rageouse as they cannot be punished too rigorously. According herevnto, Iob complayneth, that God wryteth so ouerrigorous a sentence against him, as it is ynough to make a mannes heare stand vp stiffe vpon his head. And he addeth further, that he reneweth the remembrance of the sinnes of his youth, of purpose to make him possesse them. And what doeth this Making of him too possesse them import? It is as much to say, as I could not bee stripped out of my clothes, but I must also be as it were bound. Like as when a man is in his house (for when he is abrode in the feeldes, he is after a sort stripped out of his possessions) euē so doost thou Lord make mee to keepe possession [of my sinnes.] That is too say, I cannot bee rid of this cursed and unhappie possession of my sinnes: I am so wrapped in them, as I cannot get out of them. Heere Iob acknowledgeth that God hath iust cause too scourge him: but yet for all that, hee ceaseth not too bee out of patience and to chafe. And therefore so much the more ought wee too stand vpon our gard, seing that he which was the singular mirrour of patience was neuerthelessse prouoked too such temptations.

But now let vs come to knowe why he speaketh of the sinnes of his youth. There are two reasons: The one is, bycause that in that age the lustes are seene to be whotelt. And for that cause also it is sayd in the Psalme, Psalm. 110. How shall a yoong man order his wayes: euē by keeping thy word. VVhy is there more speaking of young folk rather than of others? It is bycaute that mannes nature which is alwayes sinfull and wicked, doeth then cast vp his greatest froath, and hath the most boyling affections: and therefore hath neede of strongest brydie. For so much then as men committe moste faultes in their youth: Iob speaketh precysely therof.

And heere ye see also why David sayeth, Lord remember not the faults of my youth. Hee speaketh expressly of that age, bycause hee knew hee passed it not without offending God many waies. For there is greate vnaduisednesse, and vntruly lust wherewith a yong man is blinded, [inso much that he thinketh that] nothing is vnpossible to him, there is no stayednesse too rule him withall, but there is excesse of ouerweening and such other like things. And so ye see one reason why the sinnes of youth are spoken of here. The second reason is, that Iob ment to declare that God brought all his sinnes too remembrance, as if he should frame an indytement of all the faults that he had doone euersince he was a child. And in so doing he complayneth of ouergreate rigour, as if hee should say, Lord though I haue crewhyles done amisse, well, thou haste ben so gracious to mee as to bring mee backe and to reforme mee to thy seruice: wherefore then doost thou gather a beadroll of my faults which ought to haue bin forgotten? VVherefore comest thou to lay them before mee again? Seing thou haste pardoned mee them: it meete that I should be iangled in them new againe? Yee see then whereat Iob ailed.

And hereby wee be taught that when God wryteth bitterly against vs, that is to say when he sheweth vs all the signes of rigour, and that we be lothsome in his sight: wee must not think wee haue gained aught by finding fault with him. For we haue well deserued much more, and that is the poynt that we must alwayes come backe vnto. Furthermore of whom is it long that God wryteth bitterly against vs, and that he vseth not his accustomed sweetnesse which he is wont to vse towards those that are his? Of whom is it long (say I) that he sheweth not himself so sweete, but of our selues? For Gods presing of vs with his iudgement, is bycause he seeth well that we haue neede of such and so vehement a remedie. And for proof thereof, it is no easie matter to meeken a man that is so giuen to pride. God then wryteth bitterly against vs, to the end we should be vtterly abashed, and yet in the meane whyle he ceaseth not to receyue vs to mercie. True it is that he will hyde himself for a tyme, as he hid himselfe from Job: according as hee will say hereafter, Wherefore hydest thou thy face from mee? But let vs mark that after God hath hid his face away so for a season, he will shewe himselfe gracious and pitifull towards vs: yea verely when he perceyueh it to be mete for vs. It is true that he maketh delay and letteth vs linger in payne: but he will help vs in conuenient season. Then let vs mark, that whensoever God wryteth bitterly against vs, it is too assuage the merie within a whyle after, according as it is his office too put vs into the graue and to pull vs out againe. They that abyde in condemnation haue no will to come too Gods mercie, and to the redemption which he hath purchaced for vs, and that is the cause why they bee shet out. In the meane tyme we haue whereof to thanke God hartely, forsomuch as wee see that being woorthie too bee condemned at his hand, wee are neuertheless acquit. See how God allureth vs daily. VVhen wee come too a Sermon, there he sheweth vs what we be and what our sinnes and vices are: there he condemneth vs, and dayly pronounceth many sentences against vs, insomuch that we cannot open the holie scripture, but wee shall find some condemnation there in euery leafe. On the other side, we cannot so couer our vices but God will shew vs them, behold thou haste doone such a fault, behold thou haste committed such a sin. See I pray you how our Lord dealeth. But hath he once made vs ashamed of our sinnes? By and by after he sheweth vs that he will be mercifull to vs for our Lord Iesus Christs sake. Thus yee see what ought to make vs too magnifie his goodnesse. Furthermore although he bring our old sinnes to remembrance again: let vs assure our selues hee doeth vs no wrong therein, nother haue wee any cause to reply against him: but we haue so much the more cause too blisse him, in that wee see that when hee hath once forgiuen our old sinnes, hee receyueh vs still to mercie for euer after. In what state doeth God find vs when wee come out of our moothers womb? It is true that the naughtinesse which is in vs is not yet perceyued: but yet haue we the seede thereof inclosed in vs, so as we bee cursed already bycause wee come of a cursed and crabbed stocke. But God pardoneth vs our originall sin, that is to say, the sin that wee drayne from the roote of mankynd. Hath he pardoned vs that sin? He forgiueth vs the sinnes of our chyldhod and of our youth, and many mo sinnes doeth he continually pardon vs afterward when we be come too fortie, fiftie, and three score yeeres of age. For God is not only contented to forgiue vs a sin that we haue comitted twentie yeeres ago: but also if we come to him for a sin that we committed to day, he receyueh vs, and he is mercifull to vs. Forasmuch then as we see he is so slowe to wrath, and so foreward to shewe mercie: alas, ought we not to bee rauished with desire too glorifie him in his mercie? Lo how the reading of this sentence must bee a warning to vs not too grunt against God though now and then hee bee somewhat with the bitterest and roughest towards vs: but to pray him too assuage his rigour, and that the assuaging of the same may the more allure vs too come vntoo him. Finally Job addeth that which I haue spoken of: namely, that God holdeth him in the stocks, and that the soles of his feete (which he termeth the roots of his feete) are as it were printed within. Ye see him (sayeth he, he speaketh of himself in the third person) as a rotten tree, and as a motheaten garment: and what shall betyde then if thou list to pursue a rotten tree and a motheaten garment? VVee see yet better that which we spake afore concerning the troublednesse that was in Job. For he had such a pacience as yet notwithstanding was shaken, yea and so shaken as hee fretted and chafed against God: which thing we see in that he complained that he is set in the stocks and as it were locked vp. But let vs marke that as much at the least may befall vs. For we haue not profited so well in Gods schoole as this holie man had. Therefore we may be tormented after such a fort in our afflictions, as our impacience will bewray it self, although wee haue a true desire too hold our selues in awe vnder the hand of God. VVherefore let vs alwayes haue this point before our eyes, namely that we giue not our selues the brydle too aduance our selues against God when he seemeth to passe measure in scourging vs. For he knoweth what we be able to beare, and he will not ouerlay vs with more than he knoweth vs able to beare out. And therefore let vs not droope, but beseeche God to strengthen vs in such wise in our infirmities by his holie spirit, as wee may ouercome all the temptations wherwith it is possible for vs to bee shaken for a tyme.

Now let vs kneele downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs perceyue them better than we haue doone that we may be sorie for them, and therewithall runne vntoo him, that hee may receyue vs for our Lord Iesus Christs sake: And that although wee deserue that he should shewe himselfe a dreadfull iudge against vs: yet neuertheless he will shyne vpon vs with a fatherly countenance, to drawe vs vnto him, yea euen in such wise as it may be to haue accessse too his goodnesse, with assured trust that hee will pitie vs: And that in the meane whyle hee suffer vs not too quayle through the afflictions of this present lyfe, but that we may fight stoutly vnto the end, euen till he haue taken vs vp into the euerlasting rest which hee hath prepared for vs in heauen. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only, &c.

MAn borne of vwoman [is] of short tyme, and filled vwith many troubles.

2. He commeth vp as a floure, he is cut of, and fleeth as a shadovve, and hath no stay.

3. And thou commest to set thyn eyes vpon such a one, to call mee to the lavve.

4. VVho can bring foorth a cleane thing out of vncleannesse? There is not so muche as one.

I sawe yesterday how it is lausfull for vs to alledge our owne straitie: namely, in way of petition that it may please God too haue pitie vpon vs. For in verie deede when he perceyueth vs to bee as miserable as can bee, that is it that moueth him to mercie. But (as I sayd) wee must also beware that we murmur not when wee come vntoo God.
 VVee must not make complaintes in allegation of our owne ryght; but only keepe onward still too the end hee may haue pitie vpon vs. But Iob proceeded not that way at all. And here ye see to what purpose the holie Ghoste setteth downe the complaintes that Iob made: namely, that we should not followe that which is to be condemned in him. In this text there are goodly sayings and such as tend to a good end: but the maner is not altogether good nor allowable. Heere Iob speaketh of mannes state such as it is in it self. Man (sayeth he) batb a short and transitorie lyfe. Marke that for one point. And that it is so, he confirmeth it by similitudes. For he commeth vp as a floure (sayeth he) it is cut vp, it withereth, it is dryed vp, and it vanisheth away as a shadowe that hath no stay. VVe see then what the shortnes of mannes lyfe is: it is all one as a floure, which incontinently withereth, or as a shadowe which passeth and glydeth away. And yet for all that (sayeth he) this lyfe is also full of trouble and vnquietnesse, and for that small time which we iue in this world, wee cease not too bee vexed and stinged with store of hartgreeses, so as we haue no rest at all: so miserable is our state in it self, and in good soothe we see it.
 Considering then the shortnesse of our lyfe, and how wee be full of troubles and vnquietnesse, we haue good cause too pray yntoo God that he vse not so great ri-gour towards vs, but rather that hee will beare with vs, that wee bee not oppressed out of measure. Lo what is lausfull for vs to do. But Iob passeth further: wherein we see the excesse that is to bee condemned. Behold (sayeth he) oughtst thou too cast thy looke or thy countenance vpon a poore creature that is so transitorie as it hath nothing but miserie in it? And wherefore doost thou bend thy self that way too catch mee in a trip? Am I a fit match for thee? VVe see that Iob vnder pretence of his infirmitie would haue shifted of God, that he should not haue plagued him. Not that he was fully resolved and concluded vpon that point: but he sheweth vs what our affections are which torment vs, and which we ought to resist, as he also resisted them well. How-beeit in the meane whyle, he ceaseth not to bewray how he was tossed with many euill thoughts, as euery one of vs findeth by experience in himself. And consequently he addeth yet one sentence more. For therevpon a man myght reply, That God afflicteth not mé without cause, forso much as they bee sinners. And what can wee doo to it, sayeth he? for wee come of a corrupt and euill lump, and how should wee bee pure and cleane? No maruell if we bee full of sooyle. For from what spring issue wee? Too here Iob speake, it shoulde seeme that men ought too bee excused bycause sin is in them by nature. But so little ought this too ease our euill, that wee are so much the more faultie. Assoone as we enter intoo the world, wee are already the enemyes of God, there is nothing but rebellion and naughtinesse in vs, there is nothing but the seede of sin. Come wee once too age, the mischeef is increaced and augmented, and there is not so much as one drop of goodnesse in vs. Then let vs conclude that whereas men say [for their excuse,] that they are borne full of filthinesse: they ought so much the rather to bee cursed and reiected of God. Thus see we heere yet one faultie affection more in Iob, which is reported to vs by the holie Ghoste, too the end we may lerne to profit our selues by it, when we haue considered what our nature is. But now forasmuch as in effect wee haue Iobs meening, let vs marke what instruction is conteyned in this sentece, where he sayth, that man is of a short lyfe: and yet in the meane whyle filled with many troubles. Hereby we be instructed, first nor to set our myndes to much vpon the world, seing wee do nothing but passe away. And this is a verie common thing: but yet for all that, wee conceyue it not so well as were requisite. And for prooffe hereof, although we haue but three dayes too liue heere, yet can wee not bee vntangled from the affections and cares of this present lyfe which is tickle and transitorie. A man will neuer thinck himself too haue goodes ynough. He that is desirous to come to honour, deuiseeth and practizeth on all sides. To bee short, man is a bottomlesse pit, and an vn-satiabie gulf, insomuch that he cannot bee satisfied with all the goodes on the earth, there is nother end nor measure in him. And what is the cause thereof?

 Surely if wee considered the shortnesse of our life, our lustes would bee alayed, and our desires would not bee so headstrong if wee could consider that our lyfe is nothing. Howbeeit, in the meane whyle wee be so sharp set vpon gathering of riches, as wee think vpon nothing else. And what is the cause thereof? Our mynd is alwayes heere beneath. And so wee see that the confelsiõ which euery of vs maketh, (that is to wit, that our lyfe is but a shadowe that passeth away out of hád) is but hypocrysie and leasing. The truthe is, that it is so: but wee haue not printed it in our hartes, wee bee not fully resolued of it. Then is it no superfluous thing when as the scripture telleth vs so often that our life is nothing, and that it vanisheth away out of hand. Let vs assure our selues that ther is good cause to put vs in mind and remembrance of it, forasmuch as we forgette it, and it neuer tarieth awhit in our hartes. Thus ye see what wee haue to consider in the first place. And it is not ynough to knowe the shortnesse of our lyfe: but we must go yet further. For it were but a greef too vs too knowe that wee do nothing else but fade away in this worlde, and that our tyme glydeth away, if wee were not in hope of the endlesse lyfe: for otherwise wee shoulde be more miserable and more vnhappie than the brute beastes.
 Therefore wee must make compariõ with the hea-uenly life wherevnto God calleth vs euery day. And in so dooing, wee should despize the base and corruptible things of the world, and not be so much tyed to them as we be: and again we would aduance our selues aloft, to take all our contentation and rest there. And secondly we might well alledge the same to God as oft as wee desire him to haue pitie vpon vs. For our miseries are the things that perswade him to succour vs, and to pro-uide for all our necessities.

Thus much concerning the infirmitie and shortnesse of mannes lyfe. But there is trouble also set downe.
 And vnder that woord, Iob hath comprehended all the passions wherwith we be turmoyled, and all our inordinate lusts and likings, which are as tormenters. For a man cannot haue a woorse tormenter than himself, by punishing himself with his owne inordinate passions.
 If a man bee giuen to vaynglorie, behold, such a fire is kindled in him as he shall thinke with himselfe that hee can neuer come soone ynough to credite and estimation: insomuch that if some man happen not to honour him, ye shall see him nettled. And if forae other hinder his aduancement, streitwayes he enuyeth him. To be short, there needeth but one lust to ingender in vs a thousand others. So then, when we shall haue matched these two things toogither, then shall wee haue so much the more cause to millike of this present life. True it is (as I haue sayd afore) that this saying is not straunge to the world (for all of vs are conuicted by experience) but yet for all that euery one of vs ought too set his mynd throughly vpon it. It is not without cause that the scripture speaketh thereof, saying that although a man come to fourescore yeeres and vpwrd, wee must not esteeme the same too be any long tyme. And why? Let vs consider what our chylhdod is. VVee liue a good while in the world, before wee bee enteted intoo very life in deede. For [in our chylhdod] wee had nother wit nor reason. And verely although yoong foik haue discretion to discerne good and euill: yet do they so (as it were) overflowe their banks, as they runne at royot, and there is no settled constancie in them. Thus ye see that one part of our age passeth and slippeth away before we haue begonne to liue, by cause wee knowe not what it is. For in good sooth when a man knoweth not wherfore God created him, nor hath the skill too perceyue too what end he is set in the world: I pray you, too speake properly, ought it too bee sayd that he liueth? For hee hath no more but a confuzed knowledge. But are we come to the middle age? VVe see that then our cares increace the more. For if a man haue any regarde, he thinketh, I haue hitherto ben a rouer, I haue ben as wanton and fond as any man, and how may I now recouer the tyme that I haue lost? It will be very harde. Afterward, if a man haue a charge of children, he thinketh, go too there is no shift for mee but to take order for my state, and yet shall I neuer so soone come to it at any tyme, but I shall bee taken away from it incontinent. Thus ye see the vnquietnesse that beginneth to martr men. But is a man come to fiftie yeeres old? It may bee sayd that death is seene to summon them dayly. Although there were no diseases at all too assayle vs, yet it is well seene that wee draw neere our end. Is a man come too fowerfcore yeeres? It is seene that his graue is at hand, so as in a maner he is no more alyue. For it will greue a man to see himself vnneete for the world, he feeth that he is a burthen, and it brings many troubles, and if he bee combersome to others, he is more combersome to himself. Therefore it is not for nought that this is told vs? And why? for (as I haue erst sayd) wee set more by one yeere in this world than wee ought too doo by a hundred: and again, wee consider not how our lyfe is misgyuded when it is not put to the true vse of it. So much the more then standeth it vs in hand to bethink vs well of such sayings and warnings: that is to wit, that man borne of woman is of a verye short and flyghtfull lyfe.

But for the better conceyuing of this shortnesse, wee must also match it with the troubles that are in it. For put the case that our lyfe were farre longer: what cause haue wee too like so well of it, seing wee bee so vexed in it? VVhy doo wee not rather come too the seeking of the rest that is prepared for vs in heauen? And herewithall wee haue further too marke, from whence these troubles come vpon vs: that is too wit, from our owne naughtie affectiions. For if wee were troubled but by other folks and in the meane while were at rest in our selues, yea verely at true rest: wee myght well complayne of our disquietnesse that this present lyfe had not his free course, and that it went not in his owne pace. But forasmuch as euery man is a hangman to himself (as I haue sayd already) and our owne lustes, passions, and desyres are the cause of our vnquietnesse and incomberance: too whome or against whome shall wee make our complaint? Then let vs lerne, that when wee haue considered all well, wee must not blame God, nor commence action against him: but only find fault with our selues. For the finall point whervnto we must come, is to know the shortnesse of our lyfe, and to be abashed at it when we think therof.

But this is yet better expressed in that which foloweth when he sayth, who is he that is pure, or how can that thing bee cleane which commeth of vncleanesse or filthinesse? By this saying we be admonished, that all the miseries which we indure, procede of the corruption of mannes nature. And for the better comprehending of this doctrine, let vs note that when there is any speaking of man, or of that which is in him, the question concerneth not Gods work or creation: for Adam was created another maner of one than we be at this day. VVee be faine from the state whercin God had set Adam and all mankind in Adams persone. Adam was created after the image of God, and indewed with excellent giftes of grace, yea and vnsubiect to death. And what importeth that image of God? A perfectnesse, a rightuoufnesse, and a foundnesse wherethrough God vttered his greate riches, so that in effect man was as a mirroure of the excellent glorie that shyneth fully in God. But by sin we be bereft of all giftes of grace, and banished out of the kingdome of God. And by cause he hath forsaken vs, we are also destitute of lyfe, whereof he is the fountayne and welspring. For wherein lyeth the fulnesse of all good things but only in God? Then must we needes conclude, that being cut off from him, we be left in all miserie, yea and euen in death. But (say I) this procedeth not of our creation, but of that wee be destitute of the benefite that God had giuen vs, and hencefoorth haue it not any more.

And how are wee bereft of it? By sin. Heere a man might moue a question: It seemeth that Iobs meening is, that the cause of our vnbeleef and of all the sinnes and vices that are in vs, is by cause wee come and descend of Adams race: and wee come not of Adam, but as concerning our bodye. VVhere doeth sinne dwell? where hath he his proper seate? In the Soule. But there is no shewe of reason that mennes Soules also should come of the race and lyne of Adam. Therefore it seemeth that Iob reasoneth not aright. But wee haue too marke, that like as God created all mankynd after his owne image in the persone of Adam: euen so also through Adams sin, not only Adam himself, but consequently also all his offspring were de pryued and shct out from the grace that had bene bestowed vpon him. And whereof commeth that? By cause wee were all inclosed within his persone, according to the will of God. VVee must not heere dispute by naturall reason too knowe whether it bee so or no. It behoueth vs too knowe, that it was Gods will too giue that too our first father which he would haue vs to bee: and when he tooke the same from him, wee also were in the same ruine and confuzion with him. Then let vs haue an eye to this ordinance of God, let vs settle our selues therevpon, and let vs not beleue our owne wit and imagination. Thus ye see shortly what we haue to beare away. True it is that this matter might be dilated more at large: but it is ynough for vs too vnderstand the cheef point in two or three words: which is, too mynd the thing that is conteyned here: namely that it is no maruell though though men be full of vncleanesse, and that there is nothing in them but filthinesse. And why? For they be taken out of a corrupt lump, and therefore there is not so much as one that is otherwise. True it is that although Iesus Christ was very man: yet was he exempted from all our vncleanesse: but that was by cause he was conceived by the holy Ghost. God ordeined peculiarly that our Lord Iesus Christ should be conceived by power from above. And why? To the end that Adams vncleanesse might not light into him, nor hee be defiled therewith. But when that wee be conceived (forasmuch as it is by the common order of mans nature) we be subiect to the said corruption. It is not possible to find any one mortal wight that is not full of all vnrighteousnesse, sauing only our Lord Iesus Christ. And why? For let vs marke from whence we come. So then we haue to call to remembrance what hath bin touched: that is too witte, in what wise wee ought to alledge vnto God the shortnesse of our life and the miseries wherewith the same is subiect: which is to the end he shuld haue pitie vpon vs, and not to murmure against him. Howbeit therewithall we must also mislike of our owne life. And that is it that I haue touched alreedy: namely that if we wilt well that our life is flightfull, and bethought vs of the miseries wherewith it is fraughted and as it were pestered: we wold not be so farre in loue with it as wee bee: but heere ye see a good cause why we ought to be so much the more waker. Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs to keepe a measure in this behalfe. For there haue bin many of the heathen whiche haue knowen the thing rightly that is spoken heere, and haue bin so fully perswaded of it, that they haue bin weery and loth to liue in this world, yea & we see they haue fordone themselues. And how was that: They saue well the miseries that are heere: But wee must not come to such extremitie. VVhat then? VVhen we consider that our life vanisheth away in a moment, let vs consider also from whence the same swiftnesse proceedeth: that is to witte, from sinne. For we were not created to the end that death should haue dominion ouer vs. That is come vpon vs from our father Adam, in somuch as all of vs are gilty [of his sinne.] Therefore when there is any talke of the shortnesse of our life, we must enter into this acknowledgement of originall sinne. And againe, whence come all the miseries that hedge vs in round about, but by cause we be banished out of Gods kingdome where all our welfare lieth? Then are wee miserable so long as we be separated from God. But we be separated by reason of our sinnes: and therefore it standeth vs on hande to returne alwaies thither. VVhen we haue learned to blame our selues after this sort, we shal not deale as those do that murmure against God. How now say they? It is seene that men are as it were the chiefe worke of God among all his creatures, it was his will to shewe muche more excellencie and dignitie in them than in al the rest, and yet are they vexed and troubled beyond all measure. And what meaneth that? Verely many heathenish folke haue heerevpon taken occasion too murmure against God, as who should saye, hee had set man vpon a scaffold to make a mockerie and gazingstocke of him, notwithstanding that he seeme to be the noblest of all creatures. But when we shall haue considered that all the miseries whereto we be subiect proceede of our owne faultinesse, by cause we be all sinfull: we shall haue our mouthes stopped so as wee shall no more presume too murmure against God. Marke that for one point. But yet is not that ynough. For vnlesse we haue an eye too the remedie that God hath giuen vs: out of all doubt we shal be caried away with such desperation, as we cannot but blaspheme God. And in very deede it is certaine that those which fordoe the selues, do it as it were in despite of God. And why? For although they had knowen them selues blameworthy of their owne miseries: yet had it not booted them to the asswagement of their sorrowe and heauinesse. Therefore if we will not fall into despair: let vs haue an eye to that which is able to assuage al our anguish. As for example. First, although our life be miserable: yet neuerthelesse God maketh vs to taste of his goodnesse so many wayes, as we may well conclude that we be rightly happie, by cause he maketh vs partakers of his benefites. Our life is short: howbeit it is not so shorte but God giueth vs respite ynough to know him to bee our father and sauoure, and to talke what his power is in vs, and calleth vs vnto him. If we shuld not haue this benefite past a quarter of an houre, nor inioy it any longer time: I pray you ought we not to make account of suche a benefite? Againe, although we suffer heate and colde, and hunger and thirst, and be diuerse wayes persecuted, and besides the inconueniences that happen at other mens hands we haue a gulfe within vs, as in deede wee haue store of temptations that come vpon vs, which verely are as many incomberances: Yet notwithstanding God giueth vs some taste of his mercie in that we see he holdeth vs vp, and in that when it pleaseth him to chastise vs, either he giueth vs pacience, or else so measureth his rigoure, as we alwaies feele his goodnesse. Seeing thō that euen in the troubles and vnquietnesse of the world we haue some occasion to comforte and cheere vp our selues in God: Is not that a recompence that ought too suffice vs? can we now complaine that God hath set vs in this world? Haue we not cause rather too blisse and glorify him? Then let vs marke well that it standeth vs in hand to beware that we fall not into such extremitie, as to say, VVo worth man, it were better that he had neuer bin borne, than to be so turmoyled in this world. If we haue not the foresaid consideration, we may be sure we shall come to confusion. VVhat is to be done then? VVe must ioyne both the poynts together and say, Alas what is this present life? For we be no sooner entred in to it, but we giue vp the Ghost. And if we tarrie heere any while at all: we see nothing before our eyes but myserie. Not only the graue hemmeth vs in on all sides: but also it were better for vs to die some one kind of death out of hande, than to bee so assaulted with thousande thousande. And afterward when we haue ouerpasseed so many incomberances, in effect we do but pine away by peecemeale. Therefore if wee bethinke vs well of our estate: we shall haue good cause to mislike this world, by cause that all the inconueniences which we indure, do proceede of our owne sins. But what though? Yet dothe God in the meane while make vs to feele his goodnes, and he will not haue vs so dismayd and ouerforrowed, as we should not haue whereof to reioyce in him. Furthermore forasmuch as he sheweth vs that we be but wayfarers in this world, and that our miseries shall not continue heere for euer: the shortnesse of our life ought not to greeue vs, but rather to comfort vs. And how is that? For as for those which are so fantastickall as to say, Tush, what is mans life: It is gone with the turning of a hande, They that rest vpon that point, do fall to hartburning, and say, must we liue so small a while? Doth God play mockholyday with vs to say, returne againe to me out of hand? Could he not giue vs a longer life, or at leastwise make vs to knowe what were the remedie of our life? But we haue not one day of good time: for our lyfe hangeth by a threed, and death is alwayes betweene our teeth. Behold (I say) at what poynt they be which do altogether settle and rest them selues vpon the shortnesse of mas life. But let vs thinke thus with our selues: VVell then, God meeneth not that we should linger heere for euer. True it is that we be subiect to many miseries, in somuch that he which knoweth his owne state ought to sigh and grone continually so long as he is in this world. But God hath appointed it an end, and when he calleth vs to him selfe, then is the good and sure rest. And the care standeth not therevpon hauing a life that is equall with this life in length of time: but God maketh vs partakers of his owne life, which is endlesse. And therefore let vs be of good cheere, seeing we haue whercof to reioyce in the shortnesse of our life, and cause to be patient, and no cause at all to bee very much out of quiet. And why: For if we had a hope of the heavenly life then should we perceiue that this world is nothing. And if we be now and then disquieted. VVell may we sigh for the matter, but we shall be comforted by and by, by cause we be sure that God will bring vs to a good end by receiuing vs into his euerlasting rest. Thus ye see in what wise we ought to marke this doctrine if we purpose to fare the better for it. Furthermore, forasmuch as we see men so turmoyled with vnquietnesse, and tormenting themselues with their owne affectiōs and lusts: we haue so much the more cause to bridle our fleshly afflictions. For which of vs coueteth not to liue in peace. VVe can well confesse that although we haue all the world at wil, yet notwithstanding if we be vnquieted in our selues, behold it is so great a corzie, that all the rest is nothing woorth: we can cōfesse this. And wherein lieth our peace. In hauing our eye vpon God, and in resting in such wise vpon the loue that he beareth vs, namely vpon his free loue, as we do acknowledge ourselues to be alwayes vnhappie, till he receiue vs to him selfe: and moreover in traueling towards him and his kingdome, without setting our harts vpon these corruptible things. Lo wherein the peace of men consisteth. But in steede heereof it seemeth that we wil make warre with God, to the end he should rise vp against vs and make vs feele what an enemy we haue when he is faine to set vpon vs. And therefore let euery of vs beware that hee bridle his passions and affectiōs. For if we come like wild beasts to lit vp our selues against our God, must we not be worse than starke mad? Then let vs beare well in mind what is saide heere concerning the troublesome of mas life: let vs so thinke vpon it as it may serue to rule and correct our wicked lusts, which stirre vs and thrust vs forward vnto all euill. Ye see then in what wise we ought to practice this lesson, to receiue good and available instruction by it to our saluation. Specially vpon this poynt where it is said, that no man can make that thing pure and cleane whiche cometh of vncleannesse and filthinesse: let vs marke well that heere our Lord ment to send vs to confusion, to the intent we should not haue aught wherof to boast, but only in him and of his meere goodnesse. And it is requisite that men should be shamed after that sorte, by cause they blindfold their owne eyes, and beare themselues in hand that there is much worthinesse in them. VVe see the diuill neuer ceased yet to deface that which is conteyned in the holy scripture concerning the corruption that is in man. There haue bin heretiks ynough, which haue borne the world in hand, that originall sinne is nothing, except we follow Adam of our owne wil. But yet Gods will was that they should not altogether preuayle. Neuerthelesse, in the papacie, there is forging of free will, and there is building of morall vertues: the reason whercof is set downe afore. And to what end tendeth all this, but that men should like well of them selues, and thinke them selues to haue some goodnesse in them? Not that any body dareth saye that a man is able to saue him selfe. For euen in the papacie it will be confessed that we haue neede of Gods grace, not only in forgiuing oure finnes; but also in aiding vs with his holy spirite. And yet for all this, they say not that all cometh of him. The Papists will not confesse that. But they say, that we haue a certaine portion of goodnesse in our selues, and that God had neede to helpe vs out with the rest. Lo howe God is made a cohelper: that is to say, he must help our infirmitie, but yet must we on our side be companions with him. The deuill hath so bewitched men, as he maketh them beleue they be I wote not what: and yet for all that, we see also, that too the worldward men stande greatly in their owne conceits. How cometh it to passe that such as haue any witte or knowledge do so aduance themselues? As for them that are in credite and authoritie, are they not as idols that honoure themselues? To be short, there needeth nothing to perswade men that there is great woorthinesse in them. For although no man tell it them: yet doth euery man forge and frame store of flatterings put to vs besides, we receiue them as easily as may be, and they be fuger to vs. God therefore is fayne to knocke vs hard vpon the heads with great beetles to beate vs downe: for if he should let vs alone as we bee, pride wold dwell continually in vs, and wee wold not bow downe our necke, no her wold we be acknowne of our dette, as they say. And that is the cause why the holy Ghost speaketh to vs of the vncleannesse which is in vs by nature, as when Dauid in the one and fifteth Psalm faith, that he was begotten in sinne and that his mother conceived him in sinne: he accuseth not nother his father nor his mother, but pleadeth gilty for him selfe, as if he had said, that hee was vncleane before God, euen from his birth. Howbeit we see that Job was so carried away in his former passions, as he applied this thing to himselfe contrarie. VVherefore faith he that the thing which cometh of vncleannesse cannot bee pure and cleane? His intent is to seeke some starting hole, to abate the damnation that lieth vpon all men. But it is cleane contrariwise, as we see in the text that I alledged out of Dauid. For after that Dauid had acknowledged his horrible sinne whereby he had offended God, hee hild not him selfe contented with that, but passed further, saying: Alas Lord, it is not only in my life time that I haue done amisse: but I haue also brought such a possession of sinne from my birth, that euer since I was borne into the world I haue still increased more and more in the euill wherof I had the seed within me.

Thus ye see how Dauid did set originall sinne before his eyes, not to hunt for any pretence to cleere himselfe before God, but to passe the condemnation wherein he was. Then must we so deale, when we speake of originall sinne, as it may not bee too exempt our selues from Gods iudgemente as we see these skoffers do, whiche say, that seeing man is ordeyned to sinne, seeing hee is misframed by nature, seeing there is nothing but ignorance in him, seeing he is altogether rebellious agaynst God: what can the poore creature do? Is it meete that God should therevpon condemne vs? For certesse although we be so wretched: yet is that no shifte for vs, but it rather serueth to inhaunce our euill. VVhen Sainte Paule saith that we be naturally the children of wrath: meeneth hee too cleere men that they might haue a good care to Godward, and that our finnes might not bee layde too our charge by cause we haue the roote of them in our owne nature? Saint Paule meeneth no such such thing: but saith it is to the end that all fleshe should be confounded and all mouthes stopped before God. Ye see then to what point we must come as oft as we speake of originall sinne: namely, we must from day to day enter into the examination of our selues, to knowe that we haue offended God so many wayes as we haue deserued to die for it, and therevpon to say, Alas, when we haue gathered together all the faults that we knowe of, yet are there an infinite fort beside. For it is vnpossible that men should call to mind the hundreth part of the offences that they haue committed against God. And yet besides all this, we be borne in sinne, yea and we be foked in it, and behold we be sinners before God, before we haue any discretion. VVhen we bethinke vs of this, we shall haue cause why to humble our selues and too yeeld all glory vnto God. VVhen Iob saith, who is he that can make a pure and cleane thing to come out of vncleannesse? thereby he sheweth that men are starke mad when they beare them selues in hande that they bee pure and cleane.

The let vs bear in mind, that as in respect of our selues, there remaineth nothing for vs but confusion and decay, bycause we be so ouerladen with sinne and vices, that God might rightly cast vs away: and yet neuerthelesse that forsomuch as he chalengeth to him selfe the office of washing and clesing vs from all our spottes, we must resort to him for refuge, and that specially bycause hee hath giuen vs our Lord Iesus Christ, who hath all cleannesse in him. God seeing vs defiled and stayned, and that the way was ouerlong and high for vs to come to him: hath voutsafed to giue vs such a holines in Iesus Christ: that if we can once wash our selues in his bloud, we shall become pure and cleane from all our filthynesse. VVhen we once know what lump we come of, and that there is nothing but vncleannesse both in our bodies and in our minds: Let vs pray our Lord Iesus Christ to voutsafe to rince vs with his bloud, and to shead out those his cleere waters vpon vs, whereof Ezechiell speaketh: that is too witte, That by the holy Ghost which was giuen vnto him in all fulnesse, we may be so washed fro day to day, as in the end we may come to the purenesse which hee hath promised vs. As now we haue need of a double clesing. The one is that God should forgie our faults: and that is the washing away of our spottes. The other is that he should renew vs by his holy spirite and clesse vs from all our wicked affections and lusts. Hath he done so for one day? He must be faine to continue it all our life long vntill he haue brought vs to the perfection which we long for, and shew vs that our hoping hath not bin for nought, and that we shall not bee disappointed of oure longing, conditionally that wee haue waited for it as hee requireth.

But let vs fall downe in the presence of our good god with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs so to feele them, as we may know how greate neede we haue to flee to his mercie: and that when hee shall haue made vs to feele his goodnesse in the middes of our affliction, we may not desire to liue in this world, saue only to glorify his holy name. And so lette vs all say: Almighty God our heauenly father, we acknowledge and confesse according too the truth, that we bee not worthy to lifte vp our eyes to heauen, to present our selues before thee, nor to presume so farre as that our prayers should be. &c.

The. liiij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xiiij. Chapter.

5. Are not his daies limited? Is not the number of his moonethes in thee? Hast not thou made an ordinance vvhich he shall not passe?
6. Turne thee avvay from him, and let hym be at rest, till hys desired day come, as the day of a hireling
7. For there is hope in a tree that is cut dovvne, that it shall spring againe, and that his impes vwill grovve vp agayne.
8. Although his roote be vvaxed old, and that his body be seared and dead.
9. Yet vwill he spring agayne by force of vvater, and then vwill he spread foorth as a plant.
10. But if a man faile, so as he die, he commeth no more.
11. Like as if the vvaters should shrinke out of the Sea, and that a riuer should passe avvay.

Este day wee sawe the request that Iob made by reason of the ficklenes of mans life. The sum wherof was, that forasmuch as man is so fraile and slightfull a creature, it seemeth not reasonable that God shuld pursue him with such rigoure, and vter his force so against him. And (as we haue seene afore) he declareth that the life is not so short, but it is muche more miserable, and men are as it were in continuall torment in it.

But now hee addeth further, that God hath the life of man in his hande, and hath limited it a tearme which cannot be passed. If a man liued but for a fewe days, and that God hath not ordeined it: yet might a mā say, well, God is displeas'd and therefore he cannot abide that a little time should passe without punishing them that haue done amisse. But seeing he hath foreordained that we should liue, and al at his pleasure and determination, and seeing he hath poynted the last instant of our life and will haue vs to come to the same: seeing it is so (saith Iob) that he cannot indure that a man shuld finish his course, and come to his dayes end as dothe a hireling: why doth he not handle me more gently? And seeing we be so troubled with vnquietnesse in this presente lyfe, it may well be said that we be like a laborer that is hired by the daye. Looke vppon a labouring man, see howe hee toyles him selfe too earne a peece of money: but when his dayes worke is at an ende, hee taketh his rest, he hath his wages. Euen so is it with vs, all oure life long: bycause it is subiecte too so manye myseries, wee are in hope that when that is paste wee shall bee quite discharged. For if Deathe bee once come, it is as if wee hadde made an ende an end of our taske, we haue cause too be glad bycause we come to rest. Thus ye see what Iobs meening is. But heerewithall we must also beare continually in minde what hath bin said: namely that heere he declareth hys owne passions, which we must not allow of, for somuch as God condemneth them. And wherefore are they written? First to the end that we might see that euē the perfecteit sort, (although they be neuer so pacient faile not to haue great hardnesse in fighting againste the passions of their flesh, when God layeth his had vpon them. VVe must not thinke that Iob and such other like were made of steele, or senslesse folke. Although there were a singular stoutnesse in them, and that they indeuered theselues to obey God: yet was it not without touch of brest, for they were faine to feele maruellous stings in their flesh. And although they outtooode the temptations and gat the vpper hand of them: yet had they stormes and were tossed too and fro in the meane season. And this is tolde vs to the end we should stand the more vpon our garde, and pray God to strengthen vs, assuring our selues that although we had neuer so good a desire to honour him yet should wee be vanquished by: and by, were it not that he holdeth vs vp by his hand and giueth vs strēth from aboute to fight valiantly with stedfastnesse. Besides this, we be admonished also not to be out of hart, though we seeme at the point to quaille, nor to bee discouraged for all that. For the excellentest men that euer were, haue alwayles bin so effeebled for a time: howbeit God hath stood to them in such wise as they haue gotten the vpper hand in all their battells. And God will giue vs such victorie also, if we call vpon him, and be not so foolish as to sooth our selues in our owne vices. Finally let vs consider to what vse we ought to applie that which is sayde heere: namely, that God hath bounded the time of mans life. Very well. Is it to the end we might say he ought too leaue vs as he found vs: and that he should get him away from vs? as Iob saide yesterday that it seemed vnreasonable that God should open his eyes vpon so wretched creatures, and that he ought to let men alone there bycause they be not worthy to bee matched with him, for what strength is there in them? No. But let vs marke what a faire hande we should make if God shouide get him away from vs: I meane, if he should not guide vs to redresse vs when we do amisse. If we liue but one daye without Gods visitation we fall asleepe in our sinnes: & much more if he spare vs a long time: according as wee see that when men are in prosperitie, they know not that there is a God which is a iudge ouer them: they cannot find in their harts to be hild vnder any yoke or to be bridled: a man cannot by any meanes bring them to reason. Seing it is so: how rebellious wold we be if God should let vs alone all the time of our life? How wold we play the horses that are broken looce? There wold be no way to make vs to knowe our selues, that wee might returne vnto God. Therefore it behoueth vs to pray him to pittie vs, and so to tame all the lusts of our flesh, as we may be teachable and obedient towards him. So then let vs marke well that it was an excessiue passion in Iob to alledge that it were meete and conuenient for God to let men alone as they are, bycause their life is short and brittle, and bycause that hee him selfe hath assigned it a determinate terme. Againe it is very requisite that God should watch ouer vs and looke narrowly to vs, bycause it lieth not in vs to guide our owne steppes. And if wee were not in his protectiō, I pray you what wold become of vs? For it is pitifull to see with how many deathes we be beseeged Had not God neede then to haue a fatherly care of our life? So whereas Iob desireth God to withdraw himselfe from him, let vs pray him to draw neerer vs, and that in two sorts. The first is, that inasmuch as it is for our behoofe to be in his custodie to be maintained by him: bycause we liue not but in him, nor are susteined but by his power: it may please him to make vs feele hys presence, and to know that he is neere at hand to vs, too aide vs and succoure vs. And furthermore (which is the second point) that it may also please him to be neere at hand with vs to chastize vs when hee seeth vs too farre out of square. True it is that we ought to pray him too vse such gentlenesse towards vs, as we may not be pressed more than we be able to beare. But yet therewithall we haue also to desire him to lift vp his hand when hee seeth that we haue neede of any correction: For if hee should let vs alone, it were ynough to rocke vs asleepe and to make vs very blocks. Thus much concerning that point. But aboute all we ought to wey well that which is said heere, namely That the life of a man is determined by God, that he hath the account of our monethes in his bandes, and that he hath set an ordinance whiche cannot bee passed. Heerevpon wee haue cause to take great comfort, for that our life is in Gods hand. Behold heere what is the cause that mē are so fearefull as they dare not stirre one finger but with trembling, and it seemeth too them that this thing or that thing may befall them: namely for that they knowe not that God hath them in his keeping, and that it belongeth to him as well to take them out of this world as he hath created them. For were we throughly periwaded of that, it is certaine that we should go on our pace, and not be so tormēted as we be: So much the more then ought we to make account of the doctrine that is contained heere: that is to witte that God hath limited our dayes. Howbeit it is true that we must keepe a mean in this behalfe. For although we ought to warrant oure selues seeing our life is in Gods hand: yet must we not be rash to cast our selues geerishly into any daunger: but we must walke aduisedly according as God commaundeth vs. There are some fantasticall persons, who hearing that the dayes of a man are numbered, and that we can nother lengthen nor shorten our life, bycause it is in Gods hand and at his good pleasure: will by and by saye, very well; hen if I do all that comes in my head, it is all one: he that is borne to be hanged shall neuer be drowned, as the prouerb saies among the papists. Yea and whē the vnthrifts that are amōg vs are disposed to dally with God: they vse the same: and wold God it were not so common as it is, but in dedde it is too common, and men know wel ynough of whom I speake. So thē ye see how these despisers of God take occasion to say that we may shut our eyes and passe through fire and water, bycause God hath limited our dayes. Yea but it is not to that intent, that the scripture speaketh so. It saith that God hauing put vs into this world knoweth how long he ought to hold vs there, and that we be in his hande, and that it behoueth vs to depart hence whenfoeuer it shall please him according also as it is saide in the nintieth Psalme. Psal. 90. 4. 3 And wherefore is it told vs: to the intent we shuld learne to put our selues into Gods hand, and to say: VVel Lord seeing it is so that thou disposest of vs at thy good pleasure: giue vs the grace to liue and die according too thy good will, that we may not couet to liue longer than shal please thee, and also that our life may not seeme ouerlong to vs when thou liuest to hold vs heere, and that in the meane time we may serue thee by spending the time well which thou hast giuen vs, the rather for that it is so short. And agayne, heerevpon, Lord, seeing thou holdest our life in thy hand, and yet will not haue vs to knowe what the terme of it is, but haste referued it to thyne owne owne knowledge: graunt vs the grace to walke in feare and warely. Thou hast giuen vs meanes to mainteyne this present lyfe, thou hast giuen vs meate and drinke. Giue vs the grace to vse them soberly and with all temperance.

Moreouer thou haste giuen vs remedies: If wee bee diseased, thou wilt not haue vs too want any thing. And therefore giue vs the grace that we may not desire to tarry in this flightfull life, but only to serue and honour thee. So Lord let vs walke in all points as thou commaundest vs, according to that which is said in the one and nintieth Psalm, that God will send his Angels to garde vs that we may not stumble nor make a false step when we walke our wayes, that is to say, that we may not play the stray colts, nor skurrie heere and there, as these vn-thrifts do, who will not by any meanes submit themselves vnto God. Therefore whensoever we abide in the way that he sheweth vs: then are we garded by hym and his Angels. This done, wee must also conceiue a good and holy hardinesse when God will haue vs to enter into any daunger. As how? VVe see at this day what the state of the poore Christians is: that is to witte, that they be as sheepe in the woollens mouthes. Now if wee should go about to excuse our selues from seruing of God, and forbear to confesse our faith bycause it cannot be done without ieopardie of our life: suppose yee that God will accept so fond an excuse? No. And why? For he hath our life in his hand: let vs trust in him that he will keepe vs as he is good and faithfull: if it please him that we shall continue, it shall not be without hys will, and then will he giue vs strength and power. Thus ye see how we must applye that to our vse which is spoken heere. Otherwise, it will betide vs as we see it hath done too many others, who shrink away and giue ouer the seruice of God bycause they shun the crosse. And why is that? Their vnbeleefe is the ground thereof, bycause they know not, or at leastwise are not thoroughly perswaded that God hath appoynted their tearme, and that they cannot prolong it, do what they can. For if we were fully resolu'd of that poyn't, it is certayne that we should be the bolder to spend our selues when it standeth vpon the honoring of God and the performance of our duetie, according as becommeth euery man in his degree. I say we should haue another manner of constancie and stoutnesse than we haue. True it is that this must not make vs rash, in such wise as we should go seeke daungers of our owne heads and without aduice. But whensoever neede shall require, we shall not sticke to go vnto death, for so much as we know that men (whatsoever they attempt or praclize against vs) are able to do nothing.

So then seeing that this doctrine is greatly for oure profite, lette vs determine too beare it well in minde, and therevpon conclude, (according also as our Lorde Iesus Christ telleth vs) that the very heares of our heads are numbered, and that God holdeth vs in such wise in his custodie, as we neede not to feare that any thing can happen vnto vs without his good pleasure. True it is that Satan assayeth all the meanes he can: and on the other side we see that men make full reckning to turne all vpside downe, and it should seeme they wold confounde heauen and earth together. Yea but when they haue done their vttermoist, they are not able to take away our life except God giue them leaue and be willing therewith. And how can we withstand them? So then, let vs looke only what God commaundeth vs, let vs looke what our calling and duetie beareth to do, and let euery man imploy himselfe faithfully, assuring our selues that we shall finish our course, yea euen bycause we be in the hand of God. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpon this sentence. Now after that Iob hath said so, he addeth: That there is hope in a tree: when a tree is cut, he may spring againe, and specially if he haue nurrisshment of water, he may flourish a freish. But there is not the like hope of a man: when he is once dead, he is past recouerie (saith he) and therefore God ought to haue pitie of so poore a creature. Heere at the firste blush it may seeme straunge, that Iob cutteth off ail hope from a man when he is once dead. For it seemeth that heere is no remembrance of the euerlasting life, as though mens soules died with their bodies. But let vs note first of all, that when Iob speaketh of men, he speaketh in his passions and torments (as we haue seene already) and therefore he hath no further respect but to this present life, according as when we be pressed with any miserie, our minde runnes vpon nothing but that. If it be sommetime and we be ouerwhot, we thinke that hard frost were the pleasantest & hollosome thing that could bee. And why? Bycause we be forepossest with the passion that greeueth and tormenteth vs. So the forasmuch as Gods hand was so fore vpo Iob, he had none other regard but to get out of his presente paynes: and as for the hope of the life to come, he minded it not at all. And heere it is to be seene what menne are when they bee troubled after that sorte with aduersitie, if God doe not releue them and strengthen them.

True it is that Iob cannot be charged to haue concluded that God doth vtterly roote out men, when hee taketh them out of the world: Iob (I say) made no such final conclusion. But yet for all that we must note that he was so dazeled with his passions, that as then he remembered not that man continueth stil in God after his death, and hath there a secret life, & that the same life hath a good seed, so as we shall be fully restored to a perfectio, from which we be farre off as now: that is to witte, in his heavenly glory, and glorious immortalitie. Iob the had not that remembrance with him, to settle himselfe therevpon, but was dazeled in his passions for a time. And therefore we must looke to our selues, that we be the warer, as I haide afore. Euen so is it in the rest of these words. Certainly Iob knew wel that God doth men a singular good turne when he visiteth them. And if a man had asked him why? Is it not a great honor that God doth to vs, in that whereas we be but stinking carkeffes, yet he vnterseth to cast his eye vpon vs, and to chastise vs when we haue done amisse, as the father doth his child? He wold haue answered, Yes. But yet for all this, he was not able to conceiue it at the first brunt, that he might haue resisted hys owne passions, but was faine to be tormented and too indure great distresse. So much the more then ought we to receiue this aduertizement: Alas Lord, our life is but short and brittle, there is nothing but althinesse and corruption in vs, and yet for all that, thou forgettest vs not.

Deferue wee that thou shouldest regarde vs? Are wee worthy that thou shouldest visit vs? Alas no Lorde. For the very Angels of Heauen are not woorthie of that: and how then should we be worthy, who are but rottennesse and stinch? But what for that? Thou of thine infinite goodnesse art willing to be friendly and familiar with vs, and thou beholdest vs with pitie. And when we haue done amisse: instead of tying vs therevnto, thou still pullest vs backe to thee, and assauest all meanes to bring vs to repentaunce. And Lorde what a goodnesse is that? Lo how we ought to speake. The same also is to be said in this presente sentence, that wee may fare the better by it. For sith that men haue no strength in them selues, nor can spring and shoote forth braunches new againe as trees do which haue some roote in the earth: but do rotte away quite and cleane: let vs acknowledge the good that God doth vs in that it pleaseth hym to preferue our life after the common order of nature, and also keepeth it hidden aloft to be manifested againe in time conuenient. Therefore let vs acknowledge the same to be an inestimable priuiledge. But for the better vnderstanding of this lesson, let vs marke first that although men bee immortall, yet they haue it not of their owne strength. For it is not without cause that Saint Paule yeeldeth the title of immortalitie and euerlastingnesse peculiarly vnto God. And what shall wee say of the Angels then? What shall wee saye of men? Are they mortall as the brute beasts? It is certaine that we feele wel how god breatheth power into our soules. Ye see then that we haue this spirituall life from elsewhere and as it were do borrowe it. But that is not all. For although oure soules come not to nought, ne rotte away as our bodies do: yet notwithstanding whē they be alienated from God they be in a farre more horrible death, than if they were vtterly returned to nothing. Our state were better if we were vtterly foredone than to be separated from God and to feele him to be against vs. Then must God be faine too giue vs another life, which is, that he knit vs to himselfe by the grace of his holy Spirit, so as hee may liue and reigne in vs. If we haue this once: it is the chiefe benefite wherein we can ioy. But in the meane while God worketh after a straunge fashion and vnknowne too mans reason. For let vs consider what the state of the faithfull is during their life in this world. They are not only set in like state with the vnbelevers, but are made much more poore and miserable. For if a man looke vpon the children of God, he shall find that they be afflicted, so as it seemeth that they ought to be cut off from mankynd as though they were not worthy to liue vpon the earth. Thus ye see after what sort God suffreth his to be dealt withal. What is to be done then? Let vs come backe to that which Saint Paule saith to the Colossians, that is to witte, that we be dead, and that our life lieth hid in oure Lord Iesus Christ, and God will shewe it in due time. And by this we see a goodly similitude in that which Iob setteth downe. For he saith that the trees fade at the coming of winter, there appeereth no more greenenesse in them, and it seemeth that all is dead when the leaues are falne off, and the trees themselues frostbitten: and yet for all that, life ceaseth not to lie hid both in the rootes and in the heart of them. VVe see that when the spring time is come, all shootes forth againe, and the liuelines that was vncene for a time sheweth it selfe anew. Now if God shew vs this in the trees: will he not vtter a greater operation towards vs that are so excellent creatures? Soothly when Saint Paule speaketh of the resurrection, he reprobeth men for their beastlinesse, by cause they consider not how God doth shew vs as it wer natural figures of the resurrection, by the growing of the corne vpon the earth. Looke vpon the corne that is in the barne, it is drie, it is cast into the ground, and there it rotteth. VVe see it springeth vp againe, and for one graine there cometh vp twentie, or thirtie, or ten. Seeing then that God reneweth the graines both of wheate and of other corne yea and that euen by rotting: what will he do to men? Will he not vtter a farre greater woorke in them? Now then, are not we senselesse and brutish, when we perceyue not after what manner God woorketh to confirme vs in the hope of the life that he hath promised vs? As much is to be thought of that which he sayth here now. For when we see the trees (which in winter time were dead, or at leastwise seemed dead) become fresh and greene againe in the spring time: we must be confirmed in that which God declareth to vs, namely that although our life be hidden, and we be heere as it were in the shadow of death, yet should not that hinder vs to lifte vp oure heads continually, and looke for the resurrection that he hath promised vs. Yea and euen now although wee seeme dead, yet haue we Gods spirite dwelling in vs, which is a sufficient warrant of our life. And whensoever it shall please God to take vs out of this world, although our bodies rotte away: yet notwithstanding, seeing hee hath printed the seale of his holy spirite in our soules: thinke we that they shall perish when as he is the protector of them? So then, the frailtie that is in mans life ought too stirre vs vp the more to magnifie Gods goodnesse towards vs. If God wrought after another order, that is to witte, if when he bringeth vs backe to hym selfe by faith, he shoulde place vs heere as it were in a little Paradise, so as wee shoulde be lyke the Angels, and his power should shew it selfe in vs, and we be void of all these infirmities which we see, and our lyfe might not be like a shadow that vanisheth away, nor we be walled in with so many miseries, but God should dwell in the midds of vs and reigne peafably in vs: Verely these gracioufe gifts were so well worthy to be highly esteemed: But yet should wee in the meane while mistake them, we should not knowe from whence they come, we should be caried away into a vaingloriousnesse. As now when God humbleth vs so many waies, if wee looke vpon our present state, we see nothing but death. And yet neuerthelesse on the other parte hee sheweth vs and maketh vs too perceiue it both by experience and by faith, that we be aliue, yea verely in him, as of whose life we be partakers, and he maketh vs to see as it were in a glasse the said immortalitie which we waite for. Seeing then that God after he hath humbled vs, bringeth vs to the hope that I spake of: haue wee not the more cause to make much of his goodnesse to vsward, and to say: Alas Lord that thy spirit should dwell heere in oure bodies which are but wormes: and as for our soules there is nothing but wickednesse in them: and yet notwithstanding, thou O Lord hast chosen both our bodies and our soules to be the temples of thy maiestie, thou hast dedicated them to that vse. Lorde how greatly are wee in thy dette: How much are we bound vnto thee? Againe, although this body heere do go to decay, yet are wee sure that they shall be restored once againe, and that in sted of this transitorie lodging, we haue a dwelling place prepared for vs in Heauen, and therefore it ought not to greue vs to droope away by little and little till we be quite and cleane dispatched. Seeing we haue that, ought we not to be stirred the more to praise God? So then, we see how we may applie that thing to our instruction, whiche Iob turneth heere too an euill vse in going about to expresse the pangs that he felt, and whereagainst he fought.

And furthermore when we spake of our owne state, let vs marke well that on the one side we must consider what we our selues are, and on the other side what God is able to do, and what his power is. I haue saide alreedy that it is very requisite that men should know themselues and looke into them selues. And why? I haue told you that also alreedy: that is to witte, by cause wee neede no pricking forwarde to vaingloriousnesse. For howe frayle so euer we be, yet it is too bee scene that the most parte of vs ruffle it out, and runne riot, and forget the miseries that ought to bridle them.

VVe see thys with our eyes, and euery one of vs should be infected with that vice, if God prouided not for it. Therefore we cannot forbear the considering what our miserie and feeblenesse are, and that our life is as wretched as any thing can be. VVhē we know this, we shall haue good cause to mislike of our selues and too call vpon God and to pray him to haue pitie vpon vs. And also therewithall we must consider what his power is. And why? For if we measure that which we hope for, by that whiche wee see, what will become of it? VVhat shall become of the resurrection: VVhat shall become of the euerlasting saluation that is promised vs: VVhat shall become of his heavenly glory? For is it likely, that when our bodies are rotten, they shall bee partakers of Gods glory? Or that we, who see our selues to bee so fraile as now, must be companions with the Angels in Paradise? or specially that we shall be matched with the sonne of God? VVe knowe that all maiestie and all soueraintie both in heauen and earth are giuen vnto him. [Is it likely] that we should resemble him: or that we should be members of his body to be partakers of all that which is giuen vnto him? Can this enter into mans reason? VVhat is to be done then? Let vs acknowledge that which Sainte Paule saith to the Philippians, that God will raise vs vp by his power, whereby he made all things. See whither Saint Paule sendeth vs when he intendeth to strengthen vs in the hope of the resurrection. As if he should say, My friends, let vs not looke at that which is possible in our imagination, for God will not haue men to rest there. But let vs enter into a higher consideration, which is that God disposeth all things, yea euen about our vnderstanding, insomuch that whē we thinke vpon his works, we be astonished, and not without cause. For he worketh wōderously: insomuch that we through that power of his (saith he) whereby he made all things, are trāformed into the glory of our Lord Iesus Christ. And although our bodies be now weake, and subiect to so many necessities: yet shall they be taken into the heavenly glory.

Thus yee see the two thinges whiche wee haue too consider: namely too humble oure selues on the one side: and on the other to haue a certaine and infalible hope of that which surmounteth our capacitie, and cannot be conceiued of vs in case as we be. But heerewithall let vs gather that which Iob meeneth heere. For inasmuch as man cannot receiue of him selfe, nor is renewed as trees are, but is as if a riuer should drie vp, or as if the waters should shrike out of the sea: therefore wold he that we should not be plagued at Gods hand, so long as we be in this world. Yea but it is cleare contrarie. For if that men so destitute as they be, cannot for all that hold themselves from pride and excesse and from starting out of their bounds: what wold they do if they had no correction, as I said afore? So much the more then had God neede to abate mens pride and presumption which cannot easly correct it selfe. Forasmuch then as men do so liste vp them selues against God, and every man forget himselfe, yea and is puffed vp when he hath rest and ease. we had neede to be chastized, and to haue new correctiōs day by day. Yea verely. For if God shuld let vs runne out the race of our life without making vs to feele his roddes, and not quicken vs vp when we haue done amisse: Alas he shuld neuer come in time. VVhereto tend the correctiōs that God sendeth vs now a dayes, but to call vs to repentance? Now if God shoulde tarrie till we were dead, the gate wold bee shut, there wold be no time of returning vnto him.

Beholde (saith Sainte Paule) the acceptable dayes and the dayes of Saulation are while we be in our way. Then if God shoulde see men go astray and runne here and there, and let them go on till they were false downe and tumbled headlong into the pit whiche they coulde neuer get out of: what a thing were that?

Therefore it behoueth vs too reason contrarie too that which Iob did: that is to witte, that seeing our lyfe is short, and not in so good case as a tree (let vs put the case it were so) by cause that when wee bee departed out of the world, it seemeth that all is perished: therefore it is good that God shoulde chastize vs as long as wee lyue. And to what end? To call vs to repentance: for after death there shall bee no more time. And as for the rest, let vs not doubt (as I haue touched afore) but Iob was of opinion, that it is good for men to bee visited of Gods hande although they shunne it. But there are skoffers whiche alledge Iobs example for a shrowding shecte, saying: Behold, the holy men haue forgotten the hope of the resurrection, they chased agaynst God, and complayned that God pressed them ouerfore, in somuch that they had no leysure to subdue their imperfections: and why then shall not the like be lawfull for vs? But (as I haue declared already) although wee bee patient in bearing of Gods chastizements, and in induring them quietly as we ought too do: yet saye we not to be moued, too haue our fleshe to shewe it selfe somewhat rebellious in vs. Therefore we cannot come vnto God to serue him, but wee shall bee assayed and pricked on all sides. But what for that? VVe must still fighte, according as the Apostle saythe, that we shall get no victorie but by syghting. And the cheefe battell that we haue to syghte, is againste oure selues and againste our owne vices, and that is the thing wherin we must employ our whole force.

So then lette vs marke, that whereas Iob speaketh heere of the lyfe of man as a person without regarde of the resurrection to come: he rested not wholly vpon that poynte, (for he had well forseene what that was) but meant too expresse the passion that he felt, too the ende that every of vs should bebinke hym selfe, and not be caried away when suche temptations befall vs. Moreouer if Iob were weakened after that sorte: let vs assure oure selues that we shall bee weakened much more. Howbeit, God which assisted him, will do the like for vs also. For his power is as inuincible to mainteyne vs at this day, as it was then. Hee calleth vs too hym at thys day euen of his owne goodnesse, which is not abated that he should not make vs to feele it as well as he made his seruantes of old time to feele it. And therefore when we see all things so confounded now a days in the world, as we wote not what to say nor where to become: let vs runne to our good God, casting oure eyes vpon our Lorde Iesus Christ, who will deliuer vs from all miseries and from all the troubles that are at this day in this world. VVell then: do we feele our selues feeble and weake? Let vs looke vpon our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the power of God his father. Do we see our selues as good as already dead? The fountaine of life is come vnto vs forso much as God hath sent vs his only sonne. And to what ende. Euen to drawe vs out of the dungeons of death, and to assure vs that being vnited vnto him, we can neuer be set beside the saluation that is prepared for vs. Ye see then that if wee haue our eye settled vpon our Lorde Iesus Christ, wee shall not faile to thinke ourselues safe as well in the midds of death, as of the troubles of this world, by cause that by the meanes of him we be sure we shall come to the heavenly glory wherinto he is entered before vs, when we haue finished the course which we haue to runne, which now is subiect to so many miseries.

But

But let vs fall downe before the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying hym to make vs perceiue them better than we haue done, and yet notwithstanding after such a sort, as we may not become as folke forlorne, but returne to the remedie, desiring him to be pitifull to vs, and to shew himselfe the same towards vs, which he hath bin towards his in all times: and furthermore, that seeing it hath pleased hym to be at one with vs in the person of our Lorde Iesus

Christ, and that our Lord Iesus Christ hath giuen in his owne selfe vs so good a gage of his loue, specially by the death and passion which he indured [for our sakes] he suffer vs not to forget or to despise so greate a benefyte, but rather that we may put our whole trust in him, and by that meanes be stirred vp to call vpon oure good God in all our necessities and miseries. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs but also to all people and. &c.

Esai. 2. d. 19

The Pprophet Esay shewing howe horrible Gods wrath is and howe heauy to beare, saith that such as feele it wold fayne that the moun- taines should hide them, and wish that they might fall downe vpon their heads: and oure Lorde Iesus

Lu. 23. d. 30

Christ hath vied the selfe same words. And that is done to shew vs that we must not be so dulheaded as we be: For we know not what a thing it is to haue God against vs. True it is that we shall well ynough feele the mischief when he persecuteth vs: but that is not all, nor the chiefe thing that wee haue too do. It standeth vs in hand to wey throughly what Gods wrath is. And why so? For when we vnderstand Gods hand, then betinke we our selues of our sinnes. And therevpon we be abashed, and perceiue full well that we must needes perish except God haue pitie vpon vs. Howbeit forasmuch as we thunne that feeling: our Lord exerciseth vs to make vs throughly awake, when he intendeth to shew vs mercie. Thus ye see what is to be gathered of Iobs wordes when he saith, O that thou woldest bide me in the graue. For he preferred death before his life in cace as it was. And why: Bycause he wold haue escaped Gods hand if it had bin possible. For he knew well it was a farterrible matter to haue God to be his iudge, than to die a hundred times. And this ought to touch vs the neerer and to make vs thinke better vpon our sinnes than we haue done, too the end we may know that when we shall haue indured all the miseries of the world, it is nothing in comparison of appeering before Gods iudgemēt seate, when it cometh to the yielding vp of an account. If we be but sicke a little, we crie out alas: and if there happen vs any mischance, men shall heare vs make complaints: and yet our sinnes shall be buried all the while, and neuer come too our thought or remembrance. Heereby we shew howe vntoward we be in iudging of things. Therefore as ofte as we heare that those which haue bin scourged at Gods hand haue desired death and to be hidden in their graue: let vs assure our selues that the same is the thing which we ought to feare about all other, that is to witte, that God sheweth him selfe as it were an aduersarie against vs. And when we be perswaded that the same is the greatest daunger that can befall vnto man, we will labour by all meanes to retourne vnto him. VWhen our sinnes come to our mind Alas (will wee say) in what cace are we: For if God shew him selfe our enimie, how shal we do: in what cace shall wee be? Then let vs preuent the matter: and behold we shal be so prouoked to seeke vnto God for grace, as we shall neuer be at rest, till he be at one with vs. Thus ye see the vse wherevnto we ought to applie this lesson. And we must marke well howe he saith, I wold fayne that thou baddest hidden me in the graue, and that I were shut vp in it, vntill suche time as I were cut off. Heere he sheweth wherefore hee desireth death: namely bycause hee felte himselfe shut vp vnder Gods iudgemente, and could find no way to scape out. And heereby we be warned that our startingholes shall serue vs to no purpose in the end: and that when wee haue fished hither and thither neuer so much, wee must be fayne to be as it were shut vp. VVee shall haue profited wel for one day, if wee can beare this lesson in minde. VVhy so? For although God threaten vs neuer so much yet it is seene that there needeth not any thing to make vs beleue that we be able to shift out of it, according as euery of vs imagineth one shift or other, in somuch that our hipocrisie is the cause that Gods threatnings pierce not our harts, as were requisite. And there is nothing that prouoketh more Gods extreame vengeance, than when he sees that we make none account of his wrath. Lo what prouoketh him extremely.

So then let vs learne by that which is said heere, that whensoever GOD listeth too pinche vs in good earnest, there will be no scaping for vs nother by one meanes nor other, but we must be fayne too be fast shut vp. On the other side if God giue vs any respite, and specially if hee shewe vs how we may obtaine fauoure at his hande: let vs vse that oportunitie. It is said immediatly, I wolde that thou baddest hidden me in the graue. Heere it mighte be demanded, And is not death a token of Gods wrath and curse? Is oure comming thither too any reliefe? VVhat doothe that boote vs? Verely it seemeth too be the vttermost extremitie, and that God cannot shewe any greater rigoure vpon vs than too put vs too death. But Job hathe heere conceyued death amisse, as I haue shewed heere tofore: and that must we beare well in mind. Hee was ouerpressed with anguise, bycause GOD made hym too feele his miserie. Therevpon hee bethinketh him selfe howe hee myghte be ridde of it. At leastwise (saythe hee) I shoulde wander in the darke. But as long as I beare my fleshe, (as hee saythe for a conclusion in the ende) and so long as my soule is in me, I am in payne, I am tormented, and I haue nothing but distresse. If God had taken me out of thys worlde, I shoulde haue some ease, and there wolde be

be an ende: and (as he hath sayde afore) he should haue his ende as the hyreling, whome yee see at rest when his terme is at an ende, and his couenant come out. Thus yee see why hee desireth heere too bee shette vp in his graue. Furthermore let vs marke, that hee knewe well ynough that men ceasse not too bee vnder Gods hande by dying, but that they must bee sayne to be iudged by him, and to feele him still. Iob knewe that well ynough. But in the meane while hee had an eye too the miserie wherwith he was pressed: and he was as it were so fast tyed therevnto, as he thought not of all the rest. Ye see then that when God perfecteth a poore sinner, hee hath no further respect but to say, Alas must I be enclosed heere without remedie, and must my miserie encrease, and I perithe in the ende, because God will neuer leaue pursuyng me? The sinner hath no respect but of the thing that is so harde for him to beare. For this cause hee thought death too bee nothing, and that it shoulde serue him to bee a salue for his sores. After that manner spake Iob in desiring to be covered in his graue and to bee as it were locked vp in the same. And when hee sayeth, Vntill thou betinke thee of mee, and vnill thou set mee a day: thereby hee sheweth howe there is some feeling stil euen after death, howbeit that to his seeming as hee was then caryed away and rauished, there shall bee some respite for him to take his breath, infomuch that when he shall be gone out of this world, then shall he not be in such confuzion, nor in so hard and heauie case as he felt there. But (as I haue sayde) Iob coule not but knowe that euen after death wee haue an account too make, for hee sayeth, I will wayte in the graue vntill thou appoynt mee a time too betinke thy selfe of mee. This Betinking heere is nothing else but Gods calling of hys creatures too iudgement. But Iob was so troubled in witte, and the sayde passion did so turmoyle him, as hee iudged not with so settled a minde as he ought to doo. And why? First and formost, so long as wee liue in this worlde, what shoulde wee more desire than that God shoulde haue vs in remembrance? For if hee forget vs, what shall become of vs? Peter sayde, Get thee away from mee O Lorde, for I am a wretched sinner. Yea but we must go the contrarie way to worke and say, Lorde come neerer vs: for without thy grace, we bee nothing. So then it is very needfull that god should remember vs. And how? To mainteyne and preferue vs, so as hee vpholde vs and haue pitie vpon our feeblenesse, to releue the same and to guide vs by his prouidence. Ye see then that God must be faine to remember vs, or else our state is verie miserable. For there is nothing that a ought to be so much afrayde of, as to be forgotten of God. Lo heere one poynt. Againe, although God take vs out of this world, yet forgetteth he vs not, though he seeme to forget vs. For hee keepeth those that are his, alwayes in his hand & custodie. And as for those that are damned, they be reserued as it were in Chaynes vntill the day of executing the sentence. Ye see then that God doth alwayes beare vs in minde. And when the scripture sayth that he hath forgotten vs: it is because we perceyue not his present succors, like as if a poore man that lingreth in paine, desire God to helpe him, and feele not his helpe nor sees any likelyhood that God heareth him. Thus ye see after what sort it is sayd that he hath forgotten vs: to wit, for ought that we do perceyue. but yet for al that he remembereth vs continually. Iob then did amisse to surmize that if he were dead he should be forgotten till God should call vp all his creatures at the latter day, & summon the to his iudgemēt seat. Iob therefore did not consider this remembrance of Gods towards vs so well as was requisite. But we may well see it, if we be perswaded of that which I haue sayd: namely that God ceaffeth not to thinke vpon vs though hee leaue vs there for a little while, so as oure bodies rot in the earth, and our soules abide in suspence, wayting for the day wherin all the world shall be repayed. Moreover, so long as we liue, let vs be fully resoluēd, that there is nothing better for vs than to haue God too thinke vpon vs: yea euen though it were to punish vs. If God thinke vpon vs to make vs feele his fauor: there in consisteth all our ioy and glorie according as it is sayde in the eight Psalme. Alas what is man, that God shoulde vouchsafe to looke vpon him, and too watch ouer him? VVe be as a little shadow, we be nothing at all: and yet it pleaseth God to haue a fatherly care of our life. And ought not we to acknowledge a woonderfull goodnesse in him in that behalfe? So then we must highly esteeme the sayde mercie which God sheweth vs, in being mindfull of vs, euen too make vs feele his goodnesse. But (as I sayde) although he chastize vs for our sinnes, yet is he gracious to vs. For thereby he sheweth that he is lothe we should perish, in that he calleth vs back againe to him when he seeth vs in the high way to destruction. For are not all his chastizings as manie warnings, which he giueth vs to come to repentance? Yee see then how we ought to set the more store by Gods grace in that hee is mindfull of vs: and not desire him to forget vs. This is it in effect which we haue to remeber concerning this sentence. Nowe there ensueth, Shall the man that is dead lue agayne? For I looke for my chaunge all the dayes of my battell, or of my trauell. Heerein Iob sheweth how sore hee was troubled in minde, better than hee did afore. For hee was in suche distresse, as hee wist not what the ende of men is, or whither they shoulde bee rayzed againe or no, when they bee deade. Truly this seemeth strange at the first blushe. But wee muste marke what I haue sayde afore, namely that Iob speaketh of hys former temptations whiche hee withstoode. There is great difference betweene being vtterly beaten downe by a temptation, and betweene the feeling of it, or the being shaken with it, and yet in the meane while too withstande it. VVhat a number of euill opinions and fancies will come in our heade? According as we knowe that men receyue many mockeries at Satans hande. Beholde, one wicked fancie that commeth in our heade is that wee greatly distrust God, [as if wee shoulde saye] what canst thou tell whither God thinke vpon thee or no? Howe knowest thou whither hee hath giuen thee ouer? VVhat wotest thou whither hee vouchsafe too looke towards mortall men or no? Behold the thoughts that men haue euer among: and that is to make vs humble oure selues. And forasmuch as wee see our selues so full of vanitie: we haue so much the more need to walke in the feare before God [and to say:] Alas what a thing is this? I ought to imploy all my wittes to the glorifying of my God, and behold the most part of my wit is occupied about such maner of thoughts. Yea and there come outrageous blasphemies in my head. Greatly then ought men to be greued with themselves when they conceiue such fancies. But the faithful do repulse the incōtinently. For as soone as the deuill goes about too trouble vs after that fashion, we be armed with Gods word, & fence our selues with the buckler of faith as the scripture speaketh. Although the diuell cast firie darts at vs, as S. Paule sayth: yet enter they not so into our soules as to wound vs: the poyson of them perceth not so deepe into vs. True it is that Satan will assault vs mightily: but yet that sting of his shall be neither deadly nor infectiue. VVe then shall repulse al these wicked conceyts when we be so assayled.

Luk. 5. b. 8.

Eph. 6. c.

But the other sort are wholly possessed, and are so farre out of square, that some doubt of Gods prouidence, and other some think that God hath vterly reiected them, by meanes whereof they bee as it were vterly vnder foote. Then is there great difference betwixt a fleeting fancie that commeth in our heade for a while, and which wee withstand: and a sure perswasion that setteth it selfe and taketh root in vs. True it is that whē we shal haue fought against all the temptations of Satan, and ouercome them, yet shall we not come to a full end, but we must mourne still before God, bicause wee haue not glorified him so perfectly as were requisite: neuerthelater hee accepteth such stedfastnesse, when we resist euill after that maner. See howe Iob hath delt in that behalfe. He reherfeth the temptations wherewith hee was assayled, but yet for all that hee was not ouercome of them. And verely there are three degrees to be noted. For somtymes there come fancies to our minde, and wee driue them away out of hande. Somtymes wee shall be in paine and distresse, so that we shall bee almost tyred with them, [and say] Howe shall I outweare this temptation? But yet in the ende when Satan presseth vs therewith, God dooth still strengthen vs. The thirde degree is when wee bee vterly borne downe and ouercome. As for Iob, hee not onely came to the first degree too haue the fleeting fancie to aske whether men shall rise agayne or no: but also he came to the seconde step of temptation. For when he sawe himselfe so pressed with miserie: hee thought with himselfe, what intendeth God to do with mee? It seemeth that he is minded to wipe me quite away. And seeing I haue him mine enimie what shall become of mee? Iob then was tormented with that temptation (which was euill) bicause he marked howe God was so agaynst him: but yet was hee not ouercome. And although the battell were verie sore and harde for him to endure out: yet gat hee the vpper hande. Thus yee see after what sort we must take this sentence. For had Iob settled in that opinion, it had bene a cursed blasphemie to aske whether man shall rise agayne or no. But surely hee was assayled in such wyse, as yet neuerthelesse he abode still in the beleefe that hee had conceyued, and the spirite of God gaue him the vpper hande. VVee muste not therefore charge him with blasphemie for so dooing, neyther muste wee condemne him of misbeleefe for it. For sayth is not without fighting: it behoeth hir to bee thoroughly exercized. And howe is that done? By the diuels casting of many occasions of vnbeleefe and misbeleefe in our way. Thus yee see the true tryall of our fayth. Iob then must not be cast out of the number and companie of the faythfull for being so assaulted. Also it is too bee noted, that hee did not alonely doubt, but also was so caried away, bicause he was pressed by Gods hand. If Iob had bene demaunded whether men perish vterly by dying: he woulde haue answered no. For although the body rot away, God will raise it agayne: and the soule is referued till the last day, at which time we shall be wholly restored. Iob would surely haue answered so, if he had bin examined of death in general. But forasmuch as the case is nowe become peculiar too himself, bicause God pincheth him so sore as he woteth not where to become, insomuch as it seemeth that god is fully determined to confound and ouerwhelme him for euer: he is sore disinayd therat, & that is the cause of his doubting. Therefore let vs mark that Iob had an eie to that which was in his owne person: that is to wit, to Gods rigor, which was so great, as there was no likelihood at all that euer he should get out of the misery wherin he was. For this cause he sayth, Shall the man that is dead rise againe?

Verely he meeneth of death, in case as when God vttereth all his force to bring a man to naught. And what is that? It is as if he should say: Alas Lorde it seemeth that thou art minded to bar me of the hope which thou hast giuen vs of our rising agayne. For seing thou handlest me so rigorously, doth not this straunge dealing which thou vvest towards me, tend to the vtter fordoing of me? And when thou hast fordone me, who is he that can make me vp agayne? Then his surmizing is, not that God will put him ouer to a further time: but that he will vterly root him out of the number of creatures. And that is the cause why he demaundeth whether it be possible for a man to come to life agayne when he is once dead. It is bicause God dealeth so straungely with him, as it may seme that he is minded to bring him vterly to naught. And heereby we be warned to pray God to handle vs so measurably, as wee may alwayes haue the hope too assure our selucs, that our miserie shall not endure for euer, but that God will remedie them, and that it is his office to rayze them out of their graues which are in them. For if we beleue not that, wee must needes fall into horrible dispaire, which wil dismay vs, as we see it had happened vnto Iob, if God had not hilde him vp by strong hand. And here ye see also why it is sayd, Lord chastize me, howbeit with reason. Not that God is at any time vnreasonable: Ier. 10. 24 But by this worde Reason or Iudgement, Ieremie ment a moderate fashion agreeable to our infirmitie, when wee be not tempted so strongly but we may alwayes perceiue that God will pitie vs in the ende, and remedie our miseries. Thus ye see whereof wee bee admonished in this text when it is demaunded whether the man that is once deade shall liue agayne. As touching that which insueth, namely, I will wayte till the day of my chaunging come: some men expound it, that if Iob wist that God woulde rayze the dead, and that there were any hope of the resurrection and renewment: he would wayt for that day. But it must be taken more plainly: that is to wit, Lorde comfort me, for I am nowe at my wittes ende, I see thou vvest nothing but force, I see thou executest nothing but violence agaynst me: and so must I still fight and streyne my selfe too the vttermost, and I haue none other comfort but onely to wayte for the day of my change. See then in effect after what sort Iob vnderstoode that saying. Hee rather reasoneth with himselfe and with God, whether a man shall returne too lyfe agayne when hee is deade. As if hee shoulde say, I see my selfe heere in so wretched state, as too mine owne seeming I must be vterly confounded, and there is no meanes of recouerie. For sith that God is agaynst mee, and is minded to bring me to naught: what is to bee sayde to it? But yet heerevpon hee inforceth himselfe, and calleth his courage too him, concluding thus: yet will I wayte for the day of my change. Heereby therfore wee perceiue that Iob gat the vpper hande, and wanne the prize in that battell. For notwithstanding that he entered into debate whether he should rise agayne or no: yet in the ende hee sayth, Beholde, I will wayte for the day of my chaunge, yea even all time of my trawell. As if he had sayd, True it is that as long as my time lasteth, I wishe that God shoulde keepe me shette vp in my graue, that hee shoulde cast mee into some dungeon, and that he should cause the hills to fall vpon mee: but yet must I tarie his leysure still, yea euen in the middes of the afflictions wherein I am. And although they be harde and vnable to be endured, yet notwithstanding forasmuch as there is a change, the same must suffize me to giue me some comfort, & to nourish me in the obedience of God. Now we see what the meaning of Iobs wordes is. And we haue a good & profitable lesson lesson to picke out of this saying. First, whensoever wee be assayed by Satan, and tormented with naughtie imaginations, and specially when there commeth any distrust to leade vs too dispayre: wee must not make these disputations, but quickly and shortly conclude too resolve our selues vpon Gods truth. As howe? Some haue a pleasure too intangle themselues in lewde imaginations: and there will come some opinion in theyr heade, yea euen some opinion that is lewde, and tendeth euen to the dashing of themselues agaynst God. And heere-vpon they fall too debating and imagining whether the same be possible or no. And howe fareth it? Therefore when our heades runne vpon wheelles after that sort, and wee fall to chawing vpon the bitte, in hatching so lewde opinions which are cleane contrarie to sayth: it is all one as if men should fall to deuising of their state wyth their enemies that come too beseege their Citie. For if they giue eare to them and allow their counsell, it is the destruction of the whole towne. They will not set opē their gates to them: but it is all one as if they did. Euen so is it with those that snarle themselues in their owne lewde opinions which Satan putteth in their heades: for if they abyde by them, the ende will be the leading of them to destruction. VVhat is to bee done then? Let vs followe the experience that is shewed vs here by Iob. Verely he was assaulted daungerously when he doubted whether he should euer rize againe or no, seing that God had brought him so low. And if he had continued in that minde too the ende, what a thing had it bene? But after hee had bene so assayed, hee cutteth off the matter out of hande.

 No (sayth he) I will tarie the day of my change, how so euer I speede. Lo what we haue to do: namely to conclude according to Gods truth. Also when we conceiue any lewd imaginations that may turne vs from the faith, and from the way of saluation: we must by and by come backe and take holde of some sentence of the scripture: and when we see our selues fenced with Gods truth: the conclusion must be that we will not dispute about it seeing that God hath spoken it. Thus ye see the souerein remedie that we haue to beate backe Satan, in this behalfe: that is to wit, when he goeth about to turne vs aside from the sayth, and from obeying of Gods worde. Furthermore when Iob sayth that he will tarie for his change: that worde deserueth to be weyed throughly. Verely he speaketh of the resurrection, and therefore meeneth that we must be wholly renewed, so as the corruption which is in vs by reason of Adams sin, be vtterly done away, and god receiue vs into the immortalitie of his kingdom. Lo here the change whereof Iob speaketh: And the same is also the thing that we must haue an eye vnto. For without the resurrection we cannot comfort our selues, neyther wilal that euer man can alledge be sufficient to cheere vs.
 VVe see also that the holy scripture directeth the sayth-full thither when it purposeth to content them, and too giue them assured and settled rest. Be ye sure (say the ser-uants of God) that wee bee called to be partakers of the heavenly glorie which God hath promised to those that are his: and therefore be ye glad of it. Howbeit for the better assurance of this last change, wee must consider the chaunges that God maketh at this day euen during the course of this life, how God maketh many alterations in vs, whereby he giueth vs alreadye some taste of the last change. As for example. VVe be in some trouble, & well, we be as it were shet vp there. VVhen we looke for the ende of it, we see none, there is no remedie, it is past recouerie, and we bee forlorne: and sodeinly God hath such pitie vpon vs as we be deliuered out of hand. See ye not a change that ought to lead vs furtherforth, which is to vnderstand that there is a much perfecter deliuerance than all these are which we perceyue at this day particularly? Then let vs learne to acquaint our selues well with the chaunges that God maketh dayly, that we may bee lifted vp a high, and by that meanes be quiet till the time that we be renewed in the kingdome of heauen. Also here ye see after what maner Dauid hath spoken. For when he speaketh of the chaunges of Gods hand, whether it be in rescuing men out of trouble or in casting them into it, that saying is of great weight though it seeme nor so. For men haue alwayes this sonde opinion concerning fortune, [to say,] See what ill fortune is befallne mee, see what good fortune is happened mee. No: they see the chaunges of Gods hande, and to that poynt must we alwayes bee brought. Howbeit among all the chaunges that are made in the worlde, the liuelyest Image of the laste renewment, is Gods quickning of vs by his holie spirit, and his inlightning of vs by sayth, and his making of vs newe creatures in oure Lorde Iesus Christ as the scripture speaketh. Let vs consider what the birth of men is. True it is, that when wee come intoo this worlde, wee bring some remnant of Gods Image wherein Adam was created: howebeit the same Image is so disfigured, as wee bee full of vnrighuousnesse, and there is nothing but blindnesse and ignorance in our minde. Yee see then what the state of men is at their birth. But God inlightneth vs by his holy spirite, yea euen in such wise as wee bee able too beholde him, so farre forth as is expedient for the transforming of vs intoo his glorie and for the reforming of vs by his holy spirite. Therefore when God shall haue so chaunged vs, as wee feele him dwelling in vs, and by meanes thereof wee fight agaynst our wicked lustes: and whereas other men do ordinarily delight in their vices, and as it were bath themselues in them: we seeke the cleane contrarie: so as what euill soeuer is in vs, the same millikes vs, and we mourne for it, and therewithall follow the good, and bee altogether desirous to giue our selues ouer to the seruing of God: Is not that a woonderfull change? For such maner of doings will neuer spring out of our selues. VVhen wee taste of Gods goodnesse, so as we be sure of his fatherly loue towards vs, and specially haue the certeintie of our saluation too call vpon him as our father: See yee not a change that is able to shewe how mightfull Gods hand is? For men of their owne nature can neuer open their mouthes too call vpon God in truth. True it is that they may well haue some ceremonies, as the Heathen folke pray vntoo God, and the Papistes also do babble and make prayers that are long ynough: but all this is nothing bicause they be not assured in their prayers, nor fully perswaded that God should be their father. Do wee then see that God is willing to heare vs? Are wee desirous to serue him and to honour him? It is euen as much as if he had chaunged vs, and cast vs newe againe in a mowlde, and as though hee had put vs newe againe to making. For doubtlesse it is not for naught that the scripture calleth vs newe creatures in oure Lorde Iesus Christ. And in other places where we bee sayde too bee his woorkmanship, bicause he hath created vs to good woorkes: Saint Paule meeneth not that God hath created vs, onely to bee mortall men: but also to the intent we should do good woorkes. Therefore when God doth so chaunge his saythfull ones, yee see a speciall woork of his wherein he vttereth his power aboue nature. And heere ye see why I sayd that we must take holde of such chaunges, that we haue assured hope of the resurrection.

 If wee doubt whether God wil renew vs at the last day when we must come before him: how hath God chaunged

Psal. 77. c. 18

Eph. 2. b. 10

vs alreadie? To what purpose doth he now put his grace into vs? To what purpose shall he haue giuen vs corage to serue him and honor him? And to what purpose also shall he haue giuen vs the spirit of adoption, but to assure vs of the hope wee haue of the euerlasting glorie? All this were to no purpose. So then the chaunge that wee perceyue in our selues as nowe, is an infallible witnessse of the heauenly glorie which we see not yet, and which is hid from vs. But God giueth vs a good earnest pennie of it, according as it is sayde that the holy Ghost is the earnest pennie and pledge of it. And why? It is because of the effectes. For the holy Ghost is not ydle in vs, but rather sheweth openly that he dwelleth in vs, to make vs the children of God. And wee no sooner bee Gods children, but we must by and by enforce our selues to do good workes, and to follow his will. Ye see then in what wyze the faythfull ought too praetize this lesson. And Iob sayeth precisely, that wee will wayte for that chaunge all the dayes of his trauell. VVhich saying is woorthie too be well marked. For if we be tossed with neuer so many troubles, it is not ynough vpon some good motion and affection, to say, now must wee trust in God: for that is nothing vnlesse we holde out, yea euen in the middes of all our incounters. First of all therefore let vs marke, that hope is not a dayes bird or a monethes bird, but must continue too the ende. And doubtlesse when we be fully settled vpon Gods promises, he holdeth vs still in the same, too the end wee may not quayle euery day, but that when wee haue ouerpasseed some tyme, wee may alwayes bee stablished more and more, vntill God haue performed the things which as yet are delayed too another time. Yee see then that it booteth not too haue had some good affection, or too haue trusted in God, except it continue so throughout. And Iob hath expressed the same thing the plainlyer vnder the woorde Trauell or Battell. And why so? For he meeneth that we go not to God at our ease, as wee see well ynough. As long as we suffer nothing, we can finde in our hartes too liue still in this worlde, & to prolong our life double if it were possible. Our desire is then that God should handle vs without greewing vs, and please vs in all respects, and obey vs in all our desires. See how easily we would passe the time if we might go but our owne pace, if we might haue no temptation, and that there might be no heauinesse in feare, nor any such thing else. But it is sayde that wee must giue attendance all our life long, yea euen with fighting. In these woordes, All the dayes, there is shewed vs, that if the time linger and seeme long too vs, we must not take it for an excuse to doo euill, and too be greewed, and to giue ouer all in the middes of our journey: but we must continue to the ende. Vnder this woorde Battell or Fighting, is expressed vnto vs the state of this present life: which is, that beeing but wayfarers in this worlde, wee must be fayne too fight, too bee beseged on all sides, to be in continuall perill, to be tempted somtymes with cares, somtymes with aduersities, and sometimes with some daunger. Therefore let vs thinke vpon it. Heerewithall let vs vnderstande also that wee must fight agaynst the lustes of our owne flesh. But notwithstanding all distresses, yet muste wee still wayte for our chaunge. Thus ye see what wee haue to beare away in this streyne. And now for a conclusion Iob sayth, O that thou wouldest answere him that calleth to thee, and that thou wouldest accept the worke of thine owne hand. This serueth but for a larger declaration of the matter that wee come to treat of. His intent is to shewe what the change is that he hath wayted for, that is, that God shoulde bee gracious to the worke of his owne handes. Surely some expound this present streyne as God would beare down the worke of his handes. But that is constreyned. Therefore his meening is nothing else but that he will quietly abide Gods leysure, till he shew by effect, that he will accept him as his creature. And that is the cause why hee sayth heere, I will answere whensoever thou callest me. For Iob protesteth that he wil no more shun god nor shrinke backe from him when he calleth him, but will be readie to come, yea euen with a cheerefull courage. And why? For he knoweth that God will shew himself pitifull towards him. Thus ye see that the thing which we haue to marke in this streyn in effect, is that euen in the mids of our troubles, when it seemeth that God is sore displeased with vs, and that we shall not come any more to attonement with him, yea & that he will not reckon vs any more in the number of his creatures: when al this is come to passe: yet neuertheless we must fight against such dispayre, vntill wee haue gotten so much as to hope for the chaunge that we wayte for. See then how this text ought to prouoke vs to be of good comfort in our aduersities, and to pray God to strengthen vs so with his power, that although we be tossed to and fro with many stormes, yet we may not ceasse for all that too keepe on our way still towards him, and to make no doubt of comming thither, howfoeuer the worlde go. For although hee seeme too haue cast vs off and to be angrie with vs: yet if wee returne vnto him, and cal vpon him, he wil answere vs and stablish the hope of oure welfare by making vs too feele the loue that he beareth vs, that wee may bee throughly perswaded and out of doubt of it.

Now let vs fal downe before the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too make vs so too feele them, as the same may bee a meane too prouoke vs to returne vntoo him, with true repentance, and we may prosper therein more and more, till hee haue taken vs out of the miseries of this worlde, to gather vs into his kingdome, where wee shall inioy his euerlasting rest to the ful, whereof as now he giueth vs but a tast by his holy Ghost. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only vnto vs, but also to all. &c.

The .lvj. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the fourtenth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the rest of the exposition of the .xv. verse and then the text that followeth.

16. Nowv thou recknest my steppes, and makest no delay vpon my sinne.
17. My misdeede is sealed as in a bundell, and thou hast added to mine iniquitie.
18. A Mountayne perisheth in falling dovvne, and a Rocke vvafteth.
19. The vvaters consume stones, thou destroyest the earth vvith floods of vvaters, thou takest avvay hope from the man that is in miserie.
20. Thou vtterest thy force to overcome him, thou courest his face, and sendest him avvay.
21. He knowveth not vvhither his sonnes be exalted, or vvhither they be oppressed & distressed.
22. But his flesh mourneth so long as it is vpon him, and his soule is in sorrow.

E sawe yesterday in what wise wee may answere God: that is to saye, in what wise we may come freely vnto him: namely by knowing that he loueth vs, & that he accepteth vs as the worke of his hande. For so long as we know not whither God mistykeh vs or no, we must needs be afrayed and shun his presence, as much as is possible: and so ye see in what case the wretched creatures are whiche haue no taste of Gods goodnesse too trust in him, that they might com- 10 fort themselues. Therefore let vs marke well, that it beho-ueth vs to bee perswaded of Gods loue towards vs, that thereby we may conceyue such trust, as we may present our selues vnto him, and bee well assured that our so-ueraigne welfare is to answere him, that is to say, not too hyde our selues from his sight, but too bee alwayes willing too be guided by his hande, so as wee desire nothing but to be vnder his hand, and at his direction. But by the way we haue to consider these wordes, the worke of thine 20 handes. For, the thing wherein wee may settle oure trust that we be acceptable to God, is that he hath created vs, and that we be his. Then must wee not pretende to bee loued at Gods hande for any desertes of our owne, but bicause hee sees we are his workmanship. True it is, that we are his workmanship alreadie, in that wee bee men: But there is yet more, that is to wit, he hath fashioned vs new againe after his own Image, through the grace of our Lorde Iesus Christ. VVhen the holye Ghost teacheth vs how we should pray vnto God, he setteth these 30 wordes afore vs, Lorde we are thy workmanship. After this maner it is sayd in E. say, & likewise in the fourescore and fiftenth Psalme. VVe are thy flock, we are the worke of thy handes: and in other textes. Lorde thou wilt not despize the worke of thine handes, thou wilt not forsake that which thou hast begunne, without finishing of it. Ye see then whereof we ought to take occasion too trust in God. For if wee bee agreeable vnto him, and come vnto him, wee bee sure that hee is readie too receyue vs.
 And why? Euen bicause wee bee his creatures, and hee 40 hath formed vs, and he will not cast away the thing that commeth of himselfe. Marke this for one poynt. Howbecit, (as I sayde) wee must not looke onely too our first creation: for the hope that wee shall haue thereby, will bee verie slender, bicause Gods Image is as it were blotted oute in vs by Adams sinne. But forasmuch as God of his owne infinite mercie hath renued vs, and adopted vs too bee his children in our Lorde Iesus Christ, and imprinted his Image againe in vs: therein wee bee his workmanship, and maye come with our heades vp- 50 right too call vpon him, and assure our selues that he will not shake vs off, but that wee shall be welcome too him.
 Therefore let vs marke well this streyne, according too the profitableness thereof: which is, that men are in a wretched case when they knowe not whither God doo loue them or no. And why? For they must needs bee afrayde, and the same fearefulness muste needs cause and ingender a rebelliousnesse in them, so as they shun God, and eschue his hand as much as they can, and striue agaynst him. Yee see then that men are as wilde beastes, and cannot submit themselues vnto God, vntill such time as they know that he loueth them. But on the contrarie side, when we knowe that God fauoreth vs, then are wee bolde to approach vnto him, yea euen to answere him: that is to say, to yeeld our selues simply to his will, and to take in good worth whatsoeuer he doth or dispozeth of vs, yea and although hee scourge vs, torment vs, and put vs too distresse: yet must we still flee vnto him, as too him that hath a care of our saluation, and will bring vs therevnto.

 And howe shall that be done? Not for our desertes, but bicause God is woent too poure out his grace vpon vs, and bicause we be beholden to him for all the good things that we haue. Thus ye see that if wee acknowledge oure selues alreadie bounde exceedingly vnto God, and yet notwithstanding that he will still increafe his grace in vs, vntill he haue brought vs to full perfection: we may bee out of doubt that he will performe all that he hath begon in vs. Lo here in effect what wee haue to beare in minde concerning this streyne. Therevpon Iob entereth agayne into his complaints: And no maruill though he do so. For although Gods children doo comfort themselues in the mids of their sorowes, and set before their eyes the things that may giue them good hope: yet for all that, they cannot but be tossed with some troubles, & when they haue indured one battell, they must bee faine to enter intoo a second and a third. See in what minde Iob was. He tooke the sentence that we haue seene, to resolue himselfe that he might come freely vnto god. And the reason is, bicause God accepteth the worke of his owne handes. But nowe be-holde he is assayed newe againe. Howe? Thou maintainest my steppes (sayth he) and delayest not my sinne. The text is,
Thou keepest not my sinne But this worde keepe signifieth to watch or wayt vpon. In effect Iobs meaning is, that Gods iudgement presseth him too excessiue. Howebeit hee speaketh as a man not well at ease in his minde. For it is certaine that God is alwayes slow to wrath, as he himselfe telleth vs, and wee our selues see. VVhich of vs percey-ueth not that god vsseth great and long sufferance towards vs when we haue offended him? For if he were hastie too punish vs, what should become of vs? So then we see that God doth well ynough keepe our sinnes: that is to say, put them vp & not punish them so rigorously as we haue deserued. VVherfore then is it that Iob complayneth so?
 It is bicause he felt himself shet vp in such anguish, as he was able to indure no more. He looketh not rightly vnto Gods dooing, neither is hee able too iudge aright in such trouble: but hee complayneth according too his greefe.
 Hereby we see, that when we be so heddie in our affections, we cannot iudge of Gods works with a settled mind.
 Therefore it is no maruill though at most times we glorifie not God as were requisite, and as wee ought to doo.
 And why? For our passions doo so carie vs away, that if God doo vs any good, yet can hee not content vs. For we be like vnstiable guises, and we think that al that he dooth for vs is too little, and that hee ought to do euery thing that we would haue him. Againe if he chastize vs, we are so tender as it is a pitie to see it: by and by we fal to murmuring, we thinke him too rigorous, and although he handle vs after a gentle fashion, yet can not wee deeme so. And what is the cause of it? Our owne outrageous affections. Yee see then howe God is not glorified at our handes as he ought to be: and that is bicause we be blinded by the affectiōs of oure fleshe, which trouble vs in such wise, as we cannot haue a moderate and sure iudge-ment. So much the more ought wee to fight against such temptations, and to beate them backe, to the end we may acknowledge that God handleth vs with iustice and equitie, and that all his doings are faultlesse and according to reason. To the ende then that wee may conceyue this thing: our affectiōs must bee thrust downe, and kept as prisoners. For if it befell to Iob to deeme amisse of Gods iudgements, as we see he hath done: what will betide vs, who haue not profited the hundred parte that hee did?
 Notwithstanding Iob is somewhat to be borne withall, bi-cause that God (as I haue sayd heeretofore) handled him after an extraordinarye fashion. And if this be well confidered, it is to the greater condemnation of those that are discontented with God though he haue wayted for them with long pacience. As howe? Beholde, a man, that hath committed many offences, and whome God hath long spared, is forced in the ende too feele some correction, or otherwile hee woulde still keepe on his owne race: and therefore God punisheth him. Now as soone as wee bee touched with his hande, we fall to crying out Alas, and to lamenting as though hee were oucrigorous towards vs: and yet notwithstanding wee cannot denie, but that he hath delt gently and leuingly with vs in deferring the punishment that was due to vs. If he punish one sinne, we haue committed a hundred, and if he send vs any correction, surely it shall be light in comparison of that which we haue deserued. If we were in Iobs case, so as God pressed vs, yea and that we knew not wherefore: if he made vs not to fele our finnes (as we haue fene) but were minded too set vs as it were vpon a scaffolde for an example to others: or if he afflicted vs so without shewing vs why: howe fore woulde euerie of vs bee greued and disquieted? So then as oft as God visiteth vs wyth his rodde, let vs looke homewarde to thinke well vpon our finnes, and to consider that we haue long time afore deserued that God should shew vs such rigor. And whereas we haue bene borne withal, & not touched at the first day: let vs acknowledge our selues beholding too him therefore, and that the same proceeded of his infinit mercie, & that his present afflicting of vs is bicause we haue compelled him to do it, by prouoking him to much with our finnes: and to be short, that we haue abused his goodnesse and grace, wherethrough he bore and forbore vs so long time together. Thus ye see what we haue to note. Furthermore let vs not quarell with God though he put not vp our finnes. For what a thing were it for a man to haue euill lurking in him, if he be not purged of it? for the euill that is in him will become vncurable, whereas it might wel be remedied, if it be not delayed to long. VVe see what commeth of those that shun plisick. VVhen an inconuenience that is comming vpon vs is foreseene: if we refuze to take a purgation to preuent the mischeef, and forslow to prouide for it till it be growne to the full: it will bee past time to deale with it as then, for the disease wil haue gotten the vpper hand. If there be a strong feuer too come vpon a man: or if there bee any disease that is too bee taken out of him: if it be let alone, ye see it swelleth and rankleth, and it is ynough too make the partie lose a limme, yea or his whole bodie. For it will kindle a burning feuer, so as there shall bee no more meane to heale it. Euen so is it with vs: If God should put vp oure finnes with silence, it were euen a ranckling of them to encrease our paine: and when he should come to purge vs, it woulde be too late. And so God sheweth vs great fauour when he clengeth vs of our finnes, according as he knoweth to be meete for our welfare. Therefore we haue no cause to complaine of him, but rather to glorifie him in that hee hath a care of vs, and specially for that hee taryeth not till we aske the thing that is for our profite, but preuenteth vs by correcting the couert disease that is within vs. Thus much concerning this streyne. Nowe Iob addeth, that his sinne is sealed vp, and that God hath added to his misdoings. The worde Adde, is not taken in that sense which many men expound it, that is to wit, that God should make Iobs iniquities greater than they were, (like as a cruell man is woont to do, who when a light and pardonable fault is committed, maketh a heynous and vnpardonable crime of it, so that by this saying that God added to Iobs misdoings, it should be ment that God did make them greater & more heynous than they were in deede: ) But the text sheweth that it tendeth to another ende. For it is no new thing, (specially in Iob and in the Psalmes) to see repetitions, as which is a very ordinarie matter in the Hebrew tung. But now let vs looke to the contents of the verse. Iob borroweth this similitude, namely that God hath bound vp his finnes, as it were into a bundle, and locked them al vp together in a chest, and set his seale to it, as who should say, that nothing should escape him. And therevnto he addeth, that God hath layd a good weight vpon it, like as in Zacharie (where it is ment that God shetteth vp mens finnes) it is sayde that God layeth a masse of Leade vpon the vessel where in they are, so that after he hath shet them vp in the vessel, hee layeth a masse of Leade vpon them that they should not get out. So then Iob continueth heere the similitude that hee had set downe, saying that God hath sealed vp his finnes to the entent that nothing should escape him, and that there should not be so much as any one poynt left out. And to expresse this, he sayeth, that God hath added a good counterpeyse or weight, so as nothing can bee drawne away, but all his misdeedes must abyde before God, to come to account, and to bee iudged and condemned. Now then wee see what is the plaine meening of this sentence. And verely Iob had some occasion too speake so, bicause that (as I haue sayde) hee was pressed after an extraordinarie fashion, for that it is not Gods custome to handle men so roughly. Iob therefore had some occasion too make that complaint. But yet must we alwayes come backe to that which I haue touched: namely that he was forced with excessiue paffions, and therefore hilde no measure. For it is certaine that if God had listid to haue punished him with rigor, he could haue founde exceeding great finnes in him, and haue made him too feele a farre greater chastizement. But what for that? He considereth no more but what God is woont to do to men, and therevpon maketh his complaint. But we on our side haue first to consider, that we bee farre off from the perfection that was in Iob. Therefore whensoever the Lorde punisheth our sins, let vs assure our selues that if he chastize vs for one or two, there are three or foure, yea and a great number mo. Let euery of vs call himself to account: and when we haue well examined our life, shal we not find a gulf of sin in vs? Shall not euery man be faine to confesse that he is ashamed of himself? Let men summon theselues, & let the search a litle what our life is. And how are we to godward? VVe are but hypocrites & dullards if we be not ashamed of our selues, and as good as ouerwhelmed with confusion in that case. Sith it is so that God himself condemneth vs, can we say that we suffer not for our finnes, or that he doth vs wrong? Alas no. But we ought to know that he letteth slip a great sort of our finnes, yea and euen the most part of the, and that he is not desirous to punish vs rigorously, but giueth vs occasion to bethink vs of our finnes, and leysure to be sory for the, and to aske him forgiveness of them. Thus ye see what we haue to mark in this sentence. But herewithall let vs marke also, that Iob acknowledged his owne finnes: & that is, to the entent we should not think, that he ment to iustifie himself heretofore, or that he doth as these shamelesse persons do, who thinke themselves to be without spot, yea & that God is in det to them. Iob went not that way to work. And how then was he iustified? I haue told you already after what sort: namely by acknowledging that which God did to him. But yet for all that, Iob doth here put himselfe into the aray of sinners, and hee knoweth well that God can finde faultes ynough in him: neuerthelater it greueth him that God should handle him with so excessiue and

and vnaccustomed rigor. And hereby must we take warning, not to looke what God doth vnto other men. For that is the thing that oftentimes diueth vs to impaciencie and murmuring. VVe see that God punisheth not those which (to our seeming) haue offended as greatly as wee, yea and more too. Beholde, (say we) God beareth with such a one, and I see that if hee and I were compared together, it woulde be founde that he hath offended more than I. Therevpon we conclude, that God keepeth not so euen a hande nor such vprightnesse as he ought to do. Or if wee bee shamed too blasphemme him so: yet cease wee not too repyne at him, and too say, what a dealing is this? VVherefore dooth God punish mee for my sinnes, when in the meane while I see hee letteth others alone that are no better than I. If I looke vpon my neighbours, I shall finde them more faultie than my selfe, and yet I see not that God handleth them so rigorously as he dooth mee. Thus yee see howe men are greeued at the hart when they looke heere and there. But what? It is a sonde fashion too passe from our selues: for euerie man ought too shette his eyes, and not to looke what God dooth vntoo other folkes. Let it content vs that hee is righteous, and if hee handle me more rigorously than those whome I take too bee more offenders than my selfe: well, hee knoweth it is good and expedient for mee, hee hath a reason that is hidde from mee, and it behoueth mee to bee contented with his will, and therevpon to submit my selfe simplie vntoo him. Furthermore wee bee greatly to blame also, in that wee take vpon vs too iudge oure neighbours. For wee inhaunce their faultes, and lessen oure owne, and although wee knowe not the tenth part of the faultes that wee haue committed, yet are wee ouer sharpe sighted too marke and beare away what other men doo: yea and (which worse is) although the thing be good, yet are we so malicious that we cease not to condemne it. Therefore let vs forbear such maner of condemnings: and whensoever it shall please God to handle vs rigorously, let vs assure our selues hee hath iust cause too doo it, although the same bee vnknowne too vs as nowe. Thus yee see what we haue too remember in this sentence. And immediately Iob addeth, That a Mountayne goeth to decay, that Rockes melt, that the water holloweth the stones, and that the man that is in miserie is destroyed by God, specially if God utter his force agaynst him. Some men are of opinion, that Iob doth here compare death with the Mountaynes, Rocks, and Stones, as if he should say, how now? Mountaynes consume, and so do Rockes: but death endureth euer, death keepeth stil his strength & liuelinesse. VVhat is ment by that? But this construction is ouerforced, as men may perceyue. Othersome thinke that Iob is weary of lingring so long, and that therevpon hee sayth, Howe nowe? I cannot see mine ende, I desire death, and death commeth not. If I were a Mountayne, I might be vndermined in the while: If I were a Rocke, I might droppe downe, as we see Rockes fall into the deepe sea: and if I were stone, there needed but water too eate mee hollowe. And we see that if the sea ouerflow his bankes, it marreth a whole Countrey: and if there come a great rage of water, it maketh suche a hauocke, as neyther feild nor lande, nor cattell, nor house, nor any thing else remayneth vnturned vp. And I am a poore frayle creature, I am not so sturdie as the Mountaynes: and yet for all that, I cannot die. Verely this exposition is meetly convenient, and it draweth nie to the true naturall meaning. Howbeit, Iob ment simplie, that the mountaynes consume, and that God vseth violence towards him, according as it must needes be a great force that shall consume mountaynes and rockes. Beholde then what Iob ment. VVho am I Lord, sayth he: Thou seest there is nothing but weaknesse in me, and yet howe doest thou chastize me? Thou neededst not but touch me with thy little finger, yea thou neededst not to come neere me, giue but a puffe at me, and beholde I am vndone. For if God doo but looke vpon vs with an angie countenance, wee can looke for nothing but for death and destruction. So then God needeth not to arme himselfe, nor to gard himselfe with great power, to overcome slike creatures that are lesse thā nothing. Therefore if he vse great violence, as though he would thunder vpon the mountaynes, or as though he ment to ouerturne the rocks and to clyue them asunder, and to scatter the stones: there is no reason in so dooing. Thus yee see what Iob ment to say. But we must alwayes remember that Iob speaketh not as a man in his right wittes, nor as a man that considereth things as he ought to do, that he might minde them with reason: but singeth himselfe out of his boundes agaynst God. And why? For he sheweth after what maner he had beene tossed & shaken: not that hee resisted not the temptations (as I haue sayd afore:) but bicause he felt so vehement temptations in himself by reason of his vexation & torments, howbeit that he withstood them by the grace of God. By this we perceyue, that if God plague vs, it cannot be but we shall be troubled if wee looke vpon others, and the same is an augmenting of our owne miserie. So much the more thē must we bridle our affections, and therewithal resort vnto God, that it may please him to restreyne our lusts, and not suffer vs at any time too ouershoot our selues: and moreouer, that when he intendeth to humble vs, & therevpon giueth vs the bridle in such wise, as we can not refrayne from chafing agaynst him when hee afflicteth vs: [it may please him] to graunt vs the grace to resist & fight still, and not suffer vs to abide in those murmurings too chafe still vpon the bit: but that we may so mayster oure selues by the apparant working of his holy spirite, as wee may subdue our fleshe, and holde our selues in true subiection: and as he may dispose of vs, and we glorifie him in all his dooings. Thus yee see what we haue too beare away in the first place of this sentence. As for the rest, whē he sayth that man is miserable, and bath substore of miseries as cannot well be expresed: he meeneth to conclude thereby, that God ought not to pursue men so fore. But by the way, let vs looke a litle vpon the hardnesse that is in vs when God afflicteth vs. Though we be beaten neuer so much, is it seene that wee be euer a whitte the softer? or that we bow our neckes the more? or that he winneth vs to become teachable and obedient? Alas no. But wee see that God maye make the same complaint in these dayes, which hee made in the Prophet Esayes time: what shall I do more, sayth hee? For from the sole of the foote, to the crowne of the heade, there is no whole part in thys people. God is wearie bicause hee had chastized that people so muche, and assayde too bring them to amendment. VVell then, yee see heere a people that was beaten, and double beaten, and forworne with plagues, warres, and famine, both generally and particularly: Finally, they are become like wretched lepres that rotte in their owne afflictions: and yet for all that they are styll as stubburne or more stubburne than euer they were afore. Yee see then that oure Lorde dealeth in this behalfe as a father that seeth no amendement in hys Children, and is greeued at the hart, that notwithstanding all the correction which he vseth, yet his children are altogether stubburne and vnreformable, and therefore hee maketh his moane saying, Alas, what a thing is this? I haue lost my labor. Euen so doth God complain of his people. And see wee not as much in our selues at this day? So then let vs marke, that although wee bee miserable, and haue many defaultes in vs: yet ceasse we not therefore too bee still harde harted and stubborne. Yea and in respect of the blind pride and seerce presumptuousnesse that is in vs, and as in respect of oure rebellion and wilfull stubburnesse, in all these things wee exceede both the Mountaynes and the Rockes, notwithstanding that we bee but a little shadow or a smoke. And therefore let vs not thinke it straunge, if God vter such force for the correcting of vs. And why? For he respecteth not the infirmitie that is in vs, but the wilfull hardhartednesse wherthrough we would withstand him. Are the Mountaynes verie high? Let vs loke a little vpon the hart of man. There is suche a trayterousnesse in vs, that wee coulede finde in oure hartes too mounte about the Clowdes, yea, and too attayne too Gods throne too plucke him out of it. And although wee be but wretched carions: yet notwithstanding there is suche a malapertnesse in vs, as we woulde controll God in all his woorkes, and cannot finde in our hartes too submit oure selues vntoo him, and too say, well Lorde, holde thou the soueraignie ouer all thy creatures, and let none grudge agaynst thee: but we will put God too hislint at euery turne: and then if wee do not all things after our fashion and to our liking, we fall to checking of him. Againe if he giue vs not leaue too doo what wee list, but holde vs short: then, lo (say wee) must we be in so straye a bondage? It seemeth that God is mynded of set purpose too trouble men here, without hauing regarde of our state: but sith he appoynteth vs to liue here bilowe: why suffereth he vs not to haue at leastwise that which our nature desireth, or else why gaue hee vs not another inclination? See the deuillish pryde that is in men. Moreouer there is in vs a malicious wilfulnesse, so as if God labour too bring vs backe too him, is hee able too compasse it? Are wee teachable? On which side soeuer he turne vs, it booteth not. For we haue alwayes the sayde ouerstateliness and pride of hart. And although we haue playde the hypocrites for a little while: let a man but turne his hande, and hee shall finde that there was poyson hidden vnderneath, so as we returne too doing as wee did afore. VVee see then that this hardhartednesse hath neede too bee corrupted after a straunge fashion. And this is it which our Lorde speaketh of in Ieremie. For hee complayneth of the people, that they were vnreformable: howebeit it is vnder another similitude than the Prophete Esay dooth it, as I haue alledged afore: and the comparison that God maketh there, is verie fitte for the matter which we be nowe in hande with. God sayth that the people are like a Cake that is baked on the one side, and vnbacked on the other. As for example, let vs put the case that a man make a hote fire, and the harth is all burning and sparckling: well then, one takes a Cake and layes it vpon it: the Cake baketh not, but scorseth on the one side, and is soft paste still on the other. Euen so is it with vs: on the one part there is nothing but frailtie, according as it is seene that men can say well ynough, A'as what are men? they are nothing but wretchednesse and miserie. VV speake verie truely in so saying. Howbeit, when God visiteth vs, and chastizeth vs, doo wee shew that we can bake vnder his corrections? Nay wee will rather burne, than bake. That is too say, God shall not win one good amendment by all the chastizings that he sendeth, but we will rather fall to chafing and stomaking, and therewithall wee kinde the fyre of his wrath and vengeance. Ye see then that wheras God would haue vs to be well baked, we do rather burne. Lo why he vseth

such violence in chastizing vs. Now let vs go & complain that God should thunder vpon the mountaynes, and that there is no reason in his doing: and see if we shall mend our case by it. VVhat shall wee win by pleading so? It shall bee the next way to increace our damnation. Then let vs assure our selues, that seeing God findeth suche a wilfull hardhartednes in vs, hee muste needes set strong hande to vs, and not vse his fauourable meanes: for that will doo no good. Thus ye see what wee haue to marke in this streyne. And further let vs bee sure that when God chastizeth vs, if he strike not as boytously vpon vs as he woulde do vpon a Mountaine or Rocke: the same commeth of his mercie. But wee see it is greatly requisite that God should vse such roughnesse. For we can not say but he regardeth our welfare howe soeuer the worlde go: I say euen when he sendeth vs. For when he seemeth to haue brought vs euen vntoo hell, yet doth hee giue vs wherewith to comfort and cheere vp our selues. But wee must thanke his faterly mercie for it, and acknowledge it to be a wonderfull gracious goodnesse that God vseth towards vs, when in steede of iust thundring downe vpon vs, he sheweth himselfe so gentle and friendly, as hee seeketh nothing but to make vs feele his goodnesse. Thus then yee see in effect what wee haue too marke in this streyne. And immediately Iob addeth, that God vtereth his force so farre, that hee euen chaungeth his countenance, and frowmeth vpon him, and hee knoweth not what his beyes shall bee, whether poore or ricke, noble or vnmoble. Iob goeth on with his complaint, and sheweth that when God shall haue punished men all their life long, theyr ende also shall bee sutable therevntoo: and when they bee departed out of the worlde, they shall haue no more intelligence what is done heere. And afterwarde hee addeth for a conclusion, that so long as his fleshe is vpon him, it must needes bee payned, and his soule muste bee sorowfull, and he himselfe muste mourne. Surely this complaynt is not voyde of vnthankfulnesse. For Iob ought to knowe, that God doth alwayes mingle his fauor with the afflictions that he sendeth vs, so as we haue cause too blisse him. But he considered not that. VVhy so? Bycause hee was ouerpasionate and sorowfull. Also wee muste beare in mynde what wee haue sayde afore: that is too witte, that as oft as God scourgeth vs, wee must bethinke vs of the benefites that wee haue receyued of him, and that will helpe too asswage oure greefe. For when wee muze vpon nothing but the miserie that wee indure, wee are so ouerraught with sorowe, as wee can not blisse God, nor call vpon him, nor settle our trust in him. But if wee looke the other way, [and thinke with our selues] God hath done vs thus many good turnes, and will he not holde on still? Then oure sorowes are asswaged: and therewithall also wee recouer boldenesse too call vpon God. Heerevpon wee conclude, that it behoueth vs too be patient, and that it is ynough that he hath shewed himselfe too bee our good father, and that his correcting of vs with his owne hand, was bycause hee tendereth oure welfare. Yee see then that the thing which we haue too marke in the first place, is that Iobs rushing out intoo such rage, was bicause he looked no further but to his owne miseries: and that therefore it behoueth vs too bethinke vs of Gods benefites when he afflicteth vs, to the ende that oure sorrow may bee asswaged and sweetned thereby. And if wee doo so, wee shall find that God sendeth vs no such greefe, neither of body nor mind, but there is alwayes matter of gladnesse with it. And howe? For although wee bee subiect to manie diseases, as colde, heate, and such other sufferings: yet when wee haue this shift of approaching vntoo

Go.

God, and power to vtter our infirmities vnto him: Is it not a recompence that ought well to assuage all the sorrowes that we haue conceyued? VVe see then in what wise we may resist such maner of complaynts, which are full of vnthankfulnesse: namely by thinking vpon the benefites that we haue receyued at Gods hand in former times, & therevpon by trusting that he wil continue them in time to come. But verely we must be warned, that as long as this life lasteth wee muste be fayne to grone, and when our flesh is greued, wee must be fayne to lament. And why? To the end wee desire not to liue here at our ease and as we would wish: God hath told vs that he wil haue vs troubled in this present life, bothe in bodie and minde, and therefore it behoueth vs to make full reckening of it. But let vs marke, that euen in the middes of all our sorrowes, wee shall haue wherfore to prayse God as S. Paule doth. He calleth himself miserable. VVretched man that I am (sayeth he) who will deliuer mee from the prison of my bodie? But by and by he yeeldeth thanks to God through our Lord Iesus Christ. As concerning 20 that Iob sayeth, that the man which is departed knoweth not what is done here bylowe, nor whether his ofspring be poore or riche: It is not to grounde an article of our sayth vpon, that such as are gone out of this world know not what our state is: for Iob spake as man ouercumbered. Therefore we must not take here any certaintie of doctrine: nother is it greatly for vs too inquire of suche matters. And why? Let it suffice vs that God hath set vs in this world to communicate one with another: and euery man ought too employ himselfe vpon his neyghbours. God hath giuen mee such a gifte or abilitie, and therefore I must apply my selfe that way. Agayne one of vs may pray for another. But when he hath taken vs out of this world, the sayd communicating is taken away frō vs, and there is no more communicating as there was before: nother must we do as the Papisfts do, who are wont to runne too the decessed Saincts, as though they had not yet finished their courses. Nowe for asmuch as the Scripture teacheth vs not what wee ought to doo in this behalfe: let vs leaue that thing in doubt and in suspence, whereof wee haue no certayne resolution by the worde of God: for singlenesse of minde is also a thing wherein it behoueth vs to walke. But as touching this text, wee see in effect, that Iobs meening is nothing els but that man is miserable. And why? For as long as this life indureth (sayeth he) it is full of payne and anguise. And what is death? It is the extremest of all miseries, bicause that there a man seemeth to bee vterly rooted out. Iob spake after that maner, bicause that (as I haue sayd) he was caried away of his passions. But on our parte lette vs bee contented to languish and to haue our flesh payned, and our minde distressed during this life: for yet haue wee wherof to reioyce in God, bicause he promisseth to bee alwayes our father and Sauour. Doo we die? VVe knowe that is our aduantage, as S. Paule sayeth, Rom. 14. b. bicause that by that meanes God taketh vs out of the miseries of this worlde, too make vs parttakers of his riches 1. c. 21. and glorious immortalitie.

Nowe lette vs kneele downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs feele them so as wee may craue forgiveness of them at his hand: and that wee may bee so stirred vp to pray, as he may make vs too feele his goodness and mercie, and wee profit more and more therby: and also that all the time of our life wee may giue ouer our selues too the glorifying of his holy name, and to the praying of him as he deserueth: And that when he hath once brought vs into the right way, he will neuer suffer vs to swarue any more aside, but that wee may continue with inuincible strength and stedfastnesse, euen too the ende. That it may please him too graunt this grace not onely to vs but also to, &c.

3. VVill he reason of vnmeete matters, and of vnlavvfull vvoordes?
4. But thou pullest avvay feare, and turnest prayer avvay from God.
5. Thine ovvne mouth shall reproveth thee of vnrightuousnesse, and thou hast taken the tung of craftinesse.
6. Thine ovvne mouth shall condemne thee, and not I, and thine ovvne lippes beare vvitnesse against thee.
7. Art thou the first man borne? vvert thou created before the mountaynes?
8. Hast thou heard the secretes of God, or is vvisedome restrayned vnto thee?
9. VVhat knowvest thou that vvee knowv not? vvhat vnderstandest thou that is not in vs?
10. For vvee be baldheaded and auncient. There is an older man among vs than thy father.

When wee know wee haue spoken truth and in Gods behalfe, and yet men reiect all that we haue sayd: it is a very harde and grievous temptation. For in that case not onely 60 we be blamed in our own persons: but also we see that men refuse the things that are of God. Neuerthelesse it behoued Iob to vndertake such a battell, as we see in this streyne. He had maynteyned his case, not by suttletie, nor of wilfulnesse, nor through ignorance: and yet notwithstanding it was layd in his dish that he had taken to him the tung of craftinesse, or of the despizers of God, and that all his sayings had bene but as winde wherein there had bene no firmnesse nor reason. Iob therefore is greuously charged here for maynteyning the doctrine which he knew to bee of God. And this muste serue for our example at this day. For many are so greued when they see that men receyue not Gods worde, but rather that the most parte of the worlde condemneth it. But what for that? Seing that men haue at all times bene stubborne against God, and he could neuer yet make them too receyue that which were for their behoofe: let vs not think it straunge that we also must passe the same way, and that the authoritie of God and of his worde is imbeced by our stubborneesse and by the malice of men, considering that their iudgemēt is so awke and that they cannot giue themselves to goodnesse. And as for those that haue the charge to beare about Gods woorde and too preache it: though they see men reiect it: yet let them stande too it stoutly, and lette not such doings thrust them out of the way. For not onely Job was condemned in his sayings, but the Sonne of God also. VVee see that men were so farre off from accepting his doctine, as they did rise vp furiously agaynst it, and accused him of blasphemie. If the like bee done at this daye, it is no noueltie. But in the meane whyle lette vs determine too doo that which God comaundeth vs. Let men aduance themselves as much as they list, and lette them resist God and his truth: yet must all that bee ouerpassed, and wee must not cease to doo our duetie. Marke that for one poynt. And by the way it behoueth vs too marke, that although the woordes which are rehearsed here by Eliphaz, haue bene misapplied to the persone of Job: yet neuerthelesse, in generalitie we may gather a good and profitable lesson of them. And firste of all where as it is sayd, that a wyse man will not bring forth windie woordes, nor fill his hearers bellies with the Easterne wynde: it is the same thing which we see commonly in the Scripture: that is to wit, that our woordes ought not to bee vnprofitable, but rather well seasoned with salte, according as Sainct Paule vseth the same similitude, and afterward to expresse his meaning, sayeth that our woordes ought to bee substantiall, meete to edifie and too profit those that heare them, that they may bee instructed in the feare of God, guded aright when they bee in the way, and encouraged. Yee see then that vpon this saying of Eliphaz, we haue too marke that our woordes ought to tende too edification. And if they do so: they shall not be lyke the winde: that is to say, they shal not be puffed vp with a vaine swelling, but there shalbee a substantialnesse in them where-with too feede mens soules. And truly here yee see why it is sayd, that good and holy doctrine is as it were foode. By taking conuenient foode: wee bee satisfied, we gather strength, and our stomacke is not acloyed, but there insueth good and naturall nurrishment. Even so is it with the woorde of God. VVhen it is well applied to our vse, we bee filled with it, and wee be nurrished with it, and yet in the meane whyle there is no windinesse that breakes vp vpon our stomacke, and brings no substantiall nurrishment with it. See then the two poynts that wee haue to note. The first is that if men finde no fauour in our woordes when we haue tolde them the thing that is good, profitable, and of God: wee must not therefore be out of pacience, considering that the same hath happened not only to Job, but also to all the seruants of God, so as their doctrine had no fauour to the worldward, but was mocked at, and taken to be but winde or a trifling thing. But contrariwise on our side let vs bee well aduised, that when wee speake, it may bee too the edifying of our neighbours, and carie substantiall profite with it: and euen in our ordinarie and common talke muste wee obserue the same rule. For although we haue there some more libertie: yet notwithstanding God condemneth the vanitie that is in vs, when wee bee giuen too prattle of vnprofitable matters. Neuerthelesse wee see that men can haue no holde of themselves, nother can they make any mirth, except they raunge out into windie woordes. And are men so greatly giuen vnto that? That is no warrant to say it is therefore lawfull for them. For God findeth fault with it as wee see. Therefore let vs holde vs to the doctrine that I alledged out of S. Paule: which is that our talke muste not bee vnprofitable, but seasoned with salt, that it may edifie and profite the hearers. But about all, when the cace standeth vpon the handling of Gods woorde, it must be more neerely looked too without comparison. Then in this cace let vs haue a regard to vse such a sobrietie, as wee defile not the thing that God hath ordeyned for our saluation. For it is certayne that when wee speake of God and of his woordes, if we do but dally with it, and rayse vnprofitable questions and vayne disputations about it: it is high treason to God. And wherefore? For our Lord hath shewed vs that his woord ought to profit vs. But if we fall to handling of it after such a sorte, as wee apply it not to his right and lawfull end, but play with it as with a tennisball, and passe not for the good instruction of it, but haue our eares filled with winde, so as the same serueth but to satisfie mennes vayne curiositie: Is it not a defiling of a holy thing? Is it not a great wrong and dishonour to Godward, when the thing that serueth for our saluation, is despyzed and thrust vnder foote? So then, lette vs looke more neerely too our selues: and when we deale with holie things, let the same bee with such reuerence, as good and substantiall instruction may alwayes insue of it: that is to say, that it may so settle in vs, as our soules may bee nurrished by it. And it behoueth vs too marke well this similitude of the winde which Eliphaz vseth here. For (as I haue sayd already) if a doctrine bee good, there will bee such a substantialnesse in it, as wee shall be fedde with it, and wee shall finde that it is good too reste vpon it. Contrariwise, too what purpose are all these curiosities? True it is that there will be good store of winde, of gay shewes, and of greate likelyhoods in them: but yet for all that, in the ende they disappoynt vs. And here yee see why Sainct Paule sayeth, that knowledge of it selfe doothe but puffe menne vp, when it is not matched with loue: but loue edifieth, when wee heare Gods woorde too our owne instruction, or talke of it too the instruction of others. But if wee couet to bee counted skilfull, and by foolish vaynegloriousnesse desire euery of vs too bee esteemed sharpwitted, and to bee thought well seene in the Scriptures: what is it else but winde and puffednesse as Sainct Paule sayeth? And lo what the Diuinitie is which menne haue forged and framed too themselves by their owne vaynegloriousnesse: like as wee see that in all the Papacie, that which men call Diuinitie is nothing else but as a blast of the Easterne winde which seareth things, and hath no substance in it to feede and nourish the poore soules withall. But a man might make a generall distinction of it in twoo poynts. One parte of the Popish diuinitie consisteth in questions and quarrels that bring no fruite. And first of all they trouble themselves aboute them all the dayes of theyr life, and cannot finde any resolution of them. And why? for their minde is too seeke that which God did neuer disclose, yea and which his will is too haue hidden still from vs. Nowe wee knowe that when hee hath not spoken, hee will haue our mouthes kepte shette, and that our eares shoulde not itche too listen what it shoulde bee, but that wee shoulde bee ignorant where hee teacheth vs not. Thus yee see that our true wisdom is, not too desire to knowe more than that which God sheweth vs in his schoole. And yee see also what the Popish diuines are, whiche moue questions of those things whiche God would haue vnknowne vnto vs. They can well debate: but they can neuer conclude: for all their reasons are but gesses. But put the cace it were possible too haue certayne resolution, and too say, thus it is: yet shall a man bee neuer the more edified nor profited by being resolued of that which they debate in their schooles. For there is no disputing whither wee be saued by Gods onely

1. Cor. 8. 4. 1.

onely mercie : they shewe not, that for asmuch as wee be sure of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes, wee ought to haue so much the greater cause to prayse and magnifie his goodnesse towards vs: there is no telling what comfort wee ought too take in our aduerities. No, for there is no talke but of flitering in the ayre. The menne that doo least good, are counted of greatest skill: those are fellowes alone. For they bee contemplatiue, that is to say, they fore about in the ayre, and haue no steddi- nesse in them. Thus yee see a shamefull defiling of Gods worde, and although there were in the Papacie no doctrine that were wicked and fully false in it selfe: yet neuerthelesse that maner of veine which they haue founde out, is too bee abhorred: for by that meanes they haue peruerted the true and naturall vse of Gods worde as I sayde afore. So then let vs beare well in minde, that all suche things as serue but too puffed men vp, and too feare vp their soules in steed of feeding them and giuing them good nourishment & substance, ought to be vtterly cast away. The seconde part of the Popishe diuinitie, is too stablishe a Freedome of will in men, and too make them beleue that they haue some power in them to attayne vntoo good: or if they atteyne not fully too it, yet too bee helpers and companions too God when his grace hath preuented them, and to lift vp themselves in such wise by their owne strength, as good deseruings may proceede thereof: and that when they haue done what is in them, the grace of God shall not fayle them (as who should say, they were able to binde it:) and on the other side that they be able to purchace fauour at Gods hande by their owne workes, and that if there be any default in them, they may supplie them with satisfactions. Now then the Papists do thus teach men that they be able to do this and that of themselves: is it not a puffing of them vp with presumption and ouerweening, that they might aduance themselves agaynst God, and sooth themselves in their owne strength as though they were able to worke woonders? Marke heere a poynt which is muche more hurtfull than the vnprofitable questioning that I touched afore. Verely both of them are to be greatly misliked: but yet is there much greater harme in this latter. For if men trust in themselves, and flatter themselves in their owne strength: it is the next way to ouerthrowe them quite, it is a deadly poyson, and it is not onely a simple puffing vppe, but also a diuelishe pride, whiche serueth too sende wretched soules too destruction. By this meane then wee see, that all the Popishe diuinitie is but winde, which serueth but too puffed vp wretched soules, and not to giue them any nourishment. VVhat is too bee done then? Let vs learne too vse edifying talke, and such as may feede oure feelie soules, that wee may bee taught the feare of God, and therewithall knowe that wee can doo nothing of oure selues, but must bee fayne too drawe oute of the fountayne of all vprightnesse and iustice, and that God must be fayne to make vs partakers of his grace, for without that, we shall be voyde of all goodnesse. VVhen such doctrine as this is set forth, it will serue to edifie, and wee shall bee nourished and battled by it. Moreover let vs indeuer also to drawe our neighbours too the lyke nourishment, so as we may bee fed with Gods truth, as with the substantiall foode that must edifie vs too the full. Thus yee see what wee haue too remember in effect concerning this sentence. And streyght after, there is another declaration whiche wee ought too marke well: For Eliphaz sheweth wherfore hee likeneth sonde doctrine too a blasting winde. Thou takest away feare, and withdrawest prayer from God. True it is, that the seconde worde which hee vseth, signifieth somtimes a Muzzing, Muzzing, or Bethinking: but yet commonlye it is taken for prayer and supplication. And no doubt but Eliphaz ment heere too note the twoo principall partes of the edifying whiche wee haue too receyue by good doctrine. For what is the marke that God ameth at when hee setteth his worde afore vs? It is too holde vs in awe, and too make vs too walke in his feare, and obedience: and also too make vs put our whole trust in him, and too call vpon him, seeing wee bee destitute of the spirite of wisdom, rightuousnesse, power, and life. Marke then the twoo poyntes that wee haue too obserue, if wee intende too shoote at the right marke, and too come to the poynt whiche God calleth vs vntoo. True it is that wee shall heare of many things when Gods worde is handled afore vs. But (as I haue sayde) all commeth too those two poyntes. Eliphaz therefore intending too conclude that Iobs learning was but a winde that puffeth vp and swel- leth the stomacke, sayeth that it taketh away feare, and withdraweth prayer from God. As if hee should saye, when we be turned aside from the feare of God, and are not minded too call vpon him, and to flee vnto his goodnesse, all is but a winde that will make vs too burst, and not nourishe vs at all. By this then we may the better see what the edification is that he speaketh of. It is oftentimes sayde by S. Paule, that all must bee done too edifying. And what is that edifying? It is that wee should be taught too feare God, and stablised in the same more and more: And secondly, that wee should be taught too call vpon him, and warned too seeke all oure welfare in him alone, according also as that is the place where wee shall finde it. As touching Feare it importeth as much as that oure lyfe muste bee ruled according too the wil of God. For what becommeth of men when they knowe not themselves too bee subiect too theyr maker? They rushe out into all naughtinesse. VVe know what oure lustes are. Then if the feare of God reigne in vs, wee muste acknowledge that hee hath not put vs intoo the worlde to liue at suche libertie as wee list our selues: but reserueth his whole right ouer vs, so as wee must obey him. Beholde (I say) what this worde Feare importeth: that is to say, that we should learne to direct oure whole life to the will of God. VVe haue his law where- by he guide. h vs, & sheweth vs how to discerne betwene good and euill. Then except we will be vtterly confounded, we muste beginne at that poynt. But yet for all that, what can further vs in the feare of God, saue onely the gouernance of his holy spirite? For wee bee voyde of all goodnesse, and are giuen too nothing but euill. And if wee lay Gods lawe too the lyues of men, wee shall finde a deadly battell betwixt them, as betweene fire and water, yea, euen their whole nature: and that there is not any thing more contrarie to Gods rightuousnesse, than all the affections of our flesh. For (as Sainct Paule sayeth in the eyght too the Romanes) they are all enimyes vntoo God. Seeing the cace is so, we muste come to this praying, and forsomuch as wee drawe wholly vntoo euill, yea and are wholly caryed away and rapted vntoo furie, wee muste beseeche God too lay hande vpon vs and too guide vs, and too make his holye spirite too rule ouer vs in suche wise, as wee may freely and with a single harte sticke vntoo his rightuousnesse and vntoo all that cuer hee calleth vs vntoo: and also that hee suffer not the temptations of Satan and of the VVorlde too turne vs from dooing good: and that it may please him too forgyue vs oure faultes, and too be alwayes mercifull and louing towards vs. Thus yee see howe prayer ought to bee ioyned with the feare of God.

For it is not ynough for vs to be shewed what we ought to do, and what God requireth at our hand, and what is our ductie: but wee must also be encouraged too go to him, and to haue our whole recourse vnto him, to seeke that thing there which wanteth in our selues, to the ende that he may releue our neede, and remedie the same, as who is the chiefe and only Phisition. And when we haue well borne away this text, wee shall haue profited greatly for one day. VVe come oftentimes to sermons. But what for that? VVe do but wander if we bring not these two points, and giue not diligent hearing. For wherfore come we thither? To know what God requireth at our hands, and how we ought to walke, that wee be not as beasts in this worlde. But God alloweth none other rule but only that men should obey him and frame themselues according to his will. For all the deuotions that men can deuise, are but starke folies, according as wee see how the wretched Papists torment themselues fore, so as there is no end of doing one thing or other. But what for that? what gayne they by it? For all their doings are but their owne deuices: the Lawe of God is as good as buried among them. So then let vs beware we beguile not our selues: but let our comming vnto Sermons be to atteyne to a certieintie wherein we may not fayle. VVhich thing will then come to passe, when we admit nothing els but onely Gods will to rule and gouerne our whole life. Howbeit, that is not all that we haue to do. For it is to no purpose for men to beate our eares with preaching, and to say, behold, thus muste yee do, behold, thus doth God commaund you: vntil such time as we haue learned that it is he only that printeth his lawe in our hart and ingraueeth it in our lowels, that it is he which giueth vs power to sticke to his comādements, that it is he which by his holie spirit giueth force & effectualnesse to the doctrine, that it is he which of his goodnesse accepteth vs & forgiveth vs our sins: [I say it is all to no purpose] til we haue learned those things, and bene taught to resort vnto him, to demaund at his hand whatsoeuer we haue neede of. It is not ynough for vs to haue it tolde vs, thus and thus muste yee doo: but (as I sayd) God muste bee sayne to giue vs strength to performe that which wee shall craue at his hand. Furthermore by this we be admonished, that our fayth is not edified by aduerfitie: but that it alwayes ingendredh in vs a desire to prayse God, and to resorte vnto him. VVhen it is tolde vs that our Lorde Iesus Christ hath reconciled vs to God his father, and shed his blood to wash vs with, that wee might be pure and cleane, and that he hath payde the price of our raunsome, that wee might be quit by his rightuousnes, & so become acceptable to God, & he vse his mercie towards vs: the knowing of all these things (say I) is to the end we should thoroughly cleaue vnto him, and say, well then, how may we be faued but only by the mere grace of God, in asmuch as our Lord Iesus Christ hath made satisfaction for vs: and to the end that our fayth should rest therevpon? But must we therefore lie still asleepe? No no: but we must awake that wee may repayre vnto God, and say, where is our welfare? In the death and pāssion of our Lorde Iesus Christe, therefore we must seeke it there, for we shall not finde it among men. And how must wee seeke it but by prayers and supplications? Then let vs come vnto God, and say, Lord sith thou seest vs voyde of all goodnesse: fill thou vs with thy grace. True it is that we be wretched sinners: howbeit for asmuch as wee bee the members of thy Sonnes bodie, wee shall bee made rightuous by him. True it is that wee bee full of spottes, but he hath wherewith too clenze vs, hee hath a good washing for vs. True it is that wee bee gilty of euerlasting death, and bound therevnto: but our Lorde Iesus Christe hath set vs free from it. VVherfore, Lorde bee so good too vs, as to make vs partakers of the thing which is purchaced for vs by thine infinite goodnesse. Beholde in what maner wee ought to haue recourse vnto God, [lette vs say] yea Lorde fill thou vs with thy holie spirite, that he may leade vs by his strength: and suffer vs not to faynt for any temptation that can befall vs. Thus yee see in effect what wee haue to marke out of this streyne. But Eliphas doth afterward vprayd Iob, that he hath chozen the tung of craftinesse. This present saying importeth that he doth but mocke with God as they do which are bereft of all feare and reuerence, and haue not any more reason in them. For sometimes men shall sinne through simplicitie, and yet stande in some feare of God, howbeit they shalbe dulled [for the time:] according as wee shall see many that are not touched after a liuely sorte, but are little better than brute beasts, and yet notwithstanding there shall some feare of God lie hidden in them, which is as good as choked: well then, suche maner of folke haue more simplicitie than craftinesse and malice in the. But othersome thinke themselues to be very sharpwitted, if they can scoffe at all religion and dally with God and with his maicstie, and take vnmeasurable libertie to follow all euill of set purpose. Yee see then that the craftie or suttle folke of whom Eliphas maketh mention in this streyne, are not such as do amisse through ignorance and ouersight, but suche as wilfully and of sette purpose make none account of God, nor of the handling of his woorde contemptuously, to make a sporte or a stage play of it: for behold, that is the toppe of all iniquitie. So then let vs marke well, that if God let men runne so farre vpo the brydle, as to shewe themselues suttlewitted agaynst him: then hath Satan taken such possession of them, as it is right harde too bring them backe againe to the right way, yea and in a maner impossible. And wee see also in what wise the Prophet Esay thūdereth agaynst such kind of folke, saying, Cursed be you that make you lurking-holes: for he vseth that similitude in speaking of these suttleheaded folke, which beare themselues in hand that they can beguile God. VVhen they haue sharpened their wittes and inuented fine flightes, behold, all their straying of themselves is to abolish the feare of God. For marke wherewith they begin. If we be so bryddled (say they) that if there be but one woorde of Scripture for a thing, wee muste yeelde vnto it without gaynesaying: what a thing were that? for there are many things that are not vnderstood, and againe a man may doubt of this or that. And what a thing is it for vs to be compelled too yeelde such authoritie to Gods woorde, as it may not be lawfull for vs too aske howe the case standeth? These politike heads therefore whiche are so desirous too worke wyles with God, begin at this poynnt: namely of taking leaue to keepe men from seing what the thing is that menne call Gods woord, to the end that all mouthes should be tung-tied, and that men might raze it out quite and cleane. And when they be once entred into that doubt: afterwarde they harden themselues in it. And good reason it is that God should leaue them there, and that Satan should cary them headlong. And when they be come to that poynnt: they doo nothing else but bleare out their tung agaynst al doctrine, there is no more greefe nor remorse of conscience in them: but to be short, they be bereft of all humanitie and become brutish. Thus yee see why I sayd that it is impossible that those whome God hath left at that poynnt, should euer returne to the way of saluation. And therefore let vs beware that we hold our selues streytly in subiection vnto God, to beare such reuerence to his word, as we may shun and vtterly abhorre and detest the slights and subtleties wherin the wicked sort delight and welter themselves. For they thinke not themselves to be sharp-witted ynough, till they haue dispyzed God. Also there are of these fantasticall and fleeing heades to bee seene, who thinke themselves to bee verie dullards and of no estimation, till they haue learned to mocke God, and rid themselves quite of all Religion, so as they herken not any more too him, too say, Beholde it is God that speaketh, and he is too hee obeyed. VVe see many nowe 10 a dayes who thinke it to bee an ouergreat simplenesse too submit a mans selfe so willingly vnto God. And what meane they by it but to shake off all feare of God? To such confuzion are we come: and therefore it behoueth vs to be verie ware, and to set much store by the simplicitie which God requireth of vs. Verely his minde is not too haue vs dulheaded, for sayth is not as the Papiſtes imagine, namely that men shoulde go on lyke Goslings. VVhen the Papiſtes say, men muste liue simplie: what simplicitie meane they? It is that men shoulde not discern 20 betweene white and blacke, nor knowe what they ought to holde and to follow. But God (as I sayd) will not haue vs so ignorant, we must bee children in lewdnesse, and not in vnderstanding (as Saint Peter sayth) and wee must learne of God, and fetch light at the brightnesse of his holy spirite and of his woorde, that we liue not lewdly, but desire to be fed with the foode of simplicitie and vprightnesse as with milke. For like as God handled his children after that maner in olde time: so will hee haue the same foode set before vs at this day also. But by the way we haue to note, that Gods seruants must be readie 30 armed agaynst suche stumbling blockes, when men cast them in the teeth that they dispize God, and that they whole drift is too bring all too confuzion, as now adayes the Papiſts are so shamelesse, as to vpbrayde vs that wee seeke nothing but to bring men to a fleshy libertie, that there might bee no more honestie among men, nor any mā passe to serue God, or to exercise himself in brotherly charitie. VVell this is layde to our charge: but not to our charge alone. VVe see that Iob was assayed wyth 40 the ike temptations: and therefore let vs beare them with such pacience, as we may shew before God and the worlde, that men doo vs wrong in charging vs with that euill: and well may we answer so, if we haue had an eie to frame our selues to that which God sheweth, and too giue attentiu care to that which he sayth to vs: and furthermore that wee challenge not the knowledge of any thing but that which we haue learned in his schoole, that we may continue in the same. For that onely worde is ynough too beate backe all the slaunders which the enemies of the truth do lay vpon vs. Herewithal let vs turne men away from trust in themselves. For whereas we be commaunded to serue God purely, is it not too the ende we should put our whole trust in him, and that we should vnderstande howe we ought not to do whatsoeuer seemeth good too our selues, too turne aside eyther too the right hande or too the left, but simplie in all respectes follow whatsoeuer God commaundeth vs: Ye see then that we ought to be pure afore God, and also to haue a good report among men that we walke aright. But if wicked 60 folke slander vs, we must beare it patiently, and yet for all that, knowe them too bee impudent and shamelesse. Eliphaz hauing spoken so, addeth that Iob ought not too trust so much to his own wit. Art thou the first man (saith he) wart thou borne before the mountaynes? Heere are ancient and gray beaded men, yea euen such as are elder than thy father? Art thou of counsell with God? VVhen Eliphaz vpbraydeth Iob after this fashion, that hee is not olde ynough, and that he ought not to take vpon him such a libertie of iudging: verely hee hath some colour in his saying, as we haue seene afore. For when God is so gracious vnto a man as to let him liue long time heere: hee may well haue learned many a thing. And agayne wee knowe that mennes wittes are the better settled by age, and that yong men cast fourth many bubbles, which age represseth. So then it is too bee presumed, that an olde man forasmuch as hee hath profited by liuing long in 10 this worlde, ought to be perfecter and to haue more certaine skill than other men. But yet for all this, we see that in steed of profiting by long life, the most part go backwarde. For men might oftentimes with their age attaine to good knowledge and vnderstanding, yea and vnto some wisedome. Howbeit forasmuch as naturally wee go from euill to worse, if God vpholde vs not: Therefore it is to bee seene that the most part of men become more fooles in their age than they were in their youth. Marke that for one poynt. Agayne also there is no trusting in oure owne agednesse in respect of Gods wisedome: For hee dealeth it fourth as it pleaseth him, both to yong and olde: according as hee sayeth by the Prophete loell: Beholde, the dayes shall come that I will poure oute my spirite vpon all fleshe. Your olde men 10 sayeth hee, shall dreame dreames, (that is too say) they shall bee my Prophetes, for I will teach them) and your sonnes and daughters shall see visions. In that place wee see how God calleth as well yong as olde, and as well women as men, to the receyuing of that wisedome which he sendeth into the worlde. And so must all the glory [of age] be throwne downe, and when old folke haue liued neuer so long, and haue neuer so muche experience, it behoueth the to know that yet for al that, it foloweth not that they must needs know the secrets of the kingdome of heauen. For that is in the hand of god, & men must not presume to know it by reason of long time. True it is that if God call vs in our childehoode, we ought to be confirmed more and more. But age is not the thing that bringeth that. It is the working of Gods grace, and euerywhit 20 of it proceedeth from him. Therefore we haue no cause to stande in our owne conceyte nor to brag, as if hee had any thing at our handes. Heerein wee see what the doctrine of the Papiſtes is, who grounde all the foundation of their fayth vpon antiquitie, saying: See sirs, oure doctrine is not newe, it is not start vp yesterday, nor a yeare [or twaine] ago: but the worlde hath liued so long tyme and wee bee in possession of it. But what is that too the purpose afore God? For the cace standeth vpon the hauing of the euerlasting truth, which hath beene from before the making of the worlde. And so wee must go to God, and to our Lorde Iesus Christ, if wee will haue a sure resting stocke for our fayth to leane vnto. For the matter concerneth not a score of yeares, nor foure hundred, no nor a thousande: wee muste haue the euerlasting truth which hath beene disclosed to vs from the making of the worlde. For if wee haue that, oure fayth shall bee well settled. But if that want, all is but vanitie, wee shall alwayes bee in a mammering, there needeth but one little blaste of wynde, and beholde, oure fayth is quite blowne downe. Then let vs beare in minde, that antiquitie muste not beare suche sway with vs, but that yong folke maye vtterly refuse to bee ruled by suche as are their elders, specially if they go about to turne them from that which they haue learned concerning the onely one God, and hys truth. Lo what wee haue too marke. And heere wythall as for those that haue liued long time in this worlde, let them not glorie in theyr age, nor say that they ought 30

too take other folkes in a trip : but rather know that they are so much the more bound vnto God, for giuing them the means and occasions too bee fetted and stayed : and furthermore lette them father all their wisdom vpon God so as all pryde be cast downe, that they imagine not themselves too haue gotten any knowledge eyther by length of tyme, or by finenesse of witte, or by their owne forecast, or by their great experience, or by any thing els. How then? Bycause it hath pleased God too poure out his spirite vpon vs, that wee might knowe howe greatly wee be beholden vnto him. And lette the yong men also on their side knowe, that if God haue giuen them any gifte of grace : it is bicause he will not leaue them destitute of his spirite, no more than the olde folke and such as haue liued a long time : but intendeth too shewe that in making vs all partakers of the selfesame grace of his spirite, he will also make vs all heyres of his heauenly kingdome and to come to his euerlasting glorie, which he hath now reuealed vnto vs alreadie in part.

Now let vs kneele downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may flee to him alone, as to the partie that is able to remedie all our harmes, and seeke him in such wise, as wee may bee hilde prisoners vnder his obedience, and not desire any thing but too sticke purely and simply to his woorde, renouncing what soeuer is of our owne nature, bicause there is nothing but corruption and frowardnesse in it, and also praying him to renew vs in such wise by his holie spirite, that by being likenessen too his image, wee may haue so much the better certentie and prooffe that he taketh vs for his children, and wee also may yeelde him thanks agayne as too our father. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely too vs, but also to all people, &c.

The. lviij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the fiftenth Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the viij. ix. and x. verses, and then vpon that which followeth.

11. Seeme Gods comfortes a small thing vnto thee? and is this straunge vnto thee?
12. Why is thy heart rauished : and why do thyne eyes make signe, 13. That thou bucklest thy self against God, and vtterest the vvordes of thy mouth before him?
14. What is man that he should bee cleane? or he that is borne of vvoman, that he should bee rightuous?
15. Behold, he findeth no stedfastnesse in his Saints, nother are the heauens cleane in his sight :
16. And hovv much more is man abhominable and filthie, vvho drinketh iniquities as vvater?

He sawe yesterday the reproch that was offered vnto Iob in respect of his age : and therevpon I sayde it was good reason, that yong folke should bee ruled by the counsell of their elders, and giue eare to such as haue had more experience by reason of long vse : and also that forasmuch as God hath giuen old men the grace to liue long, they ought too consider that they are bound to teache others, and to shewe them the way : and yet for all that, that both yong & old ought to know, that there is no true wisdom but of God, who giueth it frō aboue, and that God dealeth forth the same in such wise as he thinketh good, and men must not imagine that he is bounde vnto them : for he hath promised too poure out his spirite vpon great and small as he listeth, to the end it may be knowne too be a free gift, and that the prayse of it ought to bee giuen too him alone.

Now heere againe Eliphaz vpbraideth Iob, that he hath not beard Gods secretes. This poynteth at all men in generall. For it behoueth vs too vnderstande the rudenesse and weakenesse of our owne witte : and the true meane to do it, is to reuerence Gods secretes, knowing that they are incomprehensible, & to ligher vs to atteyne vnto. For as long as men presume vpon their owne witte, and thinke to atteyne to the heighth of Gods secretes it is certayne that they cannot be humbled, nor brought to any modestie. Yee see then that the poynt whereto we must come, is that wee must reuerence and honour Gods secretes, seing we haue not the capacitie to cōprehend them: in so much that we haue no more to do, but to acknowledge our owne infirmitie, and to crie out euery one with David, Lorde howe high are thy determinations, howe ought we to reuerence them! Yee see then in effect what Eliphaz ment in saying vnto Iob, that he had not beard the secretes of God. And this doctrine is as often repeted and as common in the holy Scripture as any can bee, bycause it is harde too abate the pryde which is naturally rooted in all men. For not only euery one of vs will take vpon him too bee wyser than his fellowe : but also wee cannot finde in our hartes too acknowledge our owne slendernesse, to humble our selues euen when wee come before God. Therefore wee haue neede to be brought lowe, and too bee warned (as the Scripture doth it) that wee must not go about to comprehend the purpose of God.

For that is too high and too profound a thing for vs. What remaineth then? To honour it, acknowledging our own rawnesse and weakenesse as I sayde afore. But by the way wee muste come to that which Sainct Paule sayeth in the first to the Corinthians : that is to wit, that our Sauiour hath giuen vs of his owne spirite, whereby wee know and comprehend that which is aboue all our capacite. Then although we be not of cōsell with God : yet hath he shewed vs the fauour and honour, to disclose vnto vs that which is vnknowne and hidden from vs. How is that? There is none that knoweth what is in man, but the spirite which dwelleth in him sayeth S. Paule : and the spirite that dwelleth in God is giuen vnto vs. Thus ye see how we be made parttakers of the things that are vtterly separated from vs, and whereto wee cannot by any meanes approche. Marke heere a singular grace which wee ought too make greate account of : namely that our Lorde hath inlightened vs, euen vs that were wretched blinde foules. And although wee comprehend not the things that are here bylowe : yet are wee lifted vp aboue the heauens, and that thing is reueled and knowne to vs, which the Angels wonder at. See ye not an inestimable honour? howbeit, when Sainct Paule sayeth that this is done by Gods giuing of his spirite too vs, he excludeth not his woorde. For when God intendeth too disclose his secretes, he not onely sendeth vs inspirations, but also speaketh vnto vs. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause that Sainct Paule imputeth that thing too the spirite. For wee may well reade and heere : but wee shall not

not profite a whit except God open our minde, that wee may vnderstande what hee telleth vs by woorde of mouth. Therefore wee muste match the Spirite and the woorde together: that is too say, wee must beleue that our Lorde hath layde foorth the treasures of his infinite wisdom vnto vs, in giuing vs his Lawe and in teaching vs his will by his Prophetes, but specially in his Gospell. And on our side let vs also consider, that his opening of our eyes is, to the intent that the things which are conteyned in the holy Scripture, shoulde not be as a strange language to vs, but to the intent we should acquaint our selues therewith: for by our owne wit we should neuer attayne to it. Now then wee see how men must humble themselues, knowing well that they be not of Gods counsell, and therefore ought to honour his secretes. And furthermore forasmuche as it hath pleased God to make vs priuie to his will: Let vs conceyue his meening according as he sheweth it vnto vs. But yet for all that, wee must not be ouerwise, for when God giueth vs his spirite to shewe vs the things that are hidden from vs and passe the reache of mans reason: it is not to the ende wee shoulde know all that is in him, for wee must holde our selues contented too know but in part as yet, as sayeth Sainct Paule. Therefore let vs beware wee passe not our boundes, but onely let vs discretely seeke that which God would haue vs too know. And we shall finde that, in the holy Scripture: lette vs go no further. Furthermore although wee vnderstande not the tenth parte of the things that are in the holy Scripture: lette vs pray God too discouer dayly more and more, the things which are hidden from vs as yet: and therewithall let vs walke vnder his subiection, that wee bee not rashe too runne too farre. For it behoueth euen the forwardest and perfectest men too vnderstand, that it is not for them as yet too know all the secretes of God: for that is reserued till the latter day. And surely it is not without cause, that Dauid (though he were so excellent a Prophet) crieth out, that Gods determinations are a wonderfull thing. Hereby he sheweth vs howe it is impossible for vs too atteyne to the perfection of suche vnderstanding, vntill God haue bereft vs of this mortall flesh: and so lette vs assure our selues, that as long as wee be in this worlde, wee are but in the way. Thus yce see what wee haue too remember in this streyne. Nowe Eliphaz addeth, wredest thou that Gods comfortings are but a small thing? and is there any secrete in thee, or is it straunge to thee? For this woorde Secrete betokeneth straunge. Eliphaz meeneth heere too reprove Iob of pryde and vnthankfulness: for he sayeth too him, Howe now? It seemeth that thou despydest the consolations of God, and thou thinkest it straunge that he shoulde comfort thee. If any man were at that poynnt, surely it were an ouer great pryde, yea and a despying of Gods grace, whiche were not too bee borne withall. And why? for wee ought to esteeme Gods comfortings aboute all things. If wee bee troubled, what shift or what remedie is there for vs, except God bring vs backe againe into the right way? So then lette vs marke well, that if wee bee combered with any perplexitie, and bee at our wittes ende in any matter, wee can not dispatch our selues of it, nother is there any other shifte for vs, than that God doo pacifie vs and content vs: and that is suche a meane as wee muste make great account of aboute all things. For when wee bee in the greatest trouble in the whole worlde, God can well inighten our wittes and bring vs too quietnesse. Then neede wee no more, but that God shoulde shewe himselfe, and wee bee ridde out of all trouble. If heauen and earth shoulde (as yee woulde say) bee confounded together, so as there were nothing but confusion ouer all: yet if it please God too appeere vnto vs, he will sette all things in order agayne after suche a sorte, that the things whiche were as greatly intangled as could bee before, shall become cleere, so as wee shall see nothing too trouble and vex vs. Lo what cause wee haue too commende Gods comfortings. But this consisteth more in deede than in woorde. For they that flee too God for refuge, may well perceyue of howe great force his comfortes bee, and what a strength they haue to appeaze vs. If wee haue but the least comberance of the worlde, beholde wee bee in vexation and distresse, according as wee knowe that menne are giuen too vnquietnesse, and as soone as they haue neuer so light an occasion of greef, it seemeth that they themselues kindle the fire too torment themselues withal to the vttermost. See (I pray you) in what state men are, so long as God leaueth them a sleepe. But whē we be in such troubles, then we perceyue dayly how God bringeth vs backe. Verely it seemeth too our selues, that we shal neuer scape out of some perplexitie, & therefore we are astonished at it, and say, Alas what shall become of mee. VVe be drowned so deepe, as wee thinke we shal neuer be able to get out of such confusion: and yet notwithstanding God setteth suche an order, as wee be vtterly abasshed, and our mindes are in quiet and appeazed. VVhereof then commeth suche alteration, but bycause God woorketh so mightily in our hartes, too the ende wee shoulde magnifie his comforts exceedingly. But what? Although wee bee conuincd by experience, that none but onely God can comforte vs in our perplexities and anguish, and that when it pleaseth him so too do, wee haue well wherewith to content our selues: yet notwithstanding wee forgette it in the turning of a hand, and if any grieue befall vs, there is none of vs all but he feedeth the humour by chafing vpon the brydle. There is no talke of repaying vnto God, too say, howe now? Behold, thy God hath shewed thee heretofore, howe it is he too whom thou muste repayre, and yet notwithstanding thou thinkest not of him. So much the more then must we marke well this sentence: that is to wit, that when men make not account of Gods comfort, to be deliuered thereby fro anguish, perplexitie and trouble of minde: they be too too vnthankful: & besides their vnthankfulness, they haue also a shamefull pride, in that they perceyue not their owne necessitie, that they might seeke remedie for it. And their pryde is expressed yet better in the woord Secrete, when Eliphaz sayeth, what secretes is there in thee? as if he should say, wretched creature, feelest thou not thine owne frayltie? But surely if men knew themselues as they be in deede: they should needes fall to agreement with God, and be inflamed with suche desire thereof, as they would neuer be at rest, vntill God had made them feele his grace. But what? we be so blockish, as we weene our selues to be wise, whereas there is nothing but foolishnesse and vanitie in vs. VVe thinke our selues too haue the remedie of our miseries in our sleeues. If we happen to be combered with any trouble, wee fal to sharpening of our wittes, and wee muste needes be deuising of some shift or other: as who would say, that all that matter could be forged in our own shop. But yet for all that, mē are so ouerweening. And therefore it is sayd heere, what secretes is there in thee? Then if wee perceyued how grosse, ignorat, and doltish we be: surely we would not be such fooles, as to surmise that we haue wherewith to deliuer our selues out of our anguish & trouble: but we would go streight wayes vnto God, being well assured, that he onely can set things at a stay, according as we perceyue in very deed, & as he himself sheweth wel ynough.

Thus much therefore concerning this sentence. But (according as I haue sayde already) let vs put the same in vre. And forasmuch as our life is subiect to so many miseries, as it is impossible that a man should haue one minute of rest in himselfe, without carrying awaye and without forgetting of himselfe: let vs go to God that he may comfort vs, & let vs make account of the warnings that he giueth vs, as they deserue. And God comforteth vs diuerse wayes: for (as I haue sayd already) he cleareth all the troubles, wherout of it seemed that we should neuer get out, and dispatcheth them in such wise, as we perceyue that he hath deliuered vs. Now let vs come to that which Eliphaz addeth He sayth, that Iobs hart is caried as way, and that hee maketh a signe wyth his eyes to lyst vp himselfe agaynst God. Heere Eliphaz reprobeth Iobs pride, howbeit wrongfully and without cause. But according to that which I haue sayde already, although this matter be misapplied to Iob himselfe: yet may we gather a profitable lesson of it, and suche a one as serueth all oure turnes. Therefore hee sayeth. How is thy hart rauished, howe hath it surprised thee? For worde for worde it is thus: Howe hath thy hart seized thee? And how is it that thou maketh countenance with thine eyes to plead against God? to make a signe or countenance with the eye, is to bee so scornfull, as to do nothing else but leere (as men say) and to turne away oure eares when men tell vs any thing. And we knowe that men do so, when they regard not the things that are spoken, but take them as superfluous matter, as if nothing could be alledged which were not knowne afore. To be short, we see that Eliphaz ment to condemne such a pride in Iob, as though he humbled not himselfe vnto God, to hearken what he sayde vnto him. Herewithall he sheweth that such pride is yll grounded, when he sayeth that Iobs hart is rauished. Then is it certaine, that this pride is alwayes one of the vices in men: and therefore inasmuch as our Lord seeth men stand so in their owne conceyt, and wax hard in their pride: he is fayne to shewe them that they bee but fooles, and vterly witleffe, in presuming so much of themselves, and in bearing themselves in hand that they haue whereof to vaunt. For if we haue any apparance or likelihood of ability, by and by ye shall see vs lifted vp so high, as there is no holde of vs, and we stie so farre till we bee readie to breake our neck. Our Lorde perceyuing vs so wholly giuen to be puffed vp with presumption, asketh vs, who are ye? VVhat haue ye? Open your shop, and let men see what is in it. But if men shoulde come too such triall it would soone be perceiued, that there was nothing but foolish weening in al that euer they imagined to be in them. Thus ye see what we haue to gather vpon this text, where it is sayd, that if men open their mouths agaynst God, or pretende to vaunt themselves and humble not selues as becommeth them to do: the same proceedeth of a frenziedness, and they be not well settled in their wittes. For had they neuer so little knowledge and discretion: it is certaine that they would be humbled, and not go aboute to withstande God after that sort, nor presume vpon any thing that is in themselves, considering that they haue not any thing but condemnation in them, and that they must be fayne to abide confounded in their owne shame. Behold heere an excellent sentence, if we haue the skill too appie it well to our owne instruction. VVhat is too be done then? Let vs learne, to know our selues, and according to the old Prouerbe, we shalbe hūbled by and by so as we shall not vaunt our selues. But what? men can not refreyne to start out of their boundes: and that is the cause why we runne so a head as we do, yea euen to the casting of our selues into suche ouerweening, as God is

fayne to fall vpon vs, as the enemie of the proude. And this will not be very hard for vs, if wee be not rauished nor caried away too stande vpon our selues. For what causeth men too bee so blinde when they haue any vertue, vprightnesse or wisdom in them? It is bycause they are prysoners to themselves: that is to say, bycause they beare their owne eyes, and blinde themselves wilfully. For he that will not beguyle himselfe, but marke what God commaundeth him: shall finde ynough there to humble himselfe withall. But wee will steppe our owne eyes wilfully, wee will needes be deceyued wittingly. Nowe when men carie themselves away after that sorte, they must needes giue God the slip, and not regard any thing that he sheweth them, but rather make a mocke of all that is tolde them. But in the end all must fall out too their confusion. Now lette vs come too the principall poynt. For hitherto Eliphaz hath vsed a Preface, to shewe that nothing hindered Iob too make his owne profite of the warnings that he had heard, but that he was puffed vp with pryde, and was vnthankfull vnto God. Now he addeth: VVhat is man that he should be able too iustifie himselfe before God, or that he shoulde bee found pure and cleane? For God findeth not stedfastnesse in his Sainctes, (that is to say in his Angelles) nother are the beaues cleane in his sight: and what shall becomme of stincking, abominable, and corrupt man, which drinketh iniquitie as water? Like as fishe is fedde with water, so are men soaked in sinne and wickednesse: and shall they then take in hand too iustifie themselves before God? For firste and forme they had neede to be cleaner and purer than the Angels, and they had neede to surmount the brightness of the Sunne and the Starres, seing that the heauens themselves are infected before God, if comparison should be made betweene them and him. This hath bene treated of in parte already heretofore. Howbeit, as it is not repeated here without cause: so haue wee neede to call too minde the things that haue bene sayde afore. For it is a notable lesson and such a one as cannot be minded too often. First it behoueth vs to know after what sorte the Angelles haue not stedfastnesse before God. Some haue expounded it of the Diuelles: but there is no reason in so doing. For what a thing were it too say, the Diuelles are not rightuous, and therefore muste not men take vpon them too bee so. VVe know that the Diuell is the Prince of all iniquitie and naughtinesse. But here is expresse mention made of the Angelles. And yee see howe that in this place they bee termed the Sainctes or holie ones of God, according also as the holy Scripture yeeldeth them the same title, and oftentimes calleth them the elect or chozen Angelles. But nowe lette vs consider after what sorte God findeth no stedfastnesse in them. It is not onely bycause they shoulde not haue the constancie too continue in goodness, vnlesse God preferued them by his power: but bycause that of a very truth, they haue not so found and exquisite a rightuousnesse, as that they might rest themselves vpon the same when it commeth too the poynt of presenting themselves afore God too render their account. That poynt (say I) shall not bee founde in the Angelles. And howe so? For wee see they haue none other desire but too obey God, nother are they subiect too euill lustes as wee bee, there is no temptation in them too thrust them out of the way. And when wee desire that Gods will should bee done in earth as it is in heauen, wee meene thereby that the obedience which the Angelles yeelde vnto God, is without impeachment, and not an vnperfect and feeble thing as ours is, who when wee desire to doo good, do go too it limpingly, and

and are not the tenth parte so giuen too the seruing of God as were requisite. How then do we vnderstand that God findeth not stedfastnesse in his angels, that is to say, they be not able to answer before him? I haue told you afore, that in iudging of vs god vseth the measure which he hath set downe in his law: that is to witte, that wee loue him with all our hart, with all our mind, and with all our strength. Thus ye see a meane righteoufnesse wherewith God contenteth himselfe when the cace concerneth the iudging of Angels and men. But euen according to this righteoufnesse we be faultie: for who is hee that can boast of the yeelding vp of his whole affection vnto God and not to haue bin drawn away from it by some wicked lust: Alas, we be so farre off from atteyning to that poynt, as it is very much if we be in the way thitherward. Ye see then that all men are condemned before God, euen as in respect of this meane righteoufnes. And ye see also that when Sainte Paule alledgeth this sentence, Cursed is hee that fulfilleth not all the things that are contained in the law: he saith it is a sentence that condemneth vs all. But the Angels are acceptable too God in respect of this righteoufnes. And why? Bycause there is no blemish nor spotte in them, but all their desires are set wholly to the seruing and honoring of God, so as they giue themselues to nothing else. And so according to the righteoufnesse of the law, God accepteth the as I said afore. But ther is another higher righteoufnesse in God, which surmounteth all creatures, in so much as no Angell is able to satisfie it. And no wonder at all: for what comparison is there betweene an infinite thing, and a thing that hath bounds? Behold, although the Angels haue great glory in them: yet are they but creatures. And what is God: He is an infinite thing, in so much that whe we thinke vpon him, we ought to be rauished into astonishment. So then let vs not thinke it strange, that Gods righteoufnesse should be so high, that when all creatures come to that poynt, all that is to be found in them shall be nothing at all, but they shall deserue to be vterly wiped out. Therefore it is said heere, that God findeth no stedfastnesse in his Angels: that is to say, if he listed too vse the said extreame examination toward the Angels, they must needs vanish away, and all must needs be cast downe and sunken. Howbeit forasmuch as God is contented to be honored and serued by them according to the rule that he hath giuen vs in his law: they stande before his face, and hee auoweth them for righteouf, as they be in deede and tried so to be. But these be two diuerse things: namely that God hath a righteoufnesse which he hath measured after our capacite: and yet cometh to such rigoure as to say, who is he that hath attained to it: Now then we see that if we come before god: there we shall be condemned and accursed. And so farre are we vnable to stand vpright, that the very Angels of Heauen are confounded there. And why? Bycause the very Heauens themselues are not cleane. For whereas God hath created the Sunne to giue light to the worlde, and giuen some brightnesse too the starres also: it foloweth not therefore that they haue a diuine perfection. VVe must remember what hath bin said afore: namely that all the creatures that God made, do keepe still some marks of his grace. But if a man woulde compare that which is in the creatures, with that which is in God: he shall finde that the one is all, and the other is nothing. Thus ye see how the heauens are not cleane, that is to saye, that there is alwayes some imperfection in the creatures, so as they haue not the power to stand before god, as in respect of the infinite glory that is in him. And now it is said, that seeing the cace is such, what shall become of men? This is it that I haue touched alreedy: namely that although God wold examine vs but after the meane righteoufnesse which he hath set foorth in his law: yet we should all of vs be found giltye, and an vniuersall damnation shold lie vpon all mankinde, vnder the which we lie ouerthrowen.

To be short, behold how men are confuted two ways. For if we will come to God with our head vpright, and go about to iustify ourselues before him: our confusion must needs appeere so much the more. For shall wee be rightuoufer than the Angels of Heauen? But we see there is no creature that is able to hold out, when hee commeth before the creator. The Creator must needs swallow vp all with his glory, and make all things to vanish that seemd too bee aught woorth, yea and all that seemeth to be woonderfull: according as it is said, That the Sunne shall giue no more light, and the Moone shall be darkened. And why? Bycause the glory of God shall shine farre brighter. Esa. 13. b. 10

The Prophet Esayes intent is to do vs to witte, that whensoever God spreadeth foorth his glory, all that euer is in creatures must vanish away, though it haue bin neuer so highly esteemed afore. If the Sunne (which is but a senselesse creature) do darken the light of the Starres all the day long, so that although they abide still in the skie, yet they are not seene while the Sunne shineth: what shall the maiestie of God do? Are the creatures able to approach neere vnto him? If one creature excell another: what shall God himselfe do? Thus ye see howe we be confuted in one wise if we presume vpon oure owne righteoufnesse, and come to God with a foolish ouerweening, thinking that God ought to bee bounde vnto vs, and that we were able to bring any woorthinesse vnto him. For though we were righteoufer than the Angels of Heauen, and purer and cleaner than the very Heauens: yet were it nothing at all of that which we surmise ourselues to haue. Marke this for one poynt. Howbeit let vs not go to the perfect righteoufnesse, lette vs come but only to the meane righteoufnesse which God hath set out vnto vs, Let vs looke no more but what may be in creatures, he requireth nothing but that we should loue him with all our hart, with all our mind, and with all our strength. And no man can say, but that this is more than reasonable: but yet for all that, do we it: VWherevnto do we giue our minds? Are they set wholly vpo God? Are they so loozened from the earthly bandes, as they may lift themselues vp to heauen? Do we leade heere a spirituall life, forsaking all things that may turme vs away from God: It were very meete we should so. If the matter stand but only vpon praying vnto God: (let vs take that for an example) the scripture sheweth vs, that when a man commeth to pray vnto God, he must retire into himselfe, and discharge his mind of all caces, of all passions, and of all other like things that may hinder him, so as we must be vterly ouerthrowen by feeling our owne wretchednesse, that wee maye seeke helpe at Goddes hande.

Lo how prayer is a thing of greater prerogative than all the rest of our life: and yet come we once to praying: we see our selues to be so fleshly, that we haue an eie to many wicked fancies, which wee cannot quite and cleane leaue. And although we haue some good mynde in praying: yet misse wee not too be drawn still diuers ways. Seeing then that wee be so fugitive in so holue a thing as prayer is: what will the rest of our whole life be? In deede euery one of vs ought too perceiue it well ynough: and it is a foule shame that we must be tolde these things, and that men know them not thoroughly of themselves. Sith the case standeth so: Alas can wee be able to stand before God? shall we stand now vpon the iustifying of our owne righteousness? It is true that Iob went about no suche thing, and that Eliphaz did hym wrong and iniurie in accusing him of pride. But by the way we must profite our selues by this lesſon, and consider aduisedly what is said heere of men. For they be not only charged with frailtie, (as the Papists them selues will easly confesse that we be weake, and therefore that there is no sufficiente righteousness in vs too satisfie God) but wee be led further heere, that is too witte, that men be altogether saped in sinne. For it is not demanded in this sentence, how men can iustify them selues, sith they be not able to fulfill the law, but are bewrapped in many imperfections, loden with so many infirmities, so inconstant and fleeting, and suche other termes whiche might be spoken against men without comming too the very poynt: but it is said that men cannot iustify themselves, by cause, as they are abhominable, and filthy, and drinke iniquitie as water: that is to say, their proper nourishment is sinne, and there is not somuch as one droppe of goodnesse to be found in them: and to be short, lyke as the body draweth his sustenance of meate and drinke: so also men haue none other stuffe in them but sinne: all is corrupted. Not that the very substance (as men terme it) of our bodies and of our soules is an euill thing: for we be Gods workmanship. But in this case we speake grossely, to expresse that all that euer is in vs is atteyned with euill. Verely our bodies in their owne being, are the good creatures of God: and so likewise are our soules: but all that is in them is peruered. For wheras God created our soules good, they notwithstanding are infected with euill, and there is not one droppe of goodnesse in the which is not stained & vtterly imbeced. Thus ye see in effect what is shewed vs here. The first of al, we haue to note, that there is great differēce betwixt weaknesse and corruption. For if it be saide that men are weake as the Papists prattle: the heathē mē haue said ful afmuch. And who is he that saithe not so? The Paynims haue said that mē are inconstant, that it is a very harde thing to followe vertue, and that we be inclined to vice. The Paynims (I say) knew al this wel ynough: and the Papists themselves will confesse it at this day. But yet for all that, they know not of a very truth that there is not so much as one drop of goodnesse in mē, & that they be abhominable before God, vntill he haue reclaumed the by his grace. Howbeit to the end that men should not presume vpon any thing that is in the selues: the holy Ghost calleth the here abhominable, stinking, fylthy, & noughtwoorth. Behold also how it is said in the Psalme, God looked downe from Heauen to see if there were one righteous man, and hee founde not one. They are all gone oute of the way, they are all become abhominable and stinking. True it is, that in steade of stinking, some haue translated vnprofitable: but the very meaning of it is, that we be withered away, that there is nothing left in vs, but are as a thing that is vtterly corrupted. And it is said expressly in the Psalme, that God knew men to be so. And why? By cause men wold alwayes be theyr owne iudges. To what purpose is that? Forsooth we wold haue God tied to our fancie, and by cause we think ourselues men of sufficient abilitie, we wold that God shoulde content him selfe with our opinion. But on the contrarie part it is said, that let men iustify themselves as they list, let euery man cratch his fellowes itch, lette them sooth one another in their naughtinesse, and lette them play the drunken sottes: and yet shall not GOD leaue hys looking downe from Heauen. And what shall he fynde heere: stinch and lothlinesse. We be lothsome to God, and yet in the meane while we thinke ourselues to haue maruellouse stuffe in vs. But what gaine wee by it? So then as oft as we be tempted to pride and staretlinesse, too thinke wee haue any apparence of vertue in vs: lette it come too oure mynde to summon ourselues before God, and lette vs bethinke vs of thys dreadful saying, that when God hath looked downe, and when he hath examined men throughly, there is not one, no not euen one, but hee is infected and stinking before him, and lothely in his sight.

Thus then ye see how this sentence is to be vnderstood. And whereas it is said that we drinke iniquitie as it were water: it serueth yet better to expresse, that all our whole life is giuen to euill: and that as a fish feedeth vpon the water, so men do nothing else but feede vpon sinne. Verely wee ought not too blame God for the euill that is in vs: for Adam was not created in the corruption which is spoken of heere, but he purchaced it of hym selfe: for God founde all the thinges too bee good whiche hee had made. Man therefore who is the excellentest of all creatures, was not marred after that fashion, till hee had withdrawn himselfe from God. But when hee had once separated himselfe from the fountaine of righteousness, what could remaine vnto him but naughtinesse and corruption? Thus we see from whence all our naughtinesse proceedeth, and that wee oughte not too blame God for the vices wherunto we be subiect, and vnder which we be hild prisoners, according to the scripture, which sayeth that we be sold vnder sinne, & become the bondslaves of Satan. We must not blame God for this, but we must learne to know that it is the heritage which we haue frō our father Adam, and therefore we must take the whole blame to our selues before God. Lo in what wise we must vnderstand this corruptiō and bōdage of sinne that is spokē of heere: not to make it serue for an excuse, to say, alas what can we do with all, as we see those do whiche blaspheme God for (say they) seeing that men are so giuen to euill, what can they do with it? They haue not the power to withstande the temptations: and ought they not then to be acquitte? And if God condemne them therevpon, is hee not too cruell? Ye shall see men blasphemie after that sort. And therefore let vs keepe our mouthes shut, assuring oure selues that all the euill resteth in our selues, and that we be vtterly soked in wickednesse: and that if we will bee iustified before God, it behoueth vs to yeld our selues giltie of our owne accord. Otherwise, that which is said in the one and fiftieth Psalme must euermore be accomplished: namely, that God shall alwayes bee founde righteous in iudging. Though wee fall to checking against him, yet shall hee continue alwayes righteous, yea euen to our confusion. Are we then desirous too bee iustified before God? There is but one onely meane to do it, which is to come and confesse, that there is nothing but horrible confusion in vs, and that wee haue not so much as one drop of goodnesse. And therefore lette vs desire God to receiue vs to his mercie, and too make vs righteous for oure Lorde Iesus Christes sake. That is too saye, too washe away all curc fylthynesse with the bloud of hys Sonne, and too impute hys righteousness vnto vs: as, of a truth, when wee be clothed with his garmente, we shall be acceptable to our good God, by cause we shall haue a perfect and more than angelicall righteousness in vs.

New let vs fal downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to reach vs his hand that we may not continue in trouble and

and shame: and that although we haue to walk through many temptations, yet we may not be destitute of hys ayde and succor: but that by his comforting and strengthening of vs, we may so get the victorie in all encounters, as we may haue cause to yeld him thanks: and that according to his working in vs, we may be stablished for the tyme to come, euen till wee haue obteyned the full victorie, and are come too the glorye of Heauen, where wee shall triumphe with oure Lorde Iesus Christe. That it may please him too graunte this grace not onely too vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The lix. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xv. Chapter.

17. I vwill tell thee, heare me: I haue seene, and I vwill declare vnto thee.
18. VVhat vvise men haue told, as they receiued it from their fathers, and haue not cōcealed it.
19. To vvhome alone the land vv as giuen, and the straunger passed not through them.
20. The vvicked is alvvayes as it vv ere in trauell of child, and the number of yeeeres is hid from the outragious.
21. The noise of teare is in his eares: vvhen he is in peace, behold the destroyer shall come vpon him.
22. He beleeueth not to get out of darknesse: he shall see the svord.

Yesterday we saue in what plighte man is when he is out of Gods fauoure: that is to witte, that there is nothing but confuson and fylthyneesse in him: so farre is he ofr from being able to haue any righteousnesse that may stand before God.

Now in the meane while wee haue too consider Gods great goodnesse towards vs in clothing vs with a righteousness that surmounteth the righteousness of Angels. VVe be as wretched and miserable sinners as can be, and yet notwithstanding God maketh vs righteous after a more excellent and precious manner than the very Angels are as in respect of their nature only (for otherwise, they be partakers of the glory of Iesus Christ, bycause he is the common head of all) or Christs righteousness is giuen vnto vs, whiche farre exceedeth the righteousness of the Angels. And heerein wee haue cause to magnify the goodnesse of our God. But in the meane season let vs come too the matter that Eliphaz pursueth heere. He treateth of a thing that is true in it selfe, if it were rightly applied: that is to witte, that the wicked neuer haue any rest, but are in such vnquietnesse, as they neede none other hangman to torment them than themselves. But heerevpon he concludeth amisse, that Iob is a wicked man. For although he were astonished at his griefes: yet notwithstanding (as hath bin said already) he ceased not to trust still in God. The doctrine therefore (as I said) is good and holy: but the same must be applied accordingly. And for this cause I told you that in reading the holy scripture, we must alwayes pray God to giue vs the skill and discretion to perceiue to what ende he tendeth, and what his drift is, that wee may fare the better by that which shall be shewed vs: for we shall go continually backward if God driue vs not forward. But to the end we may take the more profite by that whiche is conteyned heere: let vs follow the processe of Eliphaz's words. Heare me (saith he) and I will tell thee what I haue seene. He speaketh of his owne experience: and afterward he addeth, that the same doctrine was receiued and hild after the same maner among the wise men too whome God had giuen the grace not only to be able to rule well themselves, but also to haue the gouernemēt of realmes and countries: and he addeth, that they hild them peaceably without any passing of straunger through them: that is too say, without any mans vsurping of that which God had put into their hands. Verely whensoever God indueth men with excellent gifts, we must not despise the same, but consider that the spirite of God dwelleth in them, and that if we be so skornefull as to refuse that whiche they tell vs, the iniurie thereof redoundeth not to a mortall wight, but to the liuing God. For thereafter as God vttereth his gracious gifts, so will he haue vs a so to receiue them to our common profite. Eliphaz therefore hath some good colour and pretence to alledge the authoritie of such as had ruled realmes and countries: but yet is not that ynough, except we knowe that it is God which speaketh. And for performance thereof, ought we to trust to the authoritie of men: True it is that God cōmandeth vs to be teachable, and not too be stubborneharted and hard to yeld obedience when we know that the thing which is told vs is true. And so ye see how the authoritie of men ought to be receiued. But if they fall to turning of the truth vpside downe, and to conuerting of it into falshood, there is no reason why men shoulde be wedded vnto them. Therefore wee must beare this poynt well in remembrance. For we see there are two vngracious extremities The one is when men reiect all knowledge and wisdom. For if there be any men among vs, whome God hath aduanced aboue others, and vnto whome he hath dealt greater abundance of his holy spirit: it is certaine (as I said afore) that in despising them, wrong is offered vnto God. Neuertheless, we see many stubborne folke, which will not by any meanes submit themselves to the counsell or aduise of any man. There is also another extremitie, whiche is, that being possessed with a foreconceiued opinion that a man is skilfull, of great witte, and well experienced wee bee so fotted therewith, as we looke no whit further. But we must not suffer ourselves to be led so: for God doth alwayes reserue his owne right to himselfe. And what is that? Verely that we shuld be subiect to him alone, specially in caes of saluation. True it is that there are ordinances and ciuill polices of mē, wherto we must be obedient, but yet is al that referred vnto him, & depēdeth vpon him. In the meane season ye see heere a resolute poynt, which is that God wil haue vs to be taught at his hand. For when we yeld such authoritie vnto mē, what do we else but rob God of his authoritie & preheminece: This extremitie therefore is to be cōdēned as well as the other. The meane betwixt these two vices is, that when we see that God hath bestowed of his gracious gifts vpon any man, we must haue him in estimatiō, take counsell willingly at his hand, and vnderstand that in despising hym we do wrong vnto God, bycause it is his will that wee should honor such. Is it so? Yet notwithstanding let vs not ceasse to discerne, least we be beguiled vnder the shadow of some opinion that we shall haue conceiued of some mortall man, and thereby bee turned out of the righte way, and God also disseated of his prehemine by the same. Thus much concerning this poynt. Now Eliphaz addeth, that these men haue not concealed the things that they had learned of their forefathers. VVherein hee sheweth, that they had behaued themselves faithfully For whensoever God giueth vs the grace to be well taught, he doth it not for our selues only, but to the intent that others also should be drawn to the same knowledge, and that we should all of vs be partakers together of the thing that hath bin giuen vs. And heere ye see that Gods instructing of vs first, is to the end that when we see our neighbours ignorant, we should indeuer to leade them with vs into the same way whereinto we our selues are entred already. He that knoweth Gods truth, must not keepe it close to himselfe, as though it were but for him alone. VVhat then? He is bound to his neighbours. And therefore if hee see them go astray, let him reach them his hand, let him call them to him, and let him shew them what he knoweth. For wee neede not bee afraid that it shall be any preiudice or hinderance to vs, though all men be made partakers of that which God hath giuen first of all vnto vs. If a man haue but small store of worldly goodes: surely if he deale them forth vnto others, he shall soone see the end of them. But when God hath enlightened vs with his word, and also giuen vs his spirite: the more wee labour to giue vnto others, the more shall we be enriched ourselues. Thus ye see a sentence which we ought to marke well when Eliphaz sayth, that those to whom God had giuen singular gifts aboue others, had not concealed the thing that they had learned of their aunceters. And heere also ye see the marke that God gaue vnto his seruant Abraham, to shewe that hee would vie well and faithfully the couenant which he had receiued. Abraham (saith hee) will indeuer to teache his household and those that are to come after him: hee will shewe them the ordinaunces and Statutes of the Lorde.

Then let vs marke well, that when God openeth our eyes, and is so gracious to vs as to teach vs his truth: it is not to the end that euery man should keepe it to himselfe, and other men haue no part nor portion of it: but we must (as much as in vs lieth) draw all the world to it. Now then seeing we be bound to all men in generall, yeauen vnto those of whom God hath not giuen vs the charge: what ought a householder to do towards his seruantes and children: VVhat ought a minister of Gods worde to do, who is specially appointed to that office? VVhat ought a magistrate to do, seeing the sword is giuen vnto him, and he sitteth in Gods seate? Then let vs marke well that although we haue nother wife, childre nor seruants: yet notwithstanding if God haue bestowed any gift vpon vs, we be bound to distribute it abroad, and to make it common to all men to their edification. Marke this for one poynt. Much more reason is it, that if a man haue a household, he ought to be so much the watchfuller and carefuller to instruct and teache those whom God hath committed to him, and of whom he shall render an account. Such as are ordeyned to be Shepherds to feede Gods people, must employ all their strength and power therevpon, nother must they openly or particularly conceale that which they haue receiued: according wherevnto Sainte Paule sheweth that he is cleere from blud: that is to say, he is not faultie before God, for hee had taught them Gods truth faithfully withoute ceasing, as well at home in their houses as openly abroad.

*Acts. 18. v. 6.

Also let the magistrate for his parte looke to himselfe, and let him not through negligence quench the lighte that God hath put into him. But to the vttermost of his power let him indeuer that iustice may reigne and haue hir full course, that God may be honored and his truth receiued, and that blessings and all things that are contrarie to true religion may be done away. Lo what we haue to remember in this streyne. Now whereas Eliphaz saith, that God had giuen them the land and no stranger had passed through it: it is to expresse that they had receiued an excellent prerogatiue from aboue. For it is certaine, that if a man be able to mainteine the gouernement that is put into his hand, it is a token that God fauoreth him, and it becommeth him too acknowledge that benefite: For there is no policie of man able too do that throughly. Also whereas Eliphaz saith, that those of whom hee speaketh, had reigned peacefully, and that God had blessed them in such wise as they were not troubled, but had so guided their subiects as their dominion conteyned in quietnesse: thereby wee be done too vnderstand, that when God mainteynerth states, and a countrie is in peace, we must not father it vpon mortall men, but acknowledge it to bee the speciall benefyte of God. And our acknowledging of it must not be only in honoring the men by whom God serued his turne in doing it, but also in yelding God his due praise.

Now let vs come to the chiefe article that wee haue touched. Eliphaz saith that the wicked man is alwayes as if he were traueling with child, that he neuer hath any rest, that he is in continuall tormente, that hee looketh euer at the sworde, and that he knoweth not the number of his dayes. And oure Lord vsseth the same threate against the transgressors of his law: namely that he will send them such a fearefulness, that their life shall hang afore them by a thread, that their eyes shall be sunken in their head, and that they shall be in such anguish of mind, that in the morning they shall say, who will warrant me my life vntill night: and when night is come, how may I indure till tomorrow?

*Leuit. 26. f.
Deut. 28. g.
65.*

Lo how God punisheth such as walke not purely according to his law. And in good faith what purenesse is there in our life? If we desire to be at rest, and not too be tossed with any cares, it behoueth vs to know that we be in Gods protection, and we must be fullie resolu'd of it: and then it is certaine that we may passe through fire and water: that is to say, hap what hap will, we shall be sure of a good and stedfast leaning stocke. But if wee know not that God watcheth ouer vs, or at leastwise if wee thinke he is against vs: wee must needs be afraide and not know where to become. Therefore it is not without cause that God vsseth the said manace againste the transgressors of his law. And so is Eliphazs saying very true, that the wicked is alwayes fearefull according also as the Prophet Esay likeneth the thoughts of wicked folkes too waues that beate one againste another. VVhen any tempest is, ye see the water stirreth, and the waues come rushing one againste another, and breake asunder. Euen so is it with a man that is not ayded by GOD. It is not any one passion that shall carrie hym away and tormente hym, but there shall bee manye contraries, and hee shall bee in suche a peck of troubles with it, that hee shall bee vtterly at hys wittes ende. And so when it is tolde vs that the wicked manne is in suche vnquietnesse: Lette vs assure oure selues that it is Gods rightfull vengeance vpon all those that haue not soughte too bee at peace wyth hym. And howe maye wee haue peace

with

with God? By walking in a good and pure conscience: and specially by knowing that we haue none other foundation to stand vpon, saue only his mercie, in that wee be in his fauoure for our Lord Iesus Christes sake: and that therewith we call vpon him, assuring our selues to be happie both in life and death, bycause it pleaseth him to be present with vs, and to receiue vs and gather vs vp to himselfe. Marke (I say) how the way for men too haue peace with God, is to assure themselues that their sinnes are forgien, and to pray vnto him: and therewithall to walke in his obedience, so as they indeuer to haue a good and pure conscience towards their neighbours. And this peace is ioyned with a ioy, which Sainte Paule termeth the ioy of the holy Ghoist, which is when we be strengthened by faith. Saint Paule saith that this ioy is ghostly, and he vieth that terme purposely, bycause the wicked do sometimes reioyce: that is to say, they friske and laugh and are merrie when all things go well with them, and they forget themselues after such a sort, as they feele not their owne miserie, but become dull. Yea but this peace wherewith God filleth them, shall be nothing at all too their profite. And what manner of peace is it? It is not for that they draw neere vnto God: but rather they turne their tayles vpon him. But the true peace which is happie and blisfed of God, is when wee haue an eye vnto him, and come to him, & thervpon are in quiet, assuring our selues that he receiueth, reckoneth and auoweth vs to be his so as he will not giue vs vp, but guide vs always both in life and death. Thus ye see what we haue to remember in this sentence. Howbeit it is true that euer-

Ro. 14. c. 17

among, the faithfull are in suche troubles, as a man can hardly discern betweene them and the despisers of God: but yet in the end God setteth them at rest. For by handling them after that manner, he maketh them too knowe their owne weakenesse, that they may humble themselues, and learne to call vpon him, and put themselues wholly into his hand, and trust altogether too his goodnesse.

Moreouer, sometimes he pricketh and spurreth vs, too make vs come to him the more earnestly, and to beseech him to reach vs his hand, and to shew that he hath a care of vs, and that whensoever we be tossed after that sorte, we neede no more but to vnloode our cares into his lappe, and to rest our selues there in all caces, and there to take all our contentation and comfort. Ye see then that the faithfull may well be stricken with feare and trembling: but yet will God make them to feele what that peace is which he is wont to giue to those that are his. And although the same appere not at the first brunt: yet in the end they shall alwayes be comforted: according as it is said in the Psalme, Lorde thou hast comforted me after the sorrowes of my mind. For God may well hold vs short sometimes: but he will set vs at libertie in the end. And heere ye see how that which Eliphas addeth ought to be expounded: namely that the extortioners, euen the person that is full of violence shall not know the number of his yeeres. The faithfull are at that poynt as well as they. Furthermore, we heare what request Dauid maketh. Shewe me at leastwise (saith hee) what my time is, that I maye take my afflictions in good woorth, when I perceiue that they shall not last for euer. VVe haue seene the lyke request made by Iob himselfe, saying that he knew not what the length of his time was, nor how long God was minded to hold him heere. VVhy then doth Eliphas referre it specially to the despisers of God, and to such as are full of pride and outrage? It is bycause they be full of care and thought for their life: & yet in the meane while wote not how to account it. And we for our part knowe that we haue no certaine terme heere, howbeit that we shall continue heere so long as it pleaseth God to mainteine vs. Seeing we be come into the worlde, and it is God that hath set vs heere: we must giue him leaue to hold vs heere, or to take vs away at his pleasure. In the meane season we heare how he telleth vs by his worde, that he guideth vs altogether, that the heares of our heads are numbered, that wee neede not too be afraid of any thing though we were beset with neuer so many daungers, and that we ought not to surmise that things are mingled together in this world, or that fortune beareth any sway. For although wee be but sillie wormes of the earth: yet doth God thinke vpon vs, and he hath our life in his hand, and will keepe it well and safely. Ought it not to suffice vs when we know this protection of God? Seeing (I say) that we be assured that God keepeth a reckening of our yeeres and dayes, yea and that he numbereth the very heares of our heads: do we not perceiue a sufficient certaintie? And so it is not without cause that Eliphas saith, that the extortioners know not the number of their dayes. And why? for they seeke it with as great anguish as may be, saying: How now? May we liue yet still? Are we sure of this or that? But when they haue made their long disputations, and great discourses: they alwayes turne backe to a continuall vnquietnesse, bycause they rest not themselues vpon Gods providence. But we for our part must not do so: but we must pray vnto him, that after we haue put our liues into his hand, we may be quiet, whatsoeuer troubles befall vs: knowing that forso much as he hath made vs and fashioned vs, he is able to deliuer vs from all daungers whensoever he listeth to shew himselfe our deliuerer: and therevpon we must conclude, that he will watch ouer vs when we be asleepe. As much is to be thought of that which Eliphas addeth: namely, that the outrageouse man doth alwayes behold the sworde, that is to say, he doth see the infinite daungers that hem him in round about, by reason whereof he quaketh and is agast. This agreeth properly vnto Tyrantes. True it is that their state may well seeme to bee happie. Howbeit they be so troubled in their mindes, that they perceiue it to be better for them to haue bin of small and base degree, than to be so honoured and feared: and yet in the meane while they themselues are afraide, not onely of men, but also of every leafe that shaketh vpon a tree. Verely ther was a Titan that confessed as much. For when one flattered him and said he was a prince of such maiestie as it might seeme that he was a God in the world, and that every man might desire to be in his state: If thou (saith he) wart in the like cace that I am, and knewest as much as I, thou wouldest not wish to chaunge thy state for mine. Heerevpon he caused a goodly banquet to be made redy, and setting this his familiar friend in his own place, caused a naked sword to be hanged ouer his head with the poynt downward.

VVhen he saw the daunger that he was in, he could nother eate nor drinke: and as for all the braueries that he had esteemed so highly afore, he made no more account of the. And this is it that Eliphas meeneth: namely that Tyrantes and cruell foike shall alwayes liue in feare, notwithstanding that they seeme too be well at ease, and haue great power and gardes. And why? For they haue the sword continually before their eyes. Some man will demaund, whither the faithfull shall not feele the daungers that threaten them. Yes certainly: yea and it is good for vs to feele them. For if we wist we were warranted, we wold not care to runne vnder the wings of our God, but we would play the colts that were broken looce.

God therefore is fayne too warne vs and put vs in minde that we be befieged with a thousand deathes, and that we bee not able to step foorth one pace withoute tumbling into our graue. VVhen we consider this, and therewithall see plagues, warres, famin, such store of myseries, such store of diseases, and so many other inconueniences both by beasts and by other things, so that looke how many creatures we see in heauen and earth, we see as many deathes or at least wife as many thynges against vs: then we bethinke vs, Aias wee be very wretched creatures if God pitie vs not. Moreouer we be prouoked to runne vnto him, and so say: Lorde thou see'st that if thou sheeld me not with thy hand, I haue not one minute of an houre to liue, and therefore good Lorde voutsafe to preferue me. See how the faithfull beholde the sword: howbeit in beholding it, they behold also the grace of God: and when they be made priuie to the dangers wherein they are, they flee to the said suretie which is shewed vs so often in the scripture: which is, that if we put our whole trust in God, hee will not only be a wall and dubble rampire to vs (as it is said in the Prophet Esay:) but also a wall of brasse or Steele: and at a word, he will be an inuincible fortresse to vs. Lo how the faithful hauing behild the sword, do neuertheless behold Gods protection, being well assured that although death seeme to manace them on all sides, yet shall not the sword come at them: and if it do come, yet shall they not fall headlong, as men say. But the wicked shal for their share haue this fearefulnesse, that the beholding of the sword shall sinke into their stomacks, and make them say, beholde, such a danger or such a mischance will light vpon me: is there no meanes to shift it off? On the other side they shall see God pursuing them, with his darts ready to rush vpon them, and with his bow bent, that is to witte, with his thunderbolts to strike them downe. No maruell then though they be greatly out of quiet, & in great distresse. And so we see the difference that is betwixt the feeling of dangers by the children of God, and the troubles and fearefulnesse of the vnbeleeuers. True it is that sometimes the faithfull shall see the sword, and be afraide of it: but their feare bringeth them to that which I touched afore: that is to witte, God putteth them in minde too humble them selues, and after ward draweth them home to himselfe, and giueth them the rest whereof they were destitute for a time to their profite. And thus ye see what we haue to remember in this sentēce of Eliphasis. And whē we once haue the knowledge of these things: thē we may well applie the doctrine to our instructiō & soulehealth. As how? For first of all we see what the state of mā is. Ye see heere a liuely picture, wherein our Lord sheweth vs, that while we be in this world, we must be put in feare and not alwayes haue rest, but sometimes bee disquieted. Very weil, yet for all that, euery man goeth astray, euery man shrinkes away from God, and the mischief increaseth and groweth dubble, and therefore it behoueth the terrours to increasē also and too become much more terrible, that they may daunt vs. VVhy so? VVe haue made warre against God, and it is good reason that he should do as much to vs, yea and that all creatures should be armed against vs. This done, Forasmuch as we see the disease: we must come to the remedie of it, which is to acknowledge that our God wil not forsake vs, and that he carrieth not till we come to seeke him, but preuenteth vs of his goodnesse, and sheweth vs that if we call vpon him, we may well put our life into his hands, and he will be a good and faithfull keeper of it. VVhen we know this once, then shall we see, that God doth vs much more good in maynteyning vs, and in taking vpon him the charge and office of preferuing vs, thā if he emptied vs from all dangers. Put the case that men were in this worlde as in an earthly Paradise, so as nothing might trouble them. They should not bee so happie, as when in the middes of many afflictions and troubles they find that God commeth downe, that is to say, abaseth himselfe so low as to thinke vpon them, & to watch for the preuenting of inconueniences, and for the beating backe of all danngers that might befall them, and putteth himselfe betweene them and their harmes, too the intent they should not be ouermated and troubled out of measure. Furthermore let vs vnderstand, that if God do no v and then leaue vs and withdrawe himself from vs, and hide himselfe in such wise as we perceiue not his succoure, nor can be assured of his protectiō: we must not be dismaide for all that, but pray him to voutsafe to shew vs his countenance that wee may see it for our more assurance, according as wee see howe Dauid speaketh: Lord (saith he) make thy countenance to shine vpon vs, and it will be much better for vs than if we had abundance of all kind of goodes. VVhen Dauid sawe himselfe at such an afterdeale, & it seemed that God had giuen Satan and the wicked men bridle, yea and that he was troubled also in his mind so as there came no more helpe to him from aboue: Lord (saith he) I desire no more but that thou make thy countenance to shine vpon vs: that is to say, that thou giue me but some little tast of thy goodnesse, to know that thou hast receiued me. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to desire God too put away the grosse and thicke cloudes that hinder vs to perceiue the loue that he beareth towards vs. Furthermore when we see the wicked in such trouble and vnquietnesse, let the same be a bridle vnto vs. For we must profit ourselues by Gods vengeance when we see them a farre off vpon the wicked. VVe must not tarle till God bende himselfe against vs, & till he rap vs hard vpon the pates. No no: but if he spare vs, & in the meane while wee see he punisheth those that haue despised him, and shakē off his yoke: Let the same serue to hold vs in awe and warinesse, so as we may say, Alas, we see heere these wretched caytifes that haue aduanced themselues in pride and presumptuousnes against god: & what painēt hau they? we see they neede no hangmā to tormēt them. VVhy, who is he that tormenteth thē? It is god that persecuteth them after that sort. Thē let this wake vs and hold vs backe, that we cast not ourselues out of our bounds. Besides this, let vs also be so much the more giuen to the seeking of this peace which is an inestimable benefite & treasure: & let vs hūt after it so much the more busily, calling to remēbrance what S. Paul saith. The peace of god (saith he) which passeth all vnderstanding of mā, keep your harts & minds: that is to say, whē we be once sure of this protection of God that we can resort vnto him, not doubting but that hee receiue vs as his owne children: he saith that that manner of peace surmoūtet all vnderstanding of mā. VVherby he doth vs to witte, that we comprehend it not, except God giue it vs by his holy spirit, as in very deede he must be faine to worke in vs, to make vs come too that poynt. And by the way we haue to marke, how that for a conclusion it is said that the noise of feare shall alwayes found in the eares of the wicked and of the despisers of God, and that when they be in most quiet, the extorcionner shall fall vpon them. Heere Eliphas speaketh two things: The one is, that whē the wicked are in their prosperitie, sodaine destructiō shal fall vpon thē like a storme that they perceiued not, in somuch as it is said of thē, that when they say peace, all is sure: and when they oueruaunt thēselues against God laughing al his threatnings to skorne:

to skorne: euen then will it come to passe that God shall ouerthrow them, when they mistruste it least. True it is that the scripture must needs be fulfilled, which is that the wicked shall feele the thing that he is afraid of. But contrariwise also God will send them that which they feared not, to roote them suddainly out of the land. Ye see then howe Eliphasis meening is, that euen in the middes of peace, pilling and polling shall light vpon the despisers of God. But the cheefest thing is the said sound of fearefulnesse which shall alwayes afright them and hold them as it were vpon the racke. And what kind of thing is that sound: It is not the voice of mā nor of beast: but a deaf sound, which God sendeth them euen when al things are at rest, when there is no noise at al to trouble them. For yet neuerthelesse must this pursue them, insomuch that they shall start and tremble at it, according as we see in the example of Caiue. Behold Caiue had no rest, and yet who pursued him? God had appointed no iudge to araigne him, nother had he any body to stand against him. Verely the bloud of Abell cried out for vengeance. But as for men, he was sure ynough, he triumphed, he built a Citie after the name of his eldest sonne, euery man stooode in awe of him, and yet in the meane while he quaked like the leafe of a tree. And wherof came that? Euen of the secret voice, of the voice that was not herd with the eare, but yet was the same a dreadful noise, insomuch as although the wicked know not what it is that God sheweth them, yet notwithstanding they cease not to be continually agast. Now when we heare this, let vs pray God to make vs heere also the sweete and amiable voyce, whereby he sendeth vs tidings of his fatherly goodnesse & loue. Thus ye see that the only remedy wherby we maye bee deliuered of the sayd feareful-nesse and astonishement wherewith the wicked are disnaide, is for vs to beseech God to make vs heare the voice of the Gospell, where he telleth vs that he receyueth vs louingly, that he is our father, that he accepteth vs as righteous for our Lord Iesus Christs sake, and that both in life and in death he will alwayes hold vs in hys hand. VVhen this voice foundeth in our eares, so as we vnderstand it throughly, we shall not be dismaid at these deafe and blind skarings, as the vnbelecuers are: but we shall be surely fenced against all the dismayings that can betide vs. Therefore if we haue our recourse vnto God, and he by his holy spirit giue vs the grace to rest vpon his promises: let vs not doubt but he wil stablish vs more and more in all the good things that he shall haue giuen vs, and so strengthen vs by his power, that in all the ter-rours of this world we shall euermore stand stedfast, vntill he haue taken vs into his eternall rest.

Now let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs feele them to our disliking of them, and that in the meane time we may not cease to trust, that like as hee receiueth wretched sinners vnto mercie, which is the thing wherein he vttereth the rich-nesse of his graciousse goodnesse: so also it may please him to make vs partakers thereof: and that therewithall it may please him also to continue that which he hath begonned in vs, vntill he haue brought vs to the full and whole perfection. And so let vs all say. Almighty God our Heauenly Father, wee acknowledge and confesse according too the truth, that wee bee not worthy: too liste vp our eyes to Heauen, too presente oure selues before thee, nor to presume so farre as that our prayers should be. &c.

The .lx. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the .xv. Chapter.

23. He vill trotte vp and dovvne for breade, knowving that the tyme of darkenesse is in his hande.
24. Anguish amazeth him and ouercommeth him, as a king that is prepared to battell.
25. Bycause he hath list vp his hande againste God, and strengthened himselfe againste the Almighty.
26. He vill leape vpon his necke, and crush the strongest part of his shield, 27. He hath couered his face vvith fat, and fatted his bowvells.
28. He hath inhabited the desert cities, and the ruinous houses that vvere falne dovvne.
29. He shall not aduance himselfe, his riches shall not continue, nother shall there be any remainder of them.

Yesterday I shewed you to how many miseries and daungers our life is subiect, in so much that we must alwayes needes tremble for feare, if we seek not our rest in god, knowing that hee hath care of vs and wil mainteine vs. If this were not, we should neuer be in quiet. Moreouer when we vnto-safe not to heare the message of peace which God prepareth and sendeth vs, we must be skared by men. And it is a iust punishment for the vnthankfulnesse of al such as receiue not so great a benefite, for it is impossible that God should beare it. Behold how God sheweth vs, that first he is willing to forgie vs our sinnes, and that although we deserue to be ouerwhelmed at his hand: yet he desireth nothing but to be at one with vs by his mercie. He addeth that he taketh vs into his protection, and will be the keeper of our life. Are we not woorthy to be deliuered vnto Satan, if we refuse this honoure and priuiledge? And not only to be vexed by men, but also to quake and be afraid though no man pursue vs. Then let vs learne to rest our selues vpon God and to sticke too the promises that he hath giuen vs, to the end we maye walke safely and quietly heere beneath in the middes of daungers.

And now Eliphasis addeth, that the wicked man shall trotte vp and dovvne for bread, knowing that the day of darknesse is in hys hande. Some lay foorth this sentence as if hee saide, that God wil impouerish the wicked howe greate riches so euer they haue, so as they must bee fayne too beg. True it is that that curle is conteyned in the lawe, and we heare also how it is sayd in the Psalme, Psal. 37. d. 19. that the righteous is neuer forsaken, nor his seede begge their bread, but God nourissheth those that are
 his,

his, in the time of dearth. If God prouide in such wise for his faithfull ones as to succoure them at their neede: wee muste not thinke it straunge that on the contrarie part he plucketh his benefites out of the wicked mens hands, bycause they be sotted on them, and make idols of them, certainly we see that the rich folke of this world become hungerstaruen, notwithstanding that they despise both God and men, and beare themselves in hand that all is for them. And this causeth God now and then to spoyle them and strip them in such wise, as they are seene to go a begging, notwithstanding that they had such abundance erewhile, as they were redy to burst. But in this place Eliphaz ment to say more. For he not only speaketh of the neede wherunto they be brought which despise God but he meeneth also that euen in the midds of their riches they shall still be full of care, and no whit better than poore folke, but shall thinke with themselves: Go to, it may be that I shal want, as we see by experience. For although God giue the vnbeleuers all that euer they can wish, so as they haue their garners and cellers full, and money wherewith to buy both corne and wine, yea and although they haue prouision made for them: yet are they afraid that the earth shuld faie them. True it is, that sometime when all other men are lyke to sterue for hunger, it seemeth to themselves that they haue great store: according as we see how our Lord Iesus Christ sheweth in the example of the rich mā, which faith, Go to my hearte, be merrie, take thine ease, thou maist sport thee at thy pleasure, for I haue store of goods laid vp for thee heere. The rich men therefore may well trust in their goods, and yet for ail that they may be still in doubt and not ceasse to thinke, I may hap to fall into such an inconuenience, and such a thing may ligat vpon me. To be short, (as I haue touched already) they be vnstable gulfes: for although they had all the whole world yet wold it not suffice them. Thus ye perceiue what Eliphaz ment in saying that the wicked should runne vp and downe for bread, as we see it. Looke vpo a very rich man: if there happen him any little losse, he will make a fishing, and he will not rest: till he haue compassed that which he hath taken in hand, hee must pine and martir himselfe out of measure. And if he bring his matters to passe, he must raise yet a newe stocke of money too get more withall, and he dares not eat one bit without cark and care or at leastwise if hee eat but halfe his fill himselfe, he repinerth at those that will eat. And why? He is neuer well at ease, till hee haue pinched as much as will serue to complayse the thing that he goeth about. Is it not a trotting vp and downe for bread, when a man that hath wherewith to find halfe a shire, thinks himselfe too haue nothing: bycause he is not able to staunche his owne desire? But God punisheth him after that manner by a contrarie vengeance. Therefore when we see this, we ought to vnderstand right well, (if we be not worse than blind) that God executeth a notable vengeance vpon such mē, and a vengeance woorthy to be remembered. For can a man haue pleasure in neuer beeing at rest? If a man should grudge vs of our meate and drinke, it wold seeme vnto vs that he went about to starue vs, and wee woude blame them of crueltie which should do so. And if a man be not his owne friende too do good too him selfe, but thinks he hath not halfe ynough, although hee haue a hundred times more than he hath neede of, is it not apparant that God hath blinded him? And yet notwithstanding this vice hath reigned in all times. Therefore it is not without cause that Eliphaz doth heere set vs down a iudgemente of God in saying, that the wicked shall trotte vp and downe after bread. And he addeth, that they know that the day of darknesse is in their hands. Some expound this to be meant that the day of darknesse is at hand, or else that trouble is at their elbow: that is to say, that God will pay them such wages as they haue deserued. For whereof commeth it that they be so formeigred in the middes of their abundance which God hath giuen them, and that when he hath fraughted them with his benefites, yet notwithstanding they dare neither eat nor drinke? VVhereof commeth this? They be punished for their crueltie, rauinousnesse, and deceites that they haue vsed towards their neighbours. Ye neede not seeke farre for the cause wherfore they be punished after that manner. For looke howe they haue troubled poore folkes, and raked other mens goodes too them, and raughte too them selues whatsoeuer they coulde finger: so must GOD bee fayne too recompence them agayne.

Thus yee see the darknesse that is in their handes: That is to say, all the miseries that they indure, proceede of their executing of tirannie against poore folks, for that they spared them not. But the plaine meaning of these wordes, namely (that they know that the day of darknesse is in their handes,) is that whatsoeuer they do or what paynes so euer they take, although they be rich and mightie, yet can they not wind them selues out of the affliction that God sendeth vpon them. It is certaine that all that euer the couetous sorte do, is to prouide thit they may neuer want. But were they well aduised, they wold be contented with that which they haue: but they cannot away with that. And why? For (as I haue said already) God so blindeth them, that they become so dull, as they cannot perceiue that the goodes which they haue, ought to suffice them. Heerevpon they practise all that euer they may, they trie all meanes to bring their matters about, and when one way will not serue, they seeke another way to the wood. The couetous sort therefore haue not their hands idle, but take vpon them to remoue the whoie worlde, rather than too be disappoynted of theyr purposes. Dayly they bee making of new shiftes (as they tearme them) and yet in the meane while they see that darknesse is in their handes: that is to say, when they haue done what they can to prouide for them selues, when they haue vsed all meanes possible, yet can they not shift their hands from beeing in continuall miserie: for God hath bereft them of that benefyte, according as it is said in the Psalme, that God will giue rest to his welbeloued, (whereas in the meane while the wretched vnbeleuers, shall rise early and go late to bed, and not dare eat their bread but with sorrowe, and yet notwithstanding shall further themselves no whit thereby,) so as they may easily perceiue, that God hath blifed them, and increased the worke of their hands.

VVe see then contrariwise, that which is set downe heere: namely that the wicked shall haue much adoo too further their labours. And why? For their handes are agaynste God: that is to saye, all their labour is misliked, and spite of theyr teeth they must bee fayne to knowe, that affliction is layde vpon them therein, and that they cannot rid their hands of it.

Then haue we heere a very notable sentence: that is to witte, that the abundance of goodes is not able to suffice vs, and that wee cannot make oure accounte too bee at oure ease, bycause wee haue store of corne, wine and money. And why? For the matter is not too bee founde there: but the perfectoin of all happinesse, is Gods gyuyng of rest to his faithfull ones. Then let vs learne not to gyue our selues to this outrageous couetousnesse, wherewith we see the moste part of the worlde

Luke. 12. c. 16.

world caught and caryed away. But after we haue betakē our selues vntoo God, let vs pray him too make vs feele that he is our fosterfather, and let vs receiue whatsoeuer he giueth vs, crauing our ordinarie foode at his hād without ar:empting of vniuful meanes, and abteyning from robbery, violence, deceyte and such other like things, & desiring to be nourished as it shal please him to shewe vs fauour. Thus ye see what we haue too marke in the first place. And furthermore let vs pray him, so to blisse the labour of our hands, as wee may perceyue that the things are not inclosed therein: but rather to make his countenance shine vpon vs, that is to say to make vs find his fauour and goodnesse by giuing vs good successe. For whē men that labour do get their iuiug honestly, they haue wherof to thank God: & therby they perceiue that God hath inlightened them, and that his fauour is as a cresset to guyde them. Therefore we haue cause too pray to God for it. Furthermore if wee now and then recoyle backe instead of going forward, let vs lerne this counsell of God to resort vntoo him, and pray him that he suffer vs not to be of the copanie of those that see so much darknesse in their handes. but rather that when he hath giuen vs any meane, he will make it to prosper in such wise, as we may knowe that he is reere at hand to vs. Thus you see in effect what we haue to remember in this sentence: now Eliphaz addeth, that for as much as he lifted vp his hand against God, and strengthened himself against the Almighty, God will take him by the necke and catch hold of the strongest and thickest of his armour. Here the reason is redred why our Lord sendeth fearfulnesse vpon the wicked, & why he tormenteth them, and also disappointeth them of all their attempts, and turneth all things cleane contrarie to their intent: namely by cause they lifted vp themselves against him. True it is that a mortall man will be ashamed to think of making warre against God: and the wicked themselves are so farre off frō being acknownd that they be minded to lift vp themselves against the almightie that they abhorre the verie woord: but yet for all that they cease not to do it For proof hereof we need not to send a trūpetter to God to defie him, when we mynd to make warre against him. for if we trouble our neyghbour wrōfully, if we vse deceyt and extortion: behold, God setteth himself against vs. If we thought we made warre against him, and not against mortall creatures, would wee be so mad as to ouerhoote our selues in such sorte as we doo? If we considered with our selues, that God sheweth himself to be an enimie of the outrage couise, would we then lift vp our selues after this fashyon against him? And whē we fall to outrage, I pray you is it not a full incountering against God? VVe take it not to be so: but yet is it so neuerthelessse. VVhat should there neede any Sophistrie in this behalf? As I sayd afore, when we speake of making warre against God, it is not ment that we chalendge him by an herault with a trumpet: but if we be so proud as to presume vpon our owne strength and power, to take more vpon vs than God giueth vs leaue to doo: it is certayne that we come to rush against God. As much do we when we disquiet poore folk, and go about to set our foote vpon the throte of them. Therefore whē we fall to aduancing of our selues in this wise aboue our bounds: it is all one as if we defied God to his face. And so this sentence is woorthie of remembrance, where Eliphaz sayeth that God will leape in the neckes of those that aduance themselves after that sort against him. He sayeth expressly that they lifted vp their hands against God. Verely this similitude is taken of those that fight in battell, neuerthelessse the meening of it extendeth yet further. For Eliphazs meening is, that when men take that vpon them which is not lafull for them, by vsing any outrage or iniurie: God will take part with their neyghbours against them. True it is that when they cannot compasse their matters by that meanes, they go too it with some deceyt and priuie packing: and thē although the world perceiue not, yet doth not God cease to be their enimie, for nourishing of their wicked affections secretly within them. Howbeit they shall be so much the more vnexcusable when their iniquitie sheweth it self abroad. He therefore that polleth a man of his goodes, shall be hild for a murderer before God, yea euen though the wrong that he doeth may be excused before men. And so Eliphaz ment to shewe here, that men ought not too think it straunge though God take such vègeance of the wicked that haue not cloked their wrongfull doings, but haue made them knowne to the whole worlde. And in good sayth when they shall haue runne in and out after that sort, whē they shall haue eaten vp one, and fleeced another, and when they shall haue executed many extortions and cruelties, is it not bygh tyme that God shuld step afore them then or neuer? For it is not for nought that he reporteth himself too bee the defender of the poore that are vexed wrongfully. No, it is apparant: yea and oftentimes we crie out vnto God for vengeance. And wherfore doo poore folk indure such things? It seemeth too them that God leaueth them in the briers, and is not wiling to do them any right. But in such temptations it behoueth vs to resort to that which the holie scripture sayth: nameiy that it is not yet conuenient tyme. He knoweth why he maketh delay, and it were for nothing else but to giue tyme of repentance to those that doo euill, too make them the more vnexcusable, and also too stirre vp the poore folk that are oppressed to cal vpon him, and to flee vnto him, and to betake themselves wholly to his providence, assuring themselves that he will ayd and succour them when he seeth it meete and expedient for their welfare. Howbeit when we see God woork in deede after he hath tarried a long tyme, ought we not to opē our eyes to behold his iudgements? should we still be dazeled at them? And afterward he addeth, that they had strengthened themselves against the Almighty. VVhen he sayeth that they strengthened themselves, he meeneth that they hardened themselves. For how is it possible that men should gather strength to lift vp themselves against God? May it be by going about sea and land, and by assembling all the help that is possible to be found? No. How then do they strengthen themselves? By a false imagination, when they haue such an ouerweening of themselves, as they think themselves able to withstand God. Not that they are directly of that mynd, but by cause they forget that God is able to do them harme. For were it not so, they would not be so stubborne in euill as they be, nother would they be so wilfull when men shew them their faults, and labour to reclayme them. Therefore the pride & stubborneesse that is to be seene in men, is a sure record, that they take themselves to be strong and mightie ynough too beate backe the hand of God whē it commeth against them. Lo how this saying that they strengthened themselves, is to be vnderstoode, Not of the verie deed doing, for that is impossible: but through diuicish ouerweening, by cause they shake off all feare, and beare themselves in hand that they shoud not indure him any more to be their iudge: and to be short that they ought not to owe God so much dutie as to come account before him: and therewithall they become the bolder to giue themselves ouer to all naughtinesse, as though it were lafull to do what they list. And Eliphaz giueth the title of almightie vnto God purposely according to the circumstance of the place. Not that God can at any tyme be ouercome: but Eliphaz intended here to skorne the pridefulnesse of the wicked in strengethen-ing themselues after that maner against God. And who is he? what meene you? He is the Almighty: yea and what shall become of your strength? If ye had to incounter with creatures, it would stand ye in hand too knowe which of them is strongest: But sith you make warre with God: must ye not needes be ouerthrowne ere ye come to hand stroks? There is no strength but of him: yea and whereas ye haue borrowd it of him, will ye come too turne it against him? Thinke ye that hee will suffer the strength which he hath giuen you, to diminish anie whit of his maiestie? Must it not needes serue him to confound you withall? Yee see then for what cause Eliphaz hath expressely set downe here the woord Al-myghtie, in reproching men for strengthening themselues against God. But we haue yet one other good and profitable lesson to gather hereof, which is that if we wil not haue warre with God, we must be well ware that we absteine from all euill dooing and from all wrong, and we must liue among our neyghbours without woorking them any anoyance or iniurye. For as soone as wee doo but stirre one finger to poill other men of their goodes or to trouble one and to deuour another: behold God is as it were chalenged by vs to make warre with vs, bycause wee haue gone about euill towards them whom hee hath taken intoo his tuicion. VVe see that when earthly princes haue giuen their protection too any howse, if a man do them any wrong, it is not simple felonie, but hygh treason, whereof they will be auenged. And doo wee imagin that God will bee lesse priuileged than princes? He hath set his badge vpon all poore folk, by taking them intoo his owne charge and protection. Now if any man come to torment them and afflict them, will he suffer it? Then (as I sayd) let vs lerne too brydle our selues, too the end that wee vse no outrage against our neyghbours. And furthermore also let vs keepe ourselues from this frenzie that is spoken of heere. For wee bee not well in our witts if wee take our selues too myghtie and strong against God. Therefore let vs aduisedly walke in modestie, and acknowledging the frayltie of our nature, let vs humble our selues, and let the same serue to hold vs within our bounds, and knowing that thing which God permitteth vs too knowe, let vs bee contented too walk playnly on our way without running ouer the feeldes like stray cattell. for what else is that but too strengthen our selues against God? when we presume to doo that which God hath forbidden vs, shall wee esteeme it to bee but a single disobedience? Is it not more than a duelistish furiousnesse? So then let vs vncace our selues out of all pryde and presumption, and simply followe that which God sheweth vs. And if wee be tempted now and then with the sayd vayne fancie, let vs marke well this woord Almyghtie too brydle vs with all, saying? How now? wretched creature, what wilt thou doo? wherevpon muzest thou? for thou strengthenest thy self in thyne euill: and behold God telleth thee that he will lift vp himself against thee, and thou must be fayre too feele him thy foe and mortal enimie. Therefore restreine thy self, except thou intend too feele his myghtie hand which is able to destroy thee quite and too make cleane riddance of thee. Mark (I say) what wee haue too note in this sentence. And furthermore let vs herken how Eliphaz addeth, that God will eaze the wicked folkes by the necks, and that if they bee neuer so well armed, so as they haue bothe helmet and sheeld, God will seaze vpon them through the thickest of their furniture. VWhereas hee sayeth that God will seaze the wicked by the necke: it is too shewe that they shall bee caught in such wise as they cannot by any meanes escape. For it is sayd that a man is hild by the necke, when he is shet vp in extremitie and distresse. God therefore sheweth that he will deale after the same fashyon with wicked folk, and that he will not handle them with stroks of cudgells, nor only giue th<sup>e</sup> a blowe or twaine, but seaze vpon their necks to choke them. And good reason it is that it should be so. For wee see how cruell they haue ben too their neyghbours, and that they haue hild their foote vpon their throts as much as they could. God therefore must not vse gentle corrections towards them: but his assaying of the must be with extremitie to their confuzion. And forasmuch as the wicked doo trust in their armour and artille-rie bycause they be well furnished: and forasmuch as they will needs barre God from comming at them: it is sayd purposely, that he will nip them through the thickest of their armour, and that all their resistance and fortifying of them selues against God, shal not boote them a whit against his force. They shall haue bothe corslet & sheeld, and yet for all that, God will compassse his intent. VWhereby we be warned to walk continually in feare: for wee ought to be afrayd of Gods punishings according as the holie scripture sayeth, that it is a dreadfull thing too fall into the hands of the liuing God. Let vs not surmyze that wee haue to do with a mortall man. As soone then as God threateneth, let vs fall flat downe, and not be so hardharted as too swell against God. The wrath of a king (sayeth Salomon) is the messenger of death: and what will the wrath of God himselfe bee? when God sendeth vs woord of his displeasure, see wee not how death is present at our backs? Therefore let vs not misbehaue our selues for all the help that we can haue at the hands of men or of al other creatures: let vs not think ourselues to be euer the neerer our purpose when wee imagin our case to bee well provided for. For if wee were to fight against creatures, it myght auayle vs: but forasmuch as our warre is with God, can we serue our turnes against him, with that which he hath in his hand, and with that which he disposeth at his pleasure? VWhen we shall purpose to marche on the one side, he will make vs turne head another way if he thinke good. Yee see then how wee haue too consider, that if wee arme our selues against God, our owne sword must cut our throte. For God will not send an armie against vs, nother needeth he to make any provision wherewith too destroy vs: for we our selues shall woork our owne decay. Therefore (as I sayd) let vs not trust to our owne fence nor to all the meanes that are here bylowe, assuring our selues that all those things shall nothing profit vs when wee haue too do with God. Again, if wee see the wicked aduanced, so as their necks swell (as the threescore and thirtenthe Psalme speaketh of them) insomuch as it seemeth that they should burst with their puffed necks: let vs neuertheless wayt alwayes patiently till God lay his hand vpon them. For he knoweth well how to daunt them, so as all theyr swelling shall vanish away intoo the ayre. If wee see the wicked to haue so greate furniture, as (to our seeming) they be sure and no euill can befall them: let vs not think that all that can be any let vnto God that he should not ouerthrowe them and destroy them when their time commeth. Then must we not be afrayd when we see the wicked flourish and in their cheef Ruffe, or rather to be so well vphild and vnderpropped, as it seemeth that they bee not too bee delt withall. God, God (I say) must be fayre to strike the stroke. And when hee putteth forth his hand, they may may well seeke help and succour at the hands of creatures, but yet shall they be cast downe and vtterly destroyed. Lo how the faythfull haue wherewith to comfort themselues when they see wicked men rage in despyzing of God and infected with all rebelliousnesse, or rather vtterly hardened, in such sort as it is impossible to make them bow, that they myght knowe that in the end God wil performe that which he hath sayd and spokē. For that which hath ben spokē by Eliphasis, is as a sentence vttered by the holie Ghoste, euē for the two considerations that I haue spokē of, that is to wit, that the faythfull myght hold theselues in all modestie and lowlinesse, and not attempt any thing against God: and that when they see the wicked haue their full scope in the world, & theselues borne downe with many wrongs, they should cast vp their sighes vnto God, desiring him to performe that which he hath once spoken: according also as it is good that they call vpon him, and haue their only refuge vnto him. And consequently it is sayd, that distresse shall light vpon the wicked, and come vpon him as a king prepared to battell, or rather as it were wynd about him. For the word that Eliphasis vseth here, signifieth a ball, or a bowle, or any round thing. For we knowe, that when it cometh to giuing of battell, sometymes men cast themselues in a ring according as the cace requyret: and so was doone in old tyme. Therefore this sentence may be expounded, that distresse shall be as a king in a redinesse [to giue battell]: and that whensoever God shall send affliction vpon the wicked, it shall not be like an enimie that hath no power nor strength: but like a king that hath souldiers ynow to giue his enimie the ouerthrowe. Or else a man may referre the sayd Roundnesse to the wicked, which shall bee inuironed on all sides, that is too say, which shall haue no way to scape. For if God seaze vpon him, it shall not bee too beseege him on the one side or on the other, but before and behynde, on the ryght hand and on the left, and he shall bee so inclosed on all sides, as there shall be no starting hole for him. And this is the most conuenient interpretation. Then let vs mark well how Eliphasis meening is, that when God is mynded too punish a man, after long taryance and long sparing of him, his shewing of himself too be angrie is not too be pacified by and by. but he will come about him on all sides, so as he may neuer scape his handes. Thus ye see what the effect of this sentence is. But herevpon we haue yet one good lesson more to gather. For wee bee put in mynd that it is not for vs too dallye with God, forasmuch as if we be ouerpressed with his hand, we may well woork all the wyles wee can, but we shall neuer be able too scape out of the distresse wherewith it shall be his pleasure too pinche vs, nor from the aduersitie wherenvnto we shall be subiect, but wee must be fayne to tarie in it spite of our teethe. And why? For God hath a woonderfull furniture. He is not like mortall men, which spitte out their choller at their mouth when their handes bee too short, I meene euen kings and princes themselues: who can storme well ynough, but their strength fayleth them at their neede. But it is not so with God: he hath alwayes furniture ynough too compasse his enimies withall. VVhat remaineth then? Let vs beware that we make no warre against him. And for performance thereof, let vs forbear all iniurie and euilldoing. For if we play the looce Colts, we shall find at length that God hath meanes ynow too reyne vs backe by force, if wee list not too submit our selues vnto him of our owne good will. But immediatly it is sayd, that forasmuch as he hath fatted his eyes, forasmuch as his face strouteth whith greace, forasmuch as he hath stuffed his bellye, and forasmuch as he hath ouer larded his gattes and inhabited the desolate townes and forsaken houses: he shall come to decay, and not prosper. Verely to the intent this sentence may bee the better vnderstoode, wee must lay it fourth after this manner. Although the wicked man dwell in desert Townes, yet crammeth he his belly and his bodie, bearing himselfe in hande that he shall make all the worlde newe again, and that his dooings are woonderfull: But yet shall all go too decay: and although hee make a faire shewe for a tyme, yet shall hee not continue, but God shall turne all vp syde downe.

Howbee it, as yet we comprehend not Eliphasis meening, except we knowe first what it is too fill a mannes face with greace or fatte. God doeth not here condemne the fatnesse that is in mennes bodies: but now and then he vseth that similitude, whē he intēdeth to expresse that men are puffed vp with pryde when they be in prosperitie, by cause it is the thing that maketh vs forget our owne infirmitie. Lo why our Lord sayeth, that fatnesse blindeth vs. And in verie deede it is a common prouerb among vs [to say that prouander pricketh men] Also when the Hebrewes intend to speake of a lowely man, they vse to say he is cast downe. For our Lord tameth vs in such wise by afflictions, as we lerne to humble ourselues before him and to rid our selues quite and cleane of all pryde and pertnesse. So then, like as in all the rest of the holie scripture, so also in this sentence, when it is sayd that the wicked are fatted, it is not ment simply that they bee fatte of their bodyes: but that they take such a pryde in their goodes and riches, that they be as it were puffed vp against God, and full of poyson and presumptuousnesse. And although they be but leane of bodie: yet are they redie to burst with another cursed fatnesse forasmuch as they be puffed vp against God. Yea and we see that their fatnesse (that is to wit, their diuclish malapertnesse) maketh their eyes too strout out of their heads, as it is sayd in the threescore and thirteenth Psalme that their eyes are as good as halfe bursten, by reason that they bleare themselues in their delights and pleasures, and consider not that they may bee bereft of them all in one minute of an houre. Marke (I say) howe fatnesse blindeth the wicked, and how they are as good as bursten to their owne shame and destruction.

But now let vs come too another sentence. Eliphasis sayeth that the wicked shall not prosper. And what is the reason? It is by cause he is puffed vp with fatnesse. VVil we then be bliffed of God, and be maynteyned in good state and true happinesse? Let vs keepe vs well from pampering our selues with fatnesse: that is too say, let vs keepe vs from being pampered with pryde, that wee presume not to make our selues this or that: but let vs walk in all mildnesse, knowing that we depend vpon the hand of God, and that when he hath lifted vs vp, hee can also soone cast vs downe again. Therefore let vs be moued so much the more too serue and honour him, and let vs not bee so vngraciouse as too giue him occasion too ouerthrowe that which he hath builded, and too destroy it quite by cause wee would make another Towre of Babylon and presume to lift vp our selues against him. Euen so happeneth it (sayeth Eliphasis) Although the wicked haue inhabited the desert Cities, that is to say, although they haue had such scope, as it might seme they would make the worlde newe againe, for too inhabite deserte Townes is as muche as not too be contented with the possession of things that are in good plyght, but too fyght against God, that they myght be new makers of the world and setters vp of things that were destroyed. The wicked then may well haue all this outward shewe, but there shal be no cōtinuance, bycause they aduance themselues against God. But on the contrarie part, when we be vndone and stripped stark naked, then wil God shewe vs the fauour to build vp again the things that are forsaken, cōdicionally that we go not about it with vayne pryde, nor presume any thing vpon ourselues, but desire him to reache vs his strong hand, & so to guide and gouerne vs alwayes by his holie spirit, that when he hath once begonne to shewe his graciously fauour towards vs, he will continue the same and bring it to perfection.

Now let vs fall downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele thē in such wise, as we may lerne to mis-like more and more of our selues, and that forasmuch as we be so much giuen to pryde and vayne presumption: it may please him to open our eyes, that when we perceiue our owne feeblenesse and infirmitie, we may run wholly vnto him, and in calling vpon him acknowledge that we haue no power to strengthen our selues, furtherforthe than it pleaseth him to quicken vs that are in death, and as it were to rayse vs vp again to lyfe, and moreouer, that he will mainteyne vs in his fauour, and make vs so too feele it bothe in bodie & soule, as we may desire nothing but to yeeld our selues wholly to his seruice, and that by our example we may allure others to like humilitie, so as he may be honored and glorified both of greate and small. That for the dooing hereof it may please him too rayse vp true and faythfull, &c,

The lxj. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the xv. Chapter.

30. He shall not depart out of darknesse, the flame shall sidge his braunches, and he shall go away with the breath of his mouthe 31. He shall be deceiued with vanitie, and shall not stand: For vanitie is his change.
32. He shall be consumed before his time, and his braunches shall not flourish.
33. He shall be berett of his sournesse, as a vine is, and God shall cast him off as an Olive tree doth his flovvres.
34. The congregation of the hypocrites shall bee desolate, and fire shall deuour the house of Brybes.
35. For he conceyeth mischeef and bringeth forth vanitie, his belly prepareth deceyt.

Yesterday we sawe how the despyzers of God aduanced themselues in such wise as it may seeme there are none but they, and that God giueth them greate aduantage, fauoring them, in such wise, as they not only mainteyne themselues in their state, but do as it were make a new world: and yet notwithstanding that their end cannot bee but cursed and shamefull. And this is it that Eliphaz addeth a new, saying, that the wicked shall not depart out of darknesse. And herein he discerneth the children of God and the afflictions that they indure, from those whom God hath vtterly reiected. For it may come to passe that wee shall be in darknesse as we see the hoie Prophetes complayne that God hath withdrawen his light from them, so as they grope about, and knowe not which way too turne them: neuerthelesse God giueth them an end of it after they haue languished for a tyme, & reacheth them his hand and draweth them out of it. But it is sayd of the wicked, that they shall neuer get out of darknesse, but shall abyde ouerthrowen in it without end. And hereby (as I sayd) they be discerned from those whom God afflicteth but for a tyme, and whom he meeneth too succour. It is sayd that God will deuoure their braunches: that is to say, how greatly focuer they be aduanced, God will consume thē. For in this place I take not their braunches for their children and offspring, but for their whole state. And surely vnder that terme is comprehended all that euer springeth out of a tree: too do vs to vnderstand that when God shall haue punished the wicked, they may wel conceyue many hopes, and beare themselues in hand that they shall spring againe but they hope is a slope sayeth Eliphaz. VVh; so: Fire shall consume al: that is to say, Gods wrath shal be as a fire to burne them vp, and when they are likely to releue againe, it shall not be so: Finally he addeth, that the wicked shal go away with the breath of his mouthe. True it is that this may wel be verified of God. For the Scripture sayeth oftentimes that God will consume the wicked with the only breth of his mouth, to shewe what power he hath to punish the wicked and his enimies. God thē needeth not to arme himself, nother needeth he to make any preparation to punish those whom he listeth: let him but only open his mouth, and breathe vpon his enimies, & behold they be ouerthrowen and destroyed. For like as Gods word quickeneth vs, when it pleaseth him to inlighten vs with his grace, (as wherin consisteth all our welfare) and like as, though we were as good as dead before, yet we be releued againe as soone as God sheweth vs his fauour: so contrariwise whē he vttereth his wrath against the wicked, he needeth no more but the opening of his mouth too drowne thē in destruction. And this same also is the cause why S. Paule sayeth that when Antichriste hath reigned in the churche, at the last he shal be consumed with the breth of Gods mouth according to that which I haue alledged out of the prophet Esay, who termeth it the mace wherwith God is woont to breake & to daunt al his enimies, when he listeth to haue his sonne reigne. This sentence therefore is vnderstood of some, that the wicked cā neuer get out of their afflictions, nor neuer shal be deliuered out of the darknesse wherinto they are entred, bycause God pursueth them, or hath his mouth open too consume them, and his word is of such power, as it shall make them to perish vnhappyly. Howbeit the true and fit meening of it is that the wicked man shall go away with the breath of his owne mouthe: that is to say, as a puffe.

Verely some also do vnderstand it thus: namely that the wicked may well gnash their teethe & chafe in themselues, but yet God will not cease to destroy them, according as we see how the vnbeleeuers are full of pride, and that if God touche them and lay his hand vpon thē, they play the Bulls and some at the mouth like wyld Bores. VV; we see then that they haue a greate breathe in chafing and fretting but what win they by that? Can all their sturdinesse and resistance against God be able to saue them?

No.

Esai. 59. b. 9.

Esai. 11. a. 4.

2. Thess. 2. b. 8.

No. And so shall it be a verie true and conuenient lesson that howsoeuer the wicked doo striue against God and how full of pride and bitterneſſe ſo euer they be, yet ſhal they not therfore eſcape Gods hand nor ſaue themſelues by that ſhift. Notwithſtanding, we muſt come to the ſenſe that I ſpake of, bycauſe it is moſt agreeable: namely that the wicked ſhall go away as it were in their breth, ſo as they neede no more but to open their mouth, and by and by they vaniſh away. To be ſhort, Eliphaz met to ſay, that when the wicked make greateſt ſhewe of themſelues afore men, and it ſeemeth that they ſhall continue without end, then ſhal be their change: inſomuch that they ſhal no ſooner breathe but they ſhal be fordoone, ſo as they ſhal be but as a breath that commeth out of a mannes mouth. Now we know that when a man puffeth out his breth, it vaniſheth away ſodeinly and becōmeth nothing. Therefore let vs marke well, that although the deſpyzers of God ſeeme to haue a laſting life: yet ſhall it ſoone vaniſh away, ſo as it is not without cauſe that they be likened to their breth. True it is that the ſame thing is verified of all men. For what are we? what firmneſſe is there in our nature? wherein conſiſteth our life? True it is that our ſoules are created after the image of God but yet for all that, mannes life is as a blaſt, and if we breathe not we be vndoone, with the yeelding vp of one gasp we be dead. And ſo this frayltie wherof Eliphaz ſpeaketh here, is not only in the deſpyzers of God, but in all men. Furthermore wee haue wherewith to comfort vs, in that God preſerueth vs: and although our life be ſo fleeting, that it is but a ſhadowe or a ſmoke: yet notwithstanding we be ſure ynough of it ſeing it is in the hand of God. Thus ye ſee wherin our whole comfort lyeth. And therefore let vs assure our ſelues of bothe twayne: that is too wit, that by nature we be nothing, and may periſh euery minute: and yet notwithstanding, that God of his infinite goodneſſe putteth a difference betweene vs and his enemies. For when they haue caſt out their forme: they muſt periſh at a blaſt: but although we languiſh ſo as we be not like too liue paſt the giuing of one gaspe more, yet neuertheleſſe God will ſtrengthen vs with his power, yea euen with a ſecret power which ſhall beare no ſhewe at all to the worldward, and yet we ſhall be ſo maynteyned by him that we ſhall be ſtill ayue whyle the wicked go to be waſted away. Lo what we haue too beare away in this ſentence. Now conſequently it is ſayd, that the wicked being deceyued in vanitie, ſhall not ſtand out, bycauſe that vanitie ſhall be his change. True it is that this ſentence is vnderſtoode diuerſly: for the woord which we tranſlate to ſtand out, is taken alſo too beleue. And ſo ſome expound it that the wicked man being in vanitie will not beleue that vanitie ſhall be his change. Again, there is a double vnderſtanding in another word: ſo that whereas wee reade vanitie, there is the woord Rightheſſe or Certaintie: as if it were ſayd, that the wicked man beleueth it not too be true. VVhyſo? Bycauſe that vanitie is his change. Neuertheleſſe the moſt receyued and commoneſt conſtruction is this: namely that he which is ſo deceyued in vanitie ſhall not ſtand out or continue, or will not beleue that vanitie is his change. As touching the woord beleue, (if we followe that conſtruction) wee may picke out a good leſſon out of it: which is that when God bereueth men of their wit and diſcretion, they can neuer receyue any good warning or profitable counſell. VVhy ſo? For they are ſtubborne. Then doo ye ſee a puniſhment of God which we muſt marke well and be afrayd of it: which is, that except God make vs conformable, wee ſhall neuer diſcerne what is good and profitable. Beſides this

although we haue men about vs that giue vs good counſell, and ſeeke to profit vs, and ſhewe vs what is good for vs: yet notwithstanding wee ſhall be ſo froward, that all that euer is ſayd too vs ſhall take no place. And this we ſee dayly. For when God bereueth men of their vnderſtanding: too ſhewe his vengeance the more vpon them, and to make them the more vnexcusable, he will giue men leaue to ſpeake ſtill too them, and too counſell and incorage them ſtill to goodneſſe: but they ſhall continue ſtill a ſleepe at it. For if a man aſke them whether they will willingly periſh or no, they will answer, no. But if a man put them in mynd of their ſaluation, or if a man ſhewe them and point them the way too it: they had leuer breake their necke and tumble intoo a ditch that is redye before them, than too walke in the way that they are called vntoo. VVe ſee this: And therefore ſo much the more muſt wee marke well ſuch iudgements of God, that wee may walk warely. For is it a ſmall thing too tempt our God in ſuch wiſe as he muſt be fayne too picke out our eyes, ſo as wee may not knowe on which ſide too turne vs, and although hee reache vs his hand and ſhewe vs which way is good for vs to go, yet we go quite contrarie?

Behold a horrible vengeance. And yet we ſee dayly that ſuch as are wilfull, and haue often tempted God by reiecting his grace, are in the end forced to fall into ſuch a biindneſſe, as they doo no more diſcerne ne can any more beleue the doctrine of fayth. Alſo heere ye ſee that it is not a common gift vnto all men to beleue the Goſpell. VVe ſee the woord of God is preached, and ſhould there be any gaynfaying if men were not wilfull and froward? VVhereas God declareth him ſelf to be a father and a Sauyour, and aboue all thing whereas hee ſeing vs full of finnes giueth vs a warrant of our ſaluation in the perſone of his Sonne, aſſuring vs that although we be full of all iniquitie, yet notwithstanding our Lord Ieſus Chriſte hath ſatiſfied for vs, ſo that by the meanes of his death and paſſion we be ſet cleere and may appeere before Gods iudgement ſeate, and bee hild there for rightuouſe and giltyleſſe: I pray you, if we were not vtterly brutiſh, which of vs would not giue eare too it with earneſt deſire? But wee ſee that the Goſpell is deſpyzed, yea and that many conceyue ſuch rancour againſt it, as they would rather plucke God out of his ſeate, than ſubmit themſelues too his doctrine.

And whereof commeth this but that it is not in mannes power to beleue the benefite, vntill it be giuen him of God, and that when men are left to themſelues and giuen vp to lewd mynd, they muſt needs reiect all goodneſſe and chooze all euill, and altogether to their owne deſtruction. For aſmuch as we ſee this, let vs humble our ſelues. For he that will aduance himſelf in his owne conceyte, muſt in the end be bereft of all vnderſtanding. For it behoueth vs too keepe our allegiance vntoo God when he hath giuen vs a right mind, cleere vnderſtanding, and good reaſon, and at the leaſt wiſe wee muſt confeſſe that the ſame cōmeth of him, & pray him to continue it in vs, & not ſuffer vs to abuſe ſo ſingular a gift, but rather cauſe vs to apply it to the right vſe, namely by yeelding our ſelues to his obeysance, and by ſticking throughly to his doctrine. Ye ſee then what we haue too doo, when we ſee ſo many poore blind ſoules wandring ouer the fields, & not able to diſcerne any thing, who eue though a mā would guide the & ſhewe the right way, would neuertheleſſe draw ſtill the contrarie way. I ſay we muſt acknowledge that wee ourſelues ſhould doo the like if God did not by ſtrong hand hold vs and drawe vs to himself. For it is not ynough for him to call vs, and to shew vs which way we should go: but he must be fayne to draw vs also as the holie scripture sayeth: that is to say, he must giue such an operation to the knowledge which he offereth vs, as we may be touched with it, and our hart as it were tyed too it. Therefore after that God hath taught vs what too doo: hee must also immediatly therewithall giue vs a mynd to followe the good. And so (as I sayd) we may gather a good and profitable lesson of it is saying, that the wicked will not beleue. And why? 10 Bycause he is deceyued with vanitie. And the reason is added expressly, bycause that when a man is fore-possessed by naughty affections, and snarled in many errors and corruptions: ye see hee is like a desperate person, and there is no comming to him to shewe him his error. Howbeit we be deceyued with vanitie before hand by nature: what bring we out of our moothers womb, when it is sayd that there is nothing but foolishnesse and vntuthe in our vnderstanding? Behold a generall sentence, to shew that as soone as wee be borne 20 intoo the worlde, we be quyte and cleane voyde of truth afore hand, vntill such tyme as God haue reformed vs. And why? wee go on forward altoogither vntoo euill. And therefore we should bee shet vp in this condemnation all the sort of vs, were it not that God did drawe vs out of it by his mercie. For wee are all of vs deceyued in vanitie, and none of vs is fit to receyue that which is good, true, and profitable for our welfare. But if we be intyced to manye deceyts, Satan will beguyle vs out of hand. As how? Marke mee a yoong man that 30 hath liued in simplicitie all his lyfe, or that hath not liued any long tyme. As for example, admit there bee a yoong man of twentie yeeres age, that hath ben well brought vp from the beginning, and hath not tasted of false doctrine nor of other wicked things. Although that such a one seeme to bee sufficiently well disposed too receyue goodnesse and too yeeld himself teachable: Yet must God be fayne too woork in him, or else hee can neuer come to good. And why? For our nature is forward vnto euill, and altoogither giuen vntoo it, as I 40 sayd afore. But if there bee any one that is wylie and full of naughtincesse, and hath ben nuzled in wicked doctrine and superstition, as we see the Papises are, that is much more. These Clawebacks and Hypocrits that are aimed a long tyme afore hand against God, and carryed headlong away in their errors, haue in such wyse applyed their whole indueuer to intangle themselves in the snares of Satan, as it is not possible to get them out againe. Then is it certaine that these sort of men doo 50 much lesse beleue, as wee see by experience. For God doeth stil shewe fauour to those that haue had any simplicitie: but as for those that are so sotted in error and wholly giuen too it: the iustice of God must needes be shewed vpon them, except it be his pleasure too woork after a woonderfull fashyon, according as he can well drawe whom he listeth out of the bottom of hell. But when he doeth so, it is a miracle well woorthie too bee knowne and magnified. Neuerthelesse wee perceyue that which is sayd, namely that the wicked man shall not beleue, after he is once sotted in vanitie. I say wee 60 perceyue that God executeth his vengeance vpon such as are hardened in euill by long continuance in it. Now when wee heare this, we haue cause too thank God for drawing of vs to the knowledge of his Gospell, and for giuing vs a mynd to cleaue vnto it. For that commeth not of our selues, it is a speciall gift of the holie Ghost. Moreouer also we bee warned to keepe our eyes open, that Satan dazel vs not, by setting his errors and de-ceyts in our sight. And why? For if we suffer our selues too be misseled and deceyued willingly: the mischief must needes be increased, euen till it come too the roof whereof Eliphaz speaketh here: that is to wit, till we be diffurnished of all reason, and bee no more able to beleue that which is for our welfare, but set our selues quyte and cleane against it. If we will not fall intoo this horrible vengeance of God, let vs preuent it. And how? Let euery of vs bee heedfull and stand vpon his gard. And sith that God hath taken vpon him the charge to keepe vs so carefully, that hee telleth vs that nother Satan, nor all his force and practizes shall be able to doo any thing against vs: let vs sticke to this promis, and not doubt but that he will fulfill it, and make vs feele the frute of it in due tyme and place. But now let vs come to that which I spake of, that is too say, that the wicked shall no more stand (for the woord importeth as much as to beleue, like as also the woord truthe may also signifie stedinesse) for it is verie true that the wicked shall not stand when hee is sotted in vanitie. And why? For vanitie is his change. The reason serueth very fitly too confirme this principle, that the wicked shall haue no settling, nor finally prosper. For God maketh them too turne alwayes too vanitie. The woord vanitie is taken here in two senses. For when it is sayd that the wicked man shall not stand bycause he is sotted in vanitie: it is as much to say as he cannot stand when he is full of vntuthe and blinded with deceyuablenesse. And why? For vanitie (see how the woord altereth his signification) is his change, that is to say, there is nothing for him but deceyuablenesse, and when he thinketh to haue things at his harts lust, all vanisheth away in the turning of a hand, so as he findeth nother help nor releef in his aduersitie, nor anye remedie of his miseries. Thus ye see what this woord vanitie importeth in the second place. And the woord change fitteth well this sense. For when God shall haue led the wicked fort through manie turmoyles, and when they shall haue buskled themselves throughly too and fro: on which side so euer they turne them, they shall alwayes fall into vanitie, that is too say, they shall be vtterly disapointed of their expectation. True it is that they may set manye fayre hopes before their eyes, and beare them selues in hand that they haue wonne the goale: but behold, in the turning of a hand they bee deceyued, and see it is but follye for them too gape for one thing or other. Now let vs come too the gathering toogether of the things that are spoken here intoo one summe: namely that the wicked shall not stand out, that is too say, shall not haue anye settling or continuance. Although the despizers of God be exalted and triumph for a time: yet haue they not any settlednesse. And why? For God leadeth them continually thorough backeweyes, in suche sorte as they fynde themselves beguiled and disapointed of their hope.

And this is a verie profitable lesson for vs. For, what is the cause that wee grudge at the wicked, and would fayne be parttakers of their state? Bycause we haue not pacience too tarye the end of them, as it is sayd in the Psalme. For if our myndes were quiet, it is certaine 73.c.17.
 that we should shudder at the end that is prepared for the despyzers of God, bycause that at the last their ioy must be turned intoo weeping and wayling and gnashing of teethe, God curseth all their mirth, and the end of it must needes bee vnhappie. But what? wee raught only at the present things and runne after them: our lustes are so whot, as wee haue no forecare what may happen toomorrowe morning. And so much the more ought ought we to marke well this lesson when it is sayd that the wicked man shall haue no settling. By this saying the we be taught, to brydle our selues when we see the despyzers of God haue their full skope and liue at their ease, yea euen whyle we weepe and lament, so as wee ouershoot not our selues for all that, but giue God leysure to finish out his woork. Again, let vs take hede that we like not to well of our prosperitie, but let vs ground our selues vpon God. If a man prosper, let him not dote vpon his good fortune (as they terme it) nother lette vs be so miscaried as to forget God: but let vs seeke too settle ourselues in him, for without that, there shall be no steadfastnesse. But the reason that Eliphaz addeth here immediatly, must be throughly weyed that is to wit that the change of the wicked shall be vanitie. And wherfore? For we see manye turninges in this world, and it seemeth to vs that alwayes the world will proue better and better for vs, bycause men doo feede themselves with wynd. If God afflict them, then they hope vpon marvellous things: but there is no substance nor stedinesse in all their enterprises. Thus then ye see in effect what we haue too marke: and that is the right sense. Now it is sayd afterward, That the wicked man shall be consumed before his tyme, & that his branches shall neuer flourish more. He shall be like a vyne that hath his vnrype grapes stript of, and like an Olive tree that casteth his floures, yea and that the same floures sheade away when there cometh any frost, so as they perish vtterly. No doubt but that by these two similitudes Eliphaz ment too confirme the former sentence, that is to say, that the wicked man perisheth before hee be full ripe: and it serueth still too bring vs backe too the matter which we haue discourfed alreadye. So then we see, that by setting before our eyes that there is no stablednesse in the wicked, our Lord calleth vs too a throughcontinuing stablednesse which shall not be deceyuable, nor serue alonly to tickle vs with a vayne and fond desire of it. Gods intent is not that we should be deceyued with a vayne imaginacion in weening our selues to happie: but he would haue vs to be happie in good earnest. But how may that be? By settling ourselues in him and in his loue. Lo wherunto he calleth vs? And contrariwise he sheweth vs that wee must not be giuen too any of these worldly things too rest vpon them where is no rest too be had, and that wee bee but stark fooles if wee beate our braynes about it. But yet cannot all this turne vs from them, notwithstanding that God tell vs that all, the prosperitie and happinesse that men weere themselves to haue in this world when they be separated from him, is but deceytfalnesse. So much the more then standeth it vs in hand too marke well this lesson, where it is sayd that the wicked shall perish before his tyme. And whereas he addeth these comparisons, that he shall be as a vyne that hath his fowre grapes plucked off, and as an Olive that casteth his floures before his tyme, so as they can bring foorth no frute.

Hereby our Lord intended too expresse the outward shewe that the wicked shall haue, wherat we shal wonder, yea and also stumble. For when we see the wicked prosper, immediatly wee bee amazed, and such a fyre is kyndled in vs, that we could finde in our harts too be as they be, saying. And why am not I as such a one? Behold, yonder naughtypack is at his ease, and in the meane whyle I am put behind the doore. I see he setteth his foote vpon my throte, and why haue I no meanes to be reuenged of him? See how our afflictions chase vs without measure as soon as we see the wicked prosper. But contrariwise our Lord sayeth to vs. Well Sirs, it is true that ye may after a sort be tempted by beholding this goodly shewe: for mennes lusts are suddaine and headye. But what for that? yee see how a vine is stripped of his vnrype grapes: when it is new burieoned, there needeth but one frost, too kill them. Or if the grapes be growne to be full fashyoned, behold there falleth a storme that sweepes them all away, so as there remaineth nother grape nor leafe, but the vine is left all bare. Also, looke mee vpon an Olive tree, wherein is the beautie of it? Is it not in his floures? And yet notwithstanding, if his floures be frostbiten, or if anye tempest light vpon them, all is cast downe. Euen so is it with the felicitie of the wicked. Truly (too the seeming of poore ignorant folk) their prosperitie shall bee such as nothing may seeme more desirable, than too be in their case: but anon bothe their floure and their frute fade away before they be ripe. God wil plucke away al before it come to perfection, according as I told you that they shall not come to so much perfection as too shoote out any floures or frute that shall not be taken away before it come to be seasonable.

Thus ye see in effect what is shewed vs here. And (as I sayd afore) it serueth too confirme the matter that hath ben discourfed already. Then let vs learne hereby, not to desire the felicitie that lasteth not past a day or a verye little tyme. But let vs learne to be throughly happie as our Lord would haue vs to be: which is, to be well settled in him, and to assure our selues that if we be blessed of God, the same shall make vs too prosper not only for a day or twayne, but also bothe in lyfe and death. True it is that much aduersitie may befall vs in the meane whyle: but what a priuiledge haue we when wee may betake ourselues vntoo God, and in that wee knowe he will not lay more vpon vs than wee bee able to beare, and specially that he will turne all our aduersities to our welfare and saluation? Seing then that wee haue this prorogative, haue we not wherewith to be contented? Although the wicked be at their ease for the present tyme: what certeintie haue they for the tyme too come? Although they aduance themselves, and think that God is not able too shake them (as it is sayd in the Psalme): yet haue they rings within. For God woundeth and pricketh them, or else tosseth them from side to side in such stormes as they be not able to auoyd. So then let vs mark, that if we desire to be in Gods fauour, and to haue a continuing prosperitie, we must be grounded in him, and then can we neuer quayle. VVe know what is sayd in another sentence of a Psalme where the wicked are spoken of: namely that they bee like great trees, which men stub vp so as there remaineth no print of them but they are plucked vp by the roote. But on the contrarie part we must (as Dauid sayeth) be like an Olive in the house of the Lord, which flourisheth alwayes. Also this similitude is taken after the same fort bothe in the first Psalme and in Ieremie: [where it is ment] that if we trust in God, and iunne vnto him, and hang vpon him: we shall bee like a tree that is planted by the water or riuers side, so as wee shall alwayes haue good sappe to flourish and bring foorth frute, Now seing it is so that God hauing drawne vs from the corruptions and vayne allurements of this world, offcreth vs also this euerlasting happinesse: must we not needs be out of our wytte if we go not to it?

Then let vs bethinke vs wel, and learne to bereeue our selues of al the lusts of our flesh (which serue for nothing but to deceiue vs, yea, and too leade vs too destruction,) and learne to knowe where our welfare lieth. Thus ye see what wee haue too beare in mynd. But alas: it is a hard thing thing as I sayd afore. VVe be streytwayes drawn too that which hath a fayre shewe, and therefore it standeth vs on hand too marke well the similitudes that Eliphaz bringeth here. VVe see an Oliftree that looketh fayre, but it is not of any continuance. And let vs also haue an eye too the Storme that is at hand vpon the wicked. For God holdeth them at that point, too beate them downe. And although we perceyue it not at the first dash: yet if we looke at Gods iustice with the eyesight of fayth: wee shall see, that all they which are not rooted in God cannot come to full ripenesse, nor neuer bring forth good frute, but shall soone come to plucking vp. And why? For God hath sayd it. VVe shall see them drowned in their owne pryde. And why? For Gods woord cannot lye. So then as oft as we be moued by our sensualirie and foolish imaginations, let vs retyre too Gods woord, and looke for that which wee saue not afore, specially for the thing that is hidden, that we may knowe it, and thervpon turne away from all the vayne conceyts that deceyue vs. Lo what we haue too beare away in this streyne. And in the end it is sayd, that the housebold of the wicked shall bee desolate, and fyre shall consume the house of Brybes. Vnder this terme Hypocrite, (according to the sense of it in other textes also) Eliphaz comprehendeth all such as haue froward and dilloyall hartes to Godward, who (sayeth hee) must perishe yea euen with all their house and retinue: And afterward he addeth, that the house of Brybes shall bee consumed. VWhereas he speaketh of the companye of Hypocrites: it is to expresse the better, that although the wicked haue greate traynes and greate and long tayles: yet for all that, they shall not misse to bee consumed. Then shall ye see farre wickedder men than the cōmon simple fort are, and they shall carye great cōpanyes and bandes after them which make a greate shewe: they shall haue their alliances and assemblies, and so drawe long traynes after them. But Eliphaz sayeth expressely that such assemblies shall come too nought: meening too shewe how it is true that the wicked maynteyne them selues for a tyme by those alliances, and that they fortifie themselves of purpose too maynteyne their state, insomuch that euery one of them thinketh himself strong ynough to beare out all brunts: But the wrath of God is kindled to burne them vp all. Yea and we see how the Prophet speaketh of them when he likeneth them too faggots of thornes. If a man haue gathered Bryers and thornes, and made a fagot of them: they will be so snarled as he will be loth to put his hand to them, and he shall not knowe on what side too take holde of them: and specially if hee would drawe out a bough of them, hee cannot. But if hee put fyre too them: immediately they kindle, and crackle, and cast a farre greater blaze than yf they were faste and substancyall wood.

Euen so is it with the wicked. They be like thornes and bryers, and when they bee plaiſhed one within another, a man cannot tell how to vndo them, nother can he well come at them. But as soone as God putteth fire to them, then must they needs cracke in peeces and vtterly consume out of hand. Ye see then what Eliphaz ment in saying that the assemblies of Hypocrits shall perishe. For his meening is that a wicked man may drawe a greate trayne and band of men after him, but it shall stand him in no sted to maynteyne him against Gods wrath.

This ought to assure vs, that when we see the wicked men so furnished, so allyed, and so garded, yet shall they not therefore misse to be suddeynly cast downe and consumed, so as wee shall see that this was not spoken for nought. And hereby we be admonished too knit our selues toogether in the right feare of God, and to haue none other band to hold vs linked toogether, but him, seruing him with a good conscience, and putting our whole trust in him, and helping one another: and finally too haue such agreement among our selues, as euery of vs may set his mynd to walke faithfully before God and man. If we deale after this sort God will blisse our concord: o-therwise, all must needs go to wrecke and hauocke. It is purposely sayd, that the house of Brybes or bryberie shall come too nought. For all buildings that haue ben set vp by pilling and polling, must needs perishe and decay of them selues. I meene not only the houses that are builded of Stone or Timber, but I meene that when a man enricheth himself by bryberie and rewards, so as he draweth to him on the one side, and snacheth on the other side, and is giuen to scraping, deceyuing, and extortion: what hath he doone? He gathereth woode, and then commeth ther a little spark of Gods wrath and consumeth it euery whit. For if there be no woode, the fire can take no hold. But the wicked do pile vp such a stacke on all sides, that the wood of it serueth for woode too burne vp them and all their trayne. So then, this text ought to be wel borne in mind that we may walk soundly and purely.

Thus much for the first point. And seeing wee be warned, that when the wicked fort haue enriched themselves by receyuing of giftes and brybes, all of it shall in the end go to destruction: let not vs repine at them: but let euery of vs looke too himself, and walk in his owne calling. Let those that be called to the state of Iustices, be ware to maynteyne themselves without bryberie, and remember how it is sayd, that gifts do blind the eyes of the wyse, and peruert the vnderstanding of the rightuouse. Therefore let them abſteyne from all corruptiō, to the intent they may cōtinue cleere and sound. Marke this for a speciall point. Again, let those that be in priuate state walke vprightly also. Let euery man be- think himself: gotoo, I may aduaunce my selfe in this world by vsing of wicked trades: how bee it forasmuche as they be things condemned of God: what shall I do but only kindle his wrath against mee?

Lo how all the faythfull ought to hold themselves in awe. And morcouer when we see the wicked lay baytes on euery side, and beare them selues in hand that they haue greatly gayned, when they haue gotten much riches by taking of brybes and giftes: Let vs say, yet will God at length shewe how he hath not in vayne sayd that which we heare in this place, and which the holic Ghost hath vttered by the mouth of Eliphaz. For God will not suffer his threatenings to be in vaine, but wil match the execution of them with them anon after. Ye see then how we must bee quiet, when wee see such as rap and rend, and pill and poll on all sides. Verely wee must assure our selues that the things shal not continue with them, and that God will take such order, as it had ben farre better for them to haue eaten bare breade, and too haue ben contented with a little, than too haue glutted themselves a'ter that fashyon at other mennes cost, and to haue drawn all to themselves to make themselves riche: for euery whit of it must goo too nought, and their houses must fall vpon their heads: that is too saye, the goods that they haue gathered, shal be to their ruine and destruction. True it is that for a tyme they shal haue such scope, as it may well seeme that their state shall last for eter. But let vs be patient, and tarye Gods leysure (as I sayd afore) till hee finish out his woork. And in the meane whyle let vs desire nothing but too stand in his his grace and fauoure. For truly that is the only meane not only to mainteine vs in our state all the time of our life, but also to giue vs a better life after our death, as he hath promised vs, in the kingdome of heauen.

Now let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faulkes, praying him too giue vs such repentance, as wee may change from our naughty life day by day, and not desire any thing but to renounce al our naughtie affectiōs, and all things that may turne vs from his seruice, and the great number of wicked lusts wherunto we be subiect and giuen: and that forsomuch as we be so full of infection, it may please him to vphold vs by his mercie, and dayly to pardon vs our faulkes, vntill he haue fully clothed vs againe with his righteousnesse, at such tyme as he shall haue taken vs out of this world, too make vs partakers of his heauenly glory. That it may please hym to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also. &c.

The .lxij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the .xviij. Chapter, with a little remnant of the last verse of the fifteenth Chapter.

IOb answered and said.

2. I haue often herd such things: you be all of you yrksome comforters.
3. VVhen vwill there be an end of [your] vvindy vvords? And vvherewith imboldenest thou thy selfe to answer.
4. I could speake as you do: If your soule vvere in my soules stead I could hold you company in talke, and I could nod my head at you.
5. I could strengthen you vvith vvords, and my talke should be to receiue griefe.
6. But if I speake, my sorrow vwill not abate, and if I hold my peace vvhat releefe haue I?
7. He hath loden me vvith anguish, he hath made all my congregation desolate.
8. He hath parched me vvith vvrinckles for a vvitnesse, and leanness is come vpon me vvich vvitnesseth it in my face.
9. He hath torne me in his vvraath, he hath handled me furiously, he grindeth his teeth at me, and mine enemie sharpeneth me and stareth vvith his eyes against me.

After that Eliphaz hath told vs, that the wicked and the despizers of God are cursed, and all their matters go against them: for a conclusion he addeth, that they conceiue sorrow, and bring forth peyne, and their bellie breedeth craft and deceite.

VV hereby hee doeth vs too witte, that all the outwarde shewes whiche wicked folkes haue, boote them not a whit, but God turneth them cleane contrarie to their thinking, by meanes wherof they be disappoynted of their expectation. True it is that this sentence is expounded as though it were a reason that Eliphaz rendreth: that is to witte, that Gods afflicting and cursing of the wicked and hypocrites, is not without cause. And why? For they do nothing but practise mischief to the whole world. Therefore after as they trouble their neighbors, so are they payed with like measure. And truly the holy Scripture doth oftentimes vse that manner of speaking, as in the seuenth Psalme. Esay also sayeth the same in his nine and fyfth Chapter. Therefore when the holy Ghost meeneth to declare that men are giuen to naughtinesse and sinne in all their intents, thoughts, and affectiōs: he vseth this similitude, that they bee as a woman with child. VVhen they haue conceiued peine (saith he) (that is too say, wheras they haue conceiued or deuised mischief against their neighbours to trouble them or too oppresse them) they bring forth iniquitie, that is to say, they execute the mischief that they had deuised. But this sense agreeth not with the text. For (as I haue said already) Eliphaz hath already heeretofore rendred sufficient reason why God should be so much against the wicked. And as now he meeneth to say no more, but that although they behight themselves good hope, and beare themselves in hande that they shall compass all their matters by some meanes or other: yet in the ende they shall be confounded. And why? Because there is nothing but Gods blessing that maketh vs to prosper. Therefore they shall win nothing by sodding themselves with any hope in their harte. For God shall turne all topsiteruie. And it is not heere only that the Scripture speaketh after that maner. In the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the Prophet Esay it is sayde, Lord we haue traueled before thy face as a woman with child, and yet haue conceiued and brought forth nothing but wind. Verely it is the faithfull that speake and complaine in that wise before god. Howbeit they acknowledge and confesse their sinnes.

For at that time when they said they traueled as a woman with child, God did persecute them iustly for their offences. But they say they cōceiued and brought forth wind: that is to say, as soone as they looked for some ease of their miseries, it vanished altogether into aire and smoke, and after long lingering in peine, their miserie was neuer a whit amended. Here Eliphaz passeth further, and saith that the wicked do but breede childe and bring forth mischief to themselves, and that their bellie nurisheth deceite, that is to say, vaine and guilefull hopes which shall deceiue them in the end. And it is the same threatning which God vttereth in the three and thirtieth of Esay against the skornefull whiche haue made none account of his word, and specially which haue bin hardened. Behold (saith he) ye cōceiue chaffe & bring forth dung. As if hee should say, you be stubborne against my word, by cause ye cannot perceiue the euil that you haue committed, and how sore you haue prouoked my wrath against you: But your flattering of your selues shall not stand you in any stead: for notwithstanding all youre flatteries you shall perceiue that you haue conceiued nothing but chaffe and stubble, and that all shall vanishe away into aire, and you shall know that all your flatteries haue profited nothing at all. Now then we see in effecte that Eliphazs meening is that the wicked may for a time be well at their ease, and God will not presse them so hard, but that they shall sode themselves with some hope. But what for that? yet shall God (do the best and worst they can) so presse them that they shall haue a

worme to gnawe them within, their own cōsciences shal alwayes pricke them, and they shall haue remorses and stings to torment them secretly: yea and in the end God shall send them so strong and excessiue anguish, as they shall bee driuen of force too bring foorth that whiche they haue bred inwardly. And why? For their bellie con-ceiued nothing but guile: that is to saye, although they perceiued not their owne harmes at the first: yet dyd they nothing but woorke theyr owne decay, seeing they were not in the fauoure of God. They warranted themselues this and that: and yet when all came to all, their cace was nothing but plaine deceit. But now let vs come to Iobs answer. He telleth them first, that hee had often heard the like things, and therefore that they bee but yrksome comforters, specially for setting vpon him with so troublesome words. In saying that he had often heard the like things, he meeneth that they should not haue brought him ordinarie and common remedies seeing his miserie was so great and extreme, but they should rather haue brought him some louing comforte, and suche as mighte haue serued his turne, than haue hilde suche talke with him as men are woont to do after a slighte fashion with him that is but measurably afflicted.

Thus wee see what Iob meant in saying that hee had oftentimes hearde suche matters afore. But surely whensoever a manne bringeth vs a comforte that wee bee acquainted withall afore, wee must not holde skorne of it. And why? For though we be instructed concerning Gods goodnesse, and exhorted too paci-ence to day: it may escape oure remembrance and wee shall neuer thinke vpon it more.

True it is that the matter wil not be darke vnto vs. Ne-uerthelesse if we be afflicted, and a man put vs in remembrance of that which hath bin told vs afore: let vs not thinke it a needelesse talke. And why? For the cace standeth vpon the practizing of that whiche wee haue heard and vnderstood, howbeit that we were not yet touched to the quicke, bycause occasion serued not. But if God nip vs with any distresse or heauinesse, then dothe he make vs to tast of the comforts that men haue dra-wnen out of his word, and brought vnto vs. And in good faith Iob was none of these nicelings which are alwayes longing for I wote not what nouelties, and cannot abide that a man shoulde tell them one tale twice. O (say they) I haue heard of this afore, I haue had mine eares cloyed with this tale. Yea but yet for all that, they haue neede to haue it beaten into them still: and when a man telleth vs one thing often, it is to our great profite and furtherance. But Iob was not at that poynt, it grieued him not to make account of a good lesson bycause it was common. Nother was hee curiouse of his desires: but (as I saide afore) hee sheweth simply that his miserie was so excessiue, as he had neede to be comforted after an extraordinarie manner: Like as when a man is sicke of a common disease, folke will also vse a light remedie. But if the disease be sharpe, the Phisition must bee faine too procede further. For if he should applie one medicine to all diseases, what a thing were it? In like cace is it with aduersities.

WVe see a manne that is sorrowfull for the deathe of his Father, or of his wife, or of his children, or else some losse is happened vnto him. VVell, one bringeth him some meane comforte, and suche as God hath set foorth. But if there bee any that is not tormented after some one manner only, but whiche feeleth the hande of God persecuting him on all sides, so that as soone as one inconuenience is befallne him, there follow two or three mo in the necke of it, and he is not only afflicted in his body, in his person, in his goodes, and in his frends but also (as we haue seene in Iob) is pressed with spirituall temptations, as though God meant tooo drowne him vtterly: there wee must go to worke after a more exquisite fashon. For if ye vexe a poore man that is alrede hartbroken: too what purpose shall all that you can bring serue? It were muche better that a man hilde hys peace, that God mighte woorke tooo supple the defaulte of men.

Thus yee see what Iob meant. Behold Eliphaz telleth Iob that God punisheth wicked men too shewe himselfe the iudge of the worlde, and that they maye well fence themselues, but they cannot scape his handes but that hee will vtterly destroy them howe greate traynes and bandes of men fouer they haue. But what?
 If a man shoulde applie this matter vnto Iob, it were as muche as tooo beare hym downe that God was hys enimie bycause hee was a wicked man, and also that there had bin nothing but hipocrisie in him. Beholde a matter misapplied. Therefore it is not withoute cause that hee sayth, Gotoo, I know these thinges, and euen nowe could I serue myne owne turne with them if I had neede of them. But that was not the cace. For Iob had conceiued in his minde, that hee was not punished for his sinnes sake, and that God had not anye suche intende. Not that hee felte not himselfe faultie, and woorthy to indure yet more, if God listed tooo examine him with rigoure: but bycause he knewe that God handled him not so for his sinnes sake, but had another intent.

Iob knowing this, reiecteth the talke that they hilde with him. And why? Bycause it was vnreasonable. You are yrksome comforters to me sayth hee. And what is the reason? Bycause they broughte not conueniente remedies.

Heereby wee bee warned, that if wee minde tooo comforte our neighbours in their heuinesse and troubles, wee must not go tooo it at randon as many men do, whych haue no mo songs but one, and haue no regarde at all tooo whome they sing it. For some man must bee handled after one fashon, and some man after another.
 As for example if there be one that is stubborne against God: in that cace a man must speake with another manner of stile and tearmes, than tooo a poore creature that hath walked alwayes in simplicitie. And so according as the maladie is, it is needefull that a man bee warned tooo procede thereafter. As for example, if men bee dullardes, they must bee cried vnto, and their negligence must bee rebuked, tooo the intende they maye feele the hande of God and humble themselues vnder the same. Therefore wee haue neede of greate wise-dome if we will comforte those whome God afflicteth as we ought to do.

Thus yee see what wee haue tooo beare in mynde concerning thys sentence where it is saide, that suche as pretended tooo comforte Iob, were yrksome comforters, bycause they broughte not anye thing whereby hee myghte fare the better. And nowe Iob addeth, 60 VVhen will there bee an ende of youre wyndy woordes?
 Hee tearmeth those woordes wyndy, wherein there is no substance: that is to say, whiche are not able tooo edifye a manne, according as the holye Scripture vseth the same similitude. For when it is required that a manne shoulde bee taught how tooo obtayne hys Saluation: It is sayde, hee is edified.
 Howe? Euen bycause hee is fyrste founded, and afterwarde buylded vpon, so as hee is confirmed in the

in the feare of God, hee is confirmed in his lawe, hee is confirmed in pacience to beare afflictions stedfastly, and afterward he is fully resolued to pray vnto God, to prayse him, and to flee vnto him. Contrariwise if the woordes bee but too trouble ones brayne, and that a man do but trifle, and babble, so as the hearer receyue no good instruction too applie too hys welfare: all are but wyndy woordes. And so let vs marke that if we will meddle with exhortation or doctrine: about all thinges, it behoueth vs too tende too the sayde substantiallness: that is too witte, that such as heare vs may receyue some good instruction, so as they may bee inuired too walke according to godlinesse, and bee grounded in the trust of his mercie, and frame themselues too call vpon him, not doubtingly and waueringly, but assuring them selues that they shall bee heard. Ye see then howe wee oughte too studie, too instructe oure neighbours substantially that the thing whiche we haue learned may not slip away lyke wind. And furthermore euery of vs must also bende too suche teaching, that wee couet not too bee filled with winde, as wee see many curiouse folke are, who would fayne haue men too listen vnto them that they myghte feede theyr eares and satisfie their sonde fancies. They imagin this and that, and woulde fayne haue men too listen too theyr complayntes, too dispute of matters that are too no edifying. And the mynde of man is ouermuche inclyned too thys vice, yea and wholly gyuen vnto it. For that if euery of vs shoulde follow hys owne appetite, it is certayne that there woulde bee none other question among vs but howe wee myghte holde vnprofitable talke, of this and that, whyche shoulde spred into the aire, and haue no substaunce in it, nor aught at all but wind. And therefore learne too seeke that whyche is good and conuenient too edifye vs in the feare of God, and in fayth and pacience, and in all good and profitable thinges.

Thus ye see what wee haue too remember in thys sentence where Iob maketh mention of wyndy words. Neuerthelesse wee must also take heede too ourselues, that wee refuse all talke that shall bee ministred vnto vs as though it were wyndy: but wee must learne to tast whither there be any vanitie or good instruction in it, that we may knowe it too applie it too oure owne vse. And therewithall lette vs pray GOD too bee so gracious to vs, that when any man ministreth any good doctrine vnto vs, it may not slippe away from vs nor vanishe into the aire through our owne heedlesnesse. For when a man commeth too informe vs of Gods worde, it behoueth vs to knowe that there is alwayes some good instruction towards. But many take no profite at all by it. And why? For they applie not their whole witte and mynde too it, but are fleeting too and fro, and Gods worde dothe as it were vanish into the wind: and that is bycause they haue no sure groundednesse in them. Neuerthelesse, for the better applying of thys lesson to our vse, euery one of vs (as I said afore) must looke narrowly to himselfe. For it followeth in Iob, That if his friendes were in his case, hee could speake as they do, and bolde them company in talke, and pleade with them, and nod his head at them. Truly some expound this sentence, that Iob would not render the lyke vnto them if hee sawe them in like trouble, but would rather indeuer to asswage theyr miseries and too gyue them some releefe, than increase their sorrowe as they dyd towards hym, according as wee haue seene their vnnmercifulnesse, howe there was none other talke among them but too dryue thys holy persone too despaire, if God hadde not hilde hym vp.

They that take the sentence in that sense, are moued thereto by thys reason: namely that it were an vnseemly matter that Iob woulde bee desyrous of reuengement when God had withdrawen hys hande from hym, and that hee woulde then mocke poore menne that were in like calamitie, when hee were at hys ease. For although there were none other cause but the affliction that hee himselfe indured, yet shoulde the same teach him too haue pitie and compasison vpon suche as had neede of it. But when all is well considered: Iob meeneth not too shewe heere what hee woulde do, but what a man myghte doo if hee were in lyke plyghte. Therefore hee meeneth not that hee woulde bee euen with them that hadde troubled him wilfully, but only that hee coulde bee merrie, if he were as they were. Then in effecte hee meeneth thus: you talke well at youre ease, yee shake youre heads at me, ye passe not of condemning me, no nor too plunge mee into the bottomlesse pittes.

And thus yee doo as folke that knowe not what it is too indure miserie. If I were in youre case, coulde I not do as muche? And howe woulde you take it if I shoulde come shake my head at youre calamities when I sawe the hande of God nippe you with extremitie? If I should say, O it is well bestowed, God must bee fayne too chastize you and too make you feele howe hee punisheth sinners. If you were ouerwhelmed with miserie, and I shoulde speake too you after that sorte, mighte ye not say I were a skorne and a cruell person. Then bethynke your selues well.

Lo in effecte what Iobs meening is. Nowe then we see hee was not sharpened vnto reuengement as those that haue no feare of God bee, who when any man disquieteth them, woulde fayne that it laye in their power to render twice as muche displeasure as hath bin done them. Iob was not of that minde. And truly it standeth Gods children in hande too bridle themselues. Although me trouble and vexe vs, yet it is not for vs too runne vpon those that haue persecuted vs wrongfully. For God sendeth them vnto vs to meeken vs, and it behoueth vs too knowe that they bee roddes whyche come from his hande. Neuerthelesse, when men come too trouble vs withoute cause why, wee may well after the example of Iob tell them that wee coulde doo the lyke too them. And why? for a man shall neuer knowe his faulte well, vntill hee bee tolde it too his face. But when a man perceyueh that the mischief may retourne vpon his owne head, then hee restreyneth himselfe and faileth too saying, Howe nowe? VVhat do I? Beholde, God too bring vs too vprighte indifferencie, saythe: Thou shalt do none otherwise too thy neighbour than thou woldest bee done vnto thy selfe. Truly hee coulde haue sayde. VVhen yee haue too do with youre neighbours, see that ye deale indifferentlye and vprightlye with them, and that ye bee not gyuen too wicked couetousnesse, too spoyle other men of theyr goodes, looke that ye desire not too enriche yourselues by the losse of anye man.

And verely so saith hee in the Scripture. But for a conclusion hee setteth downe thys saying, do as yee woulde bee done vnto. For there is not that man but hee is a greate clerke, if the matter concerne hys owne profyte. Then wee lyke well too dispute and too saye, VVhat? Suche a man hath done thys wrong. Is it a Christian mans parte too doo so? Is there no vprightnesse? Is it not the poynte of a lewde and cruell manne? Euerye manne therefore can skill too dispute well of reason, equitie, and right, when the case concerneth hys owne profite. And it is the poynt wherunto Iob sendeth hys friendes bycause they be blinde, saying, that if they were in suche extremitee as hee is, they woulde bee glad that other men shoulde handle them more gently. Therefore hee coulde do no lesse but bring them backe too thys naturall equitie by making comparison betweene them and hymselfe. And so hee sayth to them, come on, If ye were in like plighte as ye see me, were it reason that I should minister suche talke vnto you as you do to me. If a man shoulde handle you after the fashion that you go to woorke with me, howe woulde you take it? Then oughte they too bee moued. And why? For (as I haue sayde alredy) so long as wee bee out of ourselues, (that is too saye, so long as the matter toucheth not vs, ne lighteth vpon vs) wee runne crosing in and out: but if the case touche our selues, then wee learne too bee better aduised. Thus yee see in effecte what Iob meant to saye. Now may wee gather a good lesson heereof, according too oure Lorde Iesus Christes forealleged sentence, that wee shoulde not do that to another man whyche wee would not haue done too our selues. For wee haue Gods law printed in our hartes, wee haue generall principles that abide with vs. And what is the cause then that our iudgement is so peruerted and corrupted, that we draw alwayes backward? God hath no sooner giuen vs a good rule, but we be streightwayes moued to ambition, hatred, pride, and couetousnesse. Lo how all is peruerted. Then if we be ambitious, and that to vaunt our selues we fall to despising of our neighbours. If we be rashheaded, so as our tunges runne at rouers before wee well vnderstand the ground of the case: If we be led with pride, so as wee would aduance ourselues by plucking those backe whome wee see too go afore vs: If we be prouoked to hatred and malice, or if we be bynded with loue and partialitie: VVhat is to be done? Let vs enter into ourselues, and pray God too guide vs and to open our hartes that we may discern a righte, saying: Go to. if the matter concerned thy selfe, what woldest thou say then? Lo howe wee myghte become wise, discrete, and stayed: that is to wite, by applying the same thing to our selues, which we cast out against others. For we be so much giuen to selfeloue and selfe-prophete (as I sayde) and nature holdeth vs so hard to it, that euery man is in loue, yea and ouerfarre in loue with hymselfe. Therefore we shall be the lesse excused of this vice when it is found in vs, seeing we be so often exhorted too followe vprightnesse and indifferencie. But let vs pray God to woorke in suche wise in vs, as this vice may be turned into vertue by his holy spirite. Let vs consider what is imported in thys saying, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. VVhat is the cause that euery man steppeth out of his boundes, and that wee loue our selues too much, and despise oure neighbours, but bycause we be not diligent ynough in practising that which is sayde vnto vs: namely that wee must not be so much gyuen too the loue of our selues, but that wee must loue our neighbours as our selues. For we ought to consider, that God hath created vs all after his owne image, and therewithall that wee bee all of one nature. Heerewithall also hee telleth vs, that we oughte to agree in true brotherhood with those that are linked vnto vs. Thus ye see what wee haue too remember in this sentence, where Iob telleth them that had accused him vainly, that they would be loth that others should do the like to them: and therefore that it was not meete for them to abuse his pacience after that fashion.

Lo what we haue to gather in effecte. And by and by it is sayde, I will nowe hold my peace, but what shall that profite me? And if I speake, what ease shall I haue by it? Heere Iob intendeth too preuent the obiection that mighte haue bin laid against him. For his friendes mighte haue sayde. Then comfort thy selfe seeing thou arte so well able to do it: and seeing that thou couldest woorke woonders if we were in case as thou arte, go too nowe and shewe thy cunning vpon thy selfe. But hee sayth, I see my selfe in as myserable case as may be. So then I knowe not what I may hope, for God pincheth me after so straunge a fashion, that if I speake, I do but increase my sorrowe, and if I hold my peace I am neuer the more eased. Beholde I am a man swallowed vp with aduersitie.

Thus yee see what Iob meant to say in effect: namely that whither he spake, or whither hee hild his peace, he was no way eased. Marke also how Dauid in the two and thirtieth Psalme complayneth, that his aduersitie did so pinch him and streyne him, that hee wist not where to become nor what shift to make. VVhen I lamente (saith he) and thinke to haue some asswagement of my sorrowe by that meanes: the fyre is kindled more and more. If I keepe my mouth shut, and be minded to cast my selfe downe before God, my hart is vexed still, and as it were torne in peeces, and my grieffe nippeth me so to the quicke, as it is neuer awhit restrayned thereby. And in another place hee saith, that hee had determined with him selfe not too speake one worde but too haue bin dumb, so long as the wicked had their full scope. But what: I am not able (saith he) to keepe touch. For when I was mynded to bridle my selfe after that manner: in the ende my boylings were faine to burst out, lyke as when there is a greate fyre vnder a potte, although the potte bee covered yet must the skumme needes leape out on one side or other. And this is well woorthy to be noted. For when God sendeth vs any sicknesse or pouertie, it seemeth to vs that there was neuer any manne handled so roughly as we be. And that is a cause that eyther driueth vs to despaire, or else prouoketh vs to vtter impatiencie, so as we fall to lifting vp of our selues against God. Or else we beare ourselues in hand that although God afflicteth the faithfull that haue bin before vs, yet they were not so weake as wee bee, yea and that they were vtterly void of passions. And the same also is a cause of the increasing of our grieffe. VVherefore lette vs remember howe it is saide heere, That God hath so pinched his seruantes, (I say euen them whome hee loued, and whose welfare was deere and precious in hys sight) and hathe oftentimes broughte them to such extremitee, as they were not able to looke vp any more, nother wist they how to speake or how to hold their peace. Dauid made not such confession without cause, but for the instruction of all Gods children. For when wee see that a man indued with such vertue, and hauing suche constancie of the holy Ghost, is neuerthelessse thrown downe, so as hee woteth not what to do, but is as a man out of hys wittes: Let vs make our profite of it: and if God send vs so hard temptations, that we be driuen too the last cast, so as wee can no more: Let vs not thinke it straunge, for wee bee not the first [that haue bin so serued.] Dauid sheweth vs the way, hee waded out of the lyke mire, God reached him his hande, and when hee had humbled him too the vttermost, then hee hoipe hym vp agayne. VVherefore lette vs not doubt but hee will still shewe vs mercie, after wee haue bin hilde downe for a time. See then howe good and needefull it is for vs too haue these examples before

Psa. 32. 4. 3.

before our eyes, for surely it will make vs that our infirmitie shall not ouermayster vs. For if temptations bee fierce vpon vs, and wee knowe not where too become: wee will by and by bethinke vs, well, I see that the seruants of God which haue bene before vs, although they had very great giftes of grace, were fayne notwithstanding too grone vnder the hande of God, and wite not where too become, and that by that meanes God ment too ridde them from all pryde, and to teach them by experience, that they ought too stoupe vnder him. And if it please him too strike vs downe at this day by the same meane, condicionally that the ende also bee lyke, notwithstanding that wee smart in the meane whyle: lette not our mindes bee troubled for that, sith all things shall turne too our profite and welfare. Lo what wee haue too note concerning the doctrine that is contayned here. But Iob addeth, that God pincheth him in suche wyse, as it shoulde seeme he intended too rend him in peeces. In saying so he betokeneth that which wee haue seene heretofore: namely that he was not onely afflicted in his bodie, but also touched with the greatest and forest temptations that could bee, yea and with very bitter ones: that is too wit, that he was tormented inwardly, bycause God was as it were his mortall enemy. Certesse he sayeth that the leanness of his bodie was as a withering, and that in witness of Gods wrath, he was full of wrinckles, so as all his fleshe was as good as halfe rotten aheadie. And herein a man may see the tokens of a dreadfull affliction, and that God handleth him not as he is commonly wonte too handle those whom he chastizeth with his rodde, but that his payne is excessiue. This therefore is in effect the matter that Iob intended too expresse. And here wee haue too note, that God ment too giue vs lookingglasses in suche as haue had any excellent vertues, too the ende that in their persones we might learne too knowe that according as he dealeth fourth the giftes of his holy spirite, thereafter also doth he sende them greates afflictions in themselues, trying them and chastizing them too the vttermoste, to the intent too make them the more esteemed, and too bring fourth the more fruite. As for example, Looke vpon Abraham who was gouerned by Gods spirite, not as a common persone, but as an Angell, and was as full of excellencie and perfection as might bee. And yet for all that, howe did God deale with him? If wee were too indure but the tenth part of the combates that Abraham susteyned and ouercame, what a thing were it? VVee woulde quite quayle. But God spareth vs, bycause he hath not giuen vs so excellent giftes as he gaue too him. As much is too be sayde of Dauid. Behold, Dauid was not onely Gods Prophet, but also the King that gouerned his holie and chozen people, and had such vertues in him as were well woorthie of renowme and prayse, yea and euen of wonderment, and yet for all that, how did God turmoyle him? VVee see what complaints he maketh, not onely as a despyzed and offshaken persone, but also saying, that God hilde him heere on earth as vpon a racke, so as he was forced too shewe the extremitie that he was come vnto. For it is not without cause that he so often sayeth he had passed through fire and water, that he had bene plunged into the deepe gulfes, that he had felte all Gods dartes, that he had had all Gods arrowes shotte at him, that the hand of God had lyeu heauy vpon him, that his verie bones had bene broken, and that there remayned no other marie nor substance in him. VVhen wee heare these kinde of speeches, they seeme too vs to bee but a mockerie. But God purposed too set vs fourth a liuely picture, that (according too that whiche I haue sayd) wee might knowe that after as God giueth great vertues vnto menne, so doth he exercise them liuely, too the intent that those vertues should not bee idle, but that they should bee knowne in due time and place. Besides this, let vs marke by the way, that the chiefest temptations that euer the faythfull indured, were these spirituall battels as wee terme them: that is too witte, when God summoned them in their consciences, so as he made them too feele his wrath, by snytting them in such wise as they wite not in what cace they stooode with him. And this plunged them in deeper distresse than all the bodily aduersities that coulde befall them. And here yee see also why Iob vseth this similitude, that God grated his teeth at him. Also wee see howe Ezechias speaketh because he had passed through the same temptation. God (sayeth he) hath played the Lyon with mee. Likewyse he had vsed the same similitude afore which hee vseth here, namely that he wist not whither hee might speake or holde his peace. For I am (sayeth he) like a Swallowe, I chatter and chirpe, but I want woordes too vtter the greefe of my miserie, I haue no tounge too deliuer it. And herevpon he commeth afterwarde too shewe that God hath crasshed and broken his bones as a Lyon that holdeth him in his pawes and teeth. But howe can God bee likened too a Lyon, which is so cruell a beast? No: Ezechias ment not too accuse God of crueltie: but hee speaketh of his owne feeling and of the terrible payne that he indured when Gods wrath was vpon him. So then lette vs marke that when a poore creature entereth into doubting in what cace he is with God, and perceyueeth not that God will make him to feele his goodnesse: he muste needes bee in so greate distresse and so affrighted, as if hee were betweene a woulues pawes. VVee must not imagine it too bee a small thing for a man too feele Gods wrath, and specially too conceyue that he is vtterly against vs: And therefore lette vs pray God too holde vs vp, and too spare vs, knowing that wee bee not able too beare suche a burthen, except he giue vs shoulders too do it withall. Besides this, lette vs pray him, not too vse such rigour agaynst vs as wee might feele him like a Lyon: but rather too shewe himselfe a continuall father, and not punish vs after our desertes, but make vs alwayes too feele his mercie by meanes of our Lord Iesus Christe, too the ende that when he hath guyded vs in this lyfe by his holy spirit, he may lift vs vp into the euerlasting glorie of his Angelles, which he hath purchased so deere for vs.

Nowe lette vs caste our selues flat before the face of our good God and father with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs feele them in suche wise, that being touched with true repentance, wee may returne vnto him, knowing that he will bee fauourable too vs. And after wee haue desired him too forgiue vs our sinnes, lette vs also beseech him too ridde vs more and more of our fleshy vices, and that in correcting the sinfulness of our nature, he will bring vs too perfection of lyfe, that being guyded in this worlde by his holy spirite, wee may glorifie his name, and serue him with an earnest zeale, dedicating our selues wholly vnto him, according as he hath prouoked vs by his goodnesse too do. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations, &c.

10. They open their mouth against me, they giue me buffets in vway of reproch, and they gather them selues together against me.
11. God hath put mee into the handes of the malicious, hee hath dismayed me before the wicked.
12. I prospered and he threw me downe, he hath caught me by the necke, and set me as a butte before himselfe.
13. His Archers hem me in on all sides, he slitteth my reines, he spareth me not, he poureth my gall vpon the ground.
14. He hath broken me vvith breaking vpon breaking, and hee hath runne ouer me as a Gyant.
15. I haue sowed sackcloth vpon my skinne, and loden my glory vvith dust.
16. My face is vexed blevv vvith vweeping, and mine eyelids are couered vvith the shadow of death.
17. Yet is there no guile in my hands, and my prayer is pure.

IT is a very grieuous and hard thing to a mortall man when God setteth himselfe against him, and maketh him to feele that he is as it were his aduersarie. But no man can conceiue how great this miserie is, but onely by experience. And that is the cause why Iob vsed the similitude of a Lyon, (as we saw afore) and why he said, he was rent in peeces and deuoured of God, as of a Lyon. After the which manner King Ezechias also speaketh. And (as I haue saide already) this was not to accuse God of crueltie, but bycause the anguish that wretched sinners suffer when God pursueth them, cannot be expressed sufficiently. And it is requisite that we should be put in mind of these things, to the end that if God touch vs to the quicke, we may not be so dismayed with feare, but that we may consider, that the faythful which haue liued before vs haue passed the same way, and that God hath deliuered them, too the intente wee cease not to call vpon him. For it is alwayes to be feared, least we should be plunged in such despaire, as we could not call vpon God nor find helpe in him. So then lette vs marke, that when a poore creature is in maner drowned, and that God maketh him to feele his wrath: yet neuerthelesse we must still flee vnto him in such distresse. For it is his proprietie to draw men out of their graues, and to heale the woundes that he hath made, yea and euen to raise vs vp from death. But Iob complayneth heere of another temptation: which is, That the wicked haue opened their mouth to mocke at him, and that they haue buffeted him in way of reproch, and that they haue assembled together. When men set themselves after that sort against vs, it reneweth the miserie that we indure. VVhy so? For the Diuell serueth his owne turne by such as skoffe at vs, to spite vs, and to ouerthrowe and roote vp our faith vtterly, if it be possible. And Iob speaketh heere expressly of the wicked for two considerations. For there is not an irksomer thing than when God doth after that manner giue bridle to the wicked, to persecute his children, and to trample them vnder their feete. True it is that good men ought not to thinke of that, but yet it seemeth vnreasonable thing that God should giue such libertie too the despisers of his maieslie, and too folke that are wholly giuen vnto euill, as that the faythfull should be so oppressed by them.

Thus yee see one reason why Iob speaketh heere expressly of the malicious. The other is, (saith he) that the selfesame people labour alwayes to bring to passe that we may haue no trust in God, but giue our selues to all wickednesse and turne away quite from all goodnesse, as we see was done to oure Lorde Iesus Christe, the true mirroure and patternne of all the faythfull. Verely Dauid indured the lyke. But when we see what is happened to the sonne of God, the same is a sure rule for vs, and it belongeth to vs all.

Now wee see wherevnto this saying of Iobs is referred, that ouer and besides the terrible feare wherein we haue seene him, men also lifting themselves vp againste him, haue labored to driue him to despaire, and reprochfully buffeted him, as though God had cast him vp too the spoyle, and made no more reckening of him. Lo what we haue to marke in effect. And this is written for our sakes, that whensoever God shall suffer the wicked too mocke at oure afflictions, and too aduance them selues with such rage, as it may seeme we shall be vtterly ouerwhelmed: we may not be too greatly dismayed. And why? Iob hath indured the like battels, and yet we see his end was happie. God hath shewed vs in hys person, that when wee haue passed through many temptations, he is well able to helpe vs still. Therefore let vs trust in hym, and rest vpon his grace and goodnesse.

Lo what we haue too marke in this streyne. But Iob sayeth expressly, That God hath also deliuered hys into the handes of the wicked: which saying is well worthy to bee noted. For wee imagin that the wicked do what they list, and wee consider not that God gyueth them the bridle so farre foorth as hee himselfe listeth, and that they cannot passe any further than hee giueth them leaue from aboue.

Thys (as I said) deserueth well too bee noted. For if we bee forepossessed with the opinion, that the wicked are not in Gods hande, but may take as much scope as they list and God will not redresse it: what will come of it? Must wee not needes bee vtterly ouerthrowne? And whither shall wee flee for succoure? But if wee knowe that G O D holdeth Satan and all hys whelpes in a Lyam, and that they cannot onely not stirre one synger againste vs, but also not intende or thinke any thyng withoute Gods ordinance: Then will wee flee too hym boldly as ofte as wee bee so persecuted, assuring our selues that the remedye is in hys hande and at hys good disposition. Also wee haue too humble our selues before his face. For if the wicked myghte bestirre them of them selues and God shoulde not meddle with them: the wold it neuer come to our mind too acknowledge the correſtions and chaſtyzementes of God, too bethinke vs of our ſinnes, and too mourne before him that he might haue pitie of vs. But if wee knowe that the wickeddeſt of all are but roddeſ which he holdeth in his hande, too beate vs and too correſt vs withall: And to bee ſhort if we praſtyze well that which the Prophete ſayeth, ſo as wee haue an eye to the hande [that ſtryketh vs,] and not too the ſtones, dartes, or ſtrokes of cudgelles [that hitte vs:] it will be a very profitable conſideration for vs. Beholde ſtill what we haue too marke in that Iob ſayeth not ſimply, that the wicked ranne vpon him: but that it is God which hath beſieged him, and that it is euen he himſelfe that hath deliuered him. And he addeth that he was oppreſſed with extremitie. All the maner of ſpeeches which he vſeth here, tende to the ende that is vttered when he ſayeth, that he had ben beaten downe, and aſtoniſhed, and that God had caught him by the necke and rente him in peeces, and ſet him before him as a butte too ſhoote at, and that his Archers had hommed him in on all ſides, that he had ſlitte him aſunder, yea and that he had broken him and broken him againe. Hereby Iob ſheweth, that he was come too ſuche extremitie of afflictions, as it was impoſſible too finde a creature that were more preſſed or more miſerable than he. For wee haue ſeene howe God afflicted him, as well in his bodie as in his goodes, and alſo by his owne wyfe. Yee ſee then that Iob might well liken himſelfe too a marke that menne ſhoote at. For God ſente him not ſome one kinde of aduerſitie alone, but did as it were digge a pitte downe too hell too caſte him the deeper into it. And afterwarde he loded him with ſuch a weight as was impoſſible for any creature too beare, if he had not a greater ſtrength than is in man. And ſoothly it was a maruell too haue ſuche a conſtancie, notwithstanding the infirmitieſ that wee ſee in him. For when God ſtrengtheneth his owne, it is not by making them vtterly inſenſible, nor yet by taking their feebleneſſe quite away: But they muſte be fayne too acknowledge themſelues ſuche as they bee, that is too witte, frayle creatures: and yet in the meane ſeaſon God releeueth their infirmitie and ſetteth them vp againe when they be caſte downe. Thus yee ſee what happened vnto Iob. Nowe by the way he ſayeth, that he clothed himſelfe with ſackcloth, and covered his head with duſte, and that he did it not by hypocriſie. Beſides this, he ſayeth that none of all theſe thinges befell him for his miſdeedes. For there is no Robberie (ſayeth he) too bee founde in my bandes, and my prayer is pure. VVhereby he meeneth that he thinketh his afflictions ſtraunge, ſith hee had not offended God in ſuche ſorte as he might deſerue too be ſo handled. This is the temptation that wee haue ſeene ſo often before, whiche Iob calleth ſtill too remembrance. But nowe lette vs lay forth the matters particularly and apply them too our uſe. The ſimilitude that Iob vſeth, importeth a good Leſſon: [which ſimilitude is,] that God hath ſette him as a whyte in a butte, and that hee hath ſette his Archers agaynſt him, and beſette him rounde aboute, and that they haue after ſuche a ſorte torne him in peeces, that his gall is tumbled out vpon the grounde, that is too ſay, that he was wounded too the very heart. By ſpeaking ſo, Iob ment too expreſſe that God afflicted him not after the common maner. But nowe lette vs looke too our ſelues: for if wee ſuffer neuer ſo little aduerſitie, wee thinke it ouer great, and that God keepeth no meaſure. It is pitie too ſee howe nyce wee bee, and there needeth no more, to hold vs ſkirmiſh to the vttermoſt. So long as it were but a making of ſome moane, it might be thought too bee but a parte of feebleneſſe. But when menne make ſuche a ſtirre that they liſt vp themſelues agaynſt God for any common aduerſitie that they haue too abide: is it not an ouergreat impacience? Is it not a ſigne that wee were neuer in Gods ſchoole too learne what it is too ſuffer and too yeelde obedience too his will? So then, too the ende wee may learne too bee more ſtrong too indure the chaſtyzementes that God ſendeth vs: lette vs beare in minde what is ſhewed vs here: namely that Iob who was of ſo excellent holineſſe, and whom God loued ſo well, was neuertheleſſe ſette vp as a whyte too ſhoote at. And I tolde you that wee muſte bee ſtrong in our afflictions: not too harden our ſelues agaynſt God and too chawe vpon our brydle as wee ſee many menne doo. For that maketh menne hardhearted, and ſuffereth them not too bee brought too repentance. Therefore wee muſte bee tenderhearted in this behalfe: that is too witte, aſſoone as God ticketh vs wee muſte ſtrete wayes awake too thinke vpon him, and not tarye till he drawe out his ſwoorde at vs and wounde vs, nor till he lette his arrowes flye at vs or thunder vpon vs. VVhat then? Aſſoone as he giueth vs but one ſtrype with his Rodde, although it be ſoftly, we muſt be quiet.

And verely if wee were wiſe and well aduſed, wee would not tarry till he ſhoulde ſtrike ſo muche as our ſtroke, but wee would bee warned by his threatenings, and hie vs a pace too come home too him before we are touched vs: Yee ſee then that it is expedient and profitable that the faythfull ſhoulde feele Gods handes and not bee harde agaynſt his ſtrokes. For if a horſe be dull vpon the ſpurre, will menne lyke the better of him for that? will menne thinke it a good propertie in him? No, it is a vyce. Euen ſo is it with vs. Though God ſtrike vs not with the ſwoorde, but onely ſhew vs the ſhadowe of a rodde, yet muſte wee bee moued. But yet neuertheleſſe wee muſte therewithall bee ſtrong, in ſuch wiſe as I haue tolde you: whiche is, that wee muſte not bee out of heart, nor ſo ouerforowfull as our griete might not bee aſſwaged, nor wee haue any feeling of Gods gracious goodneſſe. For they that are too preſſed, can not by any meanes reclayme themſelues, becauſe that if wee once take a conceyt that God is our aduerſitie, and ſo haue no truſte at all in his goodneſſe: it is impoſſible that wee ſhoulde come neere him, but wee will rather flee from him: and when wee bee once gone away, wee will ſtill labour too drawe further and further from him. Therefore wee muſte plucke vp a good heart in our aduerſities, that wee may call vpon God and not bee aſſrayde too returne vnto him, truſting that he will be readie too ſhewe vs mercie, if wee ſeeke it with a good, pure and rightmeaning minde.

Yee ſee then wherevnto the woordes that I haue touched doo tende: namely that wee muſte not bee too nyce in our afflictions, but rather feele them betimes, that wee may returne vnto God. Alſo if God hauing ſente vs any aduerſitie do double the ſame, and that wee bee gryped exceedingly bothe within and without: Yet lette vs aſſure our ſelues that we are not yet come where Iob was, and therefore that if he continued too call vpon God, and too flee ſtill vnto him for refuge, it is not for vs too turne away from him.

Thus yee ſee what wee haue too marke in this ſentence. Nowe whereas here is mention made of Gods Archers: it is a very notable ſimilitude. For wee ſee howe menne are alwayes troubled, when they come to the afflictions of this preſent lyfe. For we cannot father them vpon God as we ought too do, but wee imagine alwayes that they come by miſfortune, or elſe by meanes of men. Too bee ſhort, wee iudge diſorderly, and cannot ſtand our selues vnto God. For this cause, the holy Scripture (besides that it telleth vs that lyfe and death, light and darkenesse, good and euill are in Gods hande) vseth also familiar comparisns, too the ende that the matter may bee expressed too vs the better, according as it is sayd heere that God did set his Archers in aray agaynst Iob. Speakes he heere of men? No: But of all the miseries that Iob had too indure. These miseries are termed Gods Archers. And why? To the ende we should learne that when God afflicteth vs, he commeth well furnished as if a iudge shoulde haue his officers aboute him, and come with a strong companie too apprehende a malefactor. Yee see then that God vseth all the aduersities which wee feele in this present lyfe. And therefore lette vs not thinke it too be misfortune when some indure sickenesse and some pouertie. Like as the aduersities of this worlde are numberlesse: so lette vs assure our selues that God hath innumerable meanes too correct vs when he listeth, and howe he listeth. And that is it that Moyses meeneth when he sayeth, that all those things are locked vp in Gods Cofers. After hee hath spoken of all the miseries that can happen too man, he addeth: And are they not in my cofers? As if he should say, I haue my Treasures of good things when it pleaseth mee too shewe my fauour and loue towards men: yea and I haue wherewith too do them good, not after the maner of the worlde, but by meanes incomprehensible. But on the contrarie parte also, when I liste too punishe menne, they shall feele howe I can doo more than they wiste of, and more than euer they knewe. Thus yee see howe God will haue his incomprehensible riches knowne vnto vs, as well by vouchsafing too poure out his benefites vpon vs, as also by the contrarie. VVherefore lette vs bee sure that whensoever it pleaseth him too plague vs, he can do it, and that after a straunge maner. VVell, are wee scaped from one miserie? a second will followe, yea and innumerable will come one after another. Lo what wee haue to remember in this verse. Furthermore whereas Iob addeth a newe, that his gall was poured out vpon the grounde, and that his kidneyes were opened and shredde in peeces: lette vs beare in minde that which I haue touched afore: that is too witte, that when God punisheth and pursueth vs with extremitie, and that his hande becommeth so grievous and ouerheauie that wee can no more beare it: we muste not therefore bee too much discouraged, and as it were dulled: but lette vs beethinke vs of that which Iob knewe: whiche is, that for somuch as wee haue too do with God, lette vs sigh and grone with all humilitie, according also as he himselfe addeth, saying that his eyes and all his face were blubbered with weeping, that hee had sowed sackcloth vpon his skinne, and that hee had couered his head with duste. VVhat ledde Iob too do so? Verely because he knewe that Gods hande was vpon him, and that of all the miseries that were light vpon him, none came of fortune, but all of Gods visitation. Had not Iob bene perswaded of that, what had it booted him too haue put on sackcloth vpon his backe next his skinne, and too haue caste duste vpon his head? True it is that they whiche thinke not at all vpon God, sayle not too make great complaynts and too weepe and howle: but too weare sackcloth a right, they shall neuer do it except they haue an eye vnto God.

By the way, although the Hypocrites knowe not God aright, yet haue they some conceyt of him when they shewe suche signes of repentance. True it is that if we sawe them within, wee shoulde finde nothing in them but faynednesse: neuerthelesse, the Ceremonie whereof

Iob speaketh, is a sure signe that men are inforced too confesse that God is their iudge. And forasmuch as Iob did it vnfaynedly: we say he was not benumbed as these vnbeleeuers are. If God handle them any thing roughly, they thinke with themselves, See the misfortune that is happended mee, and they looke no further? Iob did not so. But he knewe and was fully resolued, that it behoued him too impute those things vnto God. Had we learned this lesson, wee had profited well for one day: I meene if wee had learned to practise it throughly as wee ought to do. For mooste men can well ynough confesse, that diseases, dearthes, and other miseries, as warres, plagues, famine, and all suche things come of God: but if it come too the prooffe, wee bee amazed, and not able to make that conclusion [ & to say in our selues, ] VVell, seeing that God visiteth vs, and commeth home vnto vs, it behoueth vs nowe too returne vnto him. Herefore wee haue playde the looce coltes, and wee haue wilfully runne astray from him: and now he rayneth vs with a rough bit, he shaketh his rod at vs, yea and he maketh vs to feele it: therefore wee muste learne to stoupe vnder his hande. But contrariwise howe deale wee in that behalfe? If a man bee afflicted in any poynt, what will he doo else but chafe and grynde his teeth in grudging agaynst God? And why? Surely if a man tell him he hath offended God, he will easily graunt it too bee true: but he hath no true rumorse to restreine himselfe. And why? For (as I sayd) wee haue but a confused conceyte of it. Hereby a man may see there are few which haue this lesson well printed in their heart, that all afflictions are Gods Archers, and that hee is garded with them too shewe himselfe our iudge. As muche is too bee sayde of the ordinarie aduersities that happen commonly. If a people or a whole Countrie bee touched with warre, according too the pollings, extorcions, and other outrages that are done there: howe many menne are there that thinke vpon God? VVee see that all is on a rore: and yet wee consider not that God guydeth the sterne. VVhen wee see suche turmoyling wee are admonished too marke and note so muche the more the textes of holie Scripture, wherein God sheweth vs as in a looking glasse, or rather as in a liuely picture, that on what side so euer menne bee afflicted, it becommeth them too acknowledge the same too bee the hande of God: and specially if a whole countrie bee plagued, it muste bee acknowledged too bee Gods visitation. VVherefore when any suche thing happeneth, lette vs followe the example of Iob: whiche is, that after we haue wept yea euen till our face bee forme ygreed with teares: we muste come and confesse our faultes and desire God too pitie vs. I sayd afore, that the vnbeleeuers also do weepe: but it behoueth vs too set our selues vnto God, and then no doubt but hee will make account of our teares, according also as wee heare howe Dauid sayeth, that God putteth them all as it were into a bottle. VVhen wee bee scourged that wee can no more, lette vs flee for succour too our God. And if wee weepe before him, so it bee with true lowlinesse, surely there shall not one teare droppe from our eyes, whiche shall not come too bee accounted of in his presence. For they bee sacrifices euerychone of them, according also as it is sayde in the one and fiftith Psalm, that a sorrowfull hart, and a harte that is caste downe, is a pleasant sacrifice vnto God. If our teares tende too this ende, and bee as witnesses of our fleeing vnto God with all lowlinesse, acknowledging that in so much as his hande is agaynst vs, there is none other remedie but too beseeche him too bee mercifull too vs: it is certayne

(as I sayde) that he will make account of our teares. And specially when we be troubled by wicked men, if in steed of making two diuels for one as they say, that is to wit, if in steede of rendering euill for euill, we come and beseech God to asswage his hande, and to set order in the things that are confuzed: let vs assure oure selues, that lyke as hee put vp Dauids teares intoo a bottell: so will he do ours too: And they shall not bee lost, though they fall too the grounde: God (I meene) will neuer forget them. Ye see then how we must applie this doctrine to our owne instruction: that is to wit, if we weepe when God afflicteth vs, our teares must not bee as the teares of sillie witleffe folke, who knowe not what they themselves meene by it, nor wherevnto they ought to direct themselves: but wee must direct our selues vnto God, and mourne before him. And this is confirmed by that Iob sayth, that hee clothed himselfe with sackcloth, and couered his head with dust. Surely these things were signes of repentance, like as when a wretched offender will sue for grace, he will not cloth himselfe in wedding apparell, hee will not come combed and frised and in a brauerie before his iudge; but he will rather come so as hee may moue him to compalsion. I say hee will come with a sorrowfull and heauie countenance, he will come courtly appareled as a mourner. And so the faithfull haue had the outward signes of repentance when God afflicted them, & haue confessed their sinnes that they might obteyne forgiuenesse: their woont was too cloth themselves in hayre and sackcloth, and to cast dust vpon their heades, and their so doing was allowed of God. VVhy so? For first of all, men had neede to quicken vp themselves, because they be slowe and colde. Therefore when they take conuenient helpe too spurre themselves forward, it is not superfluous, sith we know that when it cometh to the humbling of our selues before God: we go so lazily to it, as it is not but for fashions sake. VVee can well say wee bee faultie, and we can well cast foorth some sighes. But in the meane season wee consider not our offences: the number of them is infinite, and they be excessiue great, as we ought of right to be dismayd with feare of death, when wee come before our iudge. Neuerthelessse to our seeming it is ynough too cast forth a sigh or twaine, and away. Seeing then that there is such a coldenesse in vs, let vs assure our selues that wee haue neede to be spurred like Asses. Lo wherenvnto the sackcloth and dust of the auncient fathers serued. For when they vsed this sayde ceremonie, it was not for nought. Also it behoueth vs too come vnto God when wee cast dust vpon our heades. For was not the bodie created by him? Then like as we must haue our hartes settled [vpon God] so must our bodies also bee answerable therevnto, and all the whole man must be dedicated vnto God and do him homage. Now then we see that these things were no sonde trifles, when the auncient fathers wore hayre and Sackcloth on their backes, and therewithall did also cast dust vpon their heades. And that is it which Iob ment by speaking so. Neuerthelessse the Prophete Ioel sayth, Rende your hartes and not your garmentes. His meening there is not to reiect those outward signes: but he directeth his talke to the hypocrites, who thought themselves well discharged, when they had playde a few Apes toyes afore men, and made a goodly shewe, so as it might seeme that they were well seasoned with repentance. Yea (sayth he) your garments beare good recorde, and ye make many bragges to shewe your selues too bee good penitents. But what for that? Your hartes continue still stubborne in naughtinesse, they are as harde as Stithies, which is the thing that you ought too haue begon at Furthermore all this notwithstanding, he sayeth that the people take sackcloth and ashes, and cast themselves vpon the ground, and weepe before God, and that the gouerners and such as haue publike charge do begin, and all the rest of the people follow. Now then we see howe the auncient fathers vsed sackcloth and dust, when they came to the open witnesssing of their repentance before God. True it is that nowe adayes wee bee not tyde nor bounde to such maner of doings. Neuerthelessse, if our repentance were such as it ought to be, we would not be so frozenharted as wee are. For all the necessities that I haue alledged, are to be founde in vs also. If the men of olde time were willing too spurre vp themselves too the knowledge of their owne sinnes, by putting sackcloth on their backes: I pray you what shall become of vs? Haue we such and so feruent a zeale to craue pardon of God? Are wee so pulled downe, that wee mi-like of our offences, and are as forie for them as were requisite? Alas no. It were much for our behoofe: but wee bee dull in that behalfe. Then if the auncient fathers needed to humble themselves in acknowledging their sinnes: much more neede we to do it. But what? VVee thinke not on it a whit. And thereby it is seene that we can no skill, neither of God, nor of his iudgement, nor of oure owne sinnes. True it is that our sinnes may perchance be well ynough knowne to vs. But to perceyue our owne filthinesse, and to be ashamed of it, and to bee greued wyth our selues for it: that is no part of our care, wee hearken not after it. And yet notwithstanding, this was not written in vaine. Then let vs lerne, that if any of vs be afflicted, although he weare no sackcloth, ne cast dust vpon his head: yet ought we (as much as we can) to stirre vp our selues by all the meanes that we see meete for vs. VVhen a man is by himselfe alone, let him bethinke himselfe thus: well, I pray not too God so hartly as I shoulde do. And let him aduise himselfe, such a meane were good for me, if I did cast my selfe vpon the earth, and lay there as it were with my mouth in the dust, being abashed and ashamed before God: that should touch me more neerely to the quicke, and I should bee prouoked to see to my God for succour. Beholde (I say) howe euery man ought to prouoke himselfe particularly, specially when neede constreyneth vs, as we see wee haue great neede presently. And also let all of vs stirre vp our selues together. As soone as God sendeth any plague, or famine, thinke we it shoulde not be a pleasant sacrificize to him, if men made solemne protestation, and that both great and small confessed their sinnes before him, and euerie man stirred vp his neighbours too doo the same? Contrariwise when we come bolt vpright, and it seemeth that we perceyue not Gods chastizements, but giue him the slip: do we wonder if he double his blowes, yea and punish vs seuen folde more, as it is sayde in his lawe? VVe haue skill ynough to chafe and to demaunde wherefore he presseth vs so sore: yea but we consider not, that when he went about to meeken vs, we did beate backe his blowes with such pride and sturdinesse, as he is faine of necessitie to double them. So then let vs bethinke vs too praetize better this lesson that is shewed vs heere by Iob. And furthermore let vs marke well what hee sayeth for a conclusion: that is to wit, that there was no extortion or robbie in his bandes, and that his prayer had bene pure. Iob addeth this (as I sayde) to signifie that such maner of affliction was straunge too him: For so hath hee spoken heere to fore. And surely when so euer God afflicteth vs, beholde what we must do, we must enter into our selues and examine our owne liues, and therevpon according as we haue offended, so must we lament before God, and say, Alas Lord thou afflictest mee fore in deeds, but if I compare my faults, and wey them in the ballance with the aduersitie that I indure, Alas Lord I knowe I haue offended thee so many wayes, that if thou shouldest plundge me euen in heil, I were well worthie of it. Lo what we haue to doo. But if we perceyue not that God afflicteth vs for our sinnes, that is a verie sore temptation to vs. [And we fall to reasoning in our selues,] howe now? VVhat haue I trespassed? VVherfore doth God handle me so rigorously? I see hee spareth the wicked: I haue induered to serue him with a good and vpriight conscience: In deed I come farre short of discharging my dutie throughly: But yet haue I euer kept on forward: and yet notwithstanding I am vsed as the vnhappiest and cursed creature that the earth beareth. And what is ment by this geare? Ye see heere a great temptation, and such a one as is able too dismaye vs, according as befell too Job. But what is too bee done in this behalfe? First let vs bee well aduised that we may bee like too Job, so as wee may say that there is not extortion in our handes. For it is an easie matter for a man to vaunte and bragge of his soundnesse, as we see that the wickedest sort are not ashamed too doo. And nowe adayes if a man admonish them of their misdoings, O there is nothing but perfection in them, and the diuelishest of them all woulde bee esteemed as halfe Angelles. So then (as I sayde) let vs for out part serch throughly what is in vs without flatterie, and let vs not protest that wee haue cleane handes, except wee bee throughly like vntoo Job: and for performance of that, wee must not bee our owne iudges too iudge after oure owne fancies. After what maner is it that men ought to examine their liues, or in what fourme shoulde they frame their indytement? It must not bee with saying, I weene, I suppose, I take it so, or I weene not. All this stuffe must bee layde away. VVhat then? Let vs come too Gods lawe, and pray him too enlighten vs with hys holic spirite, that wee may throughly serche oute oure owne darkenesse, for the sinnes that are in vs are terrible lurkingholes. God therefore must be fayne to light vs vp a Cresset, and too giue vs wisdome and discretion too knowe and vnderstande our faultes in such wyse as wee may confesse them. Thus yee see what wee haue to doo. But let vs put the cace that Gods handling of vs so is not for our sinnes, as in good sooth he ment no such thing towards Job as too punish him for his desertes.

 VVherfore did hee it then? Hee intended too trie his pacience. God then may afflict the good men more than the euill: according as wee see that Ezechiell indured much more than the wickedest that were in Ierusalem.
 VVherin God had not a speciall cie to his sinnes. Howbecit although God punish vs not according too oure sinnes, yet is not that as much too say as he may not doo it if hee list. If wee shoulde bee scourged a hundred tymes more than Job was, and that God woulde sende vs forer aduersities than he sent him: Yet should hee not doo vs any wrong at all. Thus we see what wee haue to marke: and therewithall it behoueth vs too knowe, that in so dooing God executeth his iudgments, which are concealed and kept from vs for a time. Beholde sometimes when hee chastizeth vs, it seemeth that hee were minded to destroy vs: and yet he doth it for our welfare.

 True it is that we knowe it not presently. But we shall knowe it when hee discouereth that whiche is nowe hidden. Againe, if Job were handled so roughly, notwithstanding that he had pure and cleane handes, as will appaere by the protestations that wee shall here him make hereafter: I pray you ought we to woonder nowe adayes if God afflict vs: I say, vs that haue rebelled against him so many wayes? Let euery of vs a little bethinke himselfe: and we shall finde we haue committed so many iniquities and offences, as it is horrible. God af-flicteth vs: but after what maner? Not as hee did Job: he beareth with vs a great deale more. For hee giueth vs but a stripe or twaine with a rodde. But put the cace hee strake vs with great blowes of his swoorde: yet are not his strokes deadly. Then seeing it is sayde that Job was handled so rigorously, notwithstanding that hys handes were cleare, and his prayer right before God: let vs learne that if all the worlde were plagued after the same sort, there were no cause why they should woonder.
 VVhy so? For we are sure that iniquitie is as a water flood, and that as euery man feeleth it particularly in himselfe, so are wee al of vs infected with vices in common. For who is hee that can say hee hath walked so vpriightly, as hee may truly protest, that his handes bee cleare before God? Alas, hee commeth farre short.
 Then seeing it is so, let vs bee sure that whensoever wee indure any afflictions, the same is Gods punishment for our sinnes: and therefore, that wee may beare them patiently, let vs assure oure selues wee haue deserued much more. Neuertheless let vs bee bolde to flee vn-too our God, praying him too vouchsafe too clenze vs from all oure vnrightuousnesse, which is the cause of the miseryes that wee endure in this present lyfe: and that it may please him to beare with our infirmities, and make vs feele his goodnesse, to the ende we may alwayes haue occasion to glorifie him, euen vntill hee haue dispatched vs out of this sightfull life, too make vs partakers of his euerlasting glorie.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the presence of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs knowe them in such wise (so farre soorth as is expedient for vs) as that therewithall hee comfort vs by his goodnesse, and so reforme vs by his holy spi-rite, as wee may not neede too bee persecuted roughly at his hand, but that as soone as hee giueth any inckling, we may bee throughly moued too humble our selues vnder him. And that it may please him to accept our prayers, not onely for our selues, but also for all those that haue neede in these dayes, according as we see howe fore the whole wretched worlde is plagued. VVherfore let vs beseech our good God too looke vpon it with the eye of pitie, that by reason of the spreading oute of his mercie vpon vs, and vpon all Nations of the earth, we may haue occasion too sounde soorth hys prayes euerie where. And so let vs say, Almightye God our heauenly father. &c.

The.lxiiij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the sixtentb Chapter.

This sermon is yet still vpon the .xviij. verse, and then vpon the text that followeth.

18. O earth, hide thou not my blood, neyther let there be any place for my cries.
 19. For euen now is my vvitnesse in heauen, and he that vvarranteth me is in the highest places, 20. My Freendes are Rhetoricians agaynst me, and mine cies poure out teares vnto God.

21. O that

21. O that it were lawfull for man to reason vvith God, as vvith the son of man his neighbour.
 22. Behold the short yeares slide avway, and I enter into the vvay by the vvich I shall not come backe againe.

Obintending too make proteſtation of his owne vprightneſſe, ſetteth downe heere twoo things. that is to wit, that he hath not delt amiſſe towardes men, and that hee hath called vpon God purely. And that was by referring his life too the lawe, bicauſe that there our Lorde ſheweth both how wee muſt ſerue him, and howe wee muſt be conuerſant among men: inſomuch that we bee often ſpoken to of it, and not without cauſe. For it is no ſmall matter too be able too guide our life in ſuch wiſe as it may pleaſe God. VVe ſee then what Iobs intent was: namely, [too ſhew that he had indeuered to ſerue God, and to walke with his neighbours without hurting or annoying of any bodie: True it is that heere he ſetteth downe but two particular. Howbeit his meaning is to comprehend the whole. For when hee ſayth there is no outrage nor exceſſe in his handes: it importeth as much as that he had liued without giuing any man cauſe too complaine of him, as who ſhoulde ſay, hee had not procured them any harme or loſſe. True it is that we may do ſome wrong and iniurie without any ſhewe of violence. But foral-much as when men giue themſelues too harmefulneſſe, they ſtart out of their boundes, and ſtreyne themſelues too racke one, too pill another, and too deuoure the thirde: therefore Iob purpoſely ſayeth, that there had bene no rauening in his handes. As much is ment by the ſeconde ſaying. For the ſeruing of God conſiſteth not onely in the exerciſe of prayer: But forſomuch as that is the cheefe poynt: vnder that particular, Iob hath comprehended the whole. Nowe then wee ſee after what ſorte oure life may bee allowable afore God: that is too witte, when it is duely referred too his lawe. For God will not haue men to liue after their owne ſwinge, nor too delight in this or that, as they thinke beſt themſelues, nor too bee their owne iudges. But hee him-ſelfe will haue the whole authoritie ouer vs, and that wee ſhoulde bee governed according too his worde. So then to the end that we labour not in vaine, let vs learne to walke according to Gods commaundement. Marke that for one poynt. Verely this is oftentimes ſhewed vs: but yet for all that wee ſee howe the worlde doth alwayes runne altraye, and men delight too muche in theyr owne fancie. Therefore it is not without cauſe that the holy Scripture dooth ſo often ſende vs too this poynt, that wee ſhoulde liue, not after our owne liking, but according as God hath commaunded. Againe, whereas vnder the worde Prayer, heere is mention made of the whole ſeruiſe of God: wee ought too wey the ſame thoroughly. For the moſt part of men thinke not at all of praying vntoo God, and wee ſee howe the worlde diſchargeth it ſelfe of it verie lightly. Neuertheleſſe, when the Scripture ſpeaketh of the honouring of God, the cheeſt poynt of it which it ſetteth downe too vs, is prayer: and had this bene obſerued as it ought to be: the maner of praying had bene much more eſteemed among men, ſo as they woulde not haue ſwarued one waye nor other, but haue followed that which the holy Scripture ſheweth. But now clean contrarywiſe, it is come too paſſe that men haue taken ſuch a ſcope in praying vntoo God, as there is no reckening made of knowing what is good and profitable too bee prayed for, or in what maner: but euery man ſteppes too it like blinde Bayarde, and commes not dutyfully vn-too God. And whence proceedeth this ouerweening?

 Bycauſe wee take not prayer to bee a thing of ſo great eſtimation as it is. For if wee tooke it for the cheefe poynt of Gods Seruiſe, it is certaine that wee woulde go too it with faire greater hartineſſe than we do. Againe wee ſee, that inſteade of praying vntoo God, men are giuen to praying too Sainctes deceaſed: and the worlde, which yeeldeth that thing to creatures which is peculiar vnto God, thinketh not the ſame to be otherwiſe than good.

If a man aſke the Papiſtes why they terme the Virgin Marie their hope of ſaluation, why they flee too hir, and why euery one of them hath his ſeueral Sainct too bee his patrone: if a man tell them it is blaſphemie agaynſt God: it is verie harde too make them beleue ſo.
 And why? Bicauſe they neuer knewe nor taſted of that which the holy Scripture vtereth ſo diligently: that is too witte, that too ſerue God aright, it behooueth vs too pray vntoo him. Surely the greateſt and honourableſt ſeruiſe that hee requireth of vs, and the greateſt and ſoueraigneſt woorthip that hee alloweth, is for vs to haue our recourse vntoo him. Nowe had the Papiſtes conſidered this: woulde it not haue yrked them to haue gone too a deade creature, and too ſay, I woorthip God, or rather I yeelde him his due? Prayer is the principall ſeruiſe that he requireth at our handes, and yet they will conuey the ſame ouer to a creature. Is not this a peruerting of the order of nature? So much the better therefore ought we too marke thoroughly what is conteyned heere: that is too witte, that by this worde prayer, Iob ment to ſhew that he had ſerued God purely. And ſo if men wil now giue prooſe of their vprightneſſe: let them not alledge their Gewgawes, as the hypocrites are wont too do, ſaying, Haue wee not faſted? haue we not done this or that? But wee muſte vnderſtande, that oure Lorde will haue vs ruled after his lawe, and hee will haue the whole authoritie ouer vs. Marke that for one poynt.

Furthermore wee haue alſo too note, that oure prayer ſhall neuer bee pure before God, nor acceptable vntoo him, vnleſſe oure handes bee cleere from violence. And why? If wee bee cruell and wrangling with our neighbours, God putteth vs backe, and wee haue no acceſſe vntoo him. True it is that many doo giue the aduenture to pray vntoo God. and although they bee full of rauening, and haue troubled one, and tormented another: yet ceaſſe they not to bee hardie ynough too call vpon God. But ſurely their prayers are abhominable, bycauſe theyr handes are ſtayned with blood, that is to ſay, with wicked doings. And heere ye ſee alſo why God complayneth by his Prophete Eſay, that the Iewes came to weare the pauement of his Temple: And ſo he mocketh them, meaning that hee lyketh not of their com-ming too hys Temple, and of their making of reſemblance as though they ment too woorthippe him. For (ſayth he) your handes are full of blood: that is to ſay, ye haue not ceaſſed to anoy & to hurt your neighbors. Now thinke you that I will giue you acceſſe to mee, or that I will haue any acquaintance with you? Thus yee ſee in effecte what wee haue too conſider in this ſentence.
 And nowe Iob addeth, O earth, hyde not my blood, neyther let my teares take place. Some haue miſinterpreted this ſentence, that the earth hydeh not the blood.

Eſay. l. 12.
 & d. 15.

For they vnderstoode it that Iob shoulde wishe too haue his miseries knowne, and that forasmuch as hee was afflicted after so excessiue a fashion, hee desired that his blood might not be hidden, but that the earth might crie for vengeance of it. But too what purpose were that? He was not plagued by men. And ment hee that the earth shoulde aske vengeance agaynst God? Againe on the other side, the text declareth it selfe anon after: And needes must a man shet his owne eies if he wil be ouerseene in so easie a matter. For Iob heere toucheth two poynts. The one is in these wordes, O earth, hide not my blood, and the other is in these, neither let my cries take place. VVhat meeneth hee by wishing that his cries shoulde not take place? It is as much to say, as when hee hath ouerlaboured himselfe in crying and turmoyleing, it shall bee but labour lost, bicause God refuseth it. And that if hee come to men, he shall gaine nothing by it. Sith the case standeth so, wee may easily conclude, that in saying, O earth, hide not my blood, he graunteth that if he haue done amisse, the matter shall come to account and iudgement, and all his whole lyfe shall be layde afore him, and his indytement shall bee framed with extremitie, and God will handle him according to his deserts. And doubtlesse, in the holy Scripture the worde Blood, is oftentimes taken for all horrible crimes. [As for example.] Lorde deliuer me from blood: that is too say, Lorde deliuer mee from all the deadly sinnes that I haue comitted. VVherefore wee see that Iob in this place termeth all the transgressions and crymes that he might haue committed, by the name of his Blood. And that is according to his matter. For he had sayde that his handes were cleare from raiuin. And for a confirmation thereof he addeth, that if God finde him guiltie in any thing whatsoever it bee, he is contented that the same shall come to light and to account, and that his sinnes should bee no longer concealed, but that God shoulde bring them abrode: and that when he is throughly examined, if he be found faultie, he is contented that God shoulde shewe him no fauour nor mercie. And afterwarde he sayth, that although hee fighe and shreeke, yet notwithstanding let it not boote him, but let all his outeries be lost, so as it may seeme that Gods eares are stopped. Now we see what Iobs meening is. And heere we haue to call to minde a thing that hath bene treated of afore: that Iobs raging is bicause hee looketh not at Gods foueraine iustice, which is so perfect and exquisite, as no creature is able to stande wyth it, no not euen the Angelles, as hath bene sayde heere tofore. For had Iob looked well vpon that, it woulde haue hilde him in awe, so as he shoulde neuer haue made such protestations. Moreouer we must call to remembrance that Iobs intent is not to iustifie himself, as though he were vtterly innocent: but he looketh at the respect why God shoulde punish him: which was not that hee had deserued it, as men are commonly punished for their misdeedes. Also God had another respect: that is to wit, he ment to set him forth as a mirrour to all men, and to trie his patience. Iob then meeneth not too declare heere that his life was wholly pure, and that he had neuer done amisse: but his meening is that God punisheth him as rigorously as if he were a wicked caytif, and had led a more licentious life than all other men. Lo heere in effect what we haue to beare away. But as for vs, let vs assure our selues that if God plague vs, it is for our sinnes. And although our conscience witnessed that we desire to serue and honour him, yea euen without hypocrisie: yet notwithstanding wee shall come farre short of being so cleare as wee ought to bee, and wee shoulde bee founde indaungered a hundred thousande wayes.

Therefore let euerie man looke neerely to himselfe, and when we knowe our faultes best, let vs be sure that God knoweth a hundred times more by vs than wee our selues doo. For if wee knowe some one fault, is not God more sharpe sighted, as sayth Saint Iohn in his Cononickall Epistle? So then, let vs learne to humble our selues and to beseech God to hide our faultes. For it behoueth vs to come backe to that which is sayde in the two and thirtie Psalm: namely, Blessed is the man whose finnes the Lorde couereth, and whose iniquities hee calleth not to remembrance. If God discouer our faultes, we must all of vs perish, yea euen the perfectest. So then the onely refuge of our welfare, is to pray vnto God too hide all our transgressions, that they may not come too account before him. For if hee intende to iudge them, there is no shift but hel must be prepared for vs. Furthermore, let vs desire God to hearken to our cries, vnworthie though they bee. For if God delay the graunting of our requestes till wee haue serued him in all perfection: alas, what shall become of vs? There shall not bee any one but the gate shall be shet agaynst him, so as hee shall haue no entrance vnto God. Our cries therefore muste be receyued, notwithstanding that we haue deserued too be shaken of. Neuerthelesse, it behoueth vs to do our indeuer, to liue quietly with our neighbours, that wee may haue Gods fauour, and finde him such a one towards vs as we desire. VVhy so? For it is written, iudgement without mercie shall hee haue, that hath bene mercilesse. Ye see how Saint Iames telleth vs that God will deale rigorously with vs, if wee haue no pitie and compassion vpon oure neighbours heere. VVhat thing can betide vs so dreadfull, as when God handleth vs rigorously? And contrariwise where is there any hope for vs to conceyue, but in Gods vsing of his infinite goodnesse, which he sheweth in not imputing our sinnes to vs? Againe Salomon sayth, that he which stoppeth his eare at the crying of the poore, shall crie himselfe and not be hearde. Then if our neighbours be in aduersitie, and desire our ayde, and yet notwithstanding we be deafe, so as we shake them of, yea and (which worse is) we also torment them: needes must we feele this vengeance, that God shall make vs to crie, yea and bring vs to such an after deale as we wote not where to become, and yet for all that shall not hearken to vs. Therefore (as I haue sayd already) if we will haue God mercifull to vs, let vs beware that we haue compassion of such as are in aduersitie, and that we succour them: and let vs keepe our selues from all crueltie and outrage, least the thing that is written be performed vpon vs: which is, that the same measure shall be moten to vs which we mote to our neighbours. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to marke in this sentence. Nowe there followeth immediately after. Also now I see my witnesse in heauen, and hee that warranteth mee is in the highest places. My friendes play the oratours agaynst mee, and mine eyes gush out teares vnto God. Heere Iob appealeth vnto God as the onely competent iudge, bicause he had bene wrongfully condemned by men. And he doubteth not to appeale vnto God, forasmuch as hee knowes his case is good. True it is (as I haue sayd already) that he mishandleth his case: howbeit in so doing he had iust cause to mainteyne his owne soundnesse. Yee see then that the cause why he is not afrayd to appeale vnto God, is for that hee seeth that men do persecute him wrongfully. But let vs consider what a one Iob was, too the content wee vse not such rashe boldnesse as most men do. VVhen the matter cometh to calling of god to witnesse, I pray you who is hee that maketh any curfie or conscience at it? The world nowe adayes is full of forswearing, and

and there is no faythfulnesse in it. VWhereof commes this? It is bicause we haue no feeling of Gods iustice, but wee come rushing agaynst his seate like wilde beastes. For what is periurie or forswearing? It is aspiting of God, as though he had neyther might nor authoritie to punish vs. VWee cannot denie but it is so when wee call God to bee our witnesse and iudge. Hee therefore that sweareth falsely, dooth mocke Gods maiestie too his face: and yet for all that wee see that men make not much account of it. Then is it apparant heereby, that wee beare small reuerence too the Maiestie of God. VWherefore so muche the more ought wee too marke that which I sayde: namely, that wee muste not bee so bolde in protestting before God, and in calling him too recorde: but wee muste go too it as if wee were at the poynt to yeelde an account before him. After the same maner was Iob sommoned, as wee haue scene heere too before, and shall see more yet fully hereafter. Nowadayes if a man bee accused of any crime, although hee bee taken tardie, yea and vtterly conuincd: yet will hee make no conscience too say, God is my witnesse that I am wronged, and falsely accused. And howe happeneth it that Gods name is so ryfe in mens mouthes? Also when the hypocrites will magnifie themselues, they will alwayes say, God is priuie too my hart, he knoweth what I am, I referre my case too him. And howe happeneth this? Doo we thinke, that bycause God wynketh at men, when they call him so to recorde, as it were too false standarde larum, and punisheth not those at the first dashe which doo so dallie with him: therefore hee will not at length shewe that which hee hath vttered in his lawe, that is too witte, that hee will not suffer hys name too bee taken so in vaine, but will reuendge the wrong that is done him in offering him so great reproch as too scorne his Maiestie after that sort? Then let vs marke well that as oft as wee muste come before God, it behoueth vs too haue examined oure life after the example of Iob, and that wee bee not so rashe as too steppe foorth too say, God is my witnesse: but that wee haue thoroughly searched oure consciences, and that God answereth within vs, that hee alloweth them. Marke that for one poynt.

And heere withall wee haue further to marke, that if all the worlde beare vs recorde, it is nothing till God haue allowed it. And heereby we bee warned not too dispose oure lyfe too any fayre outwarde shewe, as we see howe there is nothing but vaingloriousnesse alwayes in the worlde. If men clappe their handes at vs, and wee bee in good estimation among them: it is ynough for vs, and wee woulde fayne that God shoulde content himselfe with it too. Yea but hee is not lyke mortall men, as the holie Scripture sheweth. And why? VWee see the outwarde appearance: but God searcheth that which is hidden within, and hath an eye too truth and vprightnesse, as hee speaketh by his Prophete Iemie, accordingly too the other text in Samuell. Seeing it is so, let vs learne too knowe that it behoueth vs not onely to haue our handes, our eyes and feete cleane, neither must wee thinke oure selues too haue done much, when our sinnes are not manifest. And why? For the cheefe poynt is to haue our recorde in heauen: that is to say, that God allowe of oure doings, as I haue declared already. VWhat maner of allowance must we haue before God? Verely that wee haue walked in purenesse of harte, that there hath not bene any hypocrisie in vs, and that wee haue not onely had some outwarde shewe so as wee might say the worlde cannot charge mee with this or that: but that wee haue had a right meaning minde, that wee haue continued in good dooing, and that wee haue indeuced so to behaue our selues, as if God marked not onely all oure woorkes, but also oure thoughtes too. Marke yet further what we haue to beare away in this sentence. Beholde (sayth Iob) euen now is my record in beauen. Vnder this worde Euen or Also, he comprehendeth, that he may well take men to witnesse with him, but hee passeth yet further, and commeth euen vntoo God. And that ought too bee weyed. For whereas hypocrites call God too witnesse, they dare not put themselues too the tryall of men. If there bee a wicked persone that is notoriously knowne too bee suche a one, so hee be not cast in prison, or so hee bee not a drawing too the Gallowes, hee will bring of his honestie too the vttermoste: and yet in the meane whyle euerie man will condemne him, yea and in steade of three or foure Iudges, hee shall haue a hundred or a thousande. For euerie man will say, marke mee yonder naughtipacke, marke mee yonder Theefe, marke mee yonder murderer, marke mee yonder extortioner, yonder swearer, yonder despizer of God. And yet for all this, suche maner of men are so shamelesse, that they make no bones too take God too recorde of their honestie, and too protest that hee knoweth them, and that they bee readie too answer before him, whereas if the matter come but to the tryall of men, they shoulde haue a thousande voyces too condemne them, as I haue touched already. And howe dare they then presente themselues before God? Bycause they conceyue not hys Maiestie. Lo why wee ought too wey well thys worde Euen, sayth Iob. For hee presupposeth that he may call men to recorde, and that euerie man will beare witnesse with him, that hee had so behaued himselfe as that hee had bene an eye too the blinde, a gardian too the fatherlesse, a defender of the widdowes, that hee had serued in steade of legges to the Cripples, and that his hande had neuer bene shette too the poore, as wee see hee maketh his protestations afterwarde. For Iob had walked in suche wise afore men, as hee sayeth hee might come euen before God also, whiche is a greate thing. Also wee see howe hee magnifieth heere the witnesse of heauen. And by this it is well to be coniectured, that hee slung not out at aduventure too iustifie himselfe with vnbrideled libertie as these mockers doo, who protest with their mouth that God knoweth them, and yet their life is so vilanous as the verie ayre stinketh of it, and the verie babes can skill to speake of it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text. Afterwarde hee addeth, that his frendes playde the Orators agaynst him: and that in the meane while his eyes poured out teares afore God. Heere Iob sheweth why hee is faine to referre himselfe to Gods iudgement: namely, bycause he findeth no reason nor vprightnesse among men. Surely it is a verie great temptation when wee bee plagued, and that the worlde taketh vs to bee forsaken of God: for it is a pollicie of the deuils to driue vs to dispayre. VWhen a poore man is smitten with Gods roddes, the miserie that he endureth is heaue ynough of it selfe: nowe if one come and lay a double load vpon his backe, by casting him in the teeth howe it appeareth plainly that hee is vtterly forsaken of God: it is ynough to ouerwhelme him. For I speake not of the wicked stubborne sort whome God plagueth for their sinnes: but I speake of suche as haue walked vprightly, and yet notwithstanding God hath not missed to afflict them. True it is that they haue wel deserued it: but hee hath not alwayes an eye vntoo that. Nowe and then hee intendeth to mortifie them for the time to come. Bicause they be not yet sufficiently tamed,

he is faine to cut away all the lewde affections that are in them. And furthermore he will haue them learne that it is needfull for them to pray vnto him and too put their whole trust in him: and finally hee will haue their pacience shewed. Thus ye see that a good man, which tendeth to Godwarde and walketh plainly, shall notwithstanding haue great plagues. Nowe is that a prooffe that God taketh him to be a greater sinner than other men. No surely. And yet if a man shoulde threape that vpon him, it were ynough to cast him into dispayre. But so was Iob delt with. Then let vs marke well, that the sayd temptation is hard and burthensome, and therefore let vs resort to the remedie that we must vse, that is to wit, that we present our selues before God, without tying of our selues ouermuch vnto men, according as Iob hath discoursed heere afore. My frendes (sayth he) play the Orators agaynst mee. Hee meeneth that they which ought to haue comforted him, and partly to haue asswaged his greefe, haue taken pleasure to mocke at him. For this Rhetoricke whereof he speaketh, is nothing else but that they had fyled their tongues to mocke at him, too vexed him, and too put him besides himselfe. This happened vnto Iob, to the ende it should bee an example vnto vs. Therefore whensoever it shall please God too afflict vs, if the worlde iudge amisse of vs, and diuerse take occasion too condemne vs, as though oure minde had neuer bene rightly disposed: let vs take all patiently, assuring ourselues that when our Lorde stirreth vp men after that sort agaynst vs, and Satan practyzeth too cast vs quite downe, the same is a part of oure Crosse, and we muste seeke too remedie the mischeefe in such wise as Iob sheweth vs. And how is that? Oure eyes muste poure out teares vnto God. VVhy so? VVee see men come too vexed vs after that sort; and therefore wee woulde encounter them too driue them backe. And howe? O, they doo mee great wrong, and it is a greate crueltie too handle me after this maner. True it is that wee maye well make such protestation: but wee muste not stande too muche vpon that poynt, wee muste but glaunce at it, yea and it must be done to another ende: namely, as sorie that men should take occasion of stumbling at vs. But to the intent wee be not an example of euill, let vs say thus. Beholde, although men iudge euill of mee, yet haue I endeuered too serue God. Neuerthelesse, this conceyte muste glyde away lightly, for wee neuer bethinke vs of Gods iudgements, neyther doo wee enter intoo oure owne consciences, so long as we pleade after that sort with men. VVe see this vice to be ouer common. Therefore let vs remember this lesson that is shewed vs heere: that is to wit, that our eyes must shed out teares before God. And how? By lifting vp our eyes aloft. For when we see men so malicious towards vs, that wee can drawe no reason oute of them, though it be easie for them to iudge of our life, and that wee haue not done any thing worthie of blame: let vs learne to resort vnto God, and to be content to haue him for our warrant. Thus yee see wherevnto Iob leadeth vs when wee followe his example duly. And hereby also it is shewed vs more plainly, wherefore he made the protestations which we haue heard not long since. And so his complayning in this sentence, is bicause men condemned him wrongfully. But let vs nowe proceed further. Hee wisheth that it were lawfull for him to plead with God as a mortall man doth with his equall. But (sayth he) the short dayes shal de away, and I enter into the way by which I shal not come backe againe. VVhen Iob wisheth that it were lawfull for him to plead with God, it is according to that which we haue seene alreadie. For heereby he sheweth that his chafing is bicause the miserie that hee endured was so greuous as he coule not beare it any more. But in so doing hee did amisse. It is not for vs to accuse Iob in all poynts: but let vs haue an eye to that which I haue sayde, namely, that whereas he had a good matter, yet he was carryed away and ouershot himselfe [in the handling of it.] And why was that? For had hee knowne his owne transgressions, and the faultes that hee had committed, he had submitted himselfe quietly to Gods will, and not entered intoo any pleading or faultfinding. Hee had sayde afore, howe hee knewe that the Angelles were not cleare before God: and that there was suche a perfect rightuoussnesse in God, as that all that euer the creatures can bring, must of necessitie be nought woorth: infomuch that if the brightnesse of the Sunne do dimme the Starres, muche rather muste Gods rightuoussnesse swallowe vp all the rightuoussnesse that wee suppose our selues too haue. Iob therefore spake after that maner. But if hee had well remembred the sayde consideration [of Goddes rightuoussnesse:] hee woulde not haue so ouershotte himselfe as too say, I woulde it were lawfull for mee too go too lawe with God. But (as I haue touched alreadie) albeeit that hee knewe this doctrine: yet was his passion so vehement, as hee forgate himselfe. And heereby wee be warned, so too beare awaye the things which we reade in the holy Scripture, as we may learne too brydle oure passions when wee be tempted too impacience or any other vice: and as the thing that wee haue learned by Gods woorde, may be sufficient too drawe vs from the trouble that rizeth vp agaynst vs. Saint Paule sayeth that the Gospell is of power to subdue all things that lift vp themselues agaynst God. Beholde our wittes, beholde our fleshly affections, and see howe they lift vp themselues agaynst God, and bid him battell. VVhat is too be done? They must be hidde in captiuitie, that is too say, whatsoeuer it be that wee finde in vs, and in our nature too be agaynst God and his doctrine, wee muste subdue it by force. Thus yee see a perfect constancie wherein it behoueth vs to continue. Therefore when wee fall to disputing of this and that, and specially when wee come too encountering: let vs shrinke downe meekely like fillie sheepe, and let vs alwayes conclude: God is my iudge, and there is nothing to be founde fault withall in him: though I had libertie too pleade, yet shoulde my case quayle: for I couide not alledge one poynt for my selfe, but he would alledge a thousande agaynst mee. Yee see then that wee must glorifie God without standing in contention with him, yea euen although it were lawfull for vs to pleade for our selues. And heere ye see also why our Lorde (of purpose too conuince men the more) dooth nowe and then say, Go to, let vs go to lawe together: as hee dooth cheefely by his Prophete Esay. I am content (sayth he) to go to lawe with you, let vs haue a iudge or an vnper, and let it be tried who hath wrong, or who hath right. VVherof can ye accuse me? VVhat harme haue I done you? But contrarywise, I can accuse you of such points and such. It is out of all doubt, that there is no iudge betweene God and vs. VVhy then vseth hee such maner of speach? Hee letteth himselfe downe from his Majesty and highnesse, and sheweth that if he were a creature, and that there were an vnper or dayesman appoynted, so as he should be sayne too abide another bodies iudgement: yet could not men cleare themselues of that which hee had to alledge agaynst them. VVee see then that Gods vsing of this maner of speach, as though hee were a mortall man, or were clad with our person: is to shew vs that hee plagueth vs not like a Tyrant, ne dealeth with with vs by absolute authoritie, as the Popishe diuines haue surmized, which is a diuelish doctrine. God vseth no such absolute power, that is to say, no lawlesse power (as they terme it) which shoulde bee separated from hys rightfulnessse. But he vseth all vprightnesse, insomuch that all mouthes muste bee stopped before him. Hath hee condemned vs? Hee will bee founde righteous in iudging, as it is sayde in the one and fiftie Psalm. True it is that wee will haue false and wrongfull verdictes, and make many allegations agaynst it: but in the ende God shall bee founde righteous, yea euen too oure confuzion. What remayneth then? VVee muste humble and meeken oure selues, too acknowledge that all Gods iudgements are rightfull, notwithstanding that vntoo vs they seeme contrarie. Furthermore let vs not go aboute too diminishe his Maiestie, neyther let vs say, I woulde that God were a mortall man as I am, and that I had too deale with my matche. But let Gods Maiestie bee continued still in full state: for lyeth it in vs too imbrace it? And is it not a cursed blasphemie too attempt it? Surely Iobs intent was not to blaspheme: for had hee bene of that minde: Satan had caryed him quite and cleane away. But (as I sayde) he bewrayeth his owne passions, wherevntoo hee consented not. Then had hee the first moouing too it, and by and by hee did cutte it off. And so when it commeth in oure mynde too lift vp our selues agaynst God, bicause hys hande seemeth too lye too heauie vpon vs: let vs by and by turne backe and restreine the vnruely affections, as-surging oure selues that God hath iust cause too punish vs a hundred tymes more roughly than hee dooth, if hee listeth. Yee see then in what wise it behoueth men too humble themselves, and too acknowledge God too bee their soueraine iudge: and therewithall not to faile too take holde of his mercie, assuring themselves that inasmuch as hee is the wellspring of all goodnesse: hys Maiestie wyll not bee too terrible too vs, but that hee will looke vpon vs with pitie, and knowing oure infirmitie, will beare with them. And in very deede we know hee hath giuen vs a good pawne, and a good assurance of it in oure Lorde Iesus Christ, whome hee hath made oure iudge, too the intent wee might finde mercie in him, as in the partie that sheweth himselfe oure redeemer and aduocate.

Nowe let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of oure sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise, that being ashamed of the, we may flee no whither else for succor but to his mercie, and that we may know how needfull the same is for vs, and therupon imbrace it. And therewithall also let vs learne to be displeas'd with our selues for our sinnes, so as we flatter not our selues in them, as we haue bene wont to do: but that we may bee more and more clenzed from all our owne filthinesse, and bee clothed ouer with his rightuoufnesse, which is as yet but a little begonne in vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The .lxxv. Sermon, which is the first vpon the .xviij. Chapter,

This Sermon is yet still vpon the last verse of the .xviij. Chapter, and then vpon the text that followeth.

- MY breath is vnseuerie, my dayes are at an ende, and the graues are vpon mee.
2. There are dalliers vvith me, and mine eye abydeth in their bitternesse.
  3. I pray thee lay downe a guage, giue a pledge for thee: vvho is he that vvill touch in my hande?
  4. Bicause thou hast couered their hart, that they can haue no vnderstanding, thou vvilt not exalt them.
  5. Verely as for those that speake flatteries to their freends, the eies of their children shall fayle.

After that Iob had made protestation of his innocencie (as we haue seene:) hee addeth that the same booteth him not, and that he seeth himselfe in maner forlorne. I go (sayth hee) into the path whereby I shall neuer retorne againe. And anon he addeth a complaint of the shortnesse of our life, meaning thereby that God ought to handle men lesse rigorously, seeing they do but passe away ouer the earth. Afterwarde he confirmeth his matter newe againe, saying, that his breath is vnseuerie or his breath is quite spent, and hee hath no more lustinesse in him, so that there remaineth nothing for him but the graue: on which side focuer he turn him he seeth present death, and hee is hemmed in rounde about, so as he cannot scape the graue that is prepared for him. Yee see in effect what Iob meeneth. Surely as in respect of his motherwitte, hee coulde not perceyue but that God was minded to dispatch him quite and cleane. But hee might haue looked higher, according as wee knowe that euen in the extremitie of death, the faythfull must still hope for life, and so comfort themselves in their tribulations, as they may not doubt but God will giue them a good ende. Moreover God not onely giueth vs wherewith to comfort oure selues in our tribulations, but also whereof to glorie and triumph, assuring our selues that the same shall turne to our saluation. Iob then speaketh not here throughly like a faithful man: no, but (as I haue sayde already) he vttereth his passions, as euery one of vs findeth by experience in himselfe that although hee rest vpon Gods promises, and comfort himselfe wyth them: yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not to be disquieted and troubled in himselfe. VVe shall not ouercome temptations at the first push: but wee must bee fayne to fight with great force and difficultie. VVhen wee haue suche a battell, wee maye well say with Iob, that we see nothing but the Graue, that our breath is forspent, that oure lyuelinesse is cut away, and that there is no more recouerie. VVe may then say so: yea for ought that we see: howbeeit assoone as we haue espyed out our miseries and felt them, wee must lift vp our selues higher vntoo Godwarde, and not doubt but hee will deliuer vs, yea and make that thing turne too oure profite, whiche wee thinke to bee too our harme. Yee see then in effect, after what sort wee muste practise thys sentence: that is to wit, first of all when any of vs is in suche distresse as hee woteth not what too say, ne seeth any ende of hys cace: well, wee muste not therefore bee astonied, though according too the fleshe wee dreade present death, and God seeme too haue forsaken vs, and will helpe vs no more. And why? VVee see that Iob came too the like distresse, and yet notwithstanding he ceased not to beleue that God woulde haue pitie of him in the ende, after hee had fought a good while, neither doubted hee of the victorie. Yee see then that our owne feeblenesse ought not too bee any discomfort vnto vs. But as soone as we feele such impedimentes, let vs cast our eye vpon God, and say: well, wee must bee fayne to passe heere through the pathe whereby neuer man returneth againe, according to the course of kinde. Yea but hath not God promised his seruantes too holde them by the hande in the middes of death? Yes: then let vs marche on boldely.

Againe, haue wee not Iesus Christ for oure guyde? Then let vs go to death. Doo wee not knowe howe it is the entrie wherely too come too the glorie of heauen? Seeing that the resurrection was ioyned too the death of Gods sonne, was not that also too assure vs that God will not suffer vs too continue in rottennesse? Knowe wee not that that which is written in the sixtenth Psalme was fulfilled in him: namely that God preserued him from rotting, too the ende that wee shoulde bee made free from it, and drawne quite oute of it at length? Seeing then that wee haue such promises at Goddes hande, and suche assurance in the persone of oure Lorde Iesus Christe, wee ought too fight [manfully] agaynst the dreadfulnessse of death. Lo in effect what we haue to remember in this streyne. Heerewithall wee bee also put in mynde of the brittle-nesse of oure yfe. My breth is forspent sayth Iob. And in good sooth what is the lustinesse of all men? It is but a blast. Againe, were oure life as long as we would wishe: yet were it but a little start. Then are the yeares but fewe in number, as in respect of mannes life. All the lustinesse that wee haue in it is but as a thing that is so wythered as it fadeth away. Seeing it is so, let vs learne, nor too ouersleepe oure selues here, knowing that God in shewing vs howe frayle wee bee in this worlde, giueth vs occasion too thinke vpon him, and too seeke for the heauenly life, and not too torment oure selues out of measure, sith wee see that oure life goeth too decay, and by little and little fadeth vtterly. Therefore let vs not bee greeued at it. And why? As soone as God setteth vs in this worlde, hee telleth vs it is too the entent wee shoulde passe swiftly away, and as it were too make but a turne heere. Is it meete then that we should settle heere as though it seemed that our life were very strong, and in no wise to be misliked? This is the thing which wee haue yet too remember in this sentence. Also it is to be noted vpon this worde Graues, that wee bee besceged, not with any one kinde of death, but with many. VVe haue but one life, yea and the same is verye flightfull, consisting in one blast which is nothing. But if we looke neerely about vs, whole hundreds of deathes beset vs rounde aboute. And so yee see why Iob vsith the plurall number Graues. It had bene ynough for him too haue sayde the graue is prepared for mee, I cannot escape: but hee sayeth The graues are prepared for mee. And needeth one man any more than one pitte? No: but Iob meeneth, that as soone as hee were neuer so little passed oute of one death, another shoulde wayte for him, yea and another after that, and too bee short, hee shoulde bee fayne too perishe, though hee had passed neuer so many daungers. True it is that wee come not all intoo suche extremities as Iob was at. But yet is there none of vs that findeth not himselfe in the same case: that is too say, that hee hath but one lyfe among a number of deathes that are readie for vs. VVhat is too bee done then? VVe must learne too pray vntoo God, and too betake oure lyfe intoo his handes, too the ende wee maye bee sure of it. Seeing then that it pleaseth God too be the keeper of oure lyfe, let vs walke on our course wythoute ouermuch carefulnesse. Againe, though there were a thousande deathes readie too swallowe vs vp: God is strong ynough too piicke vs out of them, as it is sayde in the Psalme, that it is hee that hath the issues or outgoings of death in his hande: that is too say, hee hath the meanes whereby too deliuer vs, yea euen although the same bee incomprehensible too vs. Neuerthelesse, let vs heereby take warning too bee alwayes readie too depart oute of the worlde, and not be too much wedded to our beeing here belowe. For what shoulde wee gaine by it? So then let vs alwayes haue the one foote lifted vp as if wee shoulde enter intoo oure graue, and let vs go lustily too it, making this conclusion with our selues, that wee go not thither too tarrye there for euer, but that oure Lorde hath shewed vs in the persone of our Lorde Iesus Christ, that hee will not haue vs too perishe in death nor too abide in rottennesse for euer: But let vs proceede further. It is sayde, Of a trutb, there bee Dallyers with mee, and mine eye continueth in their bitternesse. Heere Iob findeth fault with those that came too comforte him, and did nothing else but put him too more trouble. He termeth them Dallyers, that scoffe at folke in aduersitie, because they came not too iudge of hys affliction with compassion and humanitye as they ought too haue done: and so he addeth that they coulde bring nothing but vexation too greue him the more, and that hee was fayne too beholde still the miserie and bitternesse that they had procured him. And heereby we be aduertised, that if wee will comfort the sorrowfull and afflicted aright: wee muste not come with an vnkindely harte as it were of steele or of yron, but wee must be pitifull. Then must not a man thinke himselfe meete too comforte such as are in trouble and incomberance, except hee cloth himselfe with their passions: that is to say, except hee do as it were put himselfe intoo their case. It is true. For suche as too their owne seeming are stoutest too comforte poore folke in distresse, shall do them small good, if they come but with tongue and with brauerie of gay woordes. They may well discourse of matters: but it shall bee to no purpose. For it is impossible for vs too vse the doctrine that shall bee fitte to asswage the griefes of our neighbours, vnlesse wee feele them, and bee touched with them oure selues. Therefore let vs marke well by the worde Dallyers, that all suche as are churlishe or vnkinde, can by no meane comforte those that are encombered with tribulation. Marke that for one poynt.

Againe, seeing wee knowe that it behoueth vs to bee pitifull towarde suche as suffer any miserie: let vs be- thinke vs howe it is sayde in the Psalme. Blessed is the man that hath the consideration of the poore, God will deliuer him in the day of his aduersitie. For it is to doo vs towit that it behoueth vs to haue a singular discretion too iudge aright of the aduersities of oure neighbours, and that wee muste followe the same discrete dealing which God sheweth vs and giueth vntoo vs. For wythout that, wee shall go cleane contrarie too woorke, and if a man bee plagued, wee shall holde talke with him ouerthly without any discretion. Then must God giue vs vnderstanding too deeme aright of other folkes afflictions.

And herevpon when we come to comfort such as in- dure any aduersitie, specially if it bee to shew them their faultes: let vs not go to it sharply as it were to set oure foote vpon their throte when they be downe, but rather let let vs haue a mind and desire to releue them and help them vp. But about all things we must beseeche God to giue vs the spirit of vnderstanding as I sayd. Moreouer this thing must also be practized: that is to wit, when any of vs is in trouble, he must haue a care to apply the holie scripture to such vse as he may bee comforted by it. VVhyso? For we bee offended if a man commeth to sting vs, and to heape vp yet more trouble vpon vs when we be in aduersitie already: and wee will soone say it is a greate crueltie, and that there is no honestie and good dealing in men, when they handle vs after that sort: and yet for all that, euery one of vs will do the like too himself. As how? If I bee in any heauinesse and take the holie scripture to comfort me with, I bethink mee not to take the texts that shuld do it: but rather if I meete with any threatening, in stead that the scripture should make mee feele some taste of Gods goodnesse to my cofort in him, and assuage all my sorrowes: I set my self on fire and increace my greef more and more. See then how we ouershoote ourselues bycause we haue not the skill to cofort our selues as we ought to do, and as God would we should do. And therefore not only let vs haue pitie & compassion of our neyghbours when they be in aduersitie: but also let euery of vs looke to himself, to comfort and assuage his owne sorrowes aright, when he lighteth into such extremitie. Now it foloweth that Iob desireth God to lay downe a gage, and to giue a pledge, or to put in a suretie. VVho is he (sayeth Iob) that wil touch [me] in my hand? He returneth too the matter that was declared yesterday, which is that he would faine go too lawe with God, yea and do it as with his fellowe or his equall. For why demaundeth he a gage? why demaundeth he a suretie or warrantize? It is bycause he would haue God too abace himself from his maiestie: as if he should say, Surely so long as thou continuest in thy greatnesse, I dare not come to dispute against thee, for thou art ouernightie to confound mee. But giue mee leaue to talk with thee, lay me downe a gage, bynd thy self to abyde tryall, and submit thyself too the auctoritie of a iudge, in case as if a man that is no dweller in a place, should hyre a house and put in sureties for it. VVhat Iob meeneth by saying, VVho is he that will touch mee in the hand. It is as much too say, as who is he that will vndertake too bee suretie for thee? For men vsed that ceremonie: and like as now adayes men signe a paper in the hand of a iudge or of a notarie: so in those dayes the parties touched one another in the hand, too giue their fayth and too bynd them selues. Ye see then what Iobs meening was. But yee would knowe whither this demaund of his were to bee excused, in that he desired God that he might pleade against him? It is verie certain that it was not too bee excused. For (as I touched glauncingly yesterday) we ought too desire, nothing more, than too come before God, and too haue him too be our iudge, yea and that he should handle vs as he listeth him self. True it is that if he should vtter his rigour against vs, there were no shyft but we should be confounded. VVo be too those wretched creatures that come too bee iudged rigorously and without mercye. But forasmuch as God loueth vs, too receyue vs through the forgiuenesse of our sinnes which he offereth vs, and sheweth himself too be at one with vs in our Lord Iesus Chryst, and pronounceth all them blissed whose sinnes are forgiuen: when we heare of these things, can we with a better care than too come before the face of him that taketh away our sinnes, and casteth them behynd his backe, and into the bottom of the Sea as it is sayd? And specially let vs looke vpon our Lord Iesus Christ, too whom all power of iudgement is giuen, which serueth too maynteyne our care, and he is our aduocate. Think wee not that he will make the bitter death awaylable which hee indured for vs? So then, if men were as well aduized as they ought to be: there were nothing too bee more wished, than too be iudged at Gods hand, at leastwise so they had recourse to his mercye, and yeeled them selues intoo the hands of our Lord Iesus Christ, who will not iudge vs to our condemnation, but rather acquit vs. And why? For in that behalf wee may say with Sainct Paule, It is God that acquitteth vs, who shall condemne vs? VVho shall accuse vs seing, that Iesus Christ is our aduocate that defendeth our care, and the partie that answereth for vs before God his father? Shall wee now feare too bee accused or condemned? But what? Iob hath vttered himself heere, in such wise as hee found himself turmoyled with his owne passions and tormets: and hereby wee be taught to repressse our owne naughtinesse. VVhyso? For we see what the inordinatenesse of our nature is. If we giue our affections head, where too must wee come? Iob desireth too go to lawe with God. Alas, and can he preuaile in his sute? No, he desireth to be vtterly ouerwhelmed. As much would we doo, were it not that God restreyneth vs by giuing vs the grace to subdue our passions. Then let vs marke well, first that when men suffer themselues too be carried away by their fleshy affections, they ouershoote themselues so farre, and become so hardharted, as they make no bones to rush against God: and that is a horrible thing. For there is not that man of vs which abhorreth not to aduaunce himself after that sort against God: but yet for all that, we do so, and it is an ordinarie vyce among vs. VVhat is to be done herevpon? VVe must lerne to brydle our affections, seing they be so furiose and do arme vs after that maner against God. For this example is set afore vs, to the end that euery of vs shuld indeuer to repressse them as much as in vs lyeth. Marke that for one point. Again, let vs not desire to diminish the maiestie of God for the easing of our selues. For if his hand be ouerstrong and ouerheauye vpon vs when he afflicteth vs: let vs assure our selues that he vpholdeth vs by a farre stronger and mightyer puissance. VVhen our Lord visiteth vs and sendeth vs any affliction, well, we may then say, here is a burthen to heaue for mee too beare, I can no more indure it. But when we be so feeble, let vs consider a little by what meanes we hold out but one minute of an houre. How are we able to resist? Is it of our owne manfulnesse? Is it for that we of our selues can warde Gods blowes when he striketh vs, or for that we are able too outstand his force? No no. But it is bycause that when hee striketh vs with the one hand, he holdeth vs vp with the other. For else it is certaine we should bee vndoone at euery blowe. God should neede no more but to giue vs one tillup as they say, or but to make countenance too strike vs, and we were dispatched out of hand. Seing it is so with vs that we cannot hold out when God afflicteth vs, but by his power: were it not a greate follye in vs, to desire therevpon, that his myghynesse should be abated? VVherfore (as I haue sayd erewhyle). Let vs lerne not to desire that his glorie should bee diminished for the easing of vs. For that were the cleane wrong way, and we should be vtterly disappointed of our desire, if we thought too be eased by the weakening and effecting of Gods hand. For that were the next way too send vs packing, bycause there is none other meane to preferue vs, but only Gods vttering of his strength in vs, as I haue sayd afore. That is an other poynt which we haue to consider in this text. And therewithall let vs marke also that it is an horrible blasphemie to require God to lay vs downe a gage, and too put vs in a pledge or suretie. And why? For it is a likelyhod that we trust not to his faythfulnesse. True it is that Job vseth these words to declare that there is an ouerhygh power in God, and that no mortall man durst incounter it, except God would release his owne right: and yet neuerthelesse, that God giueth vs other assurances too come vnto him. Which are they? It is that he will haue 10 men content themselues with his single word, as good reason is they should. Will we then bee assured? Let vs giue eare to Gods promises, let vs embrace them, and let vs beleue that he ment not to feede vs with leasings, nor to soade vs with vayne and frutelesse hope, but that he is faythfull to performe all that he hath promised. Thus ye see to what point it behoueth vs to come. And besides this, we haue a good gage in our Lord Iesus Christ. For we see that all that euer God promised was warrated at such tyme as he gaue his only sonne to death, and rai- 20 zed him vp againe. Do we not then see a gage that ought to assure vs sufficiently? Besides this, God sealeth his promises in our harts by his holie Ghoste. Marke then what a goodly record this is: namely to haue our Lord himselfe speake to the end we might not doubt of his truth, but might boast to our selues, that what soeuer is con- teyned in his word, is altogether sure and deceytleffe vnto vs. Make (I say) marke the assurances which God giueth vs, and the goodes that he putteth into our hands to war- rant vs. Other pledge and assurance he will not haue vs to 30 demaund: and therefore let vs lerne to content our selues with that. This in effect is all that we haue to consider vpon this verse. But yet for all that, it behoueth vs to turne backe to that which I haue touched: that is to wit, that seing our Lord voutsafeth to handle vs so sweetly, and telleth vs that we must not be afrayd to come before his face: so much the more vnthankfulnes is in vs, if we desire to go to lawe with him. For must not a man be toto froward, when he refuseth to be iudged by God? Yes: & sith that God promiseth that euen when he vseth grea- 40 test rigour, yet will he not forget his goodnesse, too releue and maynteyne vs continually as he shall see needfull, and to giue a good and desirable end to all our afflictions: must not we needs be toto vnkynd if wee refuse such a benefite and priuiledge? So then there is no way for vs but to humble and present our selues at the iudgement seate of God, that we may be vphild by his grace. Now Job addeth: By cause thou hast couered their hart that they can haue no vnderstanding, thou wilt not exalt them. Here Job strengtheneth himselfe against those that vexed 50 him vnder the colour of comforting him. But we haue to remember what hath ben sayd: namely that Job bewrayeth all his affections, and so it is no woonder though he continue not all in one tale, but shift est into one matter and est into another, and so shewe himselfe variable. And vherfore is that? By cause he speaketh as in his com- bate. VVe knowe that when a man is fighting of a com- bate, he keepeth nor alwayes one countenance, but is sayne to traueise his ground, to fet a compasse about, to shift hands, to retire, and to auance forward, after as 60 his enimie preaceth vpon him or as he himselfe espyeth his owne aduantage. Euen so is it with vs when we fail to resisting of our temptations. Sometymes we stoupe to faue our selues, and sometymes wee giue backe too auoyd a blowe. After as God giueth vs respit, so take wee hart again, and are releued when it was likely we should haue ben ouerthrowen. The thing therefore that we see here in Job, is that now he taketh courage and sayth: Lord it is true that it is a corzie to mee to see my freendes become dalyers, and to doo nothing elle but vex mee: but yet must I not discomfot my selfe for all that. And why? For I see well they haue none vnderstanding, and therefore I must not take hold of them, seing there is no reason in them. If a bealt came running vpon mee, or if a dogge hild mee at a bay: I myght well vse fayre words to appeaze them, but it could not preuayle, for they vnderstand them not. So then, o Lord, I must not take it to hart when I heare the wandering talk of these men here. VVhy so? By cause thou haste couered their hart that they can haue no vnderstanding. And this is it that I haue touched already: namely that if we will comfort wretched folk in their afflictions: we must desire God to giue vs his spirit and wisdom to doo it withall. For our talk shall be vaine and vnprofitable, sauing so farre forth as he reacheth vs his hand: like as on the couarie part, we shal speake to edifying it he guyde vs. It is sayd that he couereth their hart, that they myght haue none vnderstanding: as if a man should say, he blyndfoldeth their eyes. For in the scripiture, this word Hart is sometymes taken for the mynd. In dede it is not taken so continually, for it is sometymes taken for a trueneesse, and for a pure conscience. But whereas it is sayd by Moyse, God hath not giuen you a hart too vnderstand, no not euen vnto this day: wee see that the word Hart is taken there for the 70 mynde. Euen so is it also in this sentence. Job therefore meeneth that God hath as it were blyndfolded the eyes of these men here which thought themselues verie wise, and that thereby they became as good as beastes. Now let vs marke what maner of men these freendes of Job were. It is euident by their talk that they were excellent men, and no fooies. For wee see they were men of experience, and men of greate wit, yea and it is sayd that God had sent them: And how then shall they do that scarcely haue one iote of wisdom? what shall become of them when it pleaseth God to blynd them? Again, if God do to blynd the wyse: let those that think them selues skilfull, and trust too their owne sharp witte, and pre- sume much vpon their owne policie, lerne too humble 80 themselues, knowing that God can so blynd their eyes, as they shall not see a whit at hygh nonedaye. Thus see ye a profitable lesson for such as take pryde in their owne wisdom, and think that nothing ought too passe but by their aduyce. VVhat shall become of them when God shall haue blynded them? Thus, the blynd wretches haue theyre eyes feeled vp that they ca discerne nothing, and what shall the end of them be? God will not exalt them: that is to say, he will put them to shame in the end. Now if this be verified of worldly things: what is to be sayd of the secretes of the heauenly kingdome, which do farre surmount al the wit of man? Behold, God blyndeth the eyes of the wyse euen in worldly affayres and in the things that cocerne this present life, insomuch that euen these that are mosse craftie, and of greatest wit, become like little babes, and doo fond deedes and are redye to fall downe at euery blowe. Men see this, And what is the cause? It is for that God hath couered their eyesight. And how shall we then doo when wee 90 must be faine to mount vp hygher to the wonderfull secretes which cannot be knowne, vnlesse God haue inlightened vs by his holy spirit. Hereby wee bee warned not to take offence, when we see the wyse men of the world haue no taste of the Gospell, nor of any poynt of the doctrine of Saluation. And why? It is not a disse whereof euery man may be his owne caruer: God must be sayne to woork there by his holie spirite. And that is a thing well worthie to be noted. For wee see manie

manie wretched weaklings at this day which rest themselves vpon this, that the wise men of the world cannot frame themselves to the Gospell. How is it (say they) that such a man, being a man of so greate reputation, saureth not of the Gospell? Yea and there needeth no alledging of some one man, but of whole Nations. For men will say, what? In such a Nation where there are so manie wyse heads, we see the Gospell is not receyued. As who should say, that the receyuing of the Gospell came of our owne towardnesse, and that we by our owne mother wit were able too comprehend what foeuer God sheweth vs in the holie Scripture. No. But cleane contrariwise it is sayd, that we be blinded in that behalf, and that all the wisdom of God is foolishnesse to mannes reason. Seing then that the cace standeth so, let vs not think it straunge, though such as presume too knowe themselves, be blynded after that sorte. And why? For God forsaketh them by reason of their pryde. And further he is no schoolemaister, but for the humble and litle ones. But these men will be greate ones: and are they then able to take any profit at all in Gods schoole? No So then seing we perceiue that God blindeth men after that sort, let vs for our part lerne not to trust in our selves, but to desire him to guyde vs by his holie Ghoste, and so too gouerne vs, as wee may see clearly in the middes of the darknesse of this world. Yea for his woord is the cresset that must serue too that purpose, as Sainct Peter discourseth. Although then that there bee nothing but darknesse in the world: yet shall wee be well guyded, if wee followe the doctrine of the holie scripture. But yet about all things God must bee fayne too inlyghten vs with his holie spirit, he must take away the kerchiefs wherewith Satan hath blyndfolded vs, and he must open our eyes. Seing then that it lieth in him only to do that, let vs craue that grace with all lowlinesse, vtterly distrusting in our selves. And more ouer let vs marke the saying that is added: Lord, seeing thou hast covered their eyes: thou wilt not exalte them. For when Iob sayeth that the blynd folk of whom he speaketh, shall not be exalted, he meeneth (as I haue told you before) that they shall bee confounded, and God shall laugh them to skorne, and make them a iestingstocke. Therefore let vs bee afrayd, least when we be destitute of Gods spirit and of the lyght which wee should receyue thereby, we be confounded in the end, and our Lord cause vs to be driuen forth headlong like wretched beastes, and so we fall intoo so manye irksome thinges, as every man be ashamed of vs, and yet in the meane whyle we ourselves perceyue not our owne shame. For behold how the world goeth with all those whom God hath giuen vpon too a lewde mynd: how that (as Sainct Paule sayeth in the first chapter too the Romanes,) when God hath bereft men of witte and reason, they shall no more discern aught at all. And in good fayth, wee see how the wretched idolaters cast themselves downe before a peece of wood to woorship it: and is not that a beastly thing? Yes verely. Howbeit when God hath blynded men after that sort, they must needs become stark beastes, and fall from euill too euill, and finally giue themselves ouer to so shamefull deedes, as they forgo all countenance [of honestie], and fall too woorking against nature, and to dooing of things which men would abhorre. If we would but looke vpon drunkards, which are as swyne, if we would looke vpon whorehunters which are so chafed with the fire of their owne lust, as they haue no more modestie nor honestie in them: ought we not to tremble at the sight thereof, knowing that all of them are the frutes of Gods vengeance, when he blyndeth men and sleeth vp their eyes in such sorte, as they be not able to see or discern aught any more? And yet is not this the last part of their confuzion. VVe must come to that which the prophet Esay sayeth. VVhen God hath spoken of his punishing and of his blynding of men: and vntill when (sayeth the prophet) vntill their Cities be beaten downe, theyr people destroyed, and nothing left vnconfounded. See what the frute is of this blynding of men. And therefore we must walk aduysedly in feare, and pray God that he will neuer suffer vs too haue our eyes so blyndfolded. Thus much concerning this sentence. Now Iob addeth, That he which telleth his frend flattering tales, shall haue the eyes of his children too fayle. Heere Iob speaketh according to the circumstance of the place. For we haue seene heretofore of what opinion his freendes were: namely that it myght be perceyued and iudged in this world, which be Gods chozen, and which be the reprobates. But that were as much to say, as there were no last iudgement wherunto any thing shuld be referued. For if we will esteeme of men according to Gods present handling of them here: what a thing were it? Ye see then it were a verye vntoward doctrine to iudge so. But Iob vseth this word Flatterie of set purpose: as if he shuld say, he that preacheth prosperitie too his freend, that is to say, he that shail say to a man, Gotoo, thou art happie, thou art beloued of God, for thou prosperest, thou liuest at thine ease, thou art riche, and in the fauour of the world: he (I say) that talketh after this sort, is cursed, so as the eyes of his children shall fall out: that is too say, he shall bee accursed, not only in his owne persone, but also in his offspring. And hereby we be warned first not to rest our selves vpon the prosperitie of this transitorie lyfe: for that will bring nothing but flatterie. Marke that for one point. And this lesson will greatly auantage vs, if we can practyse it throughly. It is sayd to be a flatterie when men rest wholly vpon the prosperitie of this transitorie and worldly life. And why? For they beare themselves in hand that they be beloued of God. And this was the cause of the ruine and destruction of the Sodomites. Lived they not in pleasure and ease, whyle their arrenement was a making in heauen? Verely that was the sentence that was giuen and pronounced against them in the persone of Abraham. Sixscore yeeres before the Flud, the world did so excede in delights and pleasures, as it seemed that God should no more haue any charge of men, and they were fore abashed at their suddayne surprizing when they doubted it not. So then it were a playne fallhood to esteeme Gods fauour by the present prosperitie. And therefore let vs not take occasion to flatter our selves for it, nor to say, O, God louerh and fauoreth vs, for he prospereth vs. I say let vs beware we beguyle not ourselves after that sort: for that will be but our confuzion. Thus ye see what this woord Flatterie importeth. And therewithall we haue to note, that it is to wretched a dealing, bothe for our selves and for our neyghbours, when we vse the sayd flattering. And why? For euery man dazeleth his owne eyes, and seeketh to lift vp himself against God, whē he is in prosperitie. And again we deceiue our freendes also. For we make them that are at their ease, to beleue that they bee as good as in Gods lap, and yet for al that, they be as it were in the gulf of hell, or verie nere it. Therefore it is not without cause that Iob doeth here pronounce such greuous punishment against those that preache prosperitie after that sort to their neyghbours. VVhat is to be done in effect? VVhē we be in prosperitie, let vs cheere vp one another too serue God, & to busie ourselves in yeelding him thanks for the goodnes that he sheweth vs. And whē we be in aduersitie, let vs take the promises that are giuen vs to comfort vs withall, and make them to serue our purpose. And therewithal let vs be alwayes redye to receiue aduersitie, notwithstanding that God do shew himself gentle and louing towards vs, I say let vs not cease to prepare our selues to chastizement, but let vs be willing too receyue the stripes of his hand, if it please him to handle vs rigorously. Furthermore let not our mynd be troubled too say, that God doeth handle men here according to their desertes. But whensoever he afflicteth vs, let vs vnderstand that he chastizeth vs for our finnes. And if he spare vs: let vs vnderstand that his meening is to drawe vs to him by gētlenesse. And so whatsoeuer betyde vs, Let nothing hinder vs to lift vp our heads cōtinually, to seeke our life and contentation in heauen and in the happie rest that tarieth for vs: And let it not greue vs to be afflicted here, seing our God calleth vs to the triumph that is purchased for vs by the death of our Lord Iesus Christ.

But let vs cast our selues flat before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele what his wrath is, in such wise by our aduersities, as we may not cease to taste alwayes his fatherly mercie, and too haue recourse too the same, so grounding and setting our selues therepon, as wee may neuer swaue from it, not douting but he will deliuer vs from all our afflictions in conuenient time, and ease vs of all our miseries: and that although we be pinched too the vttermoste as now, yet we shall bee fully dispatched of them when he hath bereft vs of this flesh, to make vs parttakers of all the benefits which he hath prepared for vs aloft in his heauenly glorie, where we shall triumph with our Lord Iesus Christ, according as he hath gone afore vs in the glorie of his resurrection. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only too vs but also too all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

6. He hath made mee a common byvvoord, and set mee to be an open gazingstocke.
7. Myne eye is dimmed vvith sorrowe, and all my limbes are as a shadowve.
8. The rightuouse vvill bee astonished at this, and the innocent shall lift vp himself against the hypocrite.
9. The rightuouse vvill hold his vvay, and he that hath cleane hands shall be strengthened.
10. All of you returne, turneye againe, for there is not one vvise man among you.
11. My dayes are glyded avway, myne enterprizes are past, and the thoughts of my hart, 12. Haueturned day into night, they haue offered mee darknesse for light that approached.
13. If I tarrie, the graue is my house, I shall make my bed in the dark.
14. I vvill say too the dust thou art my father, and to corruption thou art my mother and my sister.
15. VVhere is then myne expectation? and vvhat is it that my hope must looke for?
16. They shall go downe into the bottom of the graue: there vvee shall bee layed in the earth, or oure bed shall be in the dust.

Ob following the matter that he entered intoo afore, intendeth too shewe breely, that as in respect of his present state he is vtterly forlorne, and there is no remedie for his miseries. Seing the case is such, he must be faine to conclude, that if the talk of those that spake afore him be true, (that is to wit, that mē are delt with in this world according to their desertes, and that we must esteeme Gods grace or his loue or hatred according too the state of this present life) it shall not boote him at all to flee vnto God. Ye see then in effect what we haue to marke. And first of al it is sayd, that God hath made him as it were a mockingstocke, & that he was set to be a Gazingstocke, and for men too make tales of. For the second woord which he vseth (which I haue translated Gazingstocke) signifieth a Timbell. And marke here how some men haue thought that Job ment to compare heere his prosperitie with his aduersitie so greate and extreme as it was at that tyme, as if he had sayd, Heretofore I haue ben in greate triumph, and now God hath handled mee in such wise, as I see my self too bee a bywoord and a gazingstocke. True it is that in sted of Gazingstocke, some translate it Hel: and whereas I haue translated Open, it is before them, or in their sight. And so their opinion is that Job ment too say, that men had damned him as a wretched creature before the tyme. But when all is well considered, the playne meening is that which I haue touched. For it is but a repeating of one matter twyce, for the greater confirmation of it, according too the common custome of the holie Scripture. And therefore the thing that hee intendeth to set downe, is that inasmuch as God hath made him as a mirour of aduersitie, if we should esteeme men in Gods fauour or displeasure by the state of this present life: we should hold him for a forlorne persone. But yet for al that, he takes himself for none such, howbeit that he were not vtterly without feeling: but what infirmities soeuer he had in him, yet did he fight against them, and was sure & fully resolued, that God would at lēgh pitie him, & therefore hild his mouth as it were shet, vntill he sawe some end of his miseries. And in this respect he adeth, That the rightuouse shall be astonished at it, but yet neuerthelessse the innocent shall lift vp himself against the hypocrite, & the rightuouse shall hold on their wayes, and such as haue cleane bandes shall gather new strength too bee the more steadfast. In saying that the rightuouse shall bee astonished, Job meeneth that when wee see the aduersities that God sendeth too such as haue serued him and walked in his feare with a pure conscience: we think it straunge and are abashed at it. And in good soothe, we see it runnes in our mynd, that if God doo gouerne the world, it is good reason that he should spare good men and such as haue indeuered to walk purely before him, and that he should handle them as a father doeth his children. And if we see them afflicted extremely at Gods had: we imagin eyther that he hath turned his backe & wil not think vpo earthly things: or else that he passeth not how mē liue, nor how they behaue theselues. This then is the cause why we be oftētimes astonished at the aduersitie of rightuouse mē, when when God seemeth to shewe himself their enimie and they see nothing but signes of crueltie . And that is the cause why Iob speaketh of astonishment . Howbeit he sayeth, that yet neuerthelesse the innocents shall auance themselves about the hypocrites: that is to say, they shall not be so fore astonished, but they shal make a good winding vp. And there is not a sentence which we ought to mark better thā this. Why so? For we know by experiēce how hard it is for men to iudge a right of Gods dooings, as in respect of that which we see presently . For (as hath ben declared more fully already) god executes not his iudgements after such sort in this world, as that all things shuld be well ruled and nothing out of square . But contrariwise things are confounded, and if we see a wicked man punished, a ryghtuouse man is punished much more : and if wee see a good man prosper, a wicked man shall prosper double. Where are we whē we see such things? We be astonished, we be at our wits end, and (as they say) we knowe not which way to turne vs. So then if we iudge of present things by our naturall reason, we must needs be as it were rauished, and the holie scripture telleth vs we shall be so . And although God suffer vs too haue experiēce of it, yet hath he also voutsafed to warne vs by his woord, that our wits shall be troubled and as it were dazeled if we looke vpon things as they seeme too be now, and go no further . Therefore let vs mark well this sentence, where it is sayd that the ryghtuouse shall be astonished, when they see God afflicteth his children after that sorte. And in verie deepe there is this point also, that the crosse misliketh vs, according also as we terme all such things aduersities, as mislike vs, or are hard and comberfome . Now inasmuch as wee shunne afflictions after that sorte, needes must we be as it were caryed away with astonishment by reason of this gaynestrying that is in our nature, when we se that God afflicteth his children after that maner, and layeth vpon thē with great strokes. For whē we see that our Lord spareth not those whom he hath chozen to himself, and to whom he hath giuen the grace to walk purely in his feare and seruice : we doubt of our selues. I say that when we see that , we are inforced to be astonished. But what a thing were it if we had not lerned this lesson. We might be ouertaken with such a feare, as we should neuer returne intoo the ryght way again. Wherefore let vs take warning before the blow come. And whē we see good mē hādled roughly at Gods hād: let vs not therefore be offended and set all at randō. But let vs keepe our selues from tarying in that myre, and let vs vnderstand that it behoueth vs to passe further, and to come to that which Iob sayeth, and to folowe it: that is to wit, what soeuer come of it wee must not ceasse to lift vp our selues against the despizers of God. And hereby ye see wherein the faythful differ from the faythlesse. For they may seeme too bee bothe in like cace to the worldwarde . But what? Some there bee that are vtterly plundged ouer head and eares in this imagination, that God gouerneth not the world when he sheweth not himself as a iudge, but winketh at things, and specially when his children are oppressed without releef, wheras in the meane whyle the wicked haue their full scope, and the bridle layd looce vpon their necke, without any redresse of things. There are that rest vpon that point, and cannot rid their hands of that trouble and temptation. What behoueth it vs to do then? As a man that is in the myre must be fayne to wade out by force till he come to firme ground (as it is sayd in the fortieth Psalme): Euen so when we feele that the diuell goeth about to make vs sink intoo the deepest of the bottomlesse pit, and by that meanes would driue vs to despayre:

let vs streyne our selues, I say, let vs inforce our selues till we be come to the point that we haue wonne so much as to be able to say: yet will God neuer forsake his seruants, though they seeme to be oppressed (for so will it seeme in deeede) and that he sheweth not himself too be strong ynough to susteyne thē continually with his hand, and to make them feele at length that they be deliuered, and that after a woonderfull tashyon. Marke I say what our exercizes are: mark in what battells God intendeth to imploy vs. That is to say, when we see things confuz'd in this world, and are greued at it for a time. we must labour to releue our selues, vntill wee haue gotten the victorie of such temptations . And now Iob expresth more at full, that which he had touched breefly, saying, that the ryghtuouse shall hold on his way, and that he which hath cleane handes shall be strengthened. Behold a verie profitable lesson. For what causeth many men to step out of square, but bycause they would be recōpenced at the first day? And if God contēt thē not after owne their appetite: they think it labour lost to serue him, & that they ought not to take so much peynes, seing there is not more wages for the good than for the bad . So then, impacience causeth many men to be greued and turne backe, yea & lose their corage though they haue begon wel to folowe God . Wherefore let vs marke how it is sayd here, that the ryghtuouse may take some conceyt to disquiet them selues, seing that good men ceasse not to be persecuted, inso much that God see meth eyther too haue forgotten thē, or else to be become their aduersarie, seing he persecuteth them after that sort . But although the good men feele thēselues greued for a time, yet must they strengthen themselves again, vntill they haue cōcluded to hold on their way, that is to say, to continue throughout, and although they see the way wherthrough they must passe, to be full of thornes and bryers, so as thēy must be fayne to leape ouer hedges Rocks and Diches, yet must they not ceasse to continue in Gods seruice. For if that were not, what tryall and examination of our faith shuld there be? Were we as it were in a faire medow, that we might runne along the riuers side in the shadowe, & that there might be nothing but pleasure and ioy in in al our whole life: who could vaunt that he had serued God with good affection? But when God sendeth vs things cleane contrarie to our desire, and that we must be fayne one whyle to enter into a quamyre, another whyle to marche vpon rugged stones, and anotherwyle too be combered with bryers and thornes: whē we must be fayne to meete with hedges and diches, and to leape ouer them, and when we shall haue traueled a greate whyle, it shall still seeme that we haue gone verie little or nothing foreward, & yet we see no end of our iourney : behold, it is a troublesome temptatiō to vs that couet to walk according to Gods wil. And why so? Bycause we haue not vtterly renouced our selues. He that hath not yet lerned to tame his affections, and to subdue his will to the seruing of God, notwithstanding that it be hard for him to doo : knoweth not yet in good earnest what it is to liue well and faythfully. So thē let vs praetize that which is spoken here of holding on our wayes, that is to say, of knowing that if we be desirouse to rule our life according to Gods lawe, the way is verie difficult, & it wil not be doone without many lets and hinderances : and yet we must be firme and constant to hold on our way still. Now sith that God sendeth his children such tryall, that is to wit, that he suff'reth them to be in much vexation, and yet neuerthelesse they must hold still to their tackling: what shal be become of such as forsake the right way without vexing or troubling at al, as we see many mē doo? Behold our Lord is so graciouse vnto some, as to beare with thē in respect of their weaknesse: well, he handleth them after their owne nature, so as he sendeth them not any ouerstrong temptations: and yet they fayle not too go awrye as though they tooke pleasure in forsaking god wilfully. I pray you what would they doo if they were assayed with like temptation as Job speaketh of here? Then would the vnthankfulnesse that is in most men appeere. For how many are there that repine at God without any maner of distresse? If a man aske them why they doo it, or what temptation hath moued them to it: there is none other matter but bycause they be of so maliciouse and froward a nature, as they will needes be vtterly accursed. But let vs for our part be well aduized, that although the way wherby God will haue vs to passe, be full of greate hardnesse, and that we shall haue much a doo too steppe foorth the one pace, but we shall meete with some hard incounter: yet notwithstanding we must keepe on our way still, according to that which is shewed here. Howbeit forasmuch as that cānot be done, without gathering of new strength. Therefore Job addeth, that he which hath cleane hādes shall gather new strength. Now herby let vs note, first that there is in vs such feeblenesse, that if wee flatter our selues and become verie so soone as we know our selues to be weake, all that would serue God were quite vndone, and there should be no constancie nor stedfastnes in vs. And why? Let vs consider a little how frayle wee be, I meene euen those too whom God hath giuen some goode zele. Job speaketh not here of such as sticke onely to their naturall reason. He treateth of such as haue the spirit of God dwelling in thē, which haue already receyued such vertue from aboue, as they be disposed to well doing. Yet neuertheless euen such manner of men are frayle still, and find themselves so voyd of all strength, that if God presse thē, they knowe not where they be whē they shuld withstand any temptatiō. And therefore we haue neede to gather new strength, and we must not surinak though wee feele such weaknesse in our selues. And why? for when it is sayd that Gods childrē shall be strenghtened therby, we see that although we be weake, God beareth with vs and shaks vs not off for that. No verely, so we flatter not ourselues through hypocrisie as a number doo which fode themselves in their owne vices, saying, o I am a man, and what are we able too doo, when notwithstanding, they knowe they haue so many fleshly infirmities in thē. They beare themselves in hand that they are well discharged, by alledging the common and ordinarie vice that is in all men. But contrariwise it is sayd, that as oft as God maketh vs to feele our owne weaknesse, it is a warning too make vs lerne to seeke the remedie. Wherefore let vs beware of nurrishing our owne vices by selfflatterie, and let vs beware we seeke not fond excuses, wherwith many folk beguile themselves, weening that God will forgiue our faults, though we labour not to amend thē: but contrariwise let vs looke to gather strength. And where shall we get it? Certainly it is not to be found elfwhere than in God. Doo men then find themselves weake? Let them go seeke strength where the holie scripture telleth them that it is. It is sayd that God hath the spirit of strength and stedfastnesse in him. Do we then feare too be borne downe by temptations? are we afraid of swaruing? Let vs desire God to strengthen vs. Lo how the saythfull strengthen themselves, not with a vayne overweening as they doo which trust in their owne free will, chalending woonderfull things to themselves, and bearing themselves in hand that they be come to the compassing of their intent, whereas in the end they step aside, & it is well scene that there was nothing but vanitie in them. VWill we then be well strengthened? Let vs not presume vpon our owne ryghtuoufenesse, but let vs returne vnto God beseeching him too strengthen vs in such wyse by his holie Ghoſte, as the diuell may not be able to fell vs downe though he assaye vs with neuer so many battells. Lo what the lyfe of the saythfull is in effect: that is to wit, that they shall neuer bee without manye temptations: and specially that we be subiect to so many miseries during the tyme that we be in this earthly wayfaring, that such as indeuer too serue God best, ceasse not to be often ouerpressed with many inconueniences, and manye afflictions. But what for that? VVhē we be astonished, (as it cannot be but wee must think it straunge at the first brunt) let vs fight against such temptations, and let vs holde on in the right way without starting out of it. And although we fine much hardnesse in ourselues, let vs pray God to giue vs such an inuincible strength, as we may continue in his seruice euen to the end, notwithstanding that Satan labour too thrust vs out of it. Job speaketh purposely heere of such as haue cleane hands. Surely the true purenesse consisteth in the hart, or at least wile the hart is the place where it taketh his roote. For it were nothing woorth though our life were more perfect and more Angellyke than a man could wish, except we had a pure and rightmending mynd to serue God. A man may well withhold himself from woorking euill, he may forbear to do any bodie wrong or harme, he may refreyne from giuing folk cause too complayne of him, or too cast any thing in his teethe. But if his hart bee inflamed with vaynglorie, if he bee atteynted with hypocrisie, if he be selfwilled, or if he be infected with any other vice secretly: all his whole state is but filthinesse, yea though it bee neuer so hyghly commended of men. Thus ye see why I sayd that wee must begin at our mynd, as hath ben shewed heretofore not only in this chapter but also in diuers other places. But now Job hauing spoken of the rightuouse and of the innocent or soundmending man which is matched against the hypocrite, addeth the partie that hath cleane hands. So then it standeth vs in hand too haue this inward soundnesse before God: but yet moreouer, we must also shewe by our deedes that wee bee such as we seeme. And why? For wee see that such as are full of naughtinesse and vtter despyzers of God, are more bold to brag of themselves, than those that are the best Christians, with whom no man can find fault. Too bee short, now adayes if a man will haue faire protestations, he must seeke out the wickeddest sort, for those are they that are puffed vp with self estimacion, inso much that they come foorth like shamelesse harlots of the Stewes, with, who am I? who cā find any fault in me? And yet the verie babes can descerne of their life, for it is so abominable that the verie ayre stinks of it. By reason herof it is purposely sayd, that if we intend to shewe that we be found afore God: our hands must also be pure and cleane: that is too say, wee must liue after such a sort among men, as our doings may shewe the feare of God that is within vs. Too be short, ye see in what wise it behoueth vs to yeeld record of the goodnesse of the roote. For if a man should say vnto vs. This is a good tree: and yet it appered not that the frute which it beareth is good, where were the goodnesse of it? Verely the frute that comes of it shal neuer be good except the roote & the nature of the tree be good. But yet must we yeeld frute (as I sayd) if we intend to shewe truly that we haue the sayd right & sound meening in our harts, & that we studie to serue God. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to remember in this sentence. And now Job addeth, turne ye, turne ye (say-ye (sayeth he) for there is not a wise man among you. His speaking so, is to disproue the talk that had bē ministred by those thre that had discoursed with him, (as we haue herd heretofore) to shewe that he was a man forsaken of God, and that there was nothing but cursednesse in him, bycause they sawe him so persecuted. Iob hath shewed, that iudgement must not be giuē by the aduersities that are seene in this present life, to say that a man is forsakē of God. Marke well that point. Afterward he sayth again, that God doeth not alwayes punish men for their sinnes, and that the good men are sometimes afflicted and nomā knowes why: the reason therof appereth not. Inquire a mā neuer so much, & trauell he neuer so much, yet shal he be neuer the neerer, bycause Gods iudgemēt is secret and incōprehensible. Now forasmuch as Iobs freēds cōceiued no such thing, he sayth there is no wisdom in them. And certesse (as we haue sayd afore) it is no small point of wisdom to discern aright of the afflictions that God sendeth vpon men. I say, when a man in his owne case is visited by the hand of God, it is a greate wisdom in him, if he haue skill to know his owne sinnes, and can enter into himself, and hūble himself, and acknowledge, Behold here is a right profitable medicine for mee, God knew such a vice in me, and he hath doone me the grace that I know it, and therefore must I now apply it wholly to myne owne vse. By this meanes he shal knowe how too profit himself greatly by Gods corrections: & besids this, although he know not precisely why he is afflicted, nor be able to lay his finger vpon it: yet it shal be wisdom for him to conclude, VVell Lord, thou knowest priuie diseases in me, though I haue done amisse and perceiue it not my self, thou Lord knowest it. For thou art the true phisician: giue me the grace that when I am smitten by thy hand, I may alwayes take good by thy correction and discipline. Yea and albee it a man perceyue that God doeth not in any wise punish his sinnes: yet must he neuertheless humble himself so farre as to say, Alas Lord I know not wherefore thou doest it, but sure I am that thou art ryghteous, and it is ynough for mee though thou doo it but to make mee to forget the world, to drawe mee the more to thyself, to make mee taste of the heauenly life, and to restreyn me that I be not giuen to any worldly delights. Then if a man be so skilfull as to know how to apply Gods chastyzings to his owne instruction, surely it is a point of greate wisdom: and we shall haue profited greatly all the time of our life, when wee once come to that point. As much is to be sayd of the corrections that God sendeth to our neyghbours. VVhen we see a mā so smittē, we may suppose that he is chastized for his sinnes. Yea truly if we haue knowne him too be a despyzer of God, or a disordered persone: then is it good too think that God punisheth him for the same cause. But we must not iudge our neyghbours, least the same come home by vs again immediatly. After what sort? now my God, if thou punish such a one, shalt not thou much more punish mee? And wheras thou haste giuen me the grace to haue some desire to serue thee, Lord I am so much the more bound vnto thee. But if thou list to chastize mee I must indure yet more, for I am woorse than he. All this geere must come to our remembrance. Againe: when we see him punish one mānes whoredome, another mānes drūkenesse, a third mannes blasphemie, and some othermēnes robberies, guilefulnes, or periurie: well, we must alwayes profit our selues by all such things, according also as S. Paule sayeth that they be peynted tables wherin God sheweth vs how fore he hateth and abhorreth all vnrightuoufnesse, and how it behoueth vs to make our owne gayne by othermēnes losses, as it is sayd in the prouerb. And furthermore let vs not be ouer rigorous, whē we see God smite such folk as haue not ben detected of any such greate and vnmesurable misdoings, as we might say, behold yonder naughtipacks, behold yonder despyzers of God. But if there be a man that hath had some infirmities, and yet shall haue shewed some signes of vprightnes, if we see him in greate aduersitie, we must say, well, God knoweth why he afflicteth his poore creature, but yet must we haue pitie and compasison on him. And here ye see why Dauid sayeth, Blisfed is the man that can iudge aright of him that is in aduersitie: that is too wit, when we can beare with Gods seruants and children whē we see them oppressed with aduersitie: and can pitie thē, and be gentle to them, and not cōdemne them by hooke or by crooke, assuring our selues that men may condēne vs double, if the like rigour should bee vsed against vs. Then is it not without cause that Iob doeth here reprocue his freēds, of finding no wisdom in them, bycause they iudged at randon of his aduersities. Herby we be warned, that to be well taught in Gods schoole, and to get a true wisdom that may be to our welfare: it behoueth vs too apply our mindes to the considering of Gods iudgemēt in this world, as well vpon ourselues as vpon our neyghbours, and to beate vpon that point early and late. For when a man indeuereth himself to put that in vre, surely the time is well employed. And why? For the cheef point of the doctrine that God bringeth vs, is that wee should apply his iudgements to our owne vse, and be edified by them in his leare. Therefore when we procede after that maner, surely there is perfect wisdom in vs. But without that, we may haue all the shewe of wisdom that can be deuised, we may discourse curiously vpon the holie scripture, we may bring many faire allegacions: but yetal shall be but vanitie till we be come to the point that wee can iudge aright of that which our Lord requireth of vs, when he sendeth vs chastizements and afflictions. And hervpon, to conclude his matter, Iob sayeth, that his dayes are passed, his thoughts vanished, and all his enterprizes broken of and disappointed, and that he had had darknesse in stead of the light, and when he thought that the day sprang, he had nyght. To be short, he sheweth vs that there was no end at all of his miseries, and that there was no hope that euer he should continue as touching the present life. And for this cause he addeth, Then sayd I to rottemesse thou art my father, and vnto the dust, thou art my moother and my sister. As if he should say, It is not for me to regard eyther kinde folk or freendes any more here bylowe. For God hath hidden me from them, and cut me of from the rank and cōpanie of the liuing. I am like a wretched carion, and I must not looke to returne again, to say that any creature can ease me, That matter is out of all question, & so am I vtterly dispatched, there is no more remedie in my case. What is mine expectation? I haue no more (sayeth he): when I haue looked vp and downe, I must go downe into the pit, and my bed must be bylowe: that is to say, in deathe, whatsoeuer I hope for, or howsoeuer I build: for the newbrew woord that Iob vseth may come of building. And it is a verie fit similitude when he speaketh of hope or expectation, and yet neuertheless hath an eye to this building. There was a doubtfulnesse in the woord as in respect of the signification. Therefore it is all one as if he had sayd, Although I be patient and prolong my miserie continually: yet remayneth there nothing for mee but the graue. And he likeneth this expectation of his too a building. I may well build (sayeth he) in thinking there is still some hope left for me: but shal I speede euer the better? No (sayes he). VVhen I haue builded my best, I shall haue none other house but my graue. It seemeth that Iob speaks here as a man that had no more taste of the heauenly iſſe, nor wiſt what Gods mercie ment. But it behoueth vs too conſider too whom he telleth his tale. True it is that heretofore when he was in his finnes, and diſputed againſt God, he ſhewed wel that he had terrible conceits, which notwithstanding he reſiſted. But after he hath treated of the finnes that he felt, he ſheweth what the folie of them is, which would haue Gods fauor to vtter it ſelf [vncchaungeably] in this preſent life, vpon the good and faithful, and that if God ſhewe not himſelf merciful here in the open face of the world towards thoſe that are his, it ought to be concluded that he hath forſaken them, and they be vtterly paſt hope of recouerie. Iob mocketh at this geere. So then, he telleth his tale to ſuch as would ſee mennes full payment in this tranſitorie and decaying life. But it were an ouerthroward doctrine to iudge ſo, (as I haue declared alreedy.) Wherefore let vs mark that Iob is not here as a mā in deſpayre: but he reprobueth the folie of ſuch as ſayd they were his freendes, and yet would make him beleue that euen here in this world wee ſhall ſurely perceiue whether we be in Gods fauour & grace, or whether we be forſaken of him. For the better cōprehending hereof, let vs looke vpon the argument that S. Paule maketh, when he intendeth to aſſure vs of the laſt reſurrection. VVe are (ſayeth he) the wretcheddeſt of al men on the earth. Let a man compare the Chriſtians with the deſpyzers of God, with the heathen folk, with the hypocrits, and with all them that ſpyte God to the full, & ſee which of thē are beſt intreated. It is certaine, that take one with another, a man ſhall ſee more proſperitie in thē that are giuen to all euil, than he ſhall doo in them that walk in the feare of God. And why? For as our Lord is nere vnto vs and watcheth ouer vs, ſo if we do amiſſe he amēdeth it: as a man will haue more care to correct his children thā his neyghbours. God therefore, to ſhewe the loue that he beareth vs, chaſtizeth vs whē he ſeeth vs do amiſſe. Again he intendeth too proue our obedience as good reaſon is he ſhould: and he intendeth too ratifie our fayth. For faith is ſo preciouſe a thing, that it deſerueth to be tried as gold and ſiluer, or rather more, as S. Peter telleth vs. And moreover we knowe that the diuell ceaſeth not to praize all that is poſſible againſt vs: and after as he ſeeth vs heedfull in the ſeruice of God, ſo much the more is his rage ſet on fire. Alſo looke how many wicked folk there are, ſo manie enemies haue we, and Satan ſerueth his turne by them to trouble vs. Therefore we muſt not maruell though Gods children be moſt miſerable in this world. And S. Paule vſeth the ſelfſame argument to ſhewe that we looke for a better ſtate. Sith that mē ſhake vs of (ſayeth he) ſith they treade vs vnder their feete, ſith we be a reproche and laughing ſtocke to the whole world: in what caſe were we if we hoped not for the reſurrectiō that is promiſed vs, that our Lord Ieſus Chriſt muſt come and that thē we ſhall perceiue we haue not ſerued God in vayne. If we had not this, there were no more God in heauen, there were no more Iuſtice, there were no more providence. Ye ſee then how S. Pauls argument muſt ſerue vs as a keye to open this text. Ye ſee mee (ſayth Iob here) as a man paſt hope. VVhen I haue made all my windlaſſes, I muſt be fayne to come to the graue, there is my lodging, I ſee nothing but rottenneſſe round about mee. Sith it is ſo, will ye make mee beleue that God doeth handle men here beneath theſe after as he doeth loue them or hate them? For as for mee, I knowe I haue induced too ſerue God and I am not diſappointed of myne expectatiō. Yet do I ſee my ſelf handled as roughly as may be, euery man looks a ſkew at mee, I am as a gazing ſtocke and a cōmon byword. VVhat remaineth thē?

Eyther I muſt burie all the benefits and priuiledge that God hath giuen mee, and caſt them quite away: or elſe I muſt conclud that God mocketh and abuſeth his ſeruants, and that it is in vaine for thē to truſt vnto his promiſes. And would ye haue me to fall into ſuch a wickedneſſe? Then ſith the caſe ſtandeth ſo, let vs vnderſtād that we muſt not iudge of Gods loue or hatred by the things that we ſee now. But let vs procede further, and conſider that God loueth thoſe whom he ſcourgeth, and keepeth the taſte of his goodneſſe in ſtore for them, though it be hidden from thē for a time, whē he ſheweth nothing but vtter rigour againſt them. Therefore let vs comfort ourſelues in it and ſay, yet will I hold ſtill this hope cōtinually, that my God will at length pitie mee, and that I ſhal perceiue him to be my father. And although I haue happened to liſt vp my ſelf againſt him for a tyme, yet wil I ſtill returne to the ſayd concludiō. VVe ſee thē what maner of doctrine we haue to gather of this ſentence for our better edifying: that is to wit, that we muſt take all the miſeries of this preſent life (and ſpecially all thoſe which we ourſelues feele and which we ſee in al Gods children) as an opē declaratiō that God reſerueth much better things for vs: and the ſame muſt be a cauſe to confirme vs in the hope of the heauenly life as we now ſee that Paule ſpeaketh in the ſecond to the Theſſalonians. For in reherſing that they had ſuffered many things, and had ben vexed by the wicked: It is (ſayeth he) an euident tokē of Gods iuſt iudgement, for it is a reaſonable thing and agreeable to his nature, to giue you releef when ye haue ben ſo oppreſſed [and theſe] aſſure yourſelues that ſeing you haue not had your reſt vpon earthe, God prepareth it for you in heauē. Again on the other ſide if it be a thing that ſtandeth vpon Gods Iuſtice, that the wicked ſhuld be puniſhed according to their deſerts, and yet notwithstanding we ſee it not doone in this world: aſſure yourſelues, that in your aduerſities, troubles and miſeries, God doeth as it were in a glaſſe ſhewe you, that you ſhall oneday come vnto him: and that alſo is the verie thing wherynto your hope muſt be referred. So then as long as wee be in this world, if God ſend vs neuer ſo much pouertie and tribulation, let vs lerne to be drawn to the hope of the heauenly life. VVhen we ſee good folk and Gods ſillie children roughly handled, laughed to ſcorne, their pacience abuſed, and themſelues left ſuccorleſſe: I ſay whē we ſee al this, let vs vnderſtād that God declareth, that although things be confuzed in this earthly life: yet muſt wee not therefore runne out of ſquare, but looke further afore vs, how wee muſt not neſtle ourſelues in this world, nor in theſe corruptible things, but only paſſe through thē, and right ſwiftly and as it were a full gallop. Furthermore if god ſpare vs, let vs acknowledge that he pitieth vs, & that his interteyning of vs in reſt, is to giue vs ſome taſt of his goodneſſe. But ſpecially he will haue the ſame too ſerue for the time to come, to the intent we ſhould lerne to be the bolder to truſt in him, not doubting but he will deliuer vs from all the battells and aſſaults of this world, too make vs partakers of all the benefits which he hath prepared for ſuch as come willingly to ſhroude themſelues vnder the ſhadowe of our Lord Ieſu Chriſte.

Now let vs caſt ourſelues downe before the face of our good god with acknowledgemēt of our finnes, praying him to make vs ſo to feele them, as we may returne to him vnfeinedly, & in returning come with true fayth and repentance, deſirouſe to be rid of all the vices & corruptions of our fleſh, not douting for all that, but that our Lord will alwayes behold vs with pitie, and receiue vs to mercie, for his ſake whom he hath giuen vs to be our mediator. And ſo let vs all ſay, Almighty God, &c.

Then Bildad the Suite answered, saying:

2. VVhen vvill yee make an ende of your vvoordes? Herken and let vs speake.
3. VVherefore are vvee counted as beafts, and (in your opinion) are dullardes and of no value?
4. This man teareth his ovvne soule in a rage: shall the earth bee forsaken for thy sake? Shall the Rockes bee remoued out of their places?
5. Verely the light of the vvicked shall bee quenched, and the sparke of their fire shall not shine.
6. His light shall bee dimmed in his tent, and his lampe that shyneth vpon him shall be put out.
7. His steppes shall bee restreyned, and his ovvne deuce shall cast him dovvn.
8. For a net is spred out vnder his feete, and he shall vvalke vpon Snares.
9. The Grinnes shall catch him by the heele, and the Theeues shall come vpon him.
10. His pitfall is hidden in the earth, and his trappe in his vvay.

Haue tolde you heretofore howe it is a true & very profitable doctrine, 20 that God punisheth mens faults too shewe himselfe to be our iudge: to the same be vnderstood and handled skilfully. And hereby wee see howe it is not ynough too take some poynt of holy Scripture in generall: but that we must so apply it to our vse, as wee may fare the better by it. Also experience sheweth what a number there are that abuse the holy Scripture by tosing things too and fro and by taking them at all aduenture. That which they speake is 30 true, so it were well applied. But what? They turne it cleane contrarie too the meening of the holy Ghost: and so is the truth vtrerly corrupted. The selfe same thing doth Bildad here a new. For he undertaketh that which he had spoken afore: namely that although the wicked prosper for a time, yet shall they be confounded in the ende, and God will not suffer their prosperitie to last for euer. This is true: But therewithall he passeth measure, by vpholding that the punishments which God sendeth vpon the wicked, are alwayes so full and apparant, 40 as me may finally discern by eyesight that God iudgeth them in this present life: whereas contrary wise, that is not alwayes seene, nother must wee make a generall rule of it. Lo wherein Bildad is ouerseene, yea notwithstanding that the doctrine of it self be good and holie. And so although that at the first blush there seeme to be no harme in it: yet if wee be once throughly perswaded of it, (that is too wit, that God punisheth all wicked men so as it is seene too the eye) greate daunger will insue of it. For 50 prooffe thereof, if things fal out contrarie to our expectation, it will seeme vnto vs that God is no more the iudge of the worlde, that he hath giuen vp his office, and that things are ruled here by fortune. And that is a cursed blasphemie. Herevpon wee shall bee tempted with such impatiencie, that we shall stomacke when we see that God setteth not a stay in things disordered. And finally wee shall be prouoked to giue our selues to all naughtinesse. For we shall thinke it but lost time that is spent in doing good, seeing that God hath no regard of men, to guide them, but leaueth them as it were at randon. To be short, 60 so little shall wee be able to call vpon him, that we shall be vtrerly estranged from him. And so vnder the shadowe of a good doctrine, Bildad turneth all Religion and all feare of God vpside downe, and setteth men in state of despayre. Thus yee see why I sayde that it standeth vs greatly on hand to desire God to giue vs skill to apply to our owne profite and edifying the things that wee reade in the holie Scripture, and what foecer els is shewed vs at all times concerning his iudgements. First of all Bildad is greeued that he was not herkened too, and for that his sayings were not receyued. Verely if he had taught faithfully and to purpose, he had had iust cause to be displeased. And why? For if wee be appoynted to beare abroad Gods woorde and doctrine of saluation, and see that the men which heare vs are hardened, or else hold scorn of the thing that we tell them: surely if wee haue any zeale to Godward, and reuerence his woorde, we must needes be grieved and sorie [at the hart.] And why? For that despyte toucheth not vs, but the liuing God whose messengers wee be. Therefore he that serueth God faithfully in carying abroad his woorde, must be sorie if his labour profite not, sith that men do wrong vnto God in not receyuing his woorde. And on the other side we must (as much as in vs lieth) procure the health of mennes soules. For wee see that men go to destructio bicaufe they giue not care vnto God. And when they be so headstrong against good counsell, beholde they are vtrerly vndone. Ought not this (say I) to vex vs at the hart? Then if Bildad had taught as he ought to haue done: he had had iust cause to complayne of men for not hearing his tale. But 40 for asmuch as he corrupted the truth, and turned it into a lie: there is no reason he should be grieved. Notwithstanding, whensoever any man offereth vs any doctrine, we bee warned hereby to discern what is in it, and not to reiect the thing that wee knowe not, as wee see some do, which make no great matter to reiect all, if a man go about to shewe them that which is for the health of their soule. Therefore lette vs not haue any such pryde in vs. For wee shall not onely greeue the men that seeke our 50 welfare and are willing to do vs seruice: but wee shall also grieve the spirite of God that dwelleth in them and giueth them the loue to edifie vs and to offer vs that which is good and conuenient for vs. Yee see then howe we haue neede to beware of despising that which is offered vs, till we know what is in it. Furthermore when Bildad doth here vpbrayde Iob, that he teareth his soule as in a rage: thereby we be warned (as I haue touched afore) that when men martyr themselues in their passions, they gayne nothing by it but that they plundge themselues still more 60 and more in their miserie, which shall also returne vpon their owne head. True it is that the man which is in aduersitie thinkes himselfe well eased by his murmuring, by his storming, and by his stomacking, specially if he belke out some blasphemie against God. Lo (I say) how men would fayne wreake themselues when God holdeth them in aduersitie. But what? Do they further their case by it in the ende? No: Cleane contrary wyze they do nothing else but rende their owne soules, yea euen furiously, riously, as it is sayd in this streyne. The very Heathen mē had skill ynough too say, that a mans choler is a burning and headie furiofnesse. Now when a man cannot submit himselfe to God in his aduerfite, but sharpeneth himselfe still more and more: I pray you is it not all one as if he were starke madde? Is it not al one as if he would stande againſt God? I say not that wee should be vtterly without paffions when God fendeth vs any aduerfities. But if our affections be vnbryled and vnruely, and ferue to kindle vs and to spurre vs foreward againſt God, ſo as we be full of bitterneſſe: then muſte it needes followe that we be poſſeſſed with furie, (as I haue ſayd alreadie) ſceing we come to iuſtly after that fort againſt God. And durſt the creature do ſo if he were not bereft of his right wittes and reaſon? No ſurely durſt he not. Then ſee ye a text which we ought to marke well. For although Bildad do miſapply it to the perſone of Iob: yet is the ſentence true in it ſelfe, and ought to ſerue our turne in aſmuch as we ſee that impacencie is a kinde of madneſſe in a man. And what is meant by Impacencie? It is not ſimply a greef conceyued of the milkyking of our aduerfities when wee be werie of them: but it is an exceſſiue hartburning or ſtomacking againſt thē, when we cannot ſubmit our ſelues ſimply vnto God to diſpoſe of vs at his pleaſure. Therefore if our paffions be ſo vnruely as we can not keepe any meaſure in our aduerfities: then doth impacencie ouermaſter vs. And if we haue no hold nor ſtay of our ſelues, we muſt needes cōclude that we are no better than frenlike folke againſt God, yea and vtterly out of our wittes. True it is that we will not confeſſe it to be ſo: but for ſo much as the holie Ghōſt hath auouched it, would wee haue a more competent iudge? And if we looke well into our ſelues, there is nothing in this text, which very experience ſheweth not to be too too true. So then let vs aſſure our ſelues that he which hath the power to brydle his affections and to hold them ſhort, hath gotten great wiſdome. And vndoubtedly, to the ſelf ſame purpoſe alſo S. James ſayeth that if any man want wiſdome, let him aſke it of God. And why? For (he had ſpoken afore of patiece) my friends ſayeth he, when ſo euer God aſſiſteth you, & that you light into tēptations, aſſure your ſelues it is for your profit and welfare. Yet ſolloweth it not but that the ſame may ſeeme ſtraunge, and few men ſhall agree ther-vnto: But if a man haue neede of wiſdome let him reſort vnto God. As if he ſhould ſay. It is true that mans minde will neuer thinke that al tēptations and aduerfities are benefits of Gods procuremēt towards vs: & the fault is bicauſe we be miſaduifed & know not what is expedient for vs. VVhat is to be done then? For aſmuch as we wāt wiſdome, ſpecially when our paſſiōs ouermaiſter vs, & trouble our mindes: let vs repayre vnto God: for he can well ſkill how to ſupplie our wants. Thus ye ſee what we haue to gather vpo this ſentence: namely, that we muſt applie our indeuer to bridle our affectiōs, that wee bee not in to great a choler when God aſſiſteth vs: aſſuring our ſelues that if we take it patiently, God wil turne al to our profit and welfare. Contrarywiſe if we ſtomacke matters, and wil not aſſwage our miſeries with the comfort that God giueth vs: what will be the end of thē? Euen ſuch as Bildad ſheweth here: that is to wit, wee ſhall but teare our owne ſoules, as we ſee a wretched madman do: he flings himselfe into the fire, he leapes out of windowes, and he hurteth one whyle himselfe and another whyle othermē, when the fit of his frenzie taketh him. Euē ſo ſhal we do when we be caried away by our choler. For we wil make no bones to ruſh out of ſquare againſt God, not remembering a whit, that all ſhall turne to our owne confuſion. Therefore we haue neede to wey well this doctrine: that is to wit, that we teare not our owne ſoules, but learne to referre our ſelues wholly to Gods good will, that he may do to vs what it pleaſeth him. Thus ye ſee in effect what wee haue to beare in minde. By and by after, it is ſayde: Shall the world be chaunged for thy ſake? Shall the Rockes be remoued out of their place. Some expound this ſentence very curiouſly, thus: Shall the world, that is to ſay, ſhall the order that God hath ſet and ſtabliſhed, be chaunged? And Shall the Rocke, that is too ſay, ſhall God which is the ſtrength of the world, [bee remoued out of his place]? But theſe are things to much racked. Bildad ment too ſpeake more ſimplie: namely that Iob in his talke peruerted the order of nature. That in effect was the thing that he ment. And why? For Bildad had ſet downe, that aſſoone as God had made heauen and earth, and ſettled the naturall order that wee ſee, it behoued alſo that his iuſtice ſhould haue his courſe. This is very true. Howbeit he miſtaketh it, in that he would haue Gods iuſtice to be altogether apparant, ſo as men might know it and behold it with their eyes and as it were touche it with their finger: wherein he beguyleth himselfe. Neuertheleſſe it is good to vnderſtand his meaning, that wee may gather the inſtruction which is conteyned in it. His ſaying is, Shall the world bee chaunged for thy ſake? That is too ſay, How vnderſtadeſt thou it? For thou reaſoneſt that God doth not ſo execute his iuſtice here by lowe, as it may be knowne. And would not God haue his iudgemēt knowne forthwith frō the time that he had ſtabliſhed this order in the heauen, the ayre, and the earth? when wee behold Gods workes both aboue and beneath, is it not to the end that his goodneſſe, his wiſdome, his rightfuſneſſe, and all his vertues ſhould be knowne? Yes out of all queſtion. To what end hath God ſet out ſo fayre a looking glaſſe in all his creatures? Is it not to the ende too be glorified at our hand? Now ſith it is ſo, like as God vttereth his vertues in all the reſt, ſo alſo wil he haue vs priue to his iudgemēt. This is true in ſome reſpect: that is too wit, ſo it be vnderſtood as it ought to be. But Bildad ſtretcheth it out to generally. VVhat is to be done then? As oft as any man ſpeaketh to vs of God, let his workes which he ſheweth vs & are neereſt vnto vs, leade vs continually higher vnto him. As for example. The Scripture ſpeakes oftentimes to vs of that which we ſee daily: that is to wit, that God fendeth rayne & fayre wether, maketh the earth to yeeld fruite, and cauſeth it to nurriſh vs. Now it is not ynough for vs to know that rayne & fayre wether come of God, and that when the earth yeeldeth vs foode, it is through his grace. True it is that thoſe are the fundacions: but yee muſt we go further, and mount vp higher: that is to wit, that if God giue ſuch power to the earth, it muſt much rather needes follow that we receyue our ſtrength of him: for we be much nobler creatures. Is not the life that is in vs a far greater & excellenter thing, than the power that the earth hath to yeeld fruite? Yes certainly is it. Then behoueth it vs to acknowledge, that the ſame is one of gods workes, and that it proceedeth from him. Againe of God haue a care to feede men in this world: thinke we that he which is a father in that behalf, and vouchſaueth to haue regarde of our bodies which are but wretched carkaſes, doth not make much more account of our ſoules? Alſo, if after the caſting of ſeede into the earth and the rotting of it there, he cauſe it to ſpyre againe and to beare fruyte anew: can he not reſtore vs to a better lyfe though wee go to corruptiō, ſeing he ſheweth ſuch power in the order of nature? Beſides this, God keepeth a ſtedie hande in making the Sunne to ryze & go downe every day. More- over the moone finiſheth hir circuite every moneth, and the ſunne every yeere, and we ſee the orderineſſe of the ſtars starres and the planets. Now then, as oft as wee beholde these things, we mult conclude that God is throughstedfast in his truth, and that he giueth vs some instructions and signes therof here. VVhen we see such a constancie settled in the order of nature: what shal we thinke of the promises that belong to our saluatiō, which is no corruptible thing nor subiect to the alteracions and chaunges of the world? Lo how the holy Scripture trayneth vs higher and higher by those workes of God that are neereft and most familiar to vs. Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs also to haue skill to discern betuene Gods workes as neede requireth. As how? Ye see how Bildad is vtterly cōfounded in his owne matter. For he sayeth that bicause God hath created the world in settled order, and maynteyneth it in the same: therfore it foloweth that his iudgements are al certeyne, & that men may see them and know them. But that is an ill cōsequēce. VVhy? Gods wil is that the sunne should rize and go downe, and therby we be assertyned that he wil giue vs al things necessary for the preferuatiō of our life, euen to the worldes ende. VVhen we see the vines, the trees, & the earth yeelde fruite, well, God sheweth vs that he hath a care of this present life, notwithstanding that it be flightful & drooping. But his so doing is as it were to take vs by the hand to lift vs vp to heauē vnto himself. God thē wil haue vs to know this most certenly, & so cōmaundeth vs: but astouching his iudgements, that is another care. For it is his minde, that wee should haue but only a tast of thē in this life, & that we should wayte with paciēce till he shew thē to the ful in the latter day. For then shall the things be set in order which are nowe out of order: & vntil then, God wil not execute his iudgements but in part. And so the cōclusiō that Bildad maketh here, is not good nor conuenient. For he mingleth two things togither, betuene the which there is great diuersitie. VVherfore it behoueth vs to vse discretiō in this behalfe. Now we vnderstād how this sentence is true, & yet misapplied. This sentēce is true, inasmuch as the order of nature teacheth and cōseleth vs to seeke the things that are higher, that is to wit, to knowe the wisdome, rightuoulnesse, goodnesse, and truēnesse of God: not only in things that cōcerne this transitorie life, but also in things that pertayne to the euerlasting kingdome of heauē. And if we do it not, our vnthākfulnesse is too heynous & shal not be excused. For ought not the vynes to put out our eyes? ought not the riuers, the fields, & al other like things to do the same, wherein God sheweth & representeth himself vnto vs? If we cōceyue not that: must not our blindnesse, (that is to say, our perishing in our owne ignorāce) needes be wilfull? But now let vs come to that which is spoken here. Verely the light of the wicked shall be quenched, and the lampe that shyneth vpon his head shall be dimmed: there shall not remayne one sparke of his fire. By such similitudes Bildad ment to signifie in effect, that God wil not suffer the wicked to prosper for euer. Howbeit we must marke well that it is very true, that God will giue the wicked leaue to liue at ease for a time, and to triūph and ruffle it out, as though they had fortune in their hande. If Bildad had bene ware of this poynt: he would not haue locked vp himself so streytly as he doth afterward. And why? He graunteth here that the wicked may sometimes prosper. VVherin is it then that he ouerhooteth himselfe? It is in that he foresetteth the time and in maner the day that their prosperitie should take an end, & God should turne their laughter into weeping. But it is not for vs too apoynt that. And why? God may sometimes leade forth the wicked in prosperitie eue to his graue so as the world shall see it, as I haue partly touched: that is too wit, they shall go downe into the graue without trouble in the turning of a hand, according also as it is sayd in the Psalme. Beholde (sayeth Dauid) Gods children drag their lynes and cordes, they do but pyne away here bylowe, it seemeth that death pursueth them, and yet notwithstanding will not take them away. But how fare the wicked? They be lustie and strong, and die ere they be aware. Sith it is so, let vs marke well, that it is not for vs to set God any terme, to say that he should quenche the light of the wicked in this world, & thrust them into darknesse, that is to say, into confusion. VVe cannot do so without controlling of our God. Besides this, we be aduertized that his pleasure is it should be so. For he intendeth to referue some iudgement to the latter day. VVhat is to be done then? First let vs marke as it is sayd here, that the despisers of God or the hypocrites shail haue as it were a lampe burning in their house. Surely he expresth the matter by the diuers termes of light, lampe and shyning: but Bildads speaking here is after the ordinarie maner of the holy Scripture. Neuerthelesse this light betokeneth nothing else but that the wicked liue at their ease and in pleasure, and that God seemeth to fauour them, like as on the contrarie parte it is a very common thing to haue our tribulations and anguish likened to night and darknesse. But nowe let vs come backe againe to the matter. The despisers of God, and folke of looce life, or els such as haue nothing in them but hypocritie, may wel prosper for a time, and we see it yea and it standeth vs in hand to be well acquaynted & inured with it: for if we finde it no ueltie to vs, we shalbe troubled and vexed, and we shalbe forced to giue ouer Gods seruice. Therfore it behoueth vs to be at this poynt, that if God suffer the wicked too liue merily, and to reioyce, and to take their pleasure here bylowe: we must not be astonied at it. Marke that for one poynt. And it is an exercise that is very needefull for vs. No doubt but it will seeme hard to vs: howbeit it behoueth vs too accustome our selues too it as I sayd afore. Moreouer lette vs marke secondly, that our Lorde will quench all the sayd light, & when the wicked haue sported themselues a whyle, all their pleasures and pastymes which they haue taken vp must be deereley payd for. And why? It cannot misse but that their light shalbe quēched. Also this is it that Dauid standeth vpon in the 37. Psalme. For how exhorteth he vs, not too repine at the vngodly when we see them triumph after that maner, and it seemeth that all the world is theirs, and that their life may be esteemed happie, and they themselves also do glory in it, as though no mē were beloued of God but they? VVhat reason doth Dauid alledge to assure vs? for he sayeth that al this shal passe away. Let vs tarie (sayeth he) and we shal see that all the happinesse which the wicked furnise themselves to haue is but cursednesse. True it is that they shal be sure ynough of their good fortune as they terme it, & they shall like of it too too well: but in the end God will throw them downe. Then if we wil not be misprouoked by being in companie with the wicked, we must learne to passe beyōd the world, & to vnderstād that God wil shew howe it is nothing worth too haue had the ease of this world, & that it is a ioy of no cōtinuance. True it is that God doth sometimes beare vp his seruants in their infirmitie, so long till he cut of the edge of the wicked mens prosperitie, according also as it is sayd in the Psalme, that if we should be alwaies in aduersitie without any release, wee might reache out our hande too do euill: that is too say, wee bee so frayle, that although wee called vpon God, and were desirous too serue him: yet might wee be tempted too breake square, if God did not both moderate our afflictions and also repreffe the wicked by giuing thē such blowes as should beate them downe to the ground.

God then may well execute some of his iudgements euen in this transitorie life, to the intent to support vs after a sorte: but that is not alwayes, nother must we make a generall rule of it as Baldad did. For if we say that God will quenche the light of the wicked, and being demaunded when, do answere, to day, or to morrow: [ I say ] if we set God a terme after that sorte: he will giue vs leaue to be disapoynted of our hope. Therefore lette vs put that into his hande: he knowes the time and season wherein the wicked should be rooted out. Sometimes he fatteth them as men do oxen and swyne, according as it is sayd in the prophet. Now if a mā fat an ox or a swine it is not to trauell them when they be full fedde, it is not to put them to colde and heate, it is not to set them to labour as other beafts: but it is to smutch the Ox and to cut the Swynes throte. Euen so doth God fat the wicked till they come to the brimme of their graue. And therefore let vs marke well what I haue sayd afore, namely that to rest our selues vpon Gods iudgements, we must mount aboute the worlde, and wee muste looke vnto the things that as yet are hidden from our eyes. Thus yee see what we haue to marke. And so when we see the wicked aduanced and all things fall out as they would wish: well, must we thinke it strange? Hath it not bene so from the beginning of the world: Haue not the fathers of old time bene assaulted with the same temptation, and resisted it? Then let vs leaue that to God. Onely let vs know that al the pleasures which the wicked doo take in this worlde, shal turne to their confuzion, and it were much better for them that God had dealt niggardly with them, than to haue giuen them so liberally of his benefites. And why? For according as they haue abused his goodnesse, so must they also be fayne to be punished so much the more grieuouly for their vnthankfulnessse. Also lette vs tarie till God worke in doing his office, that is to say, til he quench the light of the wicked. And herewithall we haue to mark well the maner of speeche that are set downe here: as when Bildad sayeth, That nettes are layde vnder the feete of the wicked, that they cannot passe but through straits, that when they rise vp they shall be caught as in a pitfall, and that snares are pitched vnder their feete, howbeit that those snares bee couered and are not to be perceyued. According here vnto Dauid also sayeth: that the wicked shall walke alwayes vpon yce. True it is that their way glistereth, and is layre to the eye: but there is no sure footing for them, & God will make them treade a step awrie to breake their necke before it was once thought of. All these similitudes agree in one: that is to wit, to shewe that although the wicked do prosper, and their happinesse is wondered at, and had in estimation, yea and coueted of all the whole worlde: yet notwithstanding they go to destruction. Euery man will say, I would I were in such a mans cace: but we see not the snares that are couered in the earth. It will seeme that God beareth vp the wicked, and that they haue wings to flie with. But what for that? If they flie high, it is but to tumble downe the more vnhandfomely: and if their feete be vpon the earth, there are snares vnder them. True it is that we see them not: but when wee be warned of them by Gods woorde, we muste looke vpon them by fayth. Notwithstanding if Bildad had vnderstood well what he sayd, he had not bene so hampered in the snares of contrarietie. VVhy so? For in saying that the snares are couered vnder the wicked mens feete, he should haue remembered that it is not in vs to espie them, vntill God shewe them. And when shall that be? Surely it is not for vs to appoynt him any time. Then must men submit themselues too Gods providence, and not sette downe a generall rule or Lawe, to say, God will do so or

so. But let vs on our side looke to applie the sayde doctrine to his right vse. Seing it is sayd that there be snares vnder wicked mens feete: well, let vs pray God to leade vs by the hand, assuring our selues that snares are layde in this worlde for men. For Satan not onely assaileth vs with open warre: but also layeth ambushes for vs, and practizeth our destruction priuily as much as is possible for him. VVee therefore should not know how to step one pace in this present life, but wee shoulde bee in daunger to be caught in his snares. But what for that? VVhen Satan hath layde his snares and grines for vs, and is euen ready to catch vs: our Lorde preferueth vs. Our way is made afore vs, yea and wee be hilde vp and guided by the very Angels, as it is sayde in the 91. Psalme. As for the wicked, they haue their snares alwaies pitched. True it is that they sooth themselues, and other men also do thinke them to be exceeding happie. But that is because they know not what is prepared for them. For it is not ynough to knowe that snares are layde too catch the wicked: but wee muste note also that they bee couered. Therefore when we see a fayre and pleasant way, and the wicked frisking & scoterloping, and it seemeth that God cā no more hold them backe: Yet let not vs cease therefore to conclude, that a horrible destruction is prepared for them. And why? For wee muste not iudge after our owne conceyt and seeming: for such as do so, falsifie the holy Scripture. If wee be desirous to see the snares: it is sayd that they be hidden in the earth: and therefore lette vs bee contented to bee ignorant, till God discouer his iudgements vnto vs: I meane his secreete iudgements which cannot bee conceyued but by fayth. For if wee would haue experience of them after our owne fancie, that were naught. Ye see then how the faythfull ought to brydle themselues as of as God shall seeme to fauour the wicked, and not to be minded to punish them, nor to bring them to account. VVherefore let all good menne stande alwayes vpon this conclusion. VVell, I know not what these mens ende will be: but yet is God the iudge of the worlde: I will wayte patiently, till I see the falling out of the matter: and when I shal haue once perceyued that the wicked are caught, I doubt not but God accomplisheth that which he sayeth, though the meane how he doth it be not knowne to me. Therefore will I not mount aboute my boundes, it suffiseth mee too giue glorie vnto God in all things that he doth, and therewithall too pray him that I may profite my selfe thereby: for it is not for mee to put him too his stint. And here is mention made of the Heele purposely. For although Bildad had an eye to that which he had spoken, that is, that the snares were vnder the grounde, so as the wicked were caught with them: yet notwithstanding, vnder that woorde Heele, he sheweth that we must not maruel though God make not the wicked to stumble at the first blowe, but suffer them to runne a long race. For when it seemeth that they be come to the vttermost, to triumph more than euer they did: then he beareth them downe, and giueth them such a counterbuffe as maketh them too breake their necke. Therefore we must not wonder at it. Then let vs suffer God to wayte vpon the wicked, and in the ende to take them by the heele to throw them downe headlong. Thus yee see to what purpose the woorde Heele ought to serue vs. Now Bildad addeth immediatly, that fearfulnessse shal dismay him on all sides, and make them to fall euerywhere. He had sayd that they should marche in narrowe places, & that whither soeuer they went they should not escape the ambushes. True it is that the wicked shall haue roume long and large ynough to sporte in, according as we see how they leape about to and fro: and therefore it seemeth

b. 11. 12.

seemeth not that they walke alwayes in streyts. In deede we see it not: but they themselves feele it much better than wee can imagine. Againe, albeit that we see it not continually: yet doth God at length performe that which is sayd here, euen according as Bildad uttereth it: namely that feare shall dismay them. But he mistaketh the woorde feare, as though Gods enemies shoulde needes knowe and conceyue their sinnes too be afraide and to repent them: and that is not so. And why? These two things, namely that the wicked should be amazed with feare, and yet he merry and triumphe, cannot stande together. For when the despyzers of God would be merrie, they ouershoote themselves, they forget themselves, they become beasts, they beleue they be able to worke wonders, and they thinke themselves the happiest men in the worlde that they can anger God. Lo what the ioy of the wicked sorte is: that is too witte, a furious ioy, and a ioy that so bereeues them of their wittes and reason, as it leaues no modestie at all in them. But yet in the meane whyle God doth now and then call them to account, and he summoneth them within, so as they be constreyned to perceyue, that they must be fayne to come before him: And yet for all this they burie that knowledge as muche as they can, and are contented to abyde deafe and blind, and nother to see nor yet to heare what God sheweth & telleth them. Now wee see how wee ought to set fourth this lesson, that wee may practise it too our profite. It is in effect, that although the wicked haue the worlde at will: that is not as much to say as their lyfe is therefore happie. And why? VVhat is the chiefe welfare of man? To bee sure that his conscience is quiet and at reste, so as he may go on in true cōstancie through life and through death, yea and euen be merrie. But doth that befall to the wicked? No: for although they streyne themselves to set light by God, and to be voyde of sadnesse: yet are they fayne to be sorie & out of quiet spite of their teeth. Hereby wee see that their life is vnhappie, for all the goodes that they can haue. And so if we vnderstand that God will be merciful to vs, although we be vexed on all sides: yet is it a comfort to vs in the middes of all our sorrowes, that we are sure that God wil end them to our profit and welfare, & to the cōfution of our eninies. Thus ye see how we must practyze this lesson. Verely it deserueth to bee discoursed more at length, and so it shall bee by Gods leaue at the next Lecture. But as nowe the present time will not suffer vs to go any further.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgment of our faultes, praying him that when he hath made vs perceyue our selues well woorthie too bee bereft of all light, and too bee caste into horrible darkenesse for reiecting the grace of his holy spirite which hee had offered vs: it may neuerthelessse please him to pitie vs, and like as he hath once inlightened vs by his woorde and holie Ghoste, so too increace the same light more and more in vs, and specially too make vs too prosper in that which hee knoweth too bee fit for vs. And yet in the meane whyle that hee suffer vs not too be tyed to the corruptible goodes of this world, too reste our selues too much vpon them: but that we may alwayes go forewarde too the euerlasting heritage prepared for vs in heauen, so as wee may not bee vanquished by the temptations that may befall vs, but get the vpper hand in al battelles wherwith we be assayed, wayting till our God haue deliuered vs from all miseries of this worlde, and taken vs vp into the blissednesse that is prepared for vs in heauen, where wee shall haue our full contentation. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to, &c.

12. His strength shalbee in famine, and breaking of anguish shalbee at his side.
13. The firstborne of death shall eate vp his braunches or the members of his skinne, yea it shall eate vp his members.
14. His hope shall bee rooted out of his tent, and the king of feare shall make him come.
15. He that is none of his shall dvvell in his tent, and brimstone shall bee povvred vpon his dvvelling place.
16. His rootes shall vvither bylovve, and his boughes shall bee cut off aloft 17. His name shall perish from of the earth, and he shall haue nō more rénoume any vvhere.
18. He shall be cast out of light into darknesse, and driuen quite out of the vvorld.
19. He shall haue nother Sonnes nor graundchildren among the people, nor any ouerliuer in his dvvellings.
20. They that liue after him shall bee astonied at his day, and they that go afore him shall bee caught vvith feare.
21. Surely such are the Tents of the vvicked, and the place of him that knowveth not God.

He haue too go forward with the matter that was begunne yesterday. For here Bildad sheweth that God suffereth not the wicked too scape vnpunished, howsoeuer the worlde go. This saying is very true (as I sayd afore) if it bee rightly vnderstood: that is too wit, protuided that wee minde not too binde God in such wise as wee haue bene wont too do, to punish the wicked after this maner or that maner, but giue him leaue too execute his owne iudgements. And nowe lette vs looke vpon that which followeth. Here Bildad sayeth first of all, that famine shall bee the strength of the wicked, and that breaking shall be readie [or iust by him] at his side. VVhen he speaketh of strength, no doubt but he meeneth not all abilities: as if he should say, that the wicked mans nurrishment shall be turned into hunger? And here vnto agreeth the secōd part of the streyne where he addeth, that his sides [or ribbes] shall do nothing else but burst asunder. For the ribbes betoken strength, according as wee knowe that the flashe aione were not able to beare vp a man vnlesse he had ribbes which are of a harder substance, wherein cōsisteth all the force of him. Then in effect we vnderstand that God will so curse the wicked, that although they seeme strong, and well furnished of all that belongs to them, yet shall not that keepe them from broozing broozing and breaking. And that we may fare the better by this sentence, wee haue to marke, firste that according to the Scripture, Man is not nurrished by only bread but by every woorde that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. VVherein Moyfes doth vs to wit, that the abundance which wee haue is not able to susteyne vs. VVhat then? nothing els but the grace of God. If it please our Lord, we shall be fedde though there want bread, drinke and meate, according as he sayeth, he wil feede those that are his, euen in the time of famine. But contrarywise a man may haue his garners full and well stored, and hee may be so full till he burst: and yet shall he not be sustented euer a whit the more for it. To bee shorte, God shewed once in the Manna, howe it is he onely that susteyneth vs by his power. If the foode that wee eate bee blifed of God, it will serue our turne as the Manna did: and if there be any scarcitie of it, God will well supply it. Againe if Gods blifing bee not vpon vs, nothing can do vs good, wee must needes waxe leane, wee muste needes starue and pine away with our abundance. Then is this sentence of Bildads very true, and we see there are many other textes of Scripture that agree with it. VVherefore let vs learne to profite our selues by it, & let vs vnderstand that we haue nother strength nor sustentance but by the spreading out of Gods goodnesse vpon vs, which is the thing from whence we drawe lyfe, and the meane whereby wee be preferred and maynteyned in our state: and therefore let vs settle our whole trust vpon that. Furthermore when we see the wicked to be strong: lette vs assure our selues that it shall not last euer. True it is that wee muste not imagine as Bildad did, namely that God sheweth to our eyesight the thing that is spoken here: but wee muste tarie patiently, and giue God leaue to execute his iudgements when he shall thinke good. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And now he addeth immediarly, that the first borne of death shall eate his braunches, or the members of his skinne, yea, it shall eate his members, for that parcell is repeated. VVhereas mention is made here of the firstborne of death, it behoueth vs too vnderstand some exquisite kinde of death. For when some me die, we see they passe away easily, & God spareth the. Other some are tormented in such wise as they pine away by peecemeale, and are worne away too the harde bones: and other some go away without any feeling. Then let vs marke here, that this woorde, The firstborne of death, carieth in it a great force, when a man is hidde as it were vpon the racke, and that God dismayeth him and frayeth him, and wrappes him in anguish on all sides, in somuch that he seeth nothing but a bottomlesse pitte of horrible feare. Bildad therefore sayeth it shall happen after that maner to the wicked. True it is that all of vs are mortall, and that God hath put vs into this worlde with condition to take vs hence againe. Surely we canot come to the heauely life, except the corruptible that is in vs be first put away as S. Paule speaketh. VVhat must be done then? Let every man dispose himself to die, assuring our selues that God doth vs an inestimable grace in vouchsafing too deliuer vs from corruption by the meanes of death: and that although this transitorie lodging of our bodie bee destroyed, yet will he reare vp a new buylding in vs which shall bee much more excellent, in asmuch as wee shall bee clothed with glorie and immortalitie. But on the contrarie parte lette vs assure our selues that our Lord will sende the firstborne of death vpon the wicked, so as theyr death muste bee full of terrour, without any comfort, and vnasswaged of the miserie that is in it. And here yee see that the thing wherein wee differ from the vnbeleeuers is, that although bothe of vs muste bee fayne too passe through death together, and that the same bee common too all menne without exception: yet notwithstanding God reacheth vs his hande when we come too the poynt of death, so as wee go to him with a quiet minde, and are able too commende our soules vnto him with a true and right ordered trust, that hee may receyue them as a good and faythfull keeper. But as for the wicked, they muste bee fayne too go hence with great violence, and to bee troubled and dismayed, and too striue with God, and to storme, and to haue nothing that may comfort them. Neuerthelesse let vs bethinke vs of that which hath bene sayde: namely, that this thing shall not be alwayes apparant. For sometime God sendeth a violent death too his children. But although their body be payned, yet is not their soule therefore in the worse case. And this is it wherein Bildad was deceyued, according as wee haue alwayes too beare in minde, that wee muste not iudge by eyesight: but for asmuch as Gods iudgements are hidden from vs, and wee know not how God executeth them: we must not vse our owne wit and imagination in that behalfe. Howbeit if God execute his iudgements after a visible maner: let vs marke them, that wee may take good by them. If wee see them not: well, let vs vnderstand that he hath reserued the utterance of them till the last day, for the triall of our fayth. But yet in the meane whyle wee must be fully resolued, that although death be common too all men, yet are the faythfull so comforted and strengthened by Gods goodnesse, as they come willingly vnto him, knowing that he will receyue them, according also as they be sure that he will keepe their soules well and safely vnto the latter day: in so much that they cannot perish, bicause he hath comitted the into the had of our Lord Iesus Christ, and he hath taken them into his protectiō. The faythful therefore wil go willingly vnto death. Contrarywise there lighteth an exquisite and dreadfull death vpon the wicked, by cause that first they knowe not whither they go, and secondly Gods Iustice pursueth them in such wise, as they can conceyue nothing but feare and dismayednesse. VVhen we heare that the sayde priuiledge is giuen too vs, wee haue good cause to thanke our good God, and to prepare our selues to liue or die at his pleasure. Then lette vs not bee stubborne when he goeth about too take vs out of this worlde, sith such comfort is prepared for vs. Nowe it insueth immediatly, that his hope shall bee rooted out of his tent, and that he shall bee brought too the king of death. VVhen he sayeth that the hope of the vngodly shall bee rooted out of his tent: thereby it is done vs to vnderstand, that God will for a time lodge such as are vnworthie of it, so as they shall haue ease at will, yea and dwell in palaces, whyle in the meane season the poore faythfull ones shall scarcely haue a little cotage too retyre vnto. Thus the despyzers of God, which are giuen too all naughtinesse, shall dwell in this worlde as though the Lordship thereof belonged too none but them. They shall haue wide & large houses, they shall haue goodly long walkes, and therewithall their trust shall bee in their pleasures: that is to say, they shall thinke themselves so well settled, as they may neuer be shaken, according also as it is sayde in the Psalme, that they shal repine at the order of nature: and if a man looke vpon the buildings that they make here by'owe, it seemeth that they bee so highly aduanced, as the hand of God cannot touche them. Thus yee see the twoo things that are shewed vs in this sentence. And therefore when wee see the despyzers of God in their brauerie, and in their iollitie, let vs not be abasshed at it. VVhy so? For it is not of late dayes that such trade began. Our Lorde will haue vs to behold these things, to the end we may know that we be not yet come to our heritage, but our saluatiō is yet hiddē. Thus must we not be troubled nor offended whē we see the wicked to prosper, & to haue their ful scope, & to haue fayre dwelling-places, yea & to trust in their good fortune, and to be puffed vp with pride, and to haue so suregrounded hope (to their owne seeming) as may be. VVhen we see this, well, it is no newe thing. But what? Let vs marke how it is sayd, that hope is rooted out of their dwelling place: that is to say, that although the world see thē in such pōpe now adaies, & so fenced & furnished as they seeme to be rapirde on all sides, and that no harme may come neere thē to incōber thē: & although the world see them well at their ease, and that the same is like to cōtinue with thē euer after: yet wil God performe that which he hath sayde. And it is not for naught that he hath spoken both of theyr dwellingplaces & of their hope. For therein it is shewed vs, that God wil not be letted to execute his vengeance vpō thē, notwithstanding that they be so highly aduanced for a time, and as it were exempted from all the miseries of this worlde. And in the ende it is sayd, that they shall come too the king of feare. Like as before, mencion was made of the firstborne of death, to betoken a violent death, & a death that is more terrible than common death: So likewise when Bildad speaketh here of the king of feare, he betokeneth a royall and exquisite feare, that is to say, the greatest feare that is to be found. True it is that by this similitude wee may take the Diuell for the king of feare: but the natural meaning is that which I haue touched afore. And surely the firstborne of death, and the king of feare, are all one manner of speeche. So then let vs marke briefly, that here the wicked are threatened to be driuen into such a terrible and excessiue feare, that all the feares in the worlde which the godly do conceyue, are nothing to it. And wee muste marke this sentence well. For if God sende vs any occasion of care and feare, wee be grieued at it: and truly the chiefe benefite that we can wish in this lyfe, is peace, so as wee be set free and exempted from all misdoubting and carefulnesse. Yet notwithstanding if God will haue vs to care, wee muste not therefore be out of quiet. And why? For when we be ouertakē with feare, although the same be grear, yet is it the meane whereby God prouoketh vs to resort vnto him. For we would neuer come to hyde our selues vnder the shadowe of his winges, if wee were safe and sure on all sides. It is with vs as it is with little children: for as long as they be not afraid they sport and play, and runne euerywhere. But if they bee scared with any feare, a man shall not get them out of their mothers lap. The little chickens would neuer gather themselves so hastily vnder their dāmes winges, as when they be scared and put in feare. VVee bee so witleffe, that if wee knowe there is no daunger for vs, wee play the stray beafts. And therefore our Lorde to drawe vs home too him, sēderth vs such feare, as wee be fayne spite of our teeth too acknowledge that our lyfe is vn Timer, if it be not garded by God. Thus ye see whereto the cares and feares that God sendeth to his children, do tende. Againe they be a meane too make them distrust their owne strength. For wee can neuer trust throughly in God, except wee bee discouraged in our selues so as wee know not where too become. Therefore it is good for vs to bee put in feare. Howbeit when wee see the wicked in sure state, lette vs bee of good cheere, for the reste that they inioy as now, muste in the ende be decreely payde for. And why? They shall go too the king of feare: that is too say, they shall haue such flightinges as nothing may deliuer them from them, but they shall liue in extreme torment and anguish: in somuch that if a man would bring them backe againē to God, he should not preuayle: and if he should tell them that they ought too humble themselves vnto God that they might rest vpō his goodnesse, they should not vnderstand a whit what he ment, nor be able to taste thereof. Behold (I say) what the astonishments of the wicked are, which dally nowadayes with God. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to remēber in this streyne. And consequently it is sayd, that one which is none of his shall dwell in his tent, and brimstone shall bee powred out vpon his house.

 10 Some men set it downe, that he shall dwell in his tente: howbeit by cause it is none of his owne, brimstone shall be cast downe vpon it. But that is harde and streyned. Let vs marke then that Bildad ment rather, that the dwelling-places of the wicked shall perish, or else be conueyed ouer vnto straungers. This is the effect of his meaning here, like as in other textes the like is sayd of vineyardes and landes. And it is the same curse that Moyses pronoucerth against such as obey not God, nor haue not serued him, but haue bene vnthankfull and rebellious towardes 20 him. Thou shalt plant vines (sayeth he) and another man shall gather the grapes: thou shalt sowe and another shall reape thy haruest: thou shalt builde houses, and strangers shall dwell in them. Then if this curse be performed, we must acknowledge it to be the hand of God. And (as Bildad sayeth) they that possesse great houses for a time, shall be cast out of them at length, and others shall come into them. Yea and euen while they themselves dwell in them, God wil ouerthrow thē. There shall neede no extortioner to thrust thē out, nor any other enimie to inuade them & to spoyle them of their possēsiōs. For brimstone shall fall 30 vpō them frō aboue, that is to say, God will finde meanes vnknowne to mē & extraordinarie, wherby he wil make the wicked to perish, notwithstanding that they be set vp aloft in their shrynes & noman put them out of thē. Yee see in effect what is cōteyned here. And this is a true and very noiable sentence, so we hold vs to the prouiso that hath bene set downe by me. I say we muste beare in mind, that Gods iudgements goe not all after one rate in this world, nor are executed after one visible maner, that our senses may perceyue them. Sometimes God causeth his childrē to be tossed frō post to piller, as we see: nother is 40 it of the present time only that S. Paule sayd, we be without reste. Meeneth he that it is a curse layd vpon Gods children, that they should bee alwayes wandering in this world? No: For therby they be taught, to seeke their heritage & rest that is prepared for them aboue. Therefore whereas the faithfull are as birdes vpon a bough (as men say) so as they wote not where to abide, but are remoued to & fro: it is not executed vpon them as a curse, but rather it is turned wholly to their welfare & saluatiō. How-50 beit as oft as we see our Lord leaue the wicked & the despyzers of his woord: it behoueth vs too vnderstand that he giueth a taste of his curse in that case. Againe, when they dwell quietly in their houses and noman troubleth them: God hath thunder and brimstone in his hand, and can soone destroy them. For although all men fauour them, and that the world maynteyne them and holde them vp so as they be throughly fenced en all sides: yet can not al that shet the gate against God, but that he may reuendge on his side when he listeth. Inmediatly there 60 followeth, that his roote shall wither beneath, and his boughes bee cut of aboue. Here nowe againe Bildad doth vs too vnderstand that the wicked shall be cōfounded, notwithstanding that their state seeme as happie as any may bee. For therevnto dothe this similitude leade vs. Certesse he likeneth them too a tree that is rooted in the ground. Marke me a tree that is well planted, & afterward spreadeth out aboue as wel in trūke as in boughes, which beare leaues,

leaves, flowres and frute: and euen such is the outwarde shew of the wicked, and of the despyzers of God: & such similitudes are well woorthie to be noted. For (as I haue declared already) we must not be greued at all when we see that God doth not at the first dashe punish those that steppe out vnto euill, but rather seemeth to beare them good will and to heare their petitions. This troubleth vs, and our desires boyle within vs, so as we would fayne that God should take vengeance out of hande. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke well how it is sayde here, that the wicked may wel be like vnto fayre trees, according as it is sayde in the 37. Psalme, I haue seene the vngodly aduanced so high, as he seemed like a Cedre of Libanus. For like as Ceders are higher than other trees: euen so are the wicked among men, in somuch as it seemeth that all men els should stoupe vnder thē. But what for that? I went by, (sayeth Dauid) and kept on my way, and when I came backe againe I sawe there was no print of them remaining. VVhereas he sayeth he went by, he meeneth that he taried patiently till God had accomplished his worke, and that the full time was come. Euen so must we do: when we see the wicked in prosperitie, the same must not hinder vs from following our course, till we be come thither as God calleth vs. Thus yee see what wee haue to marke in this text, for the first poynt. Secondly it behoueth vs too marke this threatening: that when the wicked shal haue taken deepe roote, and be come to such prosperitie as there is no likelihood that euer any winde or storme shall shake them: then shall their roote wither beneath: that is to say, then will God worke after such a sorte, as they shall be throwne downe and consumed: and theyr branches shal be cut off aboue: that is to say, God will persecute them by all meanes. Now when wee see this, let vs resort to the promises that are giuen to Gods children: according as it is sayd, that the man which feareth God shal be like a tree planted by a riuers side, which alwayes draweth moysture and nurrishment too it, and that such as are of a perfect beleefe in God, are like ther-vnto, as it is sayd in Ieremie. Therefore let vs pray God that we may drawe moysture frō him, and that the thing which is spoken in another place of the Psalmes, may be fulfilled in vs: namely that the righteous shall florish as the palme tree, & prosper euen in the house of the Lord: Also let vs pray our Lorde to nurrish our roote beneath, that although we carie no outwarde shewe before men, yet we may not cease to haue our life hidden in Christe. And that if it please him too giue vs any countenance, the same may be to the magnifying of his blissing, so as wee may be an example and recorde of his goodnesse: & that if it please him at any time to cut off our boughes, he will also make that too turne to our profite, as when a man cutteth or shreddeth a vine, it is too make it beare good fruyte afterwarde, whereas if it were lette alone it would growe wilde. Then lette vs be sure that if it please God to cut off our boughes, it is too make vs yeelde the more fruyte in him by taking away that which is superfluous in vs, that all things may turne too our benefite. Besides this, it will serue also to restrayne vs from being tempted too pray God too make vs like the wicked, that is too wit, to make vs prosper as they do. Thus muche concerning this similitude. And it is also sayd, that their memoriall shall perish in earth, and that they shall haue no more renoume any where. True it is that wee must not put our trust in this worlde, too seeke renoume and glorie here. For the holy Scripture mocketh such kinde of vanitie, saying that suche as doo settle their names in earth, knowe not what God and his kingdome meene. Therefore we must not be desirous too make our selues renowned in this worlde. Yet is it not in vayne also that God hath promised it as a blissing too his children, that their name shall continue for euer, and that it shall be blissed. And how is that? It is bycause our Lorde (spyte of the churlishnesse of the worlde) will notwithstanding make his seruants honorable and in good estimation. They may be despized for a tyme, yea and subiect too many slaunders and reproches. But God will deliuer them at length, and bring too passe that their rightuousnesse shall be knowne. Yee see then that the memoriall of good men and Gods children shall be blissed. True it is, that this is not alwayes accomplished in the world, but yet it falleth out so oftentimes. Againe whereas God speaketh of renoume or memoriall, he meeneth it in respect of such as haue discretion too iudge. For the vnbeleuers are blinde and ignorāt in discerning Gods children aright: but yet doth not that diminish any thing of the promise that God maketh vs. But nowe lette vs come too Bildads saying, that the memoriall of the wicked shall perish. Lette vs marke that his so saying is a curse peculiarly belonging too the despyzers of God, according too that which I haue touched already. For they be drunken in their foolish ambitiō, so as they beare themselves in hande that their name shall neuer fade in the worlde but men shall haue it in remembrance for euer. But wee see howe it goeth cleane contrarie with them. For what is the cause that they turmoyle themselves after that sort? It is too haue men to talke of them. VVell then, are the despyzers of God desirous too make themselves renowned in the mouths of men? God will turne it quyte and cleane to the contrarie. For if their remembrance continue: it shall be in reproche, and men shall not speake of them but in skorne and mockage. And as for them that haue bene caried away with this sayd vayne desire, do wee not see that God hath buried them, so as menne coulde no more tell what was become of them? VVhereas it seemed that they should be talked of whyle the world indured, and whereas they themselves surmyzed that euery of them shoulde become greatest, (for although they sawe many go before them, yet did euery of them thinke with himselfe, I shall be chiefest:) yet hath God buried them as I sayde afore, and if men speake of them, after what maner is it? Euery man is made priuie too their naughtinesse and shame. And doth not this come of the sayd curse of God? Therefore let vs marke that Bildad hath expressed here the chiefe thing that those kinde of men seeke which are giuen to the world. And that ought too be well marked. For if God make our name too perish too the worldward: what loze wee by it: what harme haue wee by it? For wee knowe our names are written in the booke of lyfe. Be glad (sayeth our Lord Iesus Christ too his Disciples) for your names are written in Gods registers to your euerlasting saluation. Is not this ynough to content vs? VVee be not like these fooles that haue none other immortalitie than too make themselves too be spoken of. For that were ouergreat fondnesse. But wee know that God hath written our names in his booke, and ingroced the recorde with his owne hande, that is too say, in his owne euerlasting determination, (for Gods hande is the vchaugeable ordinance that hee hath appoynted) and afterwarde ratified the whole with the bloud of our Lorde Iesus Christ, and finally sealed it by the working of his holy spirite. Seing then that we haue our memoriall there among the Angelles of heauen, and among the Patriarkes, Prophets and Apostles: haue wee not cause too be contented? And so albeit that our remembrance be razed out of the worlde: yet shall wee looze nothing by it. But wee see that that God maketh the memoriall of his seruants too be blessed, (as I sayde afore) notwithstanding that they be despyzed for a time, and counted in the worlde to be dirt and dung, as Saint Paule speaketh: for he likeneth them to guttes full of filthinesse that are cast away. Thus then the faythfull are exercyzed for a time, yea and they are vnder the curse of men, as though they bare all the sinnes of the worlde: but in the ende God maketh their rightuoufnesse too shine foorth as the breake of the day, and they are had in blessed remembrance. VVe see that Abraham in his tyme was despyzed and shaken off. VVhat may a man thinke of Iacob? and yet wee see that their memoriall is blessed. Euerie man ranne vpon Dauid, they cursed him, they spyted him, he became as a worme of the grounde, hee was made a skorne and mockingstocke too the veryest rascalles, and euery man did as it were lothe him: and yet notwithstanding, wee see that his remembrance is blisfed, yea euen in Gods Church. For as for the vnbeleuers, a man must not seeke too haue any renowme or remembrance among them, bicause they be wretched blinde soules that cannot iudge nor are able too discerne betweene white and blacke. Thus yee see what wee haue too marke in this sentence. And consequently heere is added, That they shall bee cast oute of light intoo darkenesse, that they shall bee driuen oute of the worlde, that they shall haue neyther children nor Graundechildren among the people, and that they shall haue no ouerliuer or heyre in the lande where they dwell. Heere Bildad confirmeth the matter that hee had treated of: which is, that if God make the wicked too prosper, that is not alwayes. And that is verie true. For what happinesse is there in their state, seing that all their laughter muste bee turned intoo sorow. So then let vs assure our selues that the present light of the wicked serues but too leade them intoo the way of darkenesse. VVhen wee heare this: if wee bee in darkenesse (that is too say in aduersitie, according also as the worde importeth) so as wee wote not on which syde too turne vs, bycause wee be besette with so many miseries round aboute, as wee see no way oute of them: well, let vs for oure parte assure oure selues, that the same darkenesse bee it neuer so greate, shall bee a pathe too leade vs too Gods light. For hee hath woonderfull meanes too leade his children too saluation, yea euen when hee seemeth fully mynded to destroy them. Are we then as it were vndone? Let vs assure our selues, that by that meanes God draweth vs to saluation. Are we in thicke darkenesse, let vs assure our selues that he can well bring vs to light. Thus yee see what wee haue to gather vpon this text. Contrariwyse, doo wee see the wicked puffed vp with their nobilitie, and make greate braucryes, and spreade oute their wings? VVell, it is true that they are in greate brightnesse: but let vs tarie till God perfourme that whiche is sayde heere: that is too witte, till hee bring darkenesse vpon them. Thus (as wee see) heere is a verie profitable thing for vs too knowe: which is, that although God make the wicked too prosper for a tyme: their cace is neuer the better for it, for alwayes the ende muste bee looked vntoo. And contrarywise, though the poore faythfull ones bee distressed heere, so as they wote not where too become: their state is neuer the worse for all that. And why? Let vs looke vpon the ende: whiche is, that by this darkenesse God meeneth too bring them light. Againe, whereas it is sayde that the wicked shall haue neyther children nor offspring, nor leaue any heyres in their dwellings: that is according too the curse of the lawe. For it is sayde that issue is a blisfing of God. And although our Lorde would that all the benefites of this life should be dedicated vntoo him, and that men shoulde acknowledge him too bee the authour of them, and yeelde him prayse for them: yet notwithstanding hee auoucheth it too bee a speciall benefite when hee giueth men issue.

Now although the law were not yet written in Bildads time: yet had hee the same doctrine printed in his hart by God: that is too witte, that our Lorde will roote out the wicked, so as hee will not leaue one of their race, but all shall bee brought too naught. If any man alledge, that our Lorde doth often suffer euen his owne children too bee barraine: the answer herevnto is, that such manner of cursings are oftentimes turned into blisfings vntoo Gods children. Neyther must wee make a generall and indifferent rule too say, that God dooth in all caces woork his sayings visibly too the eye. For wee muste leaue the choyce of that too himselfe to dispoze thereof in tyme and place as hee shall thinke good. VVe maye see then that sometymes a faythfull man and one that feareth God shall haue no issue in the worlde: and yet is it not too bee sayde therefore, that hee is cursed of God. For beholde the firste rightuous man: what issue left hee behinde him? Yea and when the promise was made too Abraham, that his offspring shoulde bee as the sande of the Sea, and as the starres of the Skye. Had hee a great number of children? Howe many children left hee after his death? True it is that hee had diuerse other children besydes Isaac: but God did cutte them off, according also as they were not woorthie too bee Abrahams children. True it is also that after him his sonne Isaac had but twoo children: and one of them was a murderer in his hart, by meanes whereof he was faine too put awaye the other, and too banishe him hys house. VVe see then that although the godly leaue no children after their deceasse: yet are they not therefore the lesse blessed of God. For they haue an euerlasting fatherhoode in heauen, in that it pleaseth God too ioyne them not onely with all the Saincts and faythfull ones: but with the Angelles also. But as for the wicked, it is too bee knowne that the want of issue is a curse of God vntoo them. For too their seeming, all were forlorne with them, if they might not haue an heyre to succede them. And God disappoynteth them of it by his rightfull vengeance, and as by a punishment meete for them, bycause it is altoogither agaynst the irkyng. This is it that wee haue too marke in this streyne. Nowe furthermore Bildad concludeth in the ende, that such as come after them shall bee amazed at it, and such as go afore them shall bee afrayde, and that such is the dwelling of the wicked, and of those that feare not God. This serueth too confirme this matter: that is too witte, that God will punishe the wicked in suche wise, as the worlde shall bee astonished at the sight of their state, it shall bee so vnhappy. This saying is verie true, and wee ought too aduauntage our selues greatly by it, and beare it well in minde, provided that we follow not Bildad in inclosing Iob and all such as are afflicted, within the sayde cursednesse. And why? For (as I haue sayde) aduersities light vpon Gods children, as well as vpon the wicked. VVe must alwayes beware that we let God alone with the guyding of all things, as vnto whome it belongeth. So then if wee bee poore and afflicted, so as the worlde esteemeth vs as wretches: let vs not therefore ceasse to rest vpon the goodnesse of oure God, and too wayte his leysure till he deliuer vs for a full adoo, from all oure necessities and afflictions, [which thing he will doo,] if wee referre all vnto him.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of oure faultes, praying him too make vs feele them in such wise, as wee maye humble our selues and be sorie for them, and learne too take more profite of the miseries and aduersities that are sent vs in this worlde, than wee haue done hitherto: that vpon the knowledge of our faultes and sinnes, wee may enter intoo examination of our lyfe, too mis-

like of our vices, to the ende that being receyued to mercie by the meane of our Lorde Iesus Christ we may haue the more matter and occasion too trust too his goodnesse for the time to come, so that whereas wee haue too walke through many miseries and aduersities in this worlde, we may not therefore ceasse to obey him alwayes to the end. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely too vs, but also, &c.

3. Yee haue already ten times put me to confusion, and are not ashamed, and yee are hardened agaynst mee.
4. If I haue done amisse, my sinne shall abide with mee.
5. But you magnifie your selues, and vaunt your selues at my miserie, 6. Know ye that God hath beseged me with his povver, & beset me round about with his nets.
7. If I crie out by reason of violence, he answereth me not: If I shreke out yet haue I no right.
8. He hath set vp my vvay, so as there is no passage out, and hee hath put darknesse in my path.
9. He hath bereft me of my glorie, he hath taken the crowne avway from my heade.
10. He hath destroyed mee on all sides, and I am vanished avway: he hath taken avway my hope as the hope of a tree.
11. His anger is kindled agaynst me, and he counteth me as hisemie.
12. His armies are come, they haue inclosed me, & they haue pitched their camp about my tent.

Ye haue seene what Bildads intent was in rebuking Iob. He tooke this <sup>30</sup> for a generall grounde, that God leaueth not the wicked unpunished. And therevpon hee concluded, that Iob must needs bee of that number, sith that God afflicted him so greuously. But Iob disproueth him, because it is not for men too deeme of his lyfe by the aduersities that hee endured, so much as God punisheth him not for his offences, but executeth some other determination that is secreete and vnknowne too men. Howbeit before he come to that poynt, hee complayneth of hys freendes, for beeing so hardhearted towards him. Ye are not ashamed (sayth he) to put me too confusion so often times already: you haue barked your selues agaynst me, or you haue made your selues straungers too mee: for the Hebrew worde may import the one as well as the other. But the fittest is, that they had hardened themselves, in not hauing pitie nor compasison vpon his miseries. Now then wee see whereto this plaint tenderh. Howbeit whereas he sayth that if hee haue done amisse, his sinne shall abide <sup>50</sup> in him: therein he sheweth himselfe too haue bene ouerpassionate. For if he had done amisse, it was for him too receyue correction peaceably. But to say let me alone, I shall beare mine owne punishment: no man shall take harme by my sin but my selfe, is a maner of speaking that agreeth to an vnreclaymable and desperate person, rather than to a childe of God. Neuerthelesse, Iob was tempted therevnto, when he sawe he coulde haue no reason at his freendes handes. But yet he returneth to the principall and standeth not vpon the other poynt, because he had an euill cace. And he sayth, I thinke ye to preuayle agaynst me by vaunting your selues because ye see mee in such plight: or thinke you that my cace is past recouerie, and that I shall bee damned, by cause ye see mee too bee as miserable a creature as may bee? Knowe ye (sayth he) that God hath ouerthrowne mee in iudgement (that is to say, yee must not dispute heere by reason: for God ruleth not himselfe according to mans capacitie) I can haue no right at his bande. I may well contende, but yet must I stande too my harmes, I must be oppressed, and yet if I crie, or if I make moane, my miserie is neuer the more assuaged, It booteth mee not, for hee hath set me himselfe too bee mineemie, hee hath sent mee innumerable miseries, like an armie to beseege me. I am tormented, and which worse is, I see no issue in all my way, and it seemeth that hee hath inclosed mee, and locked mee vp, and that there is no maner of meane to scape the miseries that presse me and torment mee. This were verie straunge talke at the first sight, if wee had not already vnderstoode partely wher vpon Iob groundeth himselfe, and that the same were not nowe newly agayne brought to remembrance, as it shall bee shewed anon by Gods leaue. But let vs go forwarde with Iobs talke. This complaint which hee maketh too his freendes is iust: that is to witte, that it was a pleasure too them too put him too confusion. Nowe (as I haue sayde heere toofore) if a man bee smitten with Gods roddes, although there be iust cause to finde fault with him, yet must the same be done with a milde spirit, that the medicine be not too sharpe, considering that the hand of God hath rigour ynough in it selfe, without adding any more to it. If a man beare himselfe stoutly agaynst God, and seeme not to feel any miserie, but playeth the man, and is not by any meanes reformable: there we haue to vse greater sharpnesse. For when men abuse Gods pacience and goodnesse, such statelnesse must be tamed. And if God handle them not at the first as they deserue so as they become more hardhearted and wilfull because he beareth with them: then ye see wherin he ought to vse greater rigor. For it is not to be borne that men should outface god after that sort, & turn his goodnesse and gentlenesse into such poison, therby to inuenim themselves more and more agaynst him. Let a man handle them mildely and they runne riot in their delightes, so as they become as it were bewitched, and a man cannot wring any reason out of them, nor draw them to repentance. But if a man be hartbroken, and it is to be sene that God hath wrought with him in such wise already, as we ought to be moued too compasison: what a matter were it too set vpon him with rigour? VVee shoulde shewe shewe our selues too haue no manhood in vs. True it is that if a man were afflicted as much as were possible, yet if we see him still hardharted against God, & that all the corrections which he hath receyued haue not amended him, there it behoueth to vse rigour. But yet neuertheless we muste still haue pitie of the miserie that wee see him in, and if wee bee kindeharted, there will be some mitigation and gentlenesse, and wee will vse him after some quiet fashion. Now as for Iobs friends, there was no suche dealing in them. For had they taken things as they ought, they had founde that he humbled himselfe vnder the hand of God. And surely although it seemed straunge too him too bee handled so: Yet notwithstanding he ceased not too confesse that God was his iudge, and had all power ouer him. Therevpon they fall too rayling at him, and beare him in hande cleane contrarie to the truthe, that he was a wicked man, that there was nothing but hypocrisie in him, that he had neuer serued God hartily, and that they whiche were not afflicted as hee was, were muche better and rightuouser than hee. If Iob woulde haue agreed with them, hee muste haue renounced God, and spoken agaynst his owne conscience. Yee see then wherevpon hee standeth. And hereby we bee taught, that when God afflicteth any of oure neighbours, wee muste nor by and by conclude that they bee the worste men aliue. But wee muste haue regarde too iudge vprightly, as wee woulde haue other men too doo by vs, and too say: It may be that Gods meening is but too trie their pacience. Although they haue walked vprightly before him, and with a good zeale: yet notwithstanding hee intendeth that wee shoulde haue mirrours. And if it please him too conceale the cause from vs, or if they haue done amisse, and God doo punishe them: yet muste wee not measure their sinnes by the punishment that we see. And why? For hee behaueth himselfe more hardly towarde the righteous than towarde the wooser sort, bycause he reserueth the wickedest till the ende: and that is too make them the more vnexcusable. For they do nothing else but heape vp store of his wrath, and horrible vengeance vpon their owne heades. Yee see then howe it becommeth vs too bee wize and modest when wee see poore men in aduersitie, too the ende that wee go not the wrong way too worke. Again, although God shew vs as it were with his finger, that there is iust cause when hee sendeth such miseries vpon any man: let vs learne too make oure owne profite of it. And that wee may so doo, let vs haue an eye to our selues. For when God maketh vs too perceyue his iudgements after that sort, his intent is too instruct vs at another mans cost. Therefore it is too no purpose for vs too condemne suche as are in aduersitie, without hauing regarde too our selues. But it behoueth euerie of vs too enter intoo himselfe, and too bethinke him, Alas, in that my God hath preserued mee, I am bounde vntoo him for it: yea and I also may bee chastized some one way or other. Wherefore I must acknowledge, that my God spareth me: and that whereas I am not scourged with extremitie, and specially for that I am at mine ease and rest, the same cometh of his meere mercie. I say, let vs acknowledge these things, that wee may haue occasion too bee oure owne iudges, and not too condemne otherfoikes without looking to our selues. And by the way we see what a temptation it is, when men giue an vntowarde and wrongfull iudgement of vs, and that it is verie hard too keepe measure in that case, sith that Iob (who had suche a paciennesse as we haue scene, and as the Scripture reporteth of him) hath notwithstanding ouerleaped by boundes, and was not able so too bridle himselfe, as no euill worde might scape from him True it is that he hath good right too complaine: but yet for all that, it is the saying of an vnreclamable person, to say, if I haue done amisse, my fault shall abide with mee. For although men be so vnkinde too vs when wee haue done amisse, (as wee see some that haue too fire a zeale, or at leastwise not so milde a harte as were requisite:) yet muste Gods children alwayes humble themselues. For what knowe wee whither God bee priue too mo faultes in vs, than wee oure selues wote of? And surely wee perceyue not the tenth part of oure sinnes. God therefore dooth nowe and then sende vs some harder chastyement than wee thinke conuenient: but that is bycause wee knowe not oure owne diseafe. VVee see that Dauid had the selfe same consideration towards Semei. He knewe verie well that Semei was a lewde fellowe, and that hee was not ledde agaynste him but of a cankerde and bitter minde: and yet notwithstanding hee sayeth, who can tell whither God hath commaunded him too rayle so vpon mee or no? Yee see howe Dauid considereth that God hilde him in his handes, and that it was his will too haue him delt withall so rudely. Nowe if the wicked mens persecuting of vs bee too bee fathered vpon God, bycause he serueth his turne with them as with whippes to strike vs iustly withall: what shall we thinke when wee see that men doo of a good zeale labour too refourme vs, and are desirous of our welfare? If they come not too vs with such suche gentlenesse as were requisite, shall wee therefore play the looce Coltes, and reiect all that is spoken? VVhat discretion were that? VVee shewe well thereby, that wee bee not gouerned by Gods spirite in any wise. But wee see that Iob was tempted after the same maner, and therefore wee must bee the warer. For if it befell so too a man that was as an Angell of heauen: I pray you what will become of vs, if wee keepe not good watche agaynst Satan? VVill he not soone haue put vs too a foyle? And surely if hee once get an entrie intoo vs, wee knowe not well on whiche syde too turne vs, too come againe too our right way when wee bee oute of it. So then, let this sentence serue vs too suche instruction as I haue spoken of: that is too witte, that if men lifte vp themselues in that wise agaynste vs, and bee too seerce vpon vs, and bee not so modest as were requisite: yet notwithstanding, it behoueth vs to vnderitande, that it will bee alwayes for our welfare to receiue the corrections that are laid vpon vs. And for the humbling of our selues, let vs learne too enter intoo our selues, and let vs neyther fret nor repine when men rebuke vs somewhat sharply, and discouer our lewdnesse. VVherefore is it that men (as we see) doo ostentimes storme without rule and modestie? It is bycause they haue not an eye vnto God. For if the partie that is appeached woulde consider, Verely I haue done amisse, I finde my selfe blame worthie, I may well excuse my selfe afore men, but let mee iustifie my selfe, let mee bleare the eies both of my selfe and of my neighbors, and let mee imagine that I haue great wrong done me: alas yet can I not scape the hande of God: VVhat shall I gayne then by seeking many krinkes, and by excusing my selfe too the worldward? For lo, God will condemne me. And moreover the matter standeth not simply vpon being cyted before the heavenly iudge: but behold mine own conscience doth so crie out vpon me, as I carie both my iudge & my hangman with me. The sith it is so, were it not better for me to yeld my selfe guiltie, and to cast down my head, & to consider that God seeth all thing, & that in asmuch as he handleth me so, I should acknowledge that the same is a fit medicine for me, and that although it seeme bitter too mee, and I could find in my hart too refuse it if it were possible, yet it is for my behoofe to yeelde too it? Yee see then what wee haue too marke in this sentence. Furthermore let vs learne too bee quickesighted in espying our owne faultes when God visiteth vs, assuring our selues that in so dooing he sheweth vs singular fauour. For we see howe we be inclined of nature too hypocrisie: and therevpon euerie of vs dooth so flatter and soade himselfe in his owne sinnes, that if wee were not preuented on the other syde, there were none of vs all but hee woulde welter in his owne filthinesse. And what woulde become of it in the ende? VVee shall runne on from euill too worse till Satan get the full possession of vs, and then shall we bee so caryed away, that there shall remayne nothing but blockishnesse in vs, according as it is sayde in the Prouerbes, and as Saint Paule speaketh also. For behold, the extreemest of all miseries is, when men haue no more remorse, but are so caryed away and giuen vp into the handes of Satan, as they are no more wounded too feele their sinnes, and too bewaile them before God. And surely wee shoulde all of vs come too that poynt, if God withhilde vs not by stirring vp men now and then too inforce vs too feele oure sinnes by disco- uering them when wee haue forgotten them, and thinke them too bee well hidden, and by putting vs in minde, that whereas wee haue turned oure backes vpon oure iudge, it behoueth vs too come before him. Therefore (as I sayde) yee see heere a benefite that is not too bee despyzed. For if wee refused the corrections that are put too vs: it is all one as if wee laboured to quench the light of Gods spirite. VVee bee in darkenesse so long as oure sinnes are hidden: and God commeth too light vs vp his Cresset, too giue vs light to see our owne wantes: but yet had wee leuer too haue kercheefes too blindefolde our selues withall, and cannot finde in oure hartes too haue them taken away: wee refuse the light, and like better of darkenesse. I pray you what an vnthankfulnesse is this? I pray you is it not a detestable sacriledge when wee resist Gods spirite after that sort, who reacheth vs his hande, and is willing too bring vs backe into the way of saluation? Yee see then that the speciall poynt which we haue too marke in this sentence, is that wee muste not say, If I haue done amisse, I shall beare mine owne burthen, other men shall not suffer punishment for mee, I say let vs nor stryue after that fashion, but let vs consider that God giueth his giftes too others too communicate them vntoo vs: and when hee sendeth vs any man too shewe vs oure faultes, it is a recorde of his goodnesse, that hee hathe still a care of vs, and is desirous too reserue vs too himselfe. And in verie deede if wee bee restie and kicke agaynst the spurre, reiecting the corrections offered vs by men: that maner of vnthankfulnesse shooteth at God himselfe, it is hee to whome the wrong is done, and it is he also that shall reuenge it.

I therefore let vs keepe our selues from falling intoo such pryde, and let vs bethinke vs, that whensoever we haue done amisse, it is high tyme for vs to come home too our selues, and too consider oure owne euill, that it may bee remedied. But nowe let vs come too the seconde poynt which is the cheefe. For (as hath bene declared heeretoofoore) Iob did not vtterly refuse correction: but did cast forth these woordes as a blast of winde. And it hath bene noted heeretoofoore, that in this booke Iob speaketh not onely what bee was fully resolved of in him selfe: but also vttereth the fittes of his affections after as hee was moued inwardely, howbeit that hee withtooode them and restreyned them so as hee was forie for them afterwarde. Nowe therefore hee giueth ouer that which hee had sayde, and passing not for it, commeth too the principall poynt. For hee knewe that the other was but wandering talke, and not grounded eyther vpon reason or truth. So returneth hee too the defence of his case: which is, that hys freendes vnder colour of comforting him, doo vaunt themselves agaynst him, yea and that their vaunting of themselves is without alledging of any thing but hys reproofe too put him too confuzion, and came thither with such harde and shamelesse hartes, as there was neither manhoode nor modestie in them. Thus ye see Iobs meening.

And further hee concludeth alwayes that God doth not punishe him for his sinnes, but that hee handleth him after a straunge fashion, suche as men are not acquainted with. And surely heere hee complayneth that if hee trie out, there is no reason for him, because that God is as it were his enimie. Heereby wee be taught, first that if we will doo oure neighbours good in rebulking them of their faultes: it behoueth vs too bee well sure, that they haue done amisse, and that wee finde fault with them iustly, and not vpon single coniectures: for it was an euill maner of proceeding of Iobs freendes, to condemne him bicause God scourged him. VVee muste bee of another mynde, as I haue sayde already. For God keepeth not alwayes one rate, too punishe none but suche as haue done amisse: nay rather, oftentimes the rightoufests are troubled muche more than the others, as wee see: for according as God hath delt of his power vnto them, so doth he also trie them too the vttermost.

It behoueth vs to beare this well in minde, to the ende we bee not greeued when wee see wee must walke in the selfe same way that they doo. For ought it to mislyke vs, that God spareth vs no more than those whome hee loued more than all other men? VVoulde wee bee more priuiledged than the holy fathers that haue had so excellent witnessse of the holie Ghost? So then if wee shoulde condemne or acquitte euerie man according to Gods handling of him: all the poore folke in the world, all the sicke folke, all despyzed folke, and all folke that are out of credite or estimation, should be wicked men. And what a dealing were that? For those are they whom God chooseth too bee his, those are they whom he acknowledgeth and auoucheth to be his children. And contrariwise, as for them that are placed in honour and dignitie, God aduanceth them after that fashion, to the intent their fall should be the deadlier, specially if they abuse his gift. Such as haue riches are so swallowed vp into them, as they be as it were an entring into hell: and they become so drunken in their prosperitie, and doo so vaunt themselves agaynst God, that the goodes which they possesse do crie out for vengeance agaynst them. VVee see that such as are strongest, are like stubburne horses that cannot be broken nor brought to handsomnesse, and to be short, there seemeth to be nothing else in the but rage agaynst God. Thus ye see an ouerspitemfull and frowarde iudgement. And therefore let vs learne too holde suche an euen hande as wee condemne not men but by Gods lawe, nor before such time as we bee sure of their faults, so as we may discern them. As for the persons let vs alwayes reserue them to Gods hand, vntill there appeare some certaine marke that God hath reiected them. I hen let vs not of oure parte bee hastie too take vpon vs the thing that is not lawefull. Thus yee see what wee haue too sticke too in this sentence. Neuerthelesse I haue haue sayde alreadie that Iobs meening is verie true: that is too wite, that hee is not punished for his sinnes: but yet it followeth not therefore but that hee ouershot himselfe in his passions. And that ought alwayes too humble vs the more. For when wee see suche a man that was indued with so greate graces, was not able too holde himselfe from swaruing aside, what shall become of vs? Nowe according heerevntoo hee sayeth, That God had ouertrowne him: that is too say, that hee commeth agaynst him after such a disordered maner, as is altoogither oute of square, and hath no indifferencie in it. This may bee spoken in suche a sense as shall not bee euill. For I haue declared heeretoofores, that there is in God a double rightuoufnesse. The one is, that which hee hath set foorth in his lawe: and that rightuoufnesse is well knowne and apparant too vs: it is oure rule [too liue by.] But there is yet another higher rightuoufnesse in God which is secrete and hidden from vs. For when wee shall haue fulfilled the whole lawe, (which is impossible too doo, but we will put the cace it were done) yet haue wee not satisfied God according to his perfect rightuoufnesse: but we shall haue contented him according too the seruice that hee requireth of vs, and according too the abilitie of our humane nature. I meane not suche abilitie as wee haue had since Adam sinned: but suche as wee had by oure creation from God. Put the cace then that wee were Angelles: go too, wee might fulfill the lawe of God: but that were not answerable too his soueraine rightfulnessse, for that is farre higher than all oure vnderstanding is able too reache vntoo, there is no proportionableness betwixt them. So then, our Lorde dooth nowe and then punishe men for their sinnes, euen according to the curses that hee hath set foorth in his lawe. Otherwhiles hee hath no such respect in punishing them, but reserueth the intent of it in his owne secrete purpose, as wee see in his afflicting of Iob. For if it be demaunded why hee did it: when wee haue sought the vttermost, wee shall not finde it too bee for his sinnes, and therefore there muste needes bee some other cause. VWee see what troubles Iacob indured: and yet for all that hee had serued God purely. And what say yee to his fathers, Abraham, and Isaac? It shoulde seeme that God had conspired agaynst them, too make them passe through all the aduersities and miseries that coulde bee deuized. As muche is too bee sayde of Dauid. VWas it for that they were more disordered than other men, and for that they had deserued more rigorous punishment? No. But yee see that God hath secrete iudgements whiche are hidden from vs for a tyme. Therefore Iobs meening heere, is that the affliction which he endureth muste not be taken as one of the common punishments that are implied in the threatnings that God hath published in his lawe: but that there is a higher cause which cannot bee knowne of men. Surely if Iob had simply had that respect with him, hee had had good reason in his so dooing. But when he sayth that God had ouertrowne him, and all was oute of order: he sheweth himselfe too bee ouermaystred of his affections. True it is that he alwayes knewe God too bee rightuous: according as wee see that although hee were shaken, and that such woordes had escaped him, yet hee returneth home againe, and acknowledgeth that hee ought too holde his mouth shette. Neuerthelesse hee ceaseth not too haue his skumme, as a boyling pot that seetheth vp into great wallops muste needes spirt ouer on one side or other. Euen so dooth Iob. And it behoueth vs too knowe that hee stormeth too much agaynst God: which thing is greatly for our profite, if we can applie it to our instruction. Fortouching the first place, wee shall haue profited greatly, if wee beare away this lesson, that God dooth sometimes punishe men not in respect of their sinnes, but too humble them, bicause his intent is too shewe that hee hath full authoritie ouer his creatures, and hath ordeyned them as mirrours of pacience, bicause hee will make them too feele their owne infirmities, that they maye knowe themselues the better when they perceyue that there be couert vices in them which are discouered by afflictions, and that they haue not had such constancie in them, as were requisite, but haue swarued asyde: and that when they shall haue seene themselues so stumbled, they maye bee the more prouoked to call vpon God, knowing that if hee had not reached them his hande, they had bene vtterly vndone. And surely whensoeuer we indure anye affliction: the best remedie is for vs to enter into the knowing of our sinnes, and euery man to accuse himselfe, saying: Alas, I haue offended my God so manye wayes, that if hee shoulde punishe me a hundred folde, I haue deserued it, and much more. Againe, if wee see not alwayes wherefore God scourgeth vs: let vs saye, VVell Lorde, thou art righteous. Although I bee not able to attayne to the reason of thyne intent: it ought to suffyse mee too knowe that thou doest not anye thing, but rightly and indifferently. Then let vs assure our selues, that wee haue true wysedome, if wee can so glorifie G O D, notwithstanding that hee holde our eyes closed vp and leade vs as poore blynde soules. Let vs bee contented too walke whithersoever hee leadeth and directeth vs, assuring oure selues that his onely will muste bee too vs the infallible rule of right: whereas wee see Iob so ouermaystred of his affections, let vs vnderstande that it is a right harde thing for vs too submit our selues to the single will of God, without asking a reason of his woorkes, and speciallye of those woorkes that surmount our wytte and capacite. And thys is it that I sayde afore: namely, that it is a perfect and more than Angelicall wysedome, too haue the skill to yeelde so much honour vntoo God, as to rest meere-ly and simply vpon hys pleasure, that although wee fynde the matter straunge, and (to our seeming) vtterly contrarie too all right and reason: yet wee boowe downe our heades, and saye, Lorde, although thy iudgements bee as a deepe gulfe: yet will not wee presume to encounter them. And trulye Iob was fully disposed so too doo. Yea, and although hee had had roughe assaultes and temptations: yet in the ende hee got the victorie. Neuerthelesse, wee see that hee swarued in saying, God hath ouertrowen my iudgement: that is too saye, hee handleth mee not lyke a iudge, but steppeth too mee with extraordinarie rigour as though hee had no compassion of mee. Seeing that Iob was tempted so farre, what shall become of vs? Therefore let vs applye all our wytte and all our indeuour too this lesson, namelye to rest simply and meere-ly vpon the good will of our God, and not too tarie vpon temptations, although they carie vs sometimes away, but to hold our selues short and to rein our selues with that bridle when we see that God playeth the iudge with vs, and that mortall men auance themselues agaynst their maker, and cannot find in their hartes to subn: i: themselues to that which he sendeth. For although they protest the cleane contrarie: yet in their doings they shewe that they blame God of crueltie, and woude fayne go to lawe with him. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde. And Iob must serue vs for such an example, sith we see the excesse of his panges. Howbeit if wee compare him with those that rush intoo diuelish boldenesse: wee ought yet too bee better warned too humble our selues. As howe? VVee shall see manie that are not like vntoo Iob. For they not onely haue a pang or twaine in chafing: but they also continue from euill too worse. And when any matter falleth not oute too their minde, first they fall too murmuring agaynst God, and afterwarde take libertie too chafe at him: and then if they meete with any vncasie saying, they headinesse is suche as they make no bones to auante themselves agaynst God, yea and too bee wilfull too the vttermost, as wee see these selfewyze folke doo, insomuch that if there bee anie thing in the holie Scripture that agreeth not with their witte and foolish braine, it muste bee condemned at the first dashe, without scanning from whence the same proceedeth. And afterwarde although they bee conuincd: yet cease they not too bee so shamelesse as too list vp themselves agaynst God and agaynst his secrete and incomprehensible iudgements, and too say, Tushe it is impossible for this to enter intoo my head. VVell my freend, if you bee blinde, is the Sunne therefore darke, and shineth it not? If a blinde man say I see no light, is that as muche too say as the Sunne dooth but darken men? That were well too the matter. Therefore sith wee see the diuell caryeth awaye men in suche a rage, that they conclude their reasons agaynst God, so much the more standeth it vs in hande too indeuer to bridle our selues short. And if our impacience doo erewhiles prouoke vs, and pricke vs forward to be angrie with God, and to fret with our selues: at leastwise yet when we haue well stormed, let vs come home againe, (for it is better to turne late than neuer) and let vs say, Lorde what would become of me, if thou hilde mee not backe? Euen so my God, it beho-ueth mee too bee gouerned by thy spirite, that thou giue mee the wisdome too bee wholly subiect too thy good will, whatsoever may betide mee. Lo what what wee haue to marke. Moreouer let vs also compare our miseries with Iobs. For if wee consider well the afflictions that hee indured: they bee so straunge as he might well say, I knowe not howe I may take them, for God opp-presseth mee ouer sore. And for prooffe heereof, if God touche vs but with his little finger: wee be so tender that by and by we are angrie, [and fall too saying,] Howe goes this geere? If God sende vs any common disease, wee beare our selues in hande that he ought rather to haue spared vs. If hee afflict vs in any wise: that will make vs too storme. Too bee short, let him giue vs but one lashe with his rodde: and wee will say hee hath thundred vpon vs. Seeing wee be so impacient, let vs consider what Iob indured, and what woulde become of vs if wee shoulde come too the same poynt. VVoulde wee doo no more but cast vp some skumme and assuage againe? No. It were the next way too set vs quite ouer our shooes, sith wee bee so inlynded therevnto vpon euery small occasion. So much the more therefore behoueth it vs too knowe that wee haue not profited in Gods schoole, till wee haue learned too take patiently all corrections that hee sendeth vs, seeing that they tend to our welfare. Thus ye see what we had more to note vpon this sentence. Howebeit among other things, let vs marke that it is a harde and verie daungerous temptation when God heareth not oure cries and complaints.

Act. 2. c. 21. Yea and although that heauen and earth were medled Ro. 10. c. 13. toogether, and the whole order of nature confounded:

yet shoulde wee still bee preferued by calling vpon the name of God as Iobell sayth. God hath promised that he will heare vs before we open our mouth: and reach our his hande to helpe vs before we speake. Ye see then that God sheweth himselfe so bountifull as yee woulde maruell, assuring vs that hee will succour our necessitie: and yet for all that, when wee shall haue called vpon him, more than once or twice, and when wee shall haue persisted in praying him too haue pitie vpon vs, wee shall continue still in one state, and (which worse is) it shall seeme too vs that God sharpeneth himselfe agaynst vs, too torment vs the more when wee haue called vpon him:

And what a temptation is that? It is sayde to me that the name of God is my refuge, and that God is neere vnto all them that call vpon him saythfully: I haue assayed what those promises meane, and I feele no commoditie by them: but rather my miserie is increased the more. And what a thing is that? Yet notwithstanding Iob came too that poynt, and not Iob onely, but also Dauid and the rest of the saythfull. And specially it behoued the same thing too bee fulfilled in oure Lorde Iesus Christ, according also as it is hee on whome this sentence is verified: namely, I crie vntoo thee daye and night, and yet thou easest mee not of my miseries. Thou seemest too haue forsaken mee: when our fathers resorted too thee, they alwayes perceyued that it was not in vaine, but thou putttest mee heere too confusion. But heereby wee note, that although God haue promised too bee neere vntoo all them that call vpon hym, and too succour them before they open their mouthes too desire him: yet dooth not that import that he sheweth it alwayes too the eye. Howe then? After his owne maner.

It is certaine that before wee call vpon God, hee is willing and readie too helpe vs. And for prooffe hereof, whence commeth the affection of praying? Commeth it not of the holy Ghost? For a man would neuer of his owne minde resort vnto God. Then is it bicause God looketh vnto vs with pitie, when we thinke he hath turned his backe vpon vs. Again, if we haue stoode vpon any time: it muste needes bee that it was through the power which hee gaue vs, and that his succouring of vs with his hande, made vs to bee patient and lowly in our aduersities. And true it is that wee may haue suche a conceyte as it maye seeme too vs for a time that God hath giuen no care too vs. VVee see howe it was so with Iob, and with Dauid, yea and that Iesus Christe also was faine too come to that poynt: not that he was tempted after our maner, that is to say, with impacience: but yet notwithstanding bicause hee had to fight against his owne humaine nature, hee was fayne too suffer angu-gnishe of minde. And forasmuch as God had left him destitute of all helpe, hee was enforced to crie out: My God, my God why hast thou forsaken mee? Therefore when wee haue suche temptations, and are greued by reason of the infirmities and great store of vices that are in vs, according as wee are full of distrust, stubburnnesse, pryde, and other like things: let vs haue recourse vntoo this poynte, that wee bee not the fyrst whome God hath mynded too succour, and haue in the ende felt the profite of theyr prayers, notwithstanding that they languished vnder his hande for a tyme. So then let vs holde oute, and suffer God too keepe vs in languishing as long as it pleaseth him, euen till hee haue delyuered vs and shewed himselfe oure Sauoure [too the full] according as hee hath gyuen vs some taste of it already in this worlde.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God wyth the acknowledgement of oure sinnes, praying him so too clenſe vs of them, as there may bee nothing in vs too hynder vs from comming right foorth vntoo him, and that in oure comming wee may finde him readie too receyue vs for oure Lorde Ieſus Chriſtes ſake. And ſo let vs all ſay: Almighty God our heauenly father. &c.

The.lxx.Sermon, which is the ſecond vpon the.xix. Chapter,

This Sermon conteyneth the expoſition of the.7. 8.9.10.11.&.12. verſes that haue bene touched alreadie, and then vpon the text that ſolloweth here.

13. Hee hath made my brethren too ſhrinke avvay from mee, and mine acquaintance become ſtraungers to mee.
14. My neighbors haue forſaken me, and my father and my mother haue forgotten mee.
15. Mine ovvne houſholde, and my maydeſeruaunts haue diſdeyned mee, and I haue beene as a ſtraunger in their ſight.
16. If I call my ſeruant he anſwereth me not, though I pray him with mine ovvne mouth.

IT behoueth vs to go throughwith the matter that we beganne in the laſt Sermon: which is, that it is a harde and burdenſome temptation when our prayers bee not heard at the firſt. For verely the onely thing that remayneth for vs when we be in aduerſitie, is that God receyue vs if wee deſire him, that he haue pitie vpon vs, and that wee may feele that oure reſorting too him for ſuccour hath not beene in vaine. This (ſay I) is the welfare and comfort of all the faythfull. But if it ſeeme that we haue loſt our time in running too our God too bee ayded at his hande: what will become of it? Shall wee not bee as good as in deſpayre? Yet is it Gods pleaſure too exercize his children after that maner by hyding himſelfe from them, and by making no countenance of hearing them, or of regarding the miſeries that they indure. True it is that he hath promiſed too bee readie too helpe vs as ſoone as we deſire him: yea and that hee will not tarie too bee ſued vntoo, but will preuent our requeſtes. And that is it that maketh the temptation much greeuouſer, namely when God ſeemeth too haue dalied with vs, and too haue giuen vs a vaine and fruteleſſe hope. But let vs vnderſtande, that ſeeing he hath exerciſed his children ſo heretofore: we muſt not maruell though he do the like to vs nowadayes. VVherfore let vs wait patiently, and we ſhal ſee by the ende, that he hath not forgotten vs, ne ceaſeth too heare vs, although he ſhewe not oute of hande in the open ſight of the worlde, that hee hath his hande ſtretched out ouer vs. And out of doubt, if wee bee patient, and able too continue in prayer: it is a token that God hath heard vs alreadie. For if he had not preferred vs after that maner, were it poſſible for vs to haue continued one minute of an houre, as hath beene declared? But it behoueth vs to come to the euill that is in vs. For the cauſe why God delayeth his helpe, and dryueth off the time, is for that we pray not to him ſo hartily as were requiſite. Euerie man will ſay he paſſeth not for praying: and in deede if men bee asked whither they haue done their indeuer too pray God too haue mercie vpon them: euerie one will anſwere, I haue prayed as muche as is poſſible. But all they that ſpeake after that maner knowe not what prayer meeneth. VVe go as coldly to it as to any thing. And do we thinke that God ought to receyue ſuch requeſts as are made but for faſhion ſake, and ceremoniouſly only? Then let vs marke, that God ſeeing our coldeneſſe and negligence, aydeth vs not ſo ſoone as wee deſire, too the intent too quicken vs, and too enflame vs with greater deſire, that by the ſame means oure ſayth may bee the better tryed. Or elſe if we pray to God after a ſort, and that there be no negligence in our prayers, yet wil there be ſome rebellioſneſſe hidden in vs, as we ſee heere in Iob. True it is that Iob prayed: but was it with ſuche mildeneſſe as was meete? No: but hee was rather too impacient. After what ſort then muſt wee go vnto God? Saint Paule giueth vs a rule of it, ſaying that wee muſte pray too hym inceſſantly with giuing of thanks. And although we be tormented and ouerpreſſed with aduerſities, yet muſt we not ceaſe too ſigh and grone: yea and therewithall alſo continually bliſſe the name of God in oure prayers, and ſubmit our ſelues vntoo him. If this bee wanting: it is no praying, it is rather a deſying of God as if a man ſhoulde go ſummon his ennemie and deſie hym. Yee ſee then that our prayers are ſometymes like vntoo ſummonings, according as wee make them vntoo God. And howe is that? The greateſt honour that God requireth at our hands, is that we ſhould call vpon him in all our aduerſities. Nowe, in ſteede of dooing that homage too him, wee come to ſpyte him. Therefore we muſt not thinke it ſtraunge that hee ſhoulde ſtoppe hys eares agaynſt our prayers, and make no countenance too helpe vs, when wee crie vpon him. So then, let vs haue theſe two things: that is to wit, let vs pray to God with an earneſt minde, ſo as it may not bee onely with liplabour, or with caſting foorth ſome ſighes at aduenture: but with beſeeching him from the bottome of our hart. And ſecondly let there be no pride in vs, too be deſirous too make God ſubiect too vs, ſo as he ſhoulde do whatſoever commeth in our heade, and in our fancie: but let vs pray vnto him with allowlineſſe, magnifying him and praying him, although he aſſiſt vs.

VVhen wee haue theſe twoo things, it is certaine that wee ſhall bee hearde ſo muche the rather. For the contrarie vices are the cauſe why God doth ſo much delay his helping of vs. But let vs put the cace that God ſuccour vs not when wee haue prayed duetifully, and with ſuche hartineſſe as he himſelfe requyreth: Yet muſt wee ſtill bee patient, till the conuenient tyme be come, whiche is in his hande. It is for him onely too iudge of that. Then if wee knowe not too day what our prayers haue auayled vs: God will make vs too perceyue it too morrowe. VVherfore let vs ſtande dumbe in that behalfe, and wayte for ſuche oportunitie, and ende as God ſhall liſt too ſende vs: and then ſhall the ſame bee good and luckie for oure welfare. Thus yee ſee what wee haue too marke in this ſentence where Iob ſayeth, that hee had cryed out, but yet was not heard. For the adding of all theſe, is but too complaine that his aſſiſtions are so extreame, as it is no wonder though he be exceedingly fore greued, and that his freendes ought not to stand checking agaynst him. For it is a follie (sayth hee) too deeme by the ordinarie custome what I ought too doo. If a man bee afflicted, and it bee tolde him that he ought to pray vntoo God: as for mee (sayth hee) if I pray vntoo him: I am not heard. If a man replie againe, my freende, you muste not storme so fore, (and peraduenture the aduersitie that he indureth is but some common thing:) no (sayth hee:) but I feele such and so excessiue paine, and the hande of God presseth mee after so straunge and rigorous a maner: as it is no maruel though there bee neyther witte nor reason in mee. Lo what Iobs meaning is. But I haue tolde you heere tofore, howe it behooueth vs too knowe, that God doth sometymes execute his rigour vpon men after an vnknowne maner, as in respect of oure mother witte. And therefore muste wee at suche tymes praye vntoo God, and say, Lorde make mee perceyue continually that thou art at hande with mee, and althoughe I finde it not by experience, but rather am as it were forsaken of thee too outwarde seeming: yet giue mee power alwayes too settle my hope vpon thy goodnesse and succour. Iob shoulde haue spoken so. Howebeit forasmuch as hee dooth it not: Therefore hee roueth ouer all the feelde (as they say) in makinge suche complaintes as wee heare in this text. But too the intent to do oure selues good by that whiche is conteyned heere, let vs marke that in Iobs persone the holy Ghoste ment too set vs oute as it were a glasse of mens affections, when they be not bridled vnder Gods obeyfance. Marke that for one poynt. Another poynt is, that God ment heere too shewe vs his iudgements howe terrible they bee, and that when hee listeth too hyde his louing countenance from vs, and too shewe himselfe an enemye too men, it is so dreadfull a thing, as were ynough too ouerwhelme the whole worlde. That is the seconde poynt. The thirde is, that although Iob were in such pangues: yet notwithstanding he resisted the temptations, howebeit that hee came no sooner too the brunt, but many euill woordes scaped from him, so as infirmitie was mingled with hys strength. Thus yee see the three things that wee haue too marke heere. Firft of all wee note that God will haue men too beholde themselues in the person of Iob. For wee shoulde not knowe what wee bee, if God enforced vs not to perceyue our owne weakenesse. Euerie man thinkes himselfe too bee mightie and strong: wee imagine oure owne power too bee woonderfull, and that wee shall neuer swarue, yea, so long as wee bee farre from blowes. But assoone as God presseth vs, we be so cast downe, as we may well see (if we bee not tootoo dull) that it was but a vaine and foolishe ouerweening in vs, when we thought wee had any strength in our selues, whereas wee haue none at all. Forasmuch therefore, as men are so blinded, and as it were sotted in that foolishe perswasion: the holy ghost presenteth here vnto vs the person of Iob, too make vs perceyue howe men shrinke vnder Gods hande when they be afflicted, and that they cannot stande out, but muste needes bee vtterlye ouerthrowne. Nowe, if this happened to Iob, who was constant aboute others: alas, what shall become of vs? But wee muste come to the seconde poynt which is the chiefest. For whereof commeth it that wee bee not teachable too humble oure selues before God, and too walke in awe without without trusting in oure selues, or in any thing that wee can doo? It is bicause wee feele not howe heauie and vntolerable Gods hande is. The matter then that God decla-reth vnto vs, is that it is a terrible cace when he listeth to vter his power vpon mortall men in punishing them: and that they muste needes melt away at it as snow against the Sunne, and be vtterly confounded. Yea verely (as the Scripture sayeth) God needeth not too vter his rigour vpon vs: let him but onely withdraw his spirite, (that is to say, the liuelinesse wherewith he quickeneth vs) and beholde, we be gone. And when he sayth that not onely he will bereeue vs of his power, but also become contrarie to vs, and fall vpon vs as a thunder and tempest too ouerwhelme vs: alas what can we do? True it is that wee confesse it too bee impossible for mortall men too holde tacke when God assaileth them: but yet for all that wee conceyue not as were requisite howe dreadfull Gods hande ought to bee to vs. Thus yee see what example is shewed vs heere in Iobs persone. But by the way (as I haue touched afore) wee must not suppose that Iob delighted or foaded himselfe in suche passions as were euill and damnable. Howe then? Hee strived to withstand them: But yet did he so fayle, that he was as good as shaken downe with them: and God intended too shewe that men are neuer so vertuous but there is somewhat too bee mislyked in them, and that euer they shew themselues verie weake in some sort or other. And that is greatly for oure profite. For it is to the ende wee shoulde not bee discouraged when wee bee tempted, though it seemeth that wee shall bee vtterly ouerwhelmed.

Then if wee finde oure selues in that cace, lette vs passe further, and pray God too holde vs vp, and let vs not doubt but hee will doo it, sith wee see that although Iob had infirmities of fleshe in him, yet notwithstanding hee fayled not of the victorie. I say let vs not not doubt, but God will so worke as hee will make vs too overcome all oure temptations. Yea but that shall not bee without making vs too limpe, and without giuing vs some blowes, and without making of our woundes to bleede. Let it suffice vs, that the strokes which we receyue are not deadly, but that God will step before vs for a buckler. Nowe let vs come too the complaynts that Iob maketh heere, Hee sayeth that God hath so beseeged his wayes, as hee knoweth not bowe too get out, and that hee hath put darkenesse in his path. Though wee bee afflicted, yet is it a great assuagement of our greefe, when wee see that the mishappe muste passe awaye apace, and not continue still, as if wee finde some meanes too scape it, or shift it off by other mennes counsell. But if all this bee taken from vs, there remaineth nothing but dispayre. This is it that Iob meeneth heere. Hee sayeth that God hath clozed vp all his wayes: which is all one as if he had sayd. Alas where shall I become? For if a wretched man bee tormented with many miseries, hee will looke which way too get out, if not by one way, yet by another, and hee will seeke meanes and aske counsell. But the cace standeth not so with mee. For God hath shet mee vp heere, I see no waye out, I may well reason of obteyning this or that: but there is no releefe at all for me. And why? There is nothing but darkenesse through oute: that is too say, I see neyther way nor path, and God hath so inclozed mee, that at a worde there is no remedie at all. This is the summe of all that is spoken heere. And it behooueth vs too marke it well, to the ende that if the like happen vnto vs, we may not leaue to call vpon God. VVhat is the cause that me shet the dore before the blow come, and are not able too pray, but are vtterly amazed? It is bicause they beare themselues in hande that the like neuer hapned to any man afore. And truly we haue seene already,

alredy, that Iob was assaulted with such temptations as thys: Looke vpon all the faithfull that haue bin before thee, if euer God handled any of them after this fashion. This was a plaine concluding that Iob was forlorne and vtterly castaway. So then ye see a texte that is well woorthy to be marked. And why? For if at any time it seeme vnto vs that the miseries whiche wee indure are endlesse, and that we can neuer be rid of them, but that when we haue sought all the wayes to the wood, it seemeth impossible that euer we should be set free againe: 10

Let vs say, very well, God knoweth how to drawe vs out of this perplexitie: and therefore let vs stand vpon that pointe. Yea but is it likely that God should pitie vs? VVe see the like hath happened to Iob. Let vs looke vnto the end (as Saint James saith) and seeing that God deliuered that man from the miseries that he indured, why should he not succoure vs also at this day? For nother is hys might abated nor his goodnesse. Ye see then to what vse it behoueth vs to applie this sentence of Iobs, when hee saith, that God had shut vp his wayes. Furthermore let 20 vs mark that God doth ere whiles for a time berecue the faithfull of the benefytes that he hath promised them, to the intent they should be prouoked to pray to him, and also when he intendeth to humble them, or when hee chastiseth them for their sinnes. As for Iob, it is certayne that he suffered not for the offences that hee had committed. Not that God found not ynough in him wherefore to punish him: but (as I haue declared heeretofore) bycause he had not that respect only, but rather meant to trie his pacience. But as for vs, if he depriue vs of the 30 blisings that he hath promised vs: it is for that we haue offended him, and are not woorthy to enioy them: or else it is a dash with the spurre which hee giueth vs too make vs pray vnto him the more earnestly. Thus dothe God promise his faithfull that hee will guide them in their wayes, yea and that he will lend them his Angels to bee their guides, so as they shall not step one pace awry, nor be incountered with any euill. This is a goodly promise. But yet notwithstanding it will seeme vnto vs that our way is shut vp, that there is nothing but bram-bles and bushes afore vs, and that there is nothing but 40 mountaines and rocks round about vs: thus are we inclosed and no likelihood of possibilitie to get out. VVhat haue we to do in this cace, but only to say, alas I am not woorthy that God shuld perfourme the goodnesse that he hath promised to his children. I should haue my way playne and leuell, and I know not on which side to step: now therefore it behoueth me to acknowledge my faults.

 Truly God hath promised to send his Angels to guide his faithfull ones. But what for that? It seemeth cleane 50 otherwise in me. Therefore it behoueth me to pray him to voutsafe too shewe the performance of the promise towards me. Thus are we by such meanes stirred vp to call vpon God. Heerewithall let vs vnderstand that hee will not berecue vs of skill and discretion vnto the end, but will make vs too finde way where none is, and hys woorking shall be so much the better knowne vnto vs, whereby wee shall haue the greater occasion to glorify him, whē he shal haue wrought after such a maner as we looked not for. For when God hath gone beyond oure 60 witte and hope: we haue so much the more cause to glorify him. Thus ye see in effect what wee haue to marke in this sentence. Now Iob addeth, that God had bereft him of his glory, and plucked the crowne from his head, that he had consumed him, destroyed him, and bereft him of his hope as a tree [that is cut vp.] Heere Iob betokeneth two thinges the one is that God scourgeth him so roughly, that if he were compared with other men, he should be found too indure much more than they. And secondly he saith that he is not as other that are in aduersitie, who though they suffer very great miserie, yet notwithstanding are as a tree that is plucked vp, but yet hath some litle roote or string leste behind, so as there is yet still some hope for them. But as for me (saith he) I am plucked vp after such a sort, as there remaineth no piece of me, but God seemeth to haue stubbed me vp quite and cleane. For although he were not yet rooted out of the world, yet was his life like a death. Yea and God had giuen him so many woundes, as there had lighted miseries and calamities vpon him: his children had bin crushed to death before him, all his goodes had bin taken away and destroyed, and his body was become a rotten carkeffe. Therefore it is not causelesse that he saith that God had cut him vp and bereft him of his hope, like as if a tree were plucked vp quite and cleane out of the ground, so as there remained nothing of it, the strength thereof fadeth away, and it is not to be hoped that it will spring any more vpon the earth to bring forth any frute, bycause it hath lost al his freshnesse. Iob then sayth that hee was dealt with in like wise. Now when we heare these things, we must not maruell that he was so sore greeued as it seemed that nothing might comfort him any more. For whiche of vs would not be more impacient, if he indured but the hun-dreth part of that which he indured? But yet we perceiue that God stood by him. Then must we hope that he will do as much towards vs. VVhat is the cause of the impa-ciencie that is oftentimes in vs? Like as when we desyre to be pacient in our aduersities, it behoueth vs too take comfort in the fauoure of our God: so also on the contrarie part, when we cannot abide that God should smite vs, but are so testie that (to our seeming) there is nother order nor reason in his doing: then goes our hope too wrecke. Euen so happened it to Iob. He not only displeased God by ouershooting himselfe in suche wise as wee haue seene: but also it was not long of himselfe that he was not cast downe headlong into despaire: and he de-serued well that God shoulde haue rooted him out, and bereft him of all hope, and made him as a tree plucked vp roote and rind. For in speaking after such sort as wee see, Iob was so bereft of Gods grace, as he had bin vtterly vndone, and as it were plunged into hell, if God had not reached him his hand a farre off. So then let vs assure ourselues it was Gods singular goodnesse that he suffered not his seruauant too fall euen into the bottomlesse pitte: and that thereby we be admonished that God had neede to mainteine vs, yea and to lift vs vp againe when we be falne. For God worketh after two sortes towards vs, to the end we should call vpon him. Sometimes hee preserueth vs in such wise by his power, as we fall not at all, and sometimes he suffereth vs to fall, to the ende too lift vs vp againe afterward. Yet notwithstanding it is true that we must not tempt God too giue vs the bridle lyke frantike folke, vnder coloure that he hath wel holpen vp such as haue falne: for then should wee abuse his grace.

 Ageyne it becommeth vs to magnify his gracious goodnesse towards Iob, assuring ourselues that when we bee as good as quite quailed, he commeth to vs and seekes vs out: and very needefull it is that hee should worke after that sort, for otherwise we should be vndone at eue-ry blow as we see heere in a faire looking glasse. Thus much concerning that saying. And furthermore, that we may withstand such temptations, let vs marke that oure life must bee hidden as Sainte Paule also speaketh of it. 70 True it is that we be like a tree that is pulled vp: but yet doth not God ceasse to giue vs secret strength, and wee shall haue continuall freshnesse, notwithstanding that we e seeme to be perished. Then let vs not esteeme our life nor our welfare by that which we behold, and may be discerned by eyesight, or by our motherwite: but let vs vnderstand that God intendeth to preferue vs by a meane which we are not able to comprehend. Our life (sayth Saint Paule) is hidden with our Lord Iesus Christ. And therefore let vs waite vpon that good God, and pray him to giue vs the grace to looke alwayes vnto him, till the time come that he discover that which is now vnknown. For it behoueth vs to be like dead men, vntill such tyme as God quicken vs. VVe may well feele heere beneath some tast of his grace and hee may well giue vs experience of it: but yet if we feele it not at times, we must pray him to waken vs, and to make vs know the loue that he beareth vs. And although we haue not past one drop of Gods grace: yet must we call to mind what Saint Paule saith to the Romans, that if Gods spirit liue in vs, although there be but a very little portion of it: yet is it sufficient to put away all that euer is in vs of our owne wicked nature. VVell then, it is true that we shall not alwayes feele it, nother shall we perceiue the woorking of Gods spirite when it is in vs: but let vs pray God that he suffer not such dulnesse and blockishnesse to dwell alwayes in vs, as we should not feele his grace to applie it to such vse as he would haue vs and to profite our selues by it. Lo what we haue to marke in the second place vpon this streyne. Now Iob saith afterward, that God hath inflamed his wrath against him, and is become his enimie. True it is that as oft as God scourgeth vs, the holy scripture saith that he is angrie with vs. Not that hee is subiect to our passions, nother is it for that he casteth vs away, or that hee hateth vs in deed. VVhat the? It is because he makes vs feele his displeasure by our afflictions. VVhy for? For afflictions are Gods chastizements which he sendeth vnto men for their sinnes. True it is (as I haue said already) that sometimes he chastiseth his seruants for some other purpose. But yet must we alwayes first call to mind that wee bee sinners and detters vnto God, and therefore that he punisheth the sinnes which we haue committed. Howbeit, there is in Iobs saying a particular consideration beyond the ordinarie woont. He complayneth that Gods anger was kindled against him. And oughte that to be any noueltie? For throughout all the holy scripture God declareth and auoweth himselfe to bee angrie with those whome he chastizeth. Yea: but Iob intended to expresse more: that this wrath of God is not a common and accustomed wrath, as though God counted him for an vnter castaway. For like as generally God will haue vs to feele his anger when he punisheth vs, and to enter into the knowledge of our owne sinnes: so also will hee haue vs to knowe that the same wrath of his lasteth but for a while, and that it passeth and fadeth away, as it is saide in the Prophet Esay, It is but for the turning of a hand that I will make thee feele my displeasure: but my mercie I shall indure towards thee euerlastingly. Ye see then that euen in the middes of afflictions, it behoueth vs on the one side to know that God is angrie, bycause wee haue offended him with our sinnes: and on the other side not to doubt but that he loueth vs, and is desyrouse to be at one with vs. But Iob declareth heere, that God hild him as his enimie: that is to say, that this anger is not Gods ordinarie anger, as when he sheweth himselfe angrie with sinners and giueth them some token of his vengeance: but that he was excessiue. This is the sence of that saying. Now what would become of vs if wee were in the same case as he was? For without comfort (as I haue declared afore) it were impossible for vs to be patient. It could not be but we should needes rebell against God, if we knew not his goodnesse. To the ende thou mayst be feared (sayth Dauid) thou Lord arte louing. The if me cannot find in their harts to beleue that God will be pitifull towards them: much lesse will they humble themselves: nay rather they will grinde their teeth against him.

Now it may seeme that Iob was not comforted, but that he beleued that God would destroy him, and that hee had vtterly throwne him downe already. In what plight might he be then? As I haue shewed heeretofore, he declareth heere his former pangs, wherein he passed measure, howbeit that he withstood them in the ende. Now whé we see this, what shift haue we but to pray god that he will in such wise ingraue in oure hartes the promise that he hath made to his whole Church, as it may neuer escape vs? The saide promise is this, That whensoever we shall haue sinned, and whensoever we shall haue swarued from his commaundements: he will chastize vs: but that shall be with the rodde of man, that is to say, he will chastize vs gently, and after a mylde fashion, and his mercy shall neuer be withdrawen from vs, according also as he saith in another text of his Prophet Abacucke. Sith it is so, let vs (saith he) pray him that in all our afflictions he suffer vs not to surmize that he taketh vs for his enimies: but that we may vnderstand that we deserue well to haue warre at his hand, and to find him to be our mortal enimie, bycause we haue prouoked him: and yet notwithstanding, that he ceaseth not to be oure father, but will go forward with his goodnesse towardes vs, howe much soeuer we haue deserued the contrarie. And herewithall although wee be tempted after that manner too thinke that God taketh vs for his enimies: yet let vs not ceasse too fyghte still against it, saying: behold I am sure that if I looke vpon mine owne state, it may well seeme that god holdeth me for his enimie, that he hath as it weraced me out of the number of his seruants: and that he will no more thinke vpon me to succoure me: but yet for all this, I will do him so much honoure as to rest vpon him, and to haue none other recourse but to hym. Thus ye see how we haue to withstand the temptation wherewith Iob was fore laid at, albeit that he were not vtterly ouercome of it. Now he addeth immediatly, for the armie of God is come, and his bands are incamped round about my boufe. He termeth all the aduersities that he indured, by the name of Gods armie or souldiers. This similitude, (namely that all the aduersities whereto we be subiect, are Gods scourges, darts, errors, swords and (to be short) men of warre that haue vs in the chace) hath bin seene heeretofore in another sentence. And it is right necessarie to be knowne. For although we confesse it in generall speech: yet are we not so fully perswaded of it as were requisite. And surely when men suffer any aduersitie, they cannot withhold themselves from thinking that it happened by some misfortune. If there fall any hayle, or if there come any frost to feare the vines and to marre the come: streightwayes it is euill fortune. And this manner of speech proceedeth of that wee looke euer at that which is neereff hand, and can mount no higher to know that all thinges are of Gods disposing. That (say I) is the cause why men runne continually into grosse blockishnesse. And so when the Scripture speaketh of afflictions, telling vs that God holdeth them in his hande, that they be his men of warre, that they bee his souldiers, that they bee too serue his turne, that hee sendeth them, and that he disposeth them at his good pleasure: Let vs marke well euery whit of it, to the end that whensoever our turne commeth to be afflicted in any manner wise, wife, we may alwayes looke vp to Gods hand, and assure ourselues that it is the same that striketh vs, and thereby let vs learne to humble ourselues, saying: well Lord, I see that men trouble me, I see these lower causes, and I see wherefore such a thing is befall me. But in the meane while Lord, thou art above all, and therefore it behoueth me to looke vp vnto thee, and to acknowledge that the strokes come from thine hand. Furthermore let vs marke also, that God hath not only one armie, one sword, or one cudgell to smite vs with: but he hath bandes, he hath whole hostes, redy to besiege vs on all sides, as Iob speaketh heere. Therefore whensoever we be scaped out of one miserie, God can well plucke vs backe againe by and by. And this point is very profitable. For although men be conuincid that Gods hand persecuteth them: yet conceiue they alwayes some vaine hope to get out, and they thinke thus: VVell, I will dispatch this wely-nough: there is yet such a shift. Behold (I pray you) how that whereas men ought to humble themselues vnder the hande of God: they become more stubborne against it, and beare themselues in hand, that if they do but dash at him with their horne, they shall driue him a great way off. And specially we see what stubbornesse is in vs, in that when God smiteth vs with his rod, wee be puffed vp with pride and presumption, and thinke he dothe vs great wrong, not considering at all that he might pinch vs an hundred fold more. Thus ye see what we haue to marke. Finally Iob complaineth that his freends were against him, and euen in that poynt he declareth that hee knew it was Gods hand. This sentence doth yet better confirme that which I haue said alreedy, to the end wee might know how farre this lesson extendeth. Are diseases Gods men of warre? yea, and they are also his scourges and swords. For the scripture vseth all these similitudes, to the intent that according to our rudenesse, wee mighte the better conceiue the thinges that otherwise could not well enter into our head. Yet notwithstanding, this will somewhat agree with our capacitie. But when we change vpon the suddaine, and become our aduersaries, and when they that ought to be our freendes and acquaintance increase our miserie: it seemeth not that that commeth of God. And in very deede whereof come such conceits, but of mens owne corruption? Neuerthelesse it is God that smiteth vs still, and his prouidence guideth it. Also as long as we looke but vpon the things, we would neuer haue thought that men shoulde haue chaunged after that sort, nor haue vsed such spite: and therefore we conclude that such chaunges come of God. True it is that if any deede be faultie or done amisse, and it be told vs that it is of Gods doing: it seemeth to vs that the euill and faultinesse is of God. But it behoueth vs to consider how this doctrine is to be vnderstood. So then it is certaine, that when men be malicious and cruell towards vs: the naughtinesse is of themselues. But yet is it not therefore to be said but that God leadeth them therevnto by bereeving them of all good and kindly affection, and is willing to haue vs persecuted by them. Yet notwithstanding God in so doing doth not euill. For he hath good and iust causes, and dothe

all things vprightly. But men cannot say that their doing of euill hath bin to the intent to obey him. For their owne consciences and his commaundementes do sufficiently conuince them of the contrarie. VVe see then that Iob hath in all caces and all respects graunted suche power vnto God, as he may do what he will with his creatures, and serue his owne turne with them to punish vs when he thinks good. If he send vs any sicknesse, well, it is he from whome they come. If he send vs any other calamities, so as we be destitute of all good things: it is God that doth all, as Iob hath said afore. For although the theceues had taken away his goodes: yet saith he, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken away, blisfed be the name of the Lord. So then let vs weyl what Iob sheweth heere: that is to witte, that when his friends were against him, and came to sting him, yea and were as it were imbattailed against him, minding fully to tread him vnder foote: he knewe how it was God that had so hardened their harts, and was not willing that they shuld vse any courtesie towards him. Iob therefore imputed all this vnto God as if he should say, Lord, thou persecutest me after such an excessiue rate, as I wote not what to say, but that thou hast set me as a butte to shoote al thy vengeance at me. VVhere am I now then? Seemeth it not that thou hast sent me to hell? Lo wherevnto Iobs tale tendeth. True it is that he had good discretio in knowing how it was God that had withdrawn his freendes from him: but yet for all that, his infirmitie sheweth it selfe, in that he quieted not himselfe when he saw the temptacion. For he ought to haue said, VVell Lord, it is true that thou hast armed me against me, thou hast sent the to bid me battell: but yet for al that, I will waite for succoure at thy had: and seing it pleaseth thee to serue thy turne with me in scourging me, I will retire vnto thee, assuring my selfe that thou canst well change their hart when it shall please thee. Lo to what point Iob ought to haue come. He came not to it at the first blow: but yet he went forward vnto it. And therefore let vs looke to ourselues, that whesoeuer we practise our destructio, and persecute vs, we may not stay at the to stick there: but we must know that we haue to do with God. And therefore let vs runne vnto him, that we may trust in his goodness when wee be chastised by his creatures.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good god with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to graunt vs the grace to profit in such wise by the afflictions & chastizement: that he sendeth vs, as we may be humbled and meekened by the same, & not come to aduance ourselues, nor to checke against him, but that being strengthened by his power, we may stand out stedfastly in obeying him, & yet notwithstanding not cease to sigh and grone, seeing the daunger wherein we be, vntill he reach out his had to vs: & that about all things we may looke vp to our Lord Iesus Christ, assuring ourselues that if we be made like to him in our afflictions, we shall haue wherewith to reioyce of our sorrowes in him, waiting for the day of the fulnesse of our ioy, when he shall gather vs into the glory of his resurrection, whereinto he is gone afore vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, &c.

Orasmuch as God hath knitte mē together to the end that one of thē should beare vp another, and each man endeouere to helpe his neighbour, and when wee can doo no more, then wee shoulde haue pitie and compas̄ion one of another: if we happen to be destitute of all helpe, so as we be troubled on all sides, and no man sheweth vs any kindnesse, but every man is cruel to vs: that temptation is very sore. And that is the cause why Iob complayneth in this sentence, that there was nother wife, nor frende, nor any of his household that pitied him, but all the world had forsaken him. Now when we heare these things, wee must applie them to ourselues. For (as it was declared yesterday) God suffereth men to fayle vs, and every body too shrinke from vs, to the end we might the better resorte vnto him. And indeede so long as we haue any stay in the world, we trust not in God as we ought to do, but rather we are hild heere bylowe, for oure nature inclineth too much, and is too much giuen thitherward. Therefore God intending nowe and then to plucke vs backe too himselfe, maketh vs vtterly destitute of all worldly help. Or else he doth it to humble vs, for it seemeth to vs that he ought of reason to haue regard of vs, and that we be woorthy of it, and euery of vs blindeth himselfe with such presumption. Our Lord therefore mindeth to teach vs now and then some lowlinesse by this meane when euery man despiseth vs, and we become as outcasts both to great and small. And so we haue to consider that wee be not the same that we haue taken ourselues to be. But whatsoeuer we be, if this come to passe, let vs be sure that God hath not therefore forsaken vs. For we see that Iob hath his recourse still vnto him and is not disappointed of his hope. God then reached him his hand, notwithstanding that men had shaken him off: and when they imagined him to be past all hope of recouerie, then had God an eye to him to shew him mercie. Therefore let vs trust in him. Besides this, let vs learne to do our duetie towards such as are afflicted, according as I haue tolde you that God hath knitte and vnited vs together, to the end we should haue communitie one with another. For men must not separate themselues vtterly afunder. True it is that our Lord hath ordeined common policie, that euery man should haue his house, his meinie, his wyfe, his children, and euery man be knowne in his degree: but yet must not any man exempt himselfe from the communitie, to say I will liue alone. For that were too liue worse than the brute beast. VVhat then? Let vs assure our selues that God hath bound vs one to another, to the end we should help one another. And that when wee see any man in necessitie, although wee cannot do him so much good as we would, yet at leastwise we must be pitifull towards him. If that be not in vs: let vs marke that here in the person of Iob, the holy Ghost asketh vengeance against vs. For no doubt but that although Iob were tossed with his hideouse and excessiue passions: yet was he alwayes gouerned by Gods spirit, and specially in respect of these generall grounds, that is to say, in respecte of the sentences that hee setteth downe, according as I haue told you that they import right profitable doctrine.

VVherefore let vs marke how our Lord telleth vs heere that it is an ouergreat cruelty in vs, when we see a poore man afflicted, and endeouere not to succoure him, but rather shrinke away from him. Also let vs marke that sometimes the same is said euen of things in the holy scripture by occasion (wherby we may gather a good lesson) which is said here by Iob of his owne wife. He saith, she was not able to abide his breath, though he prayed hir for the childrens sake of hir owne wombe. Heereby he sheweth that children ought to be an increase of the loue betweene man and wife. For when God blisseth a mariage with issew, it ought to increase their mutuall affection to liue in greater concord. The very Painims knewe that welynough. But it is ill performed of those that ought to see much cleerer. And what a condemnation shall it be to the beleeuers, which boast themselues to haue bin instructed in the worde of God, if they knowe not that which nature sheweth to the sillie ignorant sort that are as good as blind? Then looke vpon the Painims, who haue acknowledged that children are as it were gages to confirme better the loue of man and wife, and to holde them in peace and vnitie. According heere vnto Iob saith, that he intreated his wife for the childrens sake that hee had begot of hir. But that moued not hir at all. Then sheweth he how it is a thing against nature, in which behalfe his wife had shewed hir selfe to be worse than a wild beast. So let vs marke that all such as cannot follow that order, are heere rebuked by the way, as if the holy Ghost had pronounced their condemnation in expresse termes. Yet notwithstanding we see many men that haue no discretion when God is so gracioufe to them as too giue them children. Looke vpon a married man. True it is that the marriage is alreddie of itselfe, so holy a thing, that this only saying ought to suffice when it is said, that they shall be two in one flesh, and that a man shall make more account of the vnitie which he ought to haue with his wife, than of the vnitie which hee hathe with his father and mother. But when as God yet for further confirmation of the said grace, addeth increase of children in mariage: if men and women be so beastly, as not to be prouoked and led thereby, to loue one another the better: certainly their vnkindnesse is too grosse. Howbeit (as I haue said alreddie) it is a thing that is euill practised among Christians. Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs to take profite of that saying, though it be not touched heere but by occasion. To increase the euill, Iob sayth that both his friends and also the men of his counsell, that is to saye, those with whome he was wont to communicate all hys secrets turned themselues against him, or else skorned him, so as they made none account of him: and that not only they which were in some credite and authoritie, but also euen the meanest sort, and the very rascals despised him. In effect his meaning is, that he found himselfe destitute of all help, seeing that his friends had failed him: and secondly that he had bin a skorning stocke, in somuche as euen the basest sort in the world voutfased not to looke vpon him to take him as one of their retinew. It must needs bee saide that his affliction was greate, seeing there was none that wold acknowledge him to be as it were of the companie of men: but tooke him alreddie for more than an out cast. Lo in effect what Iob meant to say. But (as I haue haue touched already) Gods wil in exercising him so, was to make him a mirroure vnto vs. Then if it happen that those which are neereſt about vs become our deadly enemies and persecute vs, let vs learne to flee vnto God, and to beare it patiently, seeing it happened so vnto Iob before vs. And ſpecially (forasmuch as the ſame perteyneth to all the members of his Church) let vs beare in minde this ſaying of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt: he that eateth bread at my table, hath liſted vp his heele againſte me. This muſt needes be fulfilled in all the faithfull: and therefore hath our Lord Ieſus ſhewed vs the way, to the intent we ſhould not be too loth to become conformable too his image. VVe ſee then continually, that the faithfull ſhall be betrayed and persecuted by ſuch as they truſt moſt, and are priueſt with them of their doings. Very well, that is a right hard cace, it cannot be denied, and when wee feele the miſchiefe, it is ynough too discourage vs. Howbeit forasmuch as oure Lorde hath tolde vs that it muſt be ſo, & hath giue vs record of it in his only ſonne: let vs paſſe the ſame way, and ſubmit our ſelues too the ſame condition. Thus ye ſee againe what we haue too marke in this text. And now let vs come to that whiche Iob addeth: Haue pitie vpon me, haue pitie vpon me O my friends, for the hande of the Lorde hath touched me already. True it is that when we ſee God puniſh men, we ought of duetie to glorify him, ſaying: Lord thou art righteous. Howbeit, there was a ſpeciall conſideration in Iob, howe that his puniſhment was not for any fault that hee had committed, but for ſome other end. And againe, put the cace that he had bin chaſtiſed for his deſerts: yet notwithstanding, when wee ſee a poore offender whome God hath put to execution, we muſt be touched in our ſelues, and that for two cauſes. The one is that if euery of vs looke into himſelfe, we ſhall finde that God ought too puniſh vs as roughly or roughlier, if it pleaſed him too viſit vs according to our deſerts. Therefore whoſoeuer bethinks himſelfe well, ſhall find himſelfe woorthy too be puniſhed as grieuouſly as thoſe whome he ſeeth ſore diſtreſſed: and therefore wee ought to looke vpon them with pitie and compaſion, and ſo muſt oure vices and ſinnes cauſe vs to humble our ſelues. Beholde a poore wretch, I ſee that God persecuteth him: it is a terrible thing. But what? There is good cauſe why God ſhoulde puniſh me in likewiſe. Then behoueth it me to humble my ſelfe and to behold my ſelfe as in a glaſſe in the perſon of this man. That is one poynt. Againe, when we ſee a man ſcourged at Gods hande as ſore as may be: let vs conſider not only that he was created after the image of God: but alſo that he is our neighbour and in manner all one with vs. VVe be all of one nature, all one fleſh, all one mankind, ſo as it may be ſaid that we be iſſued all out of one ſelfeſame ſpring. Sith it is ſo, oughte wee not to haue conſideration one of another? I ſee moreouer a poore ſoule that is going to deſtruction: ought I not too pitie him and to helpe him if it lie in my power? And although I be not able: yet ought I to be ſorie for it. This (ſay I) are the two reaſons which oughte to moue vs too pitie when we ſee that God afflicteth ſuch as are woorthy of it. Then if we bethinke our ſelues, ſurely eyther we muſt needes be too hardharted and dulwitted, or elſe we ſhall pitie them that are like our ſelues, as when wee conſider thus, behold a man that is formed after the image of God, hee is of the ſelfeſame nature that I am, and againe, behold a ſoule that was purchaſed with the blood of the ſonne of God: if the ſame periſh ought not we to be grieued? This is the cauſe why Iob ſaith now: Haue pitie vpon me my friends, by cauſe the hand of God hath ſmiſten me. For the better vnderſtanding heereof, we muſt take this ground, That it is a dreadfull thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God. Therefore when we ſee God ſend any puniſhment, it behoueth vs to be moued with feare, yea euen although he ſpare vs. I my ſelf am at reſt, and God maketh no countenance to touch me, but I ſee how he ſmiteth one and puniſheth another: is not this a matter to be aſtoniſhed at? Muſt wee tarie till God fall vpon our heads with many blowes? That were ouer groſſe dealing. But when we ſee he is minded to teach vs at another mans coſt, it behoueth vs to haue an eye to the cauſe why he puniſheth men ſo, according as Saint Paule teileth vs. He ſaith not, be afraid, for the wrath of god ſhal come vpo you: but he ſaith, my friends, ye ſee howe God puniſheth the vnbeleeuers while hee ſpareth you. Yet muſt you vnderſtand that it is for your inſtruction whē he ſheweth any token of his wrath vpon men.

Then lette vs marke well this ſentence of the Apoſtle, that it is a dreadfull thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God: and therefore as oft as there is any puniſhment, let vs be moued at it. And thereby we ſhall out of hand be taught to pitie ſuch as are in diſtreſſe, and to ſay, Alas this is a poore creature, if it were ſome mortall wight that afflicted him, a man might giue him ſome reliefe. But God is againſt him: and ought not we to be ſorie when we ſee that? If any man alledge, were it not a reſiſting of God if we ſhoulde be ſorie for thoſe that are puniſhed for their faults: were it not as much as to ſtrive againſt Gods iuſtice? No: for we may well haue ſuch affections in vs, as to allow of Gods iuſtice, yeelding hym praife and glory for that which he doth: and yet neuertheleſſe be ſorie for them that are puniſhed, by cauſe we our ſelues may haue deſerued as muche or more, and ought to ſeek the welfare of all men, ſpecially of thoſe that are neereſt to vs, and where God hath put any band betwixt them and vs, according as we may allow of ciuill iuſtice whiche is nothing elſe but as it were a little glaſſe of Gods iuſtice, and yet not ceaſſe too haue pitie vpon the offender. VVhen a tranſgreſſer is puniſhed, men will not ſay that he hath wrong done vnto him, nor that there is any crueltie in the iudge. But they will ſay, that ſuch as are ſet in place of iuſtice, diſcharge their duetie, and offer an acceptable ſacrifice vnto God whē they put an offender to death. But yet in the meane while we will not ceaſſe to pitie the poore creature that ſhall ſuffer for his euill doings. If we be not moued thereat, there is no manhood in vs. If we graunt this in worldly iuſtice, which is but as a little ſparke of Gods iuſtice: I pray you when wee come too the ſoueraigne ſeate [of iuſtice] on high, ought wee not firſt too glorify God for all that hee doth, aſſuring our ſelues that he is iuſt and vpriſt in all points and in all reſpects? And yet notwithstanding (as I ſaid afore) the ſame ſhall not hinder vs to pitie ſuche as ſuffer puniſhment, to comforte them and too ſuccoure them, and when we can do them no more good, to wiſh their ſaluation, praying God to make their corrections profitable in drawing them home to him, and not too ſuffer them to become hardharted, and to ſtrive againſt his hand.

Behold (I ſay) wherevnto Iob groundeth him ſelfe when he deſyreth and beſeecheth his friends to haue pitie vpon him. And he ſpeaketh purpoſely to thoſe that were next about him. For although God haue generally ſet an vnitie among all men, that is too ſay, although hee haue knitte them altogether (as I haue ſayde afore) and that they oughte not too ſeparate them ſelues one from another: yet notwithstanding he byndeth vs dubbie when there is eyther kinred or any other aliance betwixt

vs, and we know that neighbours ought to be moued to yeild a more priuate friendship one to another. For in that behalfe God hath (as ye wold say) put vs vnder one yoke, as men might put beasts: and the brute beasts ought to teach vs what we haue to do. VVhen two Oxen are yoked together, if any of them both be stubborne, they trouble one another: and if they agree not to labour willingly together and also too drinke together and too sleepe together, they must needs be as it wee their owne tormētours in that case. Euen so is it with men. VVhen God marcheth them together, after what maner so euer it be, it is as if hee wold cupple them vnder one yoke to aide and support each other. Now if they be sturdy and worffe than brute beasts: what condemnation bring they vpon their owne head? So then let vs marke well, that after as god linketh vs together, and giueth vs the meane to communicate together, so doth he bind vs one to another. For a friend is more bound to his friend than to another man: and although it behoue our charitie to be generall, and vs to loue all those whome God commendeth vnto vs, yea though they were our mortal enemies: yet shall the husband be more bound to his wife, the father to his children, the children to their father, and the kinsfolke also one to another: and it behoueth vs too knowe generally all the degrees of friendship that God hath set in this world. Now Iob addeth, VVby do you persecute me as God doth? It should seeme that this saying hath no great reason in it. For (as I haue touched alreedy) it is said, that the righteous man shall wash his hands in the bloud of the vngodly. Then ought we to be glad when we see God punish the wicked: but Iob alledgeth heere, that men ought not to persecute those whome God afflicteth. This question hath bin dissolued alreedy, when I saide that wee may well agree to Gods iustice, and yet notwithstanding not cease to pitie and comfort those that suffer, if it lie in vs: at leastwise we must haue the affection to wish their saluation. Then were it a cruell matter if we should persecute men as well as God doth. And why? For when God punisheth sinners, (I meane not the righteous sort, such as Iob was, but such as haue liued amisse and led a wicked life:) it is not to the ende that wee should looke big vpon them, and vexe them more and more: but first that euery of vs should learne to condemne himselfe in another mans person [and say] I see that this man is smitten with Gods roddes. And why? For his sinnes. And is not God iudge of the whole world? Yes: then doth this matter concerne me also: for am I guiltlesse? Is there nothing in me that God may find fault with? Alas there is nothing but sinfulness in me, ye a and too grosse sinfulness. Ye see the how me ought to condemne themselves in other folks persons as oft as we see that God sendeth punishments vpon them: and therewithall also God mindeth to inure vs to pitifulnesse and compassion. If we follow this order, we can not do amisse. But if wee fall to grieuing of those that haue too much greefe alreedy, without hauing respect to our own faults: is it not a crueltie? we wold vsurp Gods office to be iudges, whereas we ought rather to bethinke vs how it is said, that all of vs must appeere before the iudgement seate of God. True it is (as I haue saide) that God ought of right too be glorified in all the punishments that he sendeth vpon me. But that is not as much to say, as bycause we know that God must be the iudge of all men, therefore each man ought not to condemne himselfe, and to hold himselfe within the compasse of some humanitie. And thus ye see that Iob hath iust cause to reprove his frēds for persecuting him as God did. Then let vs marke well, that if God vtter his vēgeance vpon such as

haue offended, his meening is not to arme vs with vnnaturalnesse, & to set vs in a rage against the poore paciētts that are vtterly cast downe: but rather he wold that we should rue them. Ageine Iob blameth the crueltie of his frēds, saying that they cannot be satisfied with his flesh. VVherefore (saith he) can ye not satisfie yourselves with my flesh? It is certaine that the thing whiche he taketh is a similitude. For when we be (as ye wold say) so flesht vpon our neighbours: it is all one as if we would eate them alyue: And we also do often vse suche manner of speeches in our common talke. So then like as a man taketh pleasure at his repast in eating and drinking: so it seemeth that they which are cruel against their neighbours, could find in their harts to feede vpon them and to eate them vp or to swallow them quicke. Ye see the why Iob saith, VVby do ye not satisfie yourselves with my flesh? For when wee see oure neighbours haue aduersitie ynough and more than ynough, and yet are not satisfied with it, but increace their miserie further: it is to great a crueltie, it is all one as if we wold eate them vp. Therefore this circumstance is too be noted well when Iob saith, that at leastwise his friends ought to haue bin satisfied too see him so ouerthrown. VVhat would ye more saith he? I am at the last cast so as I can holde out no longer. If wee haue hated a man and wished his harme, and sought all meanes to be reuenged of him, yet if he happen to fall into extreme miserie, behold it is a naturall thing for our anger to be appeased. Yet say I not that such an affection ought to be counted a vertue. For although the heathen men were wicked, and thought it lawfull for them too reuenge: yet notwithstanding they were of that minde, that they wold be appeased when they saw their enemies so sore afflicted, as that they needed not to put too theyr hand. As how? Admit a man haue done some other man harme. VVell, he that is offended wold reuēge himselfe if it were possible. Now in the meane while God preventeth him, and sendeth some great misfortune vpon the offender. The man that erewhile was full of rancor and defyred nothing but to destroy him whome he hated, will say, yea, and what shall I do more to him? He is so oppressed as it is pitie to see, he hath ynough alreedy. Thus then the fyre doth naturally quench of it selfe, if we see a mā in aduersitie, though we wer neuer so much moued against him before. This (as I said) is no vertue, nother deserieth it to be counted for Gods seruice or for charitie. But yet for all that, if there were such a naturall inclination euen among the Painims: what shall become of those which now adates are not satisfied whē they see their enemies persecuted with extremitie: but are so vn-satiabile as they could find in their harts euen to eate the vp? And if it be damnable when it is done to a mans enemies, so as hee is not contented with the miseries that God sendeth vpon them: what a thing were it too be done to a mans friends? Therefore let such as are so cruell assure themselves that they bee not woorthy to be counted in the number of men. Then whosoever mindeth to discharge him selfe of his duetie, must not only appease himselfe at the miserie and affliction of his enemies: but hee must also be moued too pitie: and instead of seeking reuenge, hee must rather be ready too succoure them as much as hee can. For no doubt but that when God sendeth any aduersitie too our enemies and vnto suche as haue offended vs, his intente is too asswage the malice and rancoure that is in vs, and too shifft away the cause that made vs to be so ill mynded towards oure neighbours. Nowe if God call vs too gentlenesse, and wee go cleane from it: is it not a manifest fyghting againste him? Then let vs marke well, that if God

if God scourge them that haue done vs any wrong or iniurie, it is to asswage the bitteresse of our stomacks: and if we haue bin angrie or displeas'd before, or if we haue coueted reuengement: God intendeth to meeken all those lewde affections in vs, and to leade vs to compassion and kindnesse. Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne. Now Iob addeth no new complaints of his miseries, saying that his bone cleaued to his skinne, and that hee was escaped with the skinne betwixt his teeth. This serueth to expresse the matter better which we come to touch: that is to witte, that his friends ought of right to haue bin satisfied though they had bin very beasts and had fought but to deuoure him. And why? For (saith hee) ye see in what state I am. VVhat desire ye more? Can a man with any more miserie in one person than God hath sent vpon me? Now when he saith that his skinne claue to his bones: it is as muche as if hee had saide, that he is vtterly withered away, that hee is become the right image of a dead man, and that there is no more moylture nor substance in him. And when hee saith he is scaped with the skinne of his teeth: it is to do vs to vnderstand, that there was no whole part in him, but his gummies, or that hys skinne was become like his gummies. For if a woorme do breede in a mans body, the skinne will be no more drie: but it will be like the skinne of his gummies, that is to say, when rottenesse hath gotten the vpper hand and all is woormeaten, a man shall see the flesh bloody, and there will ooze out halfe bloud and halfe water as out of a wound, like as we see how a wound will resemble the skinne of a mans gummies. Thus then Iob declareth that he was so disfigured, as the phisnomie of man could no more be discerned in him. Now seeing he was come to such extremitie, had it not bin reason that his friends should haue bin contented? Then are we warned heere to looke better vpon our neighbours aduersities than we haue done, and when God sendeth them any miseries, to pray him to giue vs the grace to haue our eyes better open to consider and marke them well, so as the same may moue vs to pitie: and euery of vs do his indeuer to remedie it as muche as they can, and finally to hope that when God hath so laide his hand vpon them hee will shew himselfe mercifull towards them. And forso muche as Iobs friends had accused him of blasphemie agaynste God, and of iustifying himselfe without cause, and of blinding himselfe in his owne vices for wat of acknowledging them: he saith, O that my wordes were written, O that they were ingraued with a pen of yron, O that they were ingraued in lead or stone for euer, and for an endlesse memoriall. In saying so, Iob declareth that he had not mainteyned his innocencie in vaine, nother feared to be blamed for it before God, for he knew he had iust cause so to do. Thus ye see in effect whereat he ameth. Neuerthelesse it is certaine that in respect of Iobs words, there was excesse and much bytalke. For hee kept not measure, and how good and reasonable ground soeuer hee had, and that his case were allowable before God: yet did he misconuey it (as I haue declared heeretofore) and many wordes escaped him that were blameworthy. VVhy then saith hee still, that he would faine that hys wordes were written? Is it not ynough to bring dubble condemnation vpon his owne head? Let vs marke that Iob hath an eye to the principall pointe, and tieth not himselfe to euery word that he had vttered: but taketh his sayings heere for the defence of his case. Now that defence was iust. And although it were mishandled & often leapt out of, now at one side and now at other: yet notwithstanding hee still mainteyned rightly that hee was not punished for his sinnes, nor was to be counted the wickeddest man in the world bycause God shewed himselfe so rigorous to him. Iob then hath set downe this thing vpon good reason. but yet hath he done amisse in that hee acknowledged not his sinnes in suche wise as hee mighte feele himselfe alwayes faultie before God.

Heereby we be warned to be very well aduised what wee say. It is said in the Psalme, I determined with my selfe to hold my peace and tooo bridle my selfe so long as the wicked bare sway and had their full scope: but in the ende I could not refraine. Dauid knew well, that when Gods children are tempted, by seeing themselves oppressed with afflictions, while the wicked sorte triumph and haue winde and wether at will: it is so fore a case, as we can very hardly refrayne ourselues from murmuring against God. For this cause it is saide, I determined to brydle my selfe, I did put on a snaffle, and I coped vp my lippes, to the intent I might not speake a word. But in the end all these letts were broken, and all the determination that I purposed vpon, could not hold me from vttering the desyre that I had conceyued within, but that finally the fyre kindled and brake out. Hereby Dauid sheweth that it is a very great and rare vertue to be patient with silence and to holde oure tung when miseries oppresse vs, and specially when we see the wicked mens mouthes open to boast themselves and to scoffe at vs. So then, by ioyning this saying of Dauids with the example of Iob, wee must learne to keepe our mouth shut when God afflicteth vs. And why? For our affectiōs are so headie, that although we haue learned to speake simply, and to praise and blisse God as we ought to do: yet can we not be so well aduised, nor so well stayed, but something will escape vs, and some bubbles will burst out, so as wee shall alwayes be faultie in our talke. Then although we haue no intent to blaspheme God, or to speake any thing that may not be to his honoure: yet can it not be auoided but we shall be ouerhardie in our talke, like as when Iob desyred to haue all his sayings registred and ingraued for an euerlasting remembrance, and printed in stone or leade, too the intente it might neuer be blotted out. But let vs rather aduise our selues to pray God to forgive vs the faultes [that wee make] euen in those words which we thinke to be purest. For (as saith Saint Iames) he that can refraine his tung hath a singular vertue. And why? For wee bee as swift to speake euill as can be: and when we thinke we haue spoken very soundly, God can still find somew hat amisse in it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. Now in the end Iob addeth, that he knoweth that his redeemer liueth. Verely this cannot be wholly expounded as now: but yet must I touch the intent for whiche Iob said so. His meening is that he delt not after the manner of hypocrits in smoothing his case before men tooo justify himselfe, but knew that he had to do with God. This is a thing that we ought to know. For if these sentences heere shoulde bee taken as broken of [from the matter:] they would haue no great edifying, nother shoulde we knowe what Iob ment. VVherefore let vs remember what I haue touched afore. VVhat is it that Iob pretendeth? VVee knowe that men will labour all that they can tooo excuse themselves, and that is, bycause they thinke not vpon God, it is ynough for them that the worlde likes well of them, and that they bee taken for honest men. Thus then dothe hypocrisy ingender an vnshamefastnesse. For if I knowe not God tooo bee my iudge, it will suffice me that men clap theyr handes at me, and haue me in good reputation. And what gayne I by that? Nothing Iames. 3. a. 2.

Nothing at al. Is it not an exceeding great shamelesnesse, when although mine owne conscience accuse me, and I be conuicted to haue done amisse, yet for all that I will perke vp with my neb, and saye, whereof can any man accuse me? VVhat haue I done? Haue I not a good case? I will take faire colour to couer my skinne, and if I can bleare mens eyes, rush, my case shall then speede well ynough. And this is it that I spake of: namely that hypocrisie ingendreth shamelesnesse, so as men become bold to mainteine their case for good, bycause they haue no regard of God. But Iob contrariwise saith, I know that my God is alieue, and that in the end he will rise vp vpon the dust. And if he should say, I am taken for a wicked man and desperate persone as though I had blasphemed God in laboring to iustify my selfe against him. No no, I desire nothing but to humble my selfe vnto him, and to repose my selfe wholly in his grace: but yet for all that I must be faine to maintaine mine vprightnesse against you. For I see you go to worke with nothing but slaunders. My defence then is after such a sort, as in the meane while I looke vnto God and haue mine eyes fastned vpon him. Heereof we both may and ought to gather a good lesson: which is, that we must not be so popcholie as too couer our faults afore men, and to make countenance of mainteineing a good case, and to beare a face of honest men: and yet all the while to be reipoued of our owne conscience. Rather let vs learne to enter into our selues, to examine our owne finnes, and too cite our selues before God: let vs (I saye) begin at this point to say, howe now? what intend I? True it is that I may well excuse my selfe afore men: but in the meane time what shall that boote me before God? VVill he accept it? No. Therefore according to this, let vs all come before the heavenly iudge both great and small, and let euery one of vs present himselfe there to craue pardon of his offences, and let vs not doubt but that if we come vnfeynedly, he will acquit vs, not for any woorthinesse of our owne, but of his owne grace and mercie.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God, with acknowledgement of our finnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as being right cast downe as we ought to be, we may repaire to the fouercine refuge of his infinite goodnesse which he hath promised vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, and there take so sure foundation as we may not doubt of his fauoure towards vs: yea and that although wee do not alwayes feele the same after that sort in this world by the outward working, but rather that he sheweth vs some tokens of rigoure: yet we may not cease to call vpon him, in all our aduerfities, not doubting but that in the end he will shew him selfe a louing and mercifull father towards vs, and make vs feele it by prooffe also in time conuenient. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people, &c.

The lxxij. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the ninenth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth still the exposition of the five and twentieth verse, and then the text following.

26. Although after my skinne, the [vvormes] destroy this [body: yet] I shal see God in my flesh.
 27. I shall behold him in me, mine eyes shall see him, and none other: my kidneyes are vvafted in my bosome.
 28. And you haue said, vvherein is he persecuted? and the roote of the matter is found in me.
 29. Be ye afraid of the presence of the lvvord: for the vvrauth of affliction is vvith the fvvord, to the intent ye should knowv that there is a iudgement.

Yesterday we saw what protestation Iob made: which was, that hee had his eye vpon God and was not tied too men, bycause that they whiche rest themselues heere by-low, are not willing tob enter into their owne consciences, too condemne themselues as they oughte too do, and to feele their owne finnes, that they might confesse themselues too haue done amisse, and craue forgiuenesse at Gods hand. For wee see that assoone as we be lesht among men, we desire no more but to ouercome them be it by truth or by vntruh. Lo heere the cause why we thinke not rightly vpon God, and consequently indeuer not to mend our misdoings as we ought to do, and to be short that there is nothing but hypocrisie. And therefore Iob saith, that he knoweth that his redeemer is alieue: as if he should say that his pleading hitherto had not bin to iustify himselfe in suche wise afore men as though that were the marke he shot at: for hee knew he should be faine too come before God and there to be iudged and to render an account of all his life. And afterward he addeth, that God shall stand vp fast vpon the dust: as if hee had saide, VVhen men faile (as the worlde must needs perish) yet doth God continue for euer: and therefore it were a great follie in me to desire to excuse my selfe afore men, when in the meane while God should condemne me.
 For they that are my iudges as now, whither they bee willing too bee so, or whither I cast that honoure vpon them, must perish with me, but God must continue for euer. So then it suffiseth me to yeeld my selfe vnto him, and to heare what it shall please him to determine. Now whereas he saith, that God shall stand vp vpon the dust: hee meaneth that he is not like men. For seeing we must all all of vs fade away euen till we come to nothing, and we knowe we must returne from whence we came, euen into corruption and rottennesse. But God (saith he) can neuer decay as men do: he will continue in his state euerlastingly. Ageine let vs marke, that Iob meant to do vs to vnderstand, that God will spread out the same power that is in him, vpon the dust, that is too saye vpon men who are nothing, ne haue any power or strength at all in them.

But this title whyche hee yeeldeth vnto God, importeth yet more: namely that he is his maker, and the partie by whome hee is maynteyned. If God listeth, he could continue in his full state, and in the meane whyle we should perish: but he intendeth to make vs partakers of his strength, and to cause vs to feele it. And so he stan-deth vp after such a sort vpon the dust, as he maketh the dust to awake out of hand, and setteth it vp agayne. For were it not so: in vaine were he named the redeemer and maker. Therefore let vs marke wel that Iob intended to declare that God holdeth not the saide power inclosed only in his owne Being, but also spreadeth it out vpon men. Heere is a good lesson for vs. For firste of all we bee

wee bee warned what a fondnesse it is to be desirous to please men only, and to be allowed of them. VVhat gaine we by it? For euery whit of it muste fall to the ground. Therefore let vs learne to haue our eyes fastened vpon God, that he may like of vs, & allow of vs. Marke wher-vnto wee must apply all our indeuer. And herewithall, to the intent we be not hilde backe by this world, nor wrapped in hypocrisse which is ouersurely rooted in vs by nature: lette vs assure our selues that God is our warrant: that it belongeth to him only to maynteyne mens soundnesse, when they shall haue walked with a pure conscience before him: that he shall one day be their iudge, & stand vp vpon the duste: and that albeit that all things which wee see aboute vs bee frayle and transitorie: yet is not God like them but hath a hygher state, not only for himselfe, but also to set all creatures in their state when they bee disordered. And it is an inestimable comfote for the godly, that when they see themselues borne downe with slaunders in the world, and although they haue indeuered to walke a right, yet men cease not to heaue at them, and to backebite them falsly: they can still referre themselues to God, and call him to be their witnesse and rest vpon this assurance, that he will stand out when men shall be brought to nothing. VVell then, They that presume as now to condemne vs, and to rayle vpon vs, must tumble downe, and their chaunce must be quite turned. For God will at length bee our redeemer. As now through rashnesse men vsurpe Gods power, and vnder-take that which is not lawfull: but in the end God muste shew himselfe as he is, and he must be exalted, that wee may knowe howe it belongeth to him to maynteyne vs. Beholde what wee ought to call to minde as oft as men do falsely misreport vs and wee haue good record before God: namely, that it is ynough for vs to be vphilde by him, and that he alloweth of vs, though all the world beside do reiect vs. But now lette vs come to that which Iob sayeth. He sayeth that the woormes (for although the woorde woormes bee not set downe in the Hebrew text, yet it is well seene that he meeneth all vermine and corruption) hauing eaten his skinne, will also gnawe and fret away the rest of him, and yet for all that, hee sayeth that he trusteth too see God, yea and to see him in his fleshe, that is to say, by being restored againe, Yea (sayeth he) I shall see him, and none other, notwithstanding that my kidneyes be consumed in me, that is to say, that all my strength be weakened and taken away. It is a protestation woorthie to be noted, when Iob sayeth that he will haue his looke fastened vpon God and none other, yea euen though he be vterly consumed. As if he should say, he would not measure the hope that he had in God, by that which he might see: but euen when nothing appeareth, yet will hee not therefore cease to looke vnto God. As howe? If a man finde himselfe forsaken of God, so as he perceyue nothing but matter of despayre, and death manace him on all sides, yea and is readie to swallow him vp, & yet neuertheless he holdes his owne still, and is stedfast in fayth to say, yet will I call vpon my God, and I shall yet feele his helpe, his mightinesse is ynough of it selfe too giue vs courage, yea and that shall bee euen when I shall seeme to be forlorne: That is the man that ouerpasseth all worldly things. The shewing of his fayth and hope which he hath in God, is not in the things that may be seene and comprehended by naturall reason: but it passeth out of the worlde, according as it is sayde that wee muste hope beyonde hope, and that hope is of things that are hidden. Nowe wee see Iobs meaning. True it is that he speaketh not here expresse-ly of the Resurrection. But yet these woordes cannot be expounded, but it muste be perceyued that Iob men to attribute such a power vnto God, as is not to be seene as now in the common order of nature. Therefore it is all one as if he had sayd, that God will haue vs to knowe him, not onely whyle he doth vs good, and whyle he preserueth and nurrisheth vs: but also although he sayle vs to our seeming, and we see nothing but death before vs: yet muste wee be fully resolued, that our Lorde will not leaue to be our keeper, and that if we be his we shall bee maynteyned by his protection. Howbeit the better to profite our selues by this sentence, lette vs wey throughly what Iob sayeth. Although that the renant of me (sayeth he) be eaten away vnder my skin: yet shall I see my God. This is more than to beleue in God bycause he maketh the earth too bring forth come and wine: as wee see a number of brutish folke which haue none other taste or feeling that there is a God in heauen, but for that he feedeth them and filleth their bellies, and if a man aske them which is that God: they answer, it is he that nurrisheth vs. True it is that wee ought to conceyue the goodnesse and power of our God in all the benefites that hee bestoweth vpon vs: but yet must we not stay there: for (as I sayde) wee muste mount by fayth aboue all things that can bee seene in the worlde. And therefore lette vs not say, I beleue in God bycause hee maynteyneth mee, bicause hee giueth mee health, and bycause he nurrisheth me: but I beleue in God bicause he hath giuen me heretofore some taste of his goodnesse and power in hauing a care of this bodie, which is but rottenesse, so as I see he sheweth himselfe a father in that I haue a being through the power of his spirite: I beleue in him alone, bycause he calleth mee too heauen, and hath not created mee as an Oxe or an Ass to liue here a little whyle, but hath formed mee after his owne image, to the intent I should hope for the inheritance of his kingdome and be partaker of the glorie of his Sonne. I beleue that he allureth mee dayly thither, to the intent I shoulde not doubt but that when my bodie is layde in the graue, and there consumed as it were to nothing: yet notwithstanding it shall bee restored againe at the laste day, and in the meane whyle my soule shall bee in safe and sure keeping, bycause that when I am dead God will haue it in his protection, and then shall I beholde much better than I do now, the lyfe that our Lorde Iesus Christ hath purchaced for vs by his blood. Thus yee see what our beliefe muste bee if it be well ruled. And if wee bee once so well disposed: wee may say with Iob, well, verely I see my bodie muste go to decay: looke what freshnesse foeuer was in it, it diminisheth day by day, and I neede not to go farre too seeke death. For I see not so small an infirmitie in my fleshe, but the same is to mee a messenger of death: but yet for all that, I shall see my God. If wee coulde speake so when wee see that our strength droupeth and vanisheth away by little and little: that although it pleased God to finite vs in such wise as wee shoulde in maner rotte aboue the grounde, as Iob did, (for he sayeth that his skinne was worme eaten and consumed, and he was as good as dead, and yet he protesteth that he will not cease looking vnto his God) yet should wee not cease too trust in God still after the example of Iob. Thus yee see that the greatnesse of the afflictions that God sendeth vs shall not astonish vs, so wee haue learned too knowe him to bee such a one to-wardes vs as he is in deede, that is too say, if wee consider well to what ende he hath created vs, and still maynteyneth vs in the worlde. Furthermore when Iob sayeth, that he shall see his redeemer in his fleshe: his meaning is (as I sayd afore) that hee shall bee restored to a newe state, though his skinne were so eaten as it was. For he sayeth expressly that his bones shall be consumed, and nothing of him shall remaine whole: and afterwarde he addeth, I shall see God in my fleshe. And howe shall he see him in his fleshe? That is to say, I shall be set in my former state, and see my God yet againe. And so he confesseth that God is able ynough to set him vp againe, although he were vtterly consumed, and plunged into a bottomlesse pitte. Thus ye see that the condicion wherevpon we must trust in God, is that when he shall haue layd vs in our graues, we should assure our selues, that he will reach vs his hand to lift vs out againe. Therefore let vs say, I trust in God bicause I see he asisteth mee and fayleth mee not in any thing. But when God fayleth vs, and is as it were estraunged from vs, let vs euen then say with Job, I shall see him in my fleshe, as nowe I am nothing, I seeme to bee but a shadowe, and my life vanisheth away out of hande: but yet for all that, my God will shewe himselfe mightie in my behalfe, so as I shall see him. If Job spake thus in the tyme when there was not yet any great learning, nor perchance the Lawe was yet written: (but admit it were) notier were there yet any Prophets, (at leastwyse not any mo than Moyse, for the Prophets make mention of Job as of a man of old time:) I say if Job hauing but only a little sparke of light, was so strengthened in his afflictions: and that not onely when he saw some one kinde of death, but also when God seemed too haue set him as a spectacle among men, (a dreadfull and terrible thing) he was able to say, yet shall I see my God: what excuse is there for vs in these dayes when God sheweth vs the resurrection so neerely and expressly, and giueth vs so many goodly promises of it? And specially considering how we see the mirrour and substance thereof in our Lorde Iesus Christe, whom he hath rayzed againe to the intent to put vs out of doubt that we shall one day be parttakers of the same immortall glorie. Then if after so much assurance, we cannot be brought to be of the same beliefe that Job was of: must we not needes be charged with vnthakfulness? For if we could embrace Gods promises with true fayth, would they not be of sufficient power to make vs to mount ouer all the temptations that do so reigne ouer vs? So then let vs marke well this text, that wee may say with S. Paule, That if this corage of our bodie were gone (for he termeth it a corage as a thing made of leaues, or as a shed that is nothing woorth) we haue a much better and excellenter buylding prepared for vs in heauen. If this outward man, that is to say, if all that pertayneth to this present life and all that is seene, were done away: yet would God renew vs againe, yea and he maketh vs already to beholde our resurrection after a sort, in that we see our bodies waste away after that maner: according also as in another text the same S. Paule sendeth vs too the seede that is cast into the earth, saying that the same cannot grow to haue a liuely roote, and to yeeld good fruite, except it first rotte. Do we then see that death hath dominion ouer vs? Lette vs marke that God is minded to giue vs a true life, that is to say the heavenly life which is purchaced for vs by the precious bloud of his Sonne. If that were not, the least temptation in the worlde would overcome vs. For (as I haue sayd already) all the miseries that wee haue too suffer, are as many messages of death. Nowe if wee sawe death and thought it should make cleane riddance of vs: must we not needes vtterly quayle? Then is there none other meane to comforte vs in our afflictions, but onely this doctrine, that when all that euer is in vs, is consumed, yet shall we not cease too see our God, yea and too see him in our fleshe. Afterward it is sayd, Mine eyes shall beholde him, and none other.

2. Cor. 5. a. 1

1. Cor. 15. e. 36.

Job addeth this as continuyng the matter that he maynteyned: that is to wit, Seing that my God hath assured mee that he will make me strong againe: I will holde me wholly vnto him, I neede not too stray any further, nor to be haled one way or other: for it behoueth me to hold my selfe too him alone. Mine eyes then shall beholde him and none other.

Behold here one goodly lesson more. That which he spake crewhile, (that is to wit, that he should see God in his fleshe,) hath a relation to experience that God should set him vp againe vpon his feete. But that which he speaketh now, is spoken in another respect, that is to witte, in respect of hope. For God is seene of vs in two maners. VVee see him when he sheweth himselfe a father and Sauour in effect, by giuing vs open prooffe and experience of it. Beholde, my God hath deliuered mee from such a sickenesse, which was as it were a rayfing from death: the same is a recorde that he hath layde his hande vpon me too succour mee: thus do I see him, yea and I see him effectually. Howbeit euen while I am sicke and when there is no more likelyhood of recouerie, I cease not to see God still. For I put my trust in him. Againe, I wayte patiently for the ende that he shall giue mee, and I doubt not but I am his still although he take me out of the worlde. Thus ye see yet another maner of beholding God. Job then meeneth that he shall see God in effect by being set agayn in his former state. And secodly he addeth, that he will not cease to beholde him although he be ouerwhelmed with miseries, that he can no more. Mine eyes (sayeth he) shall bee fastened vpon him, and I will not looke aside from him. Here wee see what is the nature of fayth: namely to gather it self in such wise vnto God, as it wander not abroad, nor bee drawne away as wee commonly bee. I pray you what is the cause that wee cannot repose our selues vpon God as it were meete wee should? It is bicause wee parte Gods office, and all his power into so manie peeces and gobbettes, as wee leave him little or nothing. VVee can well ynough say, it is God to whom it belongeth too maynteyne vs: but yet for all that, wee cease not to trudge vp and downe, and forewarde and backward too seeke meanes to liue by: not as giuen of God and proceeding from him: but wee attribute the very power of God too the meanes themselues, whereby we make them as idolles. Thus ye see how we cannot looke vpon God with a pure eye, nor settle our trust and contentation in him. Therefore let vs marke well the woordes that Job vsseth here: which are, that his eyes shall beholde God and none other: as if hee had sayde, I will holde me there, I will not bee fleeting as men are, but I will put my selfe wholly to my God, and say, It is thou Lord, yea it is thou onely of whom I holde my lyfe, and when I am gone hence, thou shalt restore mee againe as thou haste promised. And lette vs make this comparifon betweene Job and our selues, that if Job hauing not had such assurance of Gods goodnesse, nor so familiar teaching by the hundreth parte as wee haue, do notwithstanding say that hee shall and will beholde God: are wee to bee excused when wee fleete too and fro, specially seing that our Lorde Iesus Christe offereth himselfe vnto vs, in whom dwelleth the whole fulnesse of the glorie of the Godhead, and in whom the ful power of the holy Ghoste was shewed at suche time as hee was rayzed from the dead? And surely wee neede not too streyne our eye sight to looke far for him: for the Gospell is the cleere looking glasse wherein we see him face to face. Sith it is so (as I haue touched) let vs beware wee bee not guiltie of such vnthakfulnessse, as too disdeyne to looke vnto him, that offereth himselfe so familiarly vnto vnto vs. This is it in effect which wee haue too marke in this streyne. Iob addeth further, Although my kidneyes bee wasted in my bosome: that is too say, although there be no more strength nor courage in mee. To be short (following the matter that hee had entred intoo alreadie) he sheweth that his looking vnto God is not bicause he had liued at his ease, bicause God had sente him all his hartes desire, or bicause he had bene preserued in his afflictions: but cleane contrarywise. Although I be in such distresse (sayeth he) as God seemeth to thunder vpon me, and there is no more strength and courage in mee: yet will I looke vnto my God with mine eyes, and holde me wholly vnto him, and I know I shall see him againe as my redcemer and keeper, euen after he shall haue so consumed me. And for a conclusion he sayeth to his frendes: You haue sayd, wherefore is he persecuted, or wherefore doo wee persecute him? for the roote of the case [or matter] is founde in mee. This sentence is somewhat darke, bicause the woordes may bee taken two wayes. Wherefore is he persecuted? or wherefore doo wee persecute him? If we take wherefore is he persecuted, the meening is that Iobs freends marueled why God had handled him so roughly: and therefore they concluded that it was to bee sayd that he was a man vterly forsaken of God. But if yee translate it, How doo wee persecute him? the meening will be that they are come of prepened malice to take him in a trip, and to byte at him. Although there bee diuersitie as touching the woordes: yet doth the meening come all to one ende. Lette vs consider the doctrine that wee haue to gather of it: for that is the principall yea and the whole matter. Iob then chargeth his friends that they had iudged amisse of his afflictions. And why? For euen at the firste dashe they fell to saying, o, needes muste this man be sayde to be a wicked doer, for had he walked with a good conscience, he should not be so punished as he is. But contrarywise Iob sayeth, that the roote of the matter is found in him. True it is that the Hebrew woorde signifieth sometime a Thing, or matter, and sometime a woorde, speache, or saying. But here Iob meeneth that he had a good and sure foundation, and that when men haue well sifted him, they shall finde that his case is not such as other men haue falsely sumyzed. Now let vs see to what purpose this geere tendeth, and what profite wee may reape by it. VVhen Iob telleth his friends that they had sayd, wherefore is he persecuted? He sheweth that it is a greate crueltie for men to seeke out other mens sinnes when they see one beaten with Gods roddes: and to say, needes must this be a wicked man, therefore let vs sift his lyfe, for that is the poynt which we must begin at. True it is (as hath bene sayd more at large heretofore) that in all the corrections and chaityzements which God sendeth, we must alwayes behold his Iustice vpon mens sinnes: but that must be to condemne our selues. VVee muste not iudge other men, and let our selues slip. Lette vs begin, I say let vs begin at our selues. Thus we see that the vie of this doctrine is, that when any mā is pressed with aduersitie, we must not be hastie to condene him, and specially we must not wrinch aside to spie out faults in him: but rather we must looke vnto God, who sheweth himself to be the iudge both of vs and of him, and compelleth vs to know that it behoueth vs to haue pitie and compassion vpon him that suffereth, and that we muste not go to it at aduerture, although we know him to be faultie, but rather aduise our selues to bring him some medicine too heale him. Let vs beware we set not the cart before the horses, that is to say, that we iudge not before we know the case, as we are comonly wont to do. It hath bene already oftentimes sayd, that Gods afflicting of men is not alwayes for one self same end. For sometimes he punisheth them for their sinnes, and sometimes for the triall of their paciēce, or els for some other respect. Therefore let vs not be ouerhastie nor rashe to iudge before wee knowe the case thoroughly: for we see what is happened to Iobs friends. Bicause they see him afflicted, therefore at the firste dashe he muste needes be a wicked man say they. But happie is the mā that iudgeth discretely of the afflicted, as it is sayd in the Psalme. VVas not Dauid pinched as smartly by gods hand as euer any man was? And yet notwithstanding God sayeth, I haue found Dauid my seruant after mine owne hart, and I haue anoynted him with the oyle of gladnesse. Thus doth God holde Dauid as it were in his lappe, and yet we see how he was handled. If we be rash in iudging, we shall condemne both Dauid and Abraham, and all the holie Patriarkes. And doth not such maner of iudging redounde to the dishonoring of God? Yes surely. So then let vs be sober and modest when wee see our neighbours afflicted, and let vs acknowledge the hand of God, least it happ en vnto vs as it did vnto Iobs frendes. But he sayeth precisely, that the roote of the case (or the roote of the matter, or the effect and substance of it) is in him. Hereby he meeneth, that men must trie before they iudge. And in good sothe, euery man will graunt that if we should step to it at all aduerture, it were a foolish presumption and ouerweening in vs: and it is a very common Prouerbe among vs to say, A foolles bolte is soone shot. But yet for all this, we cease not to hazard our selues still, without any searching or examining how the case standeth. VVherfore let vs marke well, that we must first go to the roote, before we sitte downe to giue iudgement. And let vs not iudge swittly for feare least wee might seeme ignorant. For certesse the thing that inforceth men to be to swift, is for that they bee ashamed least they shoulde not seeme sharpwitted ynough too iudge at the firste sight: for if I blab not out my prittleprattle, men will make none account of mee. But God laugheth at such vayne glorioufnesse. Therefore let vs keepe our selues in sobernesse and modestie, vntill God haue shewed vs wherefore he punisheth one man more than another: let vs not runne before that. True it is that when we shall haue searched the matter thoroughly, and when wee shall haue come too the roote of it: then we may iudge freely. For the iudgemēt shall not come of our selues, but it shall be fetched from God, bicause it is grounded vpon his woorde and governed by his holie Spirit. Howbeit before all things, it behoueth vs to go to the roote whereof mention is made here. Afterward Iob sayeth, Be yee afrayde of the presence of the sworde: for the wrath of iniquitie or of the affliction of the sworde is at hande, too the ende yee should knowe that there is a iudgement. This present saying is somewhat darke ynough, bicause the woordes are cut of: but the effect of Iobs intent in saying, Be yee afrayde before the sworde, is all one as if he had sayd, yee speake here as in the shadowe, yee discourse at your pleasure as they that haue nothing to do and are at their owne leysure. Such folkes may dispute at wil: like as there bee none that make better battelles than they that are furthest of from blowes. For they giue the onfet, they beseege townes, they flea, they forray, and they sacke Cities, so as it is a wonder to see them. But when they haue wel discoursed, & come to marching forward in deede: they doo no sooner heare the founde of the drum, but their courage is quite quayed. Iob therefore biameth his friends for reasoning so of his case at leysure, & telleth thē that they must take holde of Gods iustice and bee afrayde of the sworde, as if he shewed it thē alreadie. And againe he sayeth, the wrath of iniquitie. This sayng pointeth at the cruelty which he had vpbrayded them with before. The wrath then is as much to say, as you chafe against mee, and that is too grieue mee. For the Hebrew woorde may signifie both Iniquitie and Affliction. But here Iob declareth that his friendes are not come vnto him for any compulsion of his miserie, but rather to chafe, yea and to grieue him and vex him the more. And what is imported in that? The sword (sayeth he). That is to say, God will not suffer such outrage vnpunished. For although I had offended you, yet ought you to be more courteous towards mee. But now in condemning mee without cause, yee shewe nothing but rigorousnesse against mee. Therefore muste Gods swoorde bee drawn out against you, verely to the ende yee may knowe that there is a iudgement. Behold a notable and very profitable sentence. For in rebuking his friends after that sort, Iob is as a Prophet of God, that speaketh generally to all men in comon. The thing then that he telleth vs, is that if wee bee malicious to iudge euill of the thing that is good, and churlish in tormenting and vexing them that are miserable ynough already: wee haue the sword of God to be afrayde of. It is sayd, *Curfed are you that call good euill, and euill good: and yet notwithstanding wee see that this vyce hath reigned at all times, and reyneth still at this day. As for them that are caried by their affections, what conscience make they too spite God openly? They haue skill ynough too say, I see the case is good ynough of it self: and yet notwithstanding they go quite and cleane against it. Such a man is desirous to serue God: but I will stop him. Suche a thing might bee too the buylding vp of the Church, and serue to the maynteyning of fellowship among men, and to the furtherance of the common weale: but I will ouerthrow it euery whit. For yee shall see some euen of those that sitte in the seate of Iustice, who are as good as Diuels incarnate in spiting of God and in ouerthrowing of all equitie and right, and are full of corruptiō and outrage. Now sith we see this, what is to be sayd, but that we be come to the toppe of all wickednesse? As much is to bee sayde of other men. For it is to bee seene that there are nother greate nor small, but they worke spite against God. So then, is it not to bee sayde that the Diuell possesseth men, sith they giue themselves so to ouerthrowe all goodnesse, and to maynteyne euill, specially seing that so horrible a curse is pronounced by the mouth of the Propther, against all such as shall say that euill is good, and good is euill. And that is it that Iob ment here, in saying, Bee yee afrayde of the swoorde. Too whom speaketh he? To suche as are puffed vp against God and against all right. For against whom do wee make warre but against God, when wee go aboute too turme light into darknesse and woulde oppresse a good case? Beholde it is God whom wee assaile. So then wee haue good cause too bee afrayde, yea though wee trouble but some one poore man, by heaping some newe vexacion vpon him. For God setteth himselfe against vs: he sayeth that hee cannot away with such violence and extorcion. VVhen menne go aboute too do any outrage or wrong to poore folkes, God steppeth before them and sheweth himselfe too bee their defender. Therefore whenseuer wee bee tempted too grieue and to trouble poore folkes and such as are in aduersitie already: ought not these woordes too make vs tremble, when it shall come too our minde that Gods swoorde is drawne against all suche as will increase the miserie of those that are in too muche miserie already? Beholde then howe God desieth all those that are giuen too do wrong, violence, extortion, and such other lyke things, and see howe he summoneth them too fire and blood. Also when wee see any poore man vn-* derfoote, and nobodie supporteth him, lette vs be afrayde to treade vpon him or to do him any wrong or reproch. And why? For God auoucheth that he hath his sword drawn at all suche as shall vex good and innocent folke after that sorte. And that is it that Iob speaketh for a conclusion, saying, that the wrath of iniquitie shall bring the swoorde: as if hee shoulde say, true it is that as now when menne ouerleape their boundes too trouble good folkes, it seemeth to themselves that they shall scape vnpunished, and so they nother feare God nor his iudgement. No (sayeth he) but the swoorde is readie for them. Therefore lette vs stande so much in our owne conceyt, as too beare our selues in hande that God cannot come at vs when we haue so tormeted poore folke, which seeke nothing but to liue in quiet, and haue not offended vs in any thing. For when wee fall to stinging of them and to shewing of our selues bitter towards them, God will be a hundred thousandfold bitterer vnto vs, and we shall feele him to be so when wee come before him as before our iudge. VVere this well weyed, surely things would go far otherwise in the world thā they do. VVe see how Princes for their ambition sake, fall to wāking of Countries, to burning of houses, to destroying of townes, too robbing, rauishing, and spoyling of all things, so as it is horrible to be seene. And wherefore? All this is lawfull for them vnder the name of warre. But first and formost they should consider, whither they be cōpelled to stirre such broyles, and to make warre after that maner through the whole world. Howbeit forasmuch as there is none other thing than their own ambition that inflameth them therevnto, and al those mischicues must spring of the rage wherwith they be moued: thinke they that the swoorde is not readie for them? Againe, as touching those, that serue their lustes and feede their humours: thinke they that God ought not to draw out his sword vpon them too? But let vs not looke vpon them onely. For we see those that are nother Kings nor Princes, nor of abilitie to make hauock of countries, or to enter vpon them with force, which not withstanding ceasse not to be as full of malice as they, or rather fuller. For they play the little Scorpions, which (when they cannot hurt otherwyse,) do caste out their poyson at their tayles: and wee see howe euery man seeketh to anoy and trouble other. Therefore muste not men needes feele that which is sayd here: that is to wit, that the swoorde is drawne out against all such maner of folke? And so yee see why Iob doth purposely say, too the intent yee should knowe. True it is that these men were no doltes, such as knewe not that there is a God in heauen who is iudge of the worlde: No, they were men of skill and experience, as wee haue seene by their talke, and shall see hereafter by Gods leaue. VVhy then doth Iob say vnto them, too the intent yee should knowe? It is by cause men beyng blinded by their naughtie affections, know not God, but beleue that when they haue once drawne a curtayne betweene God and themselves, God shoulde not see them any more, nor bee able too punishe them as they deserue. Then lette vs looke vpon the swoorde, although wee see it not yet with our eyes: that is to say, Although God do not yet shewe vs any signes that he is minded too punishe vs, and to make vs knowe that hee is the iudge of the worlde: and lette vs thinke that he is desirous to drawe vs to him, and to shewe that hee will not vse any excelsiue rigour towards vs, specially if wee bee not rigorous towards our neighbours. Furthermore lette vs vnderstand, that it is not ynough for vs to absteyne from all euill: but it behoueth also too helpe all suche as are in aduersitie. For though a man coulde protest, that he hath absteyned from from all iniurie and doing of wrong: yet shall he not therefore be discharged before God. And why? For he ought to help and succour those that haue neede of succour. Now if they that haue absteyned from euill doing are not quit before God, but are hild as offenders: I pray you what shall wee say of those which do nothing els but practise mischiefe day and night, and are alwayes deuising howe they may trouble and vexe now this man and now that man? VVhen wicked men do so sharpen their wittes of set purpose to hurt their neighbours: is it not reason that Gods sworde should by and by be sharpened against them? Then let vs bethinke our selues, and not only be readie to relieue such as are in necessitie: but also (for asmuch as there is so much miserie and wretchednesse through the whole world) let vs haue pitie and compassion of them that are farre of, and let our sight extend euen thither to them, (accordingly as charitie ought too inflame all mankinde) and let vs pray God to vouchsafe to pitie them that are so distressed, & that when he hath chastized them with roddes, he will bring them home to himselfe, and make all that to turne to their saluation, in somuch that whereas wee haue now occasion to sigh, we may then reioyce together, and prayse his name with one common accord.

Nowe let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them in suche wise, as wee may haue regard to amend them: and that therewithall euery one of vs may haue a minde to humble himselfe vnder Gods mightie hand, and in steade of cōdemning others, learne to feele the euilles that are in our selues, so as wee may seeke to him to purge and clense vs, till he haue clothed vs fully with his owne rightuoufnesse. And so let vs say Almighty God our heauenly father, thou hast, &c.

Sophar the Naamathite answered and sayd.

2. My thoughts inforce mee to answer, and hastinesse is in mee.
3. I haue heard the correction of my reproche, and the spirite of mine vnderstanding inforceth mee to answer.
4. Hast thou not knowne the time of old, since God placed man vpon the earth, 5. That the aduancement of the wicked is but of short tyme, and that the ioy of hypocrites shall not indure?
6. Though they bee lifted vp to heauen, and haue rayfed their head aboute the cloudes:
7. Yet shall they perish as their ovne dung: and they that haue seene them shall say, vvhare are they?

That wee may the better profite by this doctrine, wee haue to beare in minde, howe it hath bene declared before, that suche as incountered with Iob, saying that God leaueth not the wicked vnpunished, haue taken a ground that it is true in it selfe, but they applied it amisse too the persone of Iob. And this is a cause why wee ought to pray alwayes vnto God to giue vs skill and discretion too know how to apply that things rightly which we shall haue learned out of Gods woorde. For wee may turne that thing too euill, which might bee too our profite, according as wee see how a number abuse the holie Scripture crossely and ouerthwartly. Therefore it standeth vs in hand to marke this poynt: and then shall wee see that here are good and very profitable instructions. Now the effect of that which Sophar sayeth here, is that although the wicked and the despyzers of God bee seene too prosper here for a while: yet must they perish, and the ende of them must bee miserable, according as it hath alwayes bene seene and put in vre, and God will execute his iudgements too the worldes end as he hath done afore. But ere he come too that poynt: he vseth a preface, that is too wit, that he is inforced too answer, and compelled so too do, as well by the spirit of his vnderstanding, as also bycause he was ashamed too bee so checked at Iobs hande, specially sith he knewe (as he himselfe sayeth) that his owne sayings were true, and that Iob reasoned too the contrarie. Now if it were so: then had Sophar good reason. For first of all when God giueth vs any grace, it is not too the intent the same should serue for our selues alone: but we ought too make our neighbours parttakers of it. Then if God giue more vnderstanding too one man than to another: ought he too keepe it to himselfe alone? No. But looke what giftes God bestoweth vpon vs, wee must labour to communicate them, that our neighbours may bee edified by them as well as our selues, and God be honored with one common consent. S. Paule also sheweth the same, 1. Cor. 12. 4. 7 namely that if a man haue receyued any gift of God, he hath not receyued it for himselfe, but he muste apply it wholly too the common vse. Behold also how God will haue our charitie exercysed. It is not that euery man should like well of himselfe and despyze his neighbours: for at what poynt should wee bee then? Should there be any more bodie of the Church? Is it not meete that the members should bee knit together? Is it not meete that all should be referred to the head? Then lette vs marke well that whereas Sophar sayeth, that the spirite of his vnderstanding inforced him too answer: if it were so that God gouerned it, and that this saying were rightly placed: then had he reason too say so. For (as I sayd) when God shall haue disclosed any good thing vnto vs, the same must not be drowned by vs, but rather wee muste bring it to light. And here ye see why it is sayd, that when wee haue beleueed then must wee speake. So then fayth muste not bee a dead thing, but shee must vtter hir selfe. And S. Paule dothe well verifie the sayd sentence of the Psalme. For he sheweth that it is not lawfull for him to do it, bycause God had giuen him vnderstanding, which ought to serue the whole worlde: and therefore that he vttereth the treasure which was comitted to him, knowing well that it was not a particular thing for any one mā, but for the profite and instruction of the whole Church. And verely euery one of vs muste apply this Iesson too himselfe. For we shall see many that will say, it is ynough if euery man beleuee in his owne hart, as who would say that the thing which God hath ioyned together, might be separated by men. But wee haue seene alreadye the record of Dauid: which is, that suche as beleuee ought to speake by and by. For except they do so: they shewe that they by their malice doo burie that thing which God would haue published abroad: according as it is sayde that men light not a candle too put it vnder a bushell, or too hide it: but too set it vpon a candellsticke that it may shyne all aboute. Furthermore nowe and then when a man hath receyued any gift, he thinketh it is too winne himselfe credite and estimation aboute other men. But contrarywise, in so doing wee disgrace Gods giftes by making them too serue too any vayneglorie. It is not for that purpose that God dealeth his giftes more to one than to another, but too the ende wee should do menne good with them. Therefore let euery of vs haue a care too aduance and too spread abroad that which God hath committed vnto him: and as for them that haue not receyued so much, let them neuertheless be brought by that meanes to saluation, wherevnto God calleth vs too the ende he might be glorified among vs. Marke that for one poynt. But yet must the other poynt presse vs more, when Sophar sayeth, that he had heard the correction of his reproch. He speaketh not this in respect of his owne person onely: but according too the matter that hee had dealt with before he is angrie too see Gods truth troden by that meanes vnder foote. Iob had no such intent, (as I haue declared already) and therefore Sophar did him great wrong. Neuertheless this doctrine continueth in it selfe alwayes good and true, and wee muste holde it so, for the holy Ghost also ment to teache vs by a man that was blinded in his owne imagination, who not withstanding ceased not too haue good groundes. So then this doctrine being taken as it is, may stande vs in steade, notwithstanding that we see it reprove the good, and fight against Gods truth, resisting it by cauils and things misapplied. And therefore when the like befaller vs, wee must withstand it as much as wee can. I say, whensoever wee see a man striue against Gods truth, wee muste set our selues against him as aduersarie parties. Why so? For if God giue vs wherwith too make our selues as his proctours and witnesses, he will haue his care maynteyned by vs. And the honour is greate that is done vs in that behalfe. God seeth that wee be full of vanitie, and that there is nothing but vntruth in vs: and yet neuertheless he calleth vs to be his proctours. And ought he to do so? Is he bound to do it? No: but his minde is to honour vs so far forth. What remaineth then? That euery of vs streyne himselfe to the vttermost [to do his dutie.] VVhen we see men so malicious and wicked as to lift vp themselues against God, and to seeke al meanes possible to peruert & corrupt the truth: is it meete for vs to be slouthfull then? No. VVee see at this day howe the Pope hath many seducers which seeke nothing but to flounder all good doctrine, and to falsifie all that euer we alledge in the name of God. Yea and we neede not to go so farre, for we see malicious heades euerywhere and vnderlings of Satan, which turkin things and desire nothing but to turne all vpside downe. Now when we see the Diuell working after that sorte to ouerthrow the things that are good to edifie the Church, and that men are so impoysoned agaynst them: ought wee to hold our peace? Should we not resist them stoutly as much as in vs lieth? Yes certainly. Else should we be cowardes, yea and it should be imputed too vs for highe treason, if wee should suffer Gods truth too be so defaced, and wee not maynteyne it. Some there are of opinion that it were better for them too holde their peace, and not too speake at all agaynst the Papistes and their superstitions. Yea, but in the meane whyle wee see howe the Diuell would abuse our silence, too vtter forth his lies and tirannies continually. If poore soules perish, and wee in the meane whyle holde our tungen: what shall become of it? If a sheepeheard doo his duetie, will hee suffer woolues and theeues to enter into his flocke, and to scare them, byte them and deuour them, and yet say neu. r a woorde too them? But God hath appoynted vs too be as sheepehardes of his Church. Now like as we muste haue a sweete and amiable voyce too guide our flocke withall, and too leade such too saluation as are teachable and obedient: so also on the contrarie parte, when wee see Theeues and VVoolues, wee muste crie out aloude too scare them away. Yee see then that such as perceyue men to peruerte Gods truth, ought not to dessemble, but rather to be earnest and zelous in resisting them to the vttermost of their power. Againe, if we ought to haue such courage & constancie in maynteyning good caces against the trumpeteries and subtleties of the wicked: I pray you ought we not to speake still in the like behalfe when we see Gods name blasphemed in deede, & al good doctrine scorned and rayled vpon by the lewde lyfe, by the malapertnesse, and by all that euer the wicked folke take in hande? VVould God that necessitie constreyned vs not so muche as it dothe. But what? VVhen a man hath preached the woorde of God, lette him go abroad in the stretes, and marke what hee seeth eche man do openly, and it will be seene that euery man hath conspired against God, and that fyre and water are not more contrarie, than the common lyfe that wee leade, and the doctrine that is preached. I will not say howe reachlesse men are to heare: But although they set a face vpon the matter, and very ceremoniously pretende that God shall be honored and his woorde receyued: yet it appeereth that it is but a playing of little children, and men do throughly mocke God in their common lyfe, and do nothing else but despyze his woorde. VVee neede not too decyfer things by peecemeale what they be: menne see well ynough what they are, and wee were too dulheaded if it grieued vs not too see God so ill obeyed among vs, and so smally reuerenced at all mens handes: specially seeing things are come too the shamefulnesse that Sophar speaketh of, namely that not onely God is dishonored by whoredome, by loocenesse of lyfe, by blasphemie, by robberies, and by other such things, which reigne and are not punished as they ought to be: but also even when punishment is extended, men can finde in their harts too mocke God, and his Iustice. I speake of that whiche I sawe yesterday with mine eyes. If a strumpet be put in prison, shee must haue tartes caried hir to feast hir withall: she must be locked vp for a countenance, and in the meane whyle shee must be presented with great Tartes: And I pray you what a dealing is that? If it had but onely bene tolde me, or if it had but only bene bouted out: yet could I not haue hild my peace at it. But I saw it my selfe with mine owne eyes, in somuch that it may seeme that God brought me to it, and that the Diuell ment to make his triumphes on the other side. So then no maruell though such as haue charge of the Lordes flocke to preache his woorde do speake so roughly, sith they see things so farre out of square, that there is nother modestie nor honestie at all, nor any ho: and yet are we blameable before God, for that we speake not the hidreth part which we ought too do, considering that the disorder is so outrageous as we see. VVherefore lette vs marke well this sentence of Sophars, where it is sayde, that he could not holde his peace but was inforced too speake because he was chased with his reproch. And why? For we must not suffer euil to haue suche scope without setting our selues against it, and without shewing of our selues to haue some zeof God for the maynteyning of his glorie and truth. But nowe let vs come to the generall matter that is layde forth here. Haſte not thou knowne the tyme of olde (ſayeth Sophar) euen ſince God did ſet man vpon the earth? how that the byghneſſe of the wicked is but of ſhorte tyme, and that the ioy of hypocrites or tranſgreſſors ſhall not indure? He taketh here a principle that is good and true: which is, that if wee take the lyfe of the deſpyzers of God too bee happie, wee bee deceyued. And why? For their happineſſe is but a dreame, as he will adde in the ſimilitude anon after. True it is that moſte menne will ſay that the wicked are vnhappie. But what for that? wee ouerſhoote our felues: for if wee ſee a man liue eaſily, or in honour, although his lyfe bee not ruled according too Gods woorde: yet notwithstanding wee bee rauifhed at it, wee thinke his ſtate too bee as good as can be wiſhed, and euery man will ſpyte him. Yea but in the meane whyle wee knowe not that ſuch as are ſo aduanced, are but Snayles as it is ſayd in the Pſalme. And it is a compariſon well woorthie too bee noted. For Dauid ſayeth that ſuch as bee aduanced in this world, and haue no liuely roote ſettled in God, are as Snayles. They come creeping vp in one night, and vaniſhe away out of hande. Beholde here Snayles for all porredge. But wee haue no conſideration of that: wee leaue the principall poynt which is too looke vnto the end: we haue not the pacience too ſay, well, God aduanceth whom he will, but that is to breake the neckes of them with a greater and fowler fall. VVe can good ſkill of the wheele of fortune, but wee cannot referre all things too Gods prouidence, to beholde his workes and yeelde him all prayſe. So much the more therfore haue we neede to marke well this ſentence, that euer ſince God did ſet man vpon the earth, it hath bene founde by continuall experience that the highneſſe of hypocrites is of late time, and that their ioy ſhall indure for euer. VVhen Sophar ſayeth, that this thing is too be knowne by long experience, and that it hath bene ſo euer ſince God created the worlde: it is a ſaying of great weyght. For if we ſee but two or three examples of Gods Iuſtice, ought wee not too bee touched ynough? But here is much more: it is not in three or foure perſones onely that God ſheweth that hee will not leaue the wicked vnpuniſhed: hee ſheweth it euery day, he hath ſhewed it before wee were borne, and if we purſue from age too age ſince the creation of the world, wee ſhall ſee that God hath alwayes kepte the ſame rate. Seing then that wee haue ſuche examples and ſo greate and of ſo long continuance, that God hath alwayes ſhewed himſelfe a iudger of the wicked mens proſperitie, and made all things too turne to their conuſion and decay: is it reaſon that wee ſhoulde yet ſtill doubt of it? VVherefore lette vs marke well this ſaying howe it importeth much trueth: that is to ſay, that at all times ſince men dwelt vpon the earth, it hath bene Gods will that there ſhould alwayes be ſome recordes of his iudgemets, and therefore that wee muſt not bee ſo dull and blockiſh as not to conſider the things that God hath done for our inſtruction. Hercvpon wee ought too gather further, that it is not ynough for vs too haue our eyes open too marke and vewe well the things that God dothe in our owne lyfe time: but we muſt alſo profite in auncient hiſtories. And verely here we ſee why our Lordes will was that wee ſhould haue ſome notable iudgements leſte vs in wryting, namely to the ende that the remembrance of them ſhould remayne for euer. Yea and wee muſte not onely profite our ſelues by the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture: but alſo when we heare the ſtorie rehearced that were written by the Heathen men, wee muſt haue the ſkill too apply Gods doings to our ſelues. For there wee ſee how he hath executed his vengeance vpon all ſuch as were giuen to crueltie, robberie, and other extorcions: and therewithall howe he hath puniſhed whoredome & other filthineſſe, when they reigned ouer ſore: and finally wee ſee how he hath puniſhed periuries and outrages when mens pryde hath exceeded ſo farre as it could no longer be borne. Now when we looke vpo ſuch things, ought they not to ſerue our turne at this day alſo? Then let vs remember well the leſſon that is giuen vs here: namely that for ſomuch as God hath euer ſince the creation of the worlde from time to tyme giuen vs ſome warnings too ſhewe vs that hee is the iudger of the world: we muſt learne too ſtande in awe of him, and to walke warely, that the puniſhments which he hath executed vpon the wicked may be looking glaſſes for vs, and brydles too reſtrayne vs. But now lette vs returne too that he ſayeth, that the byghneſſe of the wicked is but of ſhorte tyme. And why? For although they were liſted vp to heauen, or reached vp to the clowdes with their heads: yet ſhould they not cōtinue, but God would throw them downe out of hand. Here Iob continueth the matter that we ſawe before: that is to wit, that God will now & then ſuffer the wicked to be aduanced and too flouriſh: but it ſhall not indure long. Now had Sophar conſidered this well: he would no more haue ſtoode in contention with Iob: but for ſomuch as he taketh a generall ſentence, and applieth it amiſſe: he goeth ouerthwartly to worke. Yet notwithstanding (as I haue ſayd) this doctrine deſerueth to bee receyued as coming from the hollie Ghōſt: and there is no more for vs too do, but too looke aduifedly vpon it, and to apply it conveniently. Therefore let vs go foreward with the matter. It is a very troublous temptation to vs, to ſee the wicked in proſperitie. For we would fayne that God ſhould ſhew himſelfe as he is: that is to wit, that he cannot away with the wicked, but throweth them downe bicauſe he hateth and abhorreth them. If we our ſelues do amiſſe, we would haue God to ſpare vs: & there is none of vs but he thinketh God to be ouerhaſtie in puniſhing vs. VVhen we haue cōmitted one ſin, two, or three: if God chaſtyze vs, we thinke it is too ſoone, wee cannot away with it. But if another man haue done neuer ſo little a faulte, we would haue God to thunder vpo him out of hande. Lo whereto hypocrisie leadeth vs. But what is to be done on the contrarie part? VVe muſt bee contented too ſee the wicked triumph for a tyme in the worlde, and too haue their full ſcope, and too liue in eaſe and pleaſure, and not bee grieued at it, no not although wee our ſelues bee in the meane whyle in aduerſitie and trouble. And why? For by that meane God intendeth too trie our ſayth. If wee ſawe things to bee ſuche as they ſhall bee in the ende, as God ſheweth vs them by his worde: would we put any truſt in him? No. VVe would belecue nothing till wee ſawe it. But when as we perceyue not the thing that God ſpeaketh ſo ſoone as we would, and yet neuertheleſſe continue ſtill ſtedfaſt in his woorde, reſting vpon that which hath proceeded out of his mouth: that is the thing wherein wee ſhewe our ſelues too belecue him. And ſo lette vs marke well that when God doth ſo lay the brydle vpon wicked and vngodly folkes neckes: it is to trie whitner wee haue ſerued him purely, and whitner wee haue patiently giuen him leaue too do what he will, without liſting vp of our ſelues agaynſt him. Alſo there is yet more, that God will haue vs too learne that our Paradife is not in this worlde. But wee woulde fayne liue in pleaſure, and that God ſhoulde dandle vs like little cockneyes. That were not for our behoofe, but cleane cōtrarie. For vnleſſe

God drewe vs too him by afflictions: wee would neuer (by our good willes) fleere out of this worlde: wee be as much intangled here as may bee. Therefore wee haue neede too be drawne to the heauenly kingdome by many tribulations, and that God should inforce vs to come to him, and yet therewithall also shewe vs, that hee wil roote out the wicked, though they runne riot neuer so much. When wee see this, wee shall haue no cause to beare them any grudge. So then (as I haue sayde already) let vs learne to ouercome the sayd temptation when it is trumped in our way: and if the wicked happen too bee aduanced, yea euen too reaching of the cloudes with their heads: lette vs vnderstand that wee muste not be grieued at it, as though God were asleepe, or as though he regarded not the worlde ne had any care of it. But contrarywise let vs assure our selues that Gods lifting of them vp, is too strike them quite downe at one blow, yea euen with a deadly fall. For if their falling were but as they stande vpon their feete: then might they well scape with the breaking of some bone. But when God suffereth them too be hoyfed vp so highe: he fendeth them downe to their vtter destruction. Thus ye see to what intent Sophar sayeth, that the loftinesse of the wicked is but for a short tyme. And nowe he addeth, that their ioy shall be of no long continuance. Whereby he meeneth that the despyzers of God and all such as are tyde to the worlde, do ouer ioy themselues in the present prosperitie, and are vtterly drunken with it. True it is that the children of God may well be merie when they haue prosperitie, like as when God fendeth vs wherewith to be fed and maynteyned, when he dealeth so with vs as wee want nothing, when he giueth vs health, quietnesse, and all other like things: we may well be merrie, yea and we ought to be so, according as it is sayd in the lawe, Thou shalt eate and drinke before thy God and be merrie. But yet must not the faythfull settle their ioy vpon the present benefites, nor hold themselues tyde only vnto them. Yea rather if they want meate & drinke, or be troubled with sicknesse, they must not therefore ceasse to trust in God: but must learne S. Pauls lesson, which is, to haue skill both to be poore and riche, too indure hunger and scarcitie, and also to haue abundance. Thus yee see that the mirth of Gods childre differeth greatly from the mirth of the vnbeleeuers and worldlings. For these reioyce in the things that they hold in hand without looking any further: and as for God or heauenly life, they haue no care of them, but besotte themselues in such sort, that if they find ease, they runne ryot into extreme loocenesse of lyfe. Contrarywise, when the faithful are in prosperitie, they are alwayes ledde further: that is to wit, to the acknowledging of Gods goodnesse in that he hath made them feele him more than a father towards them. And they know also, that when he may seeme to haue forsaken them, then is he neereft them to succour them. So then in this sentēce Sophar ment to shewe, that when the despyzers of God and those that are giuen too do euill are aduanced, and fortune (as they terme hir) laugheth vpo them, so as they prosper and liue at their ease: all that whyle they bee so dyled, that their mirth is a drunkenesse, and they runne ryot without order or measure. Lo what Sophar ment to speake. To this purpose, let vs marke well howe our Lord Iesus Christ sayeth, wo be to you that laugh, for you shall weepe: your mirth shall be turned into gnashing of teeth, Not that it is not lawfull for vs to bee merrie (as I sayd afore,) or that it is not Lawfull for vs too reioyce when God giueth vs occasion. But will wee bee merrie. Then let vs (as S. James willet vs:) Let him that is merrie, sing: that is to say, let him giue God thanks, and in calling vpon him let him alwayes still go foreward towards him and bee stablished in loue, feare, and truste towards him more and more. Ye see then what our mirth ought to bee. But by the way, with this sayd mirth, we must also bee sad, considering how we ceasse not to offend God (as S. Paule also sheweth vs by example) and considering the vices that are in vs. And so let vs alwayes go onward still too the full and perfect ioy which is hidden from vs as yet. Thus much concerning this saying, that the ioy of the wicked shall not indure long. Furthermore lette vs marke that Sophar was beguyed by mistaking these wordes, a short time, and of small continuance. For when the Scripture sayeth that the wicked vanishe away, and that God will consume them in the turning of a hand: it is not ment that he keepeth one ordinarie stint, as I haue declared already. And why? For if God should do so, what should be referued till the latter day? wee would be wedded to this world, and not wayte for the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ to accomplish our resurrectiō and redemption. Our Lord therefore is fayne to referue many, yea and the most part of things til his last iudgement. But yet in the meane whyle it is alwayes his office to destroy the wicked, and too shew that they bee but of short continuance. And in good sooth let vs cōsider well what our life is, and wee shall see that the thing which lasteth longest time in this worlde, doth but passe by and slippe away in the turning of a hand. VVe be such fooles, that if God lift not vp his hand the first day to destroy such as haue offended: we are of opinion that the tyme will neuer come. And why? It seemeth to vs that this life lasteth long, and yet, we graunt it is but a shadow: for euey man muste away hence (spite of his teeth). Therefore when it is sayd vnto vs, that the wicked continue not any long time: lette vs learne that it is not mente that our Lorde riddeth them out of hand. For although they come too the yeeres of fiftie or threescore: yet ceasse they not to bee trayned on still by Gods hande to their decay and confuzion. Too be shorte, wee muste bee patient and wayte with silence what God will do, without such boyling and hastinesse as Sophar is wont to vse here. Behold I say howe it behoueth vs too apply this doctrine, if wee intend to fare the better by it. And truly it is a right necessarie poynt for vs. For wee shall see many offended at the reading of the promises in the holy Scripture, (as that God will blisse those that are his, that he will leade them in all their wayes, that he will bring all their deuiCES too good ende, that they shall liue in prosperitie, that they shall bee blisfed at his hande, bothe in themselues, and in their offspring, and their cattell, at home and abroad, and in their possessions, and that they shall all be preferued by the grace of God. And on the contrarie part we see, that the childre of God indure so great scarcitie and so many miseries, as is rufull. Sometime they haue not so much as one morsell of bread to put into their mouth, and they be smitten with diseases and al other calamities: while in the meane time the wicked whome God had threatened, do prosper. VVe be astonished at that, and we seeme to lose our time in trusting vnto God, and that his threatenings and promises are deceytfull. VVhat is the cause of suche trouble? It is for that we want paciēce to bridle our selues, & to say, I will see what God wil do. VVe neede no more burto shide ouer, as when we haue to passe a dicke wee bee fayne to leape and stryde, that wee may get ouer it. So then, for asmuch as wee cannot leape ouer the things of this worlde, and so list vp our selues to beholde Gods iudgements: therefore we cannot see them, though they be neere at hande. And certesse there are diuers that will say, I can go no further, for suche a thing stoppeth mee. And

And what is that stoppe? It is but some strawe that lyeth in their way. That is all the lette, and yet they needed no more but to lift vp their loote, or to treade vpon it, to ouercome all the matter that that we make so greate a doo of. And is not that a greate lazinesse in vs? Howbeit when we bee destitute of Gods spirite, yee see in what plight wee bee. Yet are not the things that are conteyned in the holie scripture, spoken in vayne, nor without cause. Furthermore it behoueth vs to marke also, how Sophar sayeth here, that when the wicked shall haue lifted vp their head too the skie, and reached to the cloudes: God will find meanes well ynough to throw them downe, yea and to sink them euen intoo hell. Lo what the end of the wicked shall bee, which seeke nothing but to aduance themselves. True it is that God doeth ere whyles exalt his seruants too honour and dignitie: but yet do they not ceasse too bee lowly still all the whyle. VVhen a man is gouerned by Gods spirit, although he be a greate prince and honored of the whole world, and God haue reached him his hand too exalt him hyghly: yet will he alwayes bee modestly mynded too acknowledge his owne infirmitie, & to walk in feare and warenesse, saying, Alas what would become of mee if my God bryddled mee not? He giueth mee of his grace, and as for mee I haue nothing of myne owne. Haue I any cause then too glorifie my self? No: But the neerer he commeth to mee, the more doeth he bynd mee too him: so as if I bee honored among men, it behoueth mee too be as a Mirroure to saue such as are destroyed and ouerthrowen. God then hath set mee in this cace, to the end I should serue their turnes that haue neede of my help. Thus when the children of God are indewed with any graces, they meene not to keepe them to themselves too serue their owne peculiar turne withall: but to acquaint them selues with their neyghbours, yea euen with the meanest of them, (according as Sainct Paule speaketh) and to humble themselves too the lowest of them, as God hath commaunded them. But cleane contrarie, whē the wicked happen to be aduanced, they doo nothing but lift vp their heads to the cloudes, and perke vp vnto heauen. And wherof commeth that? It is bycause they haue forgotten themselves, and think not themselves to be mortall men, but take themselves to be (as ye would say) Gods. VVe see this in all these blynde wretches that are sotted in pryde, namely that they knowe not themselves. If one speake to them as to men, they think they be forgotten. And that is it that Sophar meeneth by saying that the wicked lift vp their heads vnto the skyes, and perk aboute the cloudes. True it is that it behoueth vs to reache our heads aboute the skyes and aboute the cloudes: but that is after another maner: that is to wit, although we be wayfarers in the world, and see nothing but corruption in our selues: yet we must not fayle to possesse by hope the euerlasting benefits that God hath promised vs: but must be able to protest with Paule, that wee be citiens of heauen, that the heritage is prepared for vs there already, that we be already set in the heauenly places, namely in the persone of our head Iesus Christ, who hath knit and vnited vs to him self neuer to be separated. Thus ye see how the faythfull children of God must lift vp their heads not only to heauen, but also aboute heauen. Yet notwithstanding it is not ment heereby that they should not humble them selues, according as it is sayd, that they shall alwayes stoupe vnto God as the Prophet Amos speaketh. And what meeneth he by saying that God will haue vs to stoupe vnder him? It is too the intent we should knowe that there is such a burthen vpon our shoulders as we be not able to beare, if we be not maynteyned by his power. And surely it is necessarie for vs, to the end he may be glorified in vs by deliuering vs after that sort out of the miseries and aduerfities wherewith we be so ouerloden and borne downe. Therefore let vs marke well these things, to the end wee may lerne to frame our selues to such myldnesse, as we may be of the number of those whom God will lift vp too heauen, after he hath cast them downe vnto hell. So then, will we be vphild by the hand of God? Let vs humble our selues (as the Apostle sayeth) yea let vs humble our selues in such sort, as wee may first yeeld God the glorie that belongeth vnto him, as of whom al goodnesse procedeth, and make true confession vnto him: and secondly haue euery one of vs an eye too his owne calling, knowing that God hath knit vs in such wyse together, as the greatest ought to apply themselves to the least, and euery of vs ought to put Gods gifts to such vse, as all may take good by them in common, assuring our selues that the condition wherupon they be giuen vs, is that others should be partakers of them as well as we. VVhen wee go to work after this sorte: it is certaine that we shall be alwayes vphild by the hand of God. And although the the diuell make neuer so greate assaults vpon vs: yet shall we hold out. Againe though we be fayne to stagger now and then, yet will God be alwayes redye at hand, so as we shall euermore get the victorie howsoeuer the world go. Therefore if we be hild in such modestie as becometh vs: let vs assure our selues, that God will cause vs to feele his power by making vs to continue in all goodnesse, euen to the end. And although we must be fayne too walke through manye hazardes and daungers of this world: yet will hee not suffer vs to rush against any euill incounters too breake our necke: but if wee meete with any, surely he will giue vs the grace too leape ouer it, as I sayd afore. Thus muche haue wee too gather of these woordes of Sophar for the present tyme.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so too feele them, as thereby wee may bee taught to mislike of our selues sith wee bee so wretched creatures as wee ceasse not too offend, and that therewithall wee may with true lowlinesse receyue all the chastizements that he shall send vs, so as we may dayly more and more stoupe vnder his myghtie hand: and that being so striken downe, wee may notwithstanding not ceasse to walk as he commaunderth, with our hartes and myndes lifted vp by fayth and hope vntoo the kingdome of heauen, continuing neuerthelesse as little ones in this world: howbeit not as babes in wit, but as babes in malice: to the intent that being bereft of all vayne presumption and selfeiyking, wee may so serue one another, as God may bee honored of vs all with one accorde. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not only too vs, but also too all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

This Sermon goeth on with the exposition of the vij. verse, and then with the text that is added here.

8. He shall vanish away as a dreame and not be found again, he shall passe away as a vision in the night.
9. The eye that hath seene him shall see him no more, His place shall no more knowe him.
10. His children shall fauue vpon the poore, his hands shall restore his riches.
11. His bones shall be full of his youth, and it shall lie downe with him in the dust.
12. If euill be sweete in his mouth, he will hyde it vnder his tounge.
13. He will spare it, and not let it go, but keepe it in the mids of his palate.
14. His meate in his bowels shall be turned intoo the gall of an Adder within him.
15. He hath swallowed vp riches, and he shall spevv them vp again, and God shall plucke them out of his bellie.

Eere Sophar goes forward with the doctrine that was glaunched at yesterday: that is to wit, that whereas the wicked and the despizers of God seeme to bee happie, the same shall not last long, bycause God must put to his hand to confound them in the end. He vseth a phrase which may do vs to vnderstand that they shall perish in their owne turning, or else as their owne dung, for so do the Hebrewes terme their turning, as if it were sayd that they shall go out as dung, and they speak it in way of disdeyne and reproche. Ye see then that his meening is to say, that although the despizers of God be braue and make themselues terrible: yet must they perish with shame ynough, and be cast out as men remove dung. Lo what the sense is. Afterward he addeth that they shall perish neuer to recouer nor too be made whole againe. Herevpon he likeneth them to a dreame or to a vision in the nyght, which passeth away incontinent. To bee short, he sayeth that such as haue seene them in greate estate and authoritie, shall knowe them no more, nother shall there be any hope for them to recouer their place againe. All this (as I haue declared) is verie true. For all the happinesse that appeereth in the wicked, shall in the end turne too their greater confuzion, and forasmuch as they bee cursed off God, it cannot be but they must needs come too an euill ende. VVhat is the cause of menns happinesse, but bycause God receyueth them into his fauour and blisseth them? Then if we haue the contrarie, so as he shake vs of: although the whole world seeme to be on our side and all things fall out to our contentation tooo well: needs must all the benefites that it is possible for vs too haue, be turned to our vndoing. Therefore there is no fountayne of welfare but only the goodnesse and loue of our God. If we haue that: although wee seeme neuer so wretched, yet shall all things turne too our welfare. But cleane contrariwise, if God loue vs not, it is impossible that wee should by any meanes prosper. VVe may well haue some outward shewe: but that shall bee of no continuance, as is shewed vs here. Therefore let vs marke well the speche that Sophar vseth here. For although it betoken two things (as I haue sayd): yet notwithstanding it importeth that God ouertroweth the wicked in the turning of a hand. This deserueth to be noted, bycause they seeme too be fastened with yron nayles (as they say) so as they may neuer be removed. But God will finde the meanes to throwe them downe, yea euen vpon the suddein before men are aware of it. And when the thing shall seeme impossible to vs, God is able to woork beyond our imagination or conceyt. Again let vs lerne not too be bleared with the gloriousnesse and dignitie of the wicked, seing that our Lord casteth them in the teethe with it as wee see. Doth the world hyghly commend such as are enriched by roberie, such as are aduanced by wicked praetizes, and such as despize God and all equitie and right? Behold, the holie Ghoste likeneth them too dung and filth. So then (as I haue touched) let vs not be tempted when wee see anye greatnesse & excellencie in the despisers of God. But rather let vs herken too the saying which the holie Ghoste vtereth against them to put them out of estimation: and not without cause. For it is bycause we should not repine at their state, nor be drawen into their lines as our owne lusts would do at euery blowe, nor finally be disquieted, as though God executed no Iustice in the world, but were asleepe in heauen, and listid not to repress wickednesse when it ouerfloweth his banks. Therefore too the end that such temptations haue not dominion ouer vs, let vs lerne to esteeme those things as dung and filth, which the world hath in greate reputation. Lo what we haue to do when we see men clap their hands at the wicked and in manner honour them as Gods. Therefore in the meane while let vs bee patient, in wayting for the ende, assuring our selues that they be but dung afore God. But there is also this poynte more too bee noted: namely that their place shall knowe them no more, and that the eye which hath seene them shall see them no more. VVhereby Sophar meeneth that the wicked shall not be afflicted for a small tyme like as God doeth oftentimes afflict the faythfull also in such wise as they may seeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed. Then may it seeme that God is mynded to confound his owne seruants without any hope of setting them vp againe: but yet haue they this promis, that although they were in the bottom of hell, the hand of God should stretch it self thither too drawe them out of it. VVherefore though we must bee faine to walk in the midds of the shadowe of death: yet let vs not be dismayed, seing that God giueth vs this token that he is our Redeemer: that is to wit, sith we heare the voyce of God warrating vs that he hath not forgotte vs. Lo what we haue on our side. But although God giue the wicked but so much as a litle fillup, their wounds are so deadly as they neuer recouer them. And why? For when God speaketh, it is to destroy them, yea eue in such wise as no man may be able to set them in their estate nor to build

to build them vp again. VVel may mē attempt it, but they shall not preuayle at all: the more they think too further them, the more they plucke thē backe. Thus we see heere how Sophar shoeth out the despizers of God and the wicked sort, from the faythfull. For afflictions may well light vpon bothe alike: but there is oddes in the end of them. I say that afflictions light vpon the one as well as the other, insomuch that the faythfull shall seeme to be at the verie point to perish vtterly without recouerie: howbeit forasmuch as God hath promised too reache them 10 his hand, although they were come euen to death: yet should they be rayzed vp again. But as for the wicked, they must perish vtterly. And why? For the curse of God is vpon them. And therefore let vs lerne to comfort ourselves when God shall send vs any afflictions. For although they be greate, hard, & heauie: yet is there cause of gladnesse, sith the end shall be happie. On the other side, when we see the wicked flourish and triumph, let vs not cease to keepe on our pace, notwithstanding that we be miserable to the worldward. And why? For when God 20 striketh them vpon the suddain, it is not to set them vp againe but there must they lie still, and their place shall neuer be acquainted with thē any more, as it is sayd more at full in the seuenandthirtith Psalme. For inasmuch as it is a hard thing to be beleueed that God will destroy the wicked euen when they bee so well settled in this life, as it may seeme that they should continue in their state for euer: the holie Ghoste is faine to drawe vs backe oftentimes to that lesson, to the end it may be throughly settled in our harts, and we fully persuaded of it. Then 30 if we perceyue not at the first, that God will raze out the wicked without euer suffering them too recouer vp again: let vs herken what the scripture sayeth, and we shall perceyue that God rooteth them out after such a sorte, as men shall not wote what is become of them. Thus much concerning Sophars words where he sayeth, that the place where the wicked were shall knowe them no more. And there is also a comparison of a Dreame in the night, and of the phancies that men conceiue. True it is that the life of man in it self may well 40 be called a dreame. For what doo men heere vntill our Lord haue inlightened them and made them knowe that they be ordeyned to a better life? VVhat doo they (I say) but only dreame? All such as weene too get weith and too heape vp riches heere bylowe, cease not too runne seeking heere and there, and too make large circuites: and yet notwithstanding they come alwayes to one point, which, is to think vpon nothing else but gathering: and all that is but a dreame. VVhat other vices so euer men be infected with, I pray you haue they any certain marke 50 or any resting place so long as they be intangled in this world? Haue they a cleere mind to vnderstand that God calleth them? No. Haue they their thoughts well settled? Haue they their affections well ordered? No not at all. They do but dreame. To be short, if all things were well serched by peccemeale which men purpose and deuise, which they take in hand, and which they doo: it would be found that their whole state is but like a dreame or fancie that a man conceyueth. And (as I haue sayd) such may mannes life be generally sayd to be. But specially it 60 may be verified of those that hold aloof from God and turne their backs vpon him. For inasmuch as they leaue the light and wilfully seeke after darknesse: it is meete for them too haue such wages as they deserue: that is to wit, to haue their witts confounded, so as they may not be able to iudge any thing, nor to discern betweene whyte and blacke, but rather be ouerspred with a [continuall] night to doo nothing else but dreame. And in deede we see also how they transforme things, and turne them cleane contrarie. Marke mee a despizer of God: he will beare himself in hand that he is able too woork wondrous: and yet in the meane whyle he knoweth not that if God be his enimie, he must needs perish, and that he may well fortifie himself, but he shall not be able to scape Gods hand that it fal not vpon him as a hideous storme. But as I sayd, forsomuch as the wicked doo shun the light as much as they can, they deserue that God should cast them as it were into an vnlyghtsome place, as it were into a continuall night, there to be wrapped round about with darknesse. Haue they once their mindes so dazeled, they conceyue dreames and fancies, and make themselves beleue this and that. So then it is not without cause that the holie Ghost doeth here by the mouth of Sophar liken the wicked vnto a dreame. And not onely they disguise themselves after that sorte, but wee see that other men also haue a false opinion of them. For if a wicked man be aduanced, euery man reuerenceth him, 20 yea and they enuie his state, and would faine be like him: and such as cannot come at it, doo ostentimes make an ydole of him. Thus ye see in what case men are when they see the wicked prosper. But we consider not that within them they haue a woorme that gnaweth them without end or ceasing, bycause Gods iustice followeth them at the hard heeles, and they are alwayes troubled in their consciences. Then knowe we not in what perplexitie and vnquietnesse the wicked are bycause God hath cursed them. But wee be beared with a certain vayne shewe, and (as the prouerb sayeth) all that glistereth is eyther gold or siluer in our eyes. So then let vs lerne to remember that which is shewed vs heere: that is too wit, that we must no more dreame, nor be so led by our owne misweening fancie. For God will skorne such vanitie, and shewe that in the end after we haue ben in darknesse, a day will come wherin we shall be brought too light, and when that day commeth, men shall see how wee haue ben beguyled in our dreames. But now 30 are wee not in the night: for God inlyghteneth vs, at leastwise if the let be not in ourselves. VVhat is it then that maketh vs too dreame? what is the cause that we bee so deceyued by our owne fond imaginacions, and that euery one of vs forgeth some fancie or other to himself: but that wee be loth too stay our selues to consider what God doeth dayly before our eyes, and specially what he warneth vs of by his woord? Behold how God sheweth vs which is the true happinesse and what is our true welfare. Blissed is the man (sayeth he) that feareth the Lord: Blissed is the man that applyeth himself too the mynding of Gods truthe: Blissed is the man that putteth his whole trust in God. For he shall be like a tree 40 planted by a riuers side, alwayes full of good sappe, so as nother heate nor drought may cause him too forgoe his freshnesse, and lustinesse. Thus doeth our Lord shewe vs the true happinesse, that wee may knowe it if we our selues be not too blame. But what? wee be fugitiue and cannot rest vpon firme ground, but will needes haue a happinesse that is slippery and flyghtfull. Therefore wee bee well woorthie too perish and too tumble intoo the bottomlesse pit, sith wee goe so wilfully too seeke after the darknesse of the nyght. Thus yee see why I sayd, that forsomuch as God is so gracious as too inlyghten vs with his woord: it beho- 50 ueth vs too come away out of our dreames and fancies, too the end we be no more tossed so. And afterward it is sayd, that his bones are ful of his youth. The Hebrew woord that Sophar vseth here, doeth sometimes signifie hid and secret sinnes: and surely the Hebrew word that

signifieth youth is deriued thence also. And so, the sense may be, that a wicked mannes bones are full of the finnes that he hath committed, and specially that he began to commit them in his youth, or else that in his youth his bones were full and he was filled and glutted with pleasures, so as he had his harts desire, and all that euer he had a mynd vnto came to his hand. This is it that we haue to note. So then, if we take the woord youth in his owne signification, the meening will be, first that Sophar warranteth the wicked, that if they be once giuen vnto euill, they neuer turne backe again, according as it is sayd in Salomons prouerbes, that when a yoong man hath once take a wrong way, he shall go on still: and when he commeth to old age he shall continue all one. VVee see that when men haue once taken their way awrye to giue them selues to naughtinesse: it is very hard too plucke them backe again. Lo heere a good and profitable lesson. And although it be common ynough [in talke,] and that the verie heathen men haue made prouerbes of it: yet haue we neede to be warned of it, considering how wee be so much giuen to continue in euill as it is rufull, and think it too be nothing at all. But we perceyue not how Satan taketh possession of vs when we continue in our filthinesse. VVhen a man beginneth first to doo euill, he thinketh that if he followe it still a day a moneth, or a yeere, he shall returne well ynough again in the end: verely as though we had repentance in our sleeue. But (as I sayd,) behold, Satan creepeth into vs and taketh possession of vs ere we be aware. Therefore let vs keepe vs from hardening so in euill, and as soone as we perceyue that our flesh and naughtie nature egge vs and prouoke vs to step asyde, let vs be restreyned by the feare of God. And if we be false, let vs doo our indeuer too get vp again incontinently: and when wee bee out of the way, let vs returne by and by. I say, it is not for vs to delay till to morrowe. And specially when a yoong man standeth vpon the ordering of his lyfe: let him be well aduysed that he giue not himself ouer too vyce and filthinesse. For if he weene to returne, when he listeth himself: hee is deceyued. Yee see then that the first thing which we haue too marke, is that we must not be saped in our finnes. Now then, it is a verie fit maner of speaking to say, that the bones of the wicked are full of their youth: that is to wit, the wicked not only haue some fleeting lusts: as a man shall see some folk that haue not any maliciouse wilfulness in them, nor are vtter despyzers of God, but haue still some seede of goodnesse, and would fayne giue themselves to well dooing, howbeit forasmuch as they haue no hold of themselves, nor are costant: as soone as they mete with any prouocation, they streyt ouershoote themselves: we shall see some such, (I say). But Sophar meeneth much more heere: that is to witte, they haue their bones full of naughtinesse within, and are soked or steeped in it, and they delight themselves in it. And wee see also that when the diuel poysoneth men, it is not by stinging them lightly, but by sheading his venim into the bottō of their hart, so as their witte and vnderstanding may conceyue nothing but euill. Lo how God punisheth such as haue despyzed him, and giuen themselves ouer to euill, so as they do dayly appayre and wex euer woorse and woorse. Hereby we see that it is not in mannes choyce to repent when he listeth, as these skoffers say, mocking God, with Tush, there needs but one good sigh at the end. But who shall giue them that sigh? VVherfore let vs beware that we welter not in our finnes. For if they once get into our bones and intoo our marce, our naughtinesse will go wirth vs to our graue, and well may wee stryue against it, but yet must we be fayne to dwell with it still in our old

Pro. 22. 4. 6.

skin. Therefore let vs beware that such vengeance of God light not vpon vs. Furthermore (as I haue sayd) there is another lesson for vs to gather out of his saying, that the bones of the wicked are full in their youth, and that they shall lie downe with them in their graue, where their naughtinesse shall lye with thē sayeth Sophar. Hereby he meeneth that when the wicked are (as ye would say) redye to burst for fulnesse of goodes and pleasures: God will make them leane ynough, so as they shall wither away, and be fayne to go stark naked too their graue. This serueth to confirme the matter that was discourfed not long afore: that is too wit, that when the wicked haue their owne wish, and are in their cheef iollitie, so as they seeme to be the happyest men in the whole world: it is all one as if their bones had ben full in their youth: that is to say, as if God had first giuen them all that they could wish, and afterward made them to lay themselves downe to sleepe. And with whom? Euen euery man by himself alone: that is to say, with no more but only his bare carkeffe. For God vncafeeth them, and when they be stripped stark naked, he sendeth them to their graue. Hereby wee be admonished, that when wee see the wicked men haue meate & drink their fill, yea eue till they burst, so as their riches flowe vnto them more thā they desire, and they be honored and haue all their pleasures: I say we be warned not to be out of quiet when we see such things. For seing that our Lord hath told vs that it must be so: it is good reason that we should passe ouer such stumbling blockes, and not be shaken by thē. But let vs marke wel their end which Sophar sheweth here, how that euery one of them must go lie downe alone by himself in his graue. Then seing it is so: let vs tarie till our Lord vncafe the wicked: and then we shall haue no more cause to enuy them, nor to ouershoote ourselves with them. If it be sayd, that it is a common thing to vs all to go to dust, and there to rotte: it is true. Howbeit we haue good companie, inasmuch as we haue walked in the feare of God during our life. For we knowe that if we yeeld our soules into his hands, he will keepe them well and faythfully. VVe shall bee well accompanied inasmuch as we knowe that the verie Angelles of God (as the scripture telleth vs) shall receyue our soules to put them into this sayd good and safe keeping, vntill we rise againe intoo the heauenly glorie. Albee it then that to outward apperance, euery one of vs be cut of from the world, and from the companie of men, and laid in our graues: Yet shall we be well accompanied to Godward, when we haue walked in the feare of him. But on the contrarie part, the wicked must lie still in the dust: and although they haue had greate traynes and bāds and haue (as ye would say) trayled a long taylor after thē: yet must God bring thē to the end that is declared heere. Afterward it is sayd, that if euil be swete in their mouth, they will hold it vnder their tounge, they wil spare it without swallowing of it downe, and keepe it still in the palate of their mouth, and farther, that it shall be turned into the gall of an Adder in their bowels, and that as soone as they haue swallowed it downe, they shall spew it vp again. And among these things he spake also of the children of the wicked, which thing I had forgotten. Sophar therefore among those other things sayeth, that wicked folkes children shall flatter the poore, and their bandes shall restore the riches that they had possessed. Hereby he doeth vs to vnderstand that God wil vtter his vengeance and make it to be felt, not only in the persones of those whom he speaketh of: but also in their children, according also as the Scripture sayeth, that God will make the iniquitie of the fathers to come home intoo the bosoms of their children. It may seeme at the first blush that this agreeth not with Gods right-

Ezec. 18. e. rightuousnesse. For the soule that hath sinned shal beare 20. the punishmēt of his sinnes, as it is sayd in Ezechiel. How is it then that God punisheth the children for the sinnes of their fathers? He doeth so in deede. Howbeit we must presuppose that God doeth oftentimes of his owne graciouse goodnesse exempt the children of the wicked, and not ceasse to blisse, notwithstanding that they had deser-ued to be cursed. Again when God intendeth to per-forme the iudgement whereof mention is made heere, he letteth the children of the wicked too hold on their owne race after the steppes of their fathers. By reason whereof they cannot but continually increace the mis-cheef: and forsomuch as they bee vtterly voyd of Gods spirit, they doo but prouoke his wrath, and continue in heaping vp of his vengeance vpon themselues, according as God had executed it vpon their fathers. True it is that the verie cause hereof is for that God draweth them not backe by his holie spirit, so as they might not followe their fathers. And what for that? Is he bound or tyed too anye man? No. So then, let vs not think this maner of punishing straunge whereof Sophar speaketh heere: that is to wit, that God should impouersish wicked mennes children and bring them too so lowe an ebbe, as they must be fayne too sawne euen vpon the veryest rascals. Their fathers were passingly proud, insomuch that the greatest and honorablest fort durst not match with them, but stood in awe of them: according as we see that such as haue their harts so puffed vp with pryde, must needes disdeyne men seing they haue already begonne too de-spize God. VVe see then an intollerable pryde in them, when they cannot voutsaue too giue a good looke too such as come to sew to them and too make supplication.
 VVell, is it so? Their children must bee fayne too few too the veriest rascals that are. I say that this vengeance is performed when God suffereth the children too followe their fathers. And it is a thing right necessarie for vs to knowe, to the end we may consider of what fort the vengeance of God is vpon the wicked, seing it must also extend to their children: like as on the other side we perceyue the infinite goodnesse of our God, when it pleaseth him to blisse our childrē and to make thē feele his mercie for our sakes. For is not that an excellēt record of the loue that he beareth vs? So on the contrarie part, whē wee see the fire of his wrath so kindled that it not only pursueth our selues, but also spreadeth further and cat-cheth hold of our children also: is it not ynough to make our heares stand vpright vpon our heads? Then let vs lerne to walk so much the more carefully in the feare of God, least wee drawe the sayd horrible punishment vpon our selues and our offspring. And herewithall let vs vnderstand also that our Lord will blisse the offspring of those that haue feared and honored him, that wee may with the better courage giue our selues to his seruice, when we see him so liberrall that he thinks it not ynough too make promise to vs, but will haue the same to extend to our children also. Behold (I say) what we haue to marke in this sentence. Now consequently it is sayd, that their bands shall restore their riches. And that agreeth with this that Sophar addeth: namely, haib he deuowred? He must spew it vp again, and God will make him too restore the thing that he hath swallowed vp. It is ment heere, that the wicked may well rake much toogether in a short tyme and inriche themselues: but they shall neuer the sooner inioy the goods that they haue gotten. And why? For eyther their children must be brought to pouertie: or else they themselues must spew them vp again. For God will not tarie so long a tyme in making them too yeeld vp their account. But when they seeme to be come too the full point of their purpose, God must be fayne to doo a cure vpon them, and make them to cast vp their stomacks, to rid them quite and cleane of the greate store of goods that they had raked toogether. VVe see verie many examples hereof: but yet there are verie fewe that think vpon it. I say we see men pilling and scraping on all sides.

 VVel, God giueth them the brydle so as they haue the meanes and occasions to inriche themselues: they buy both house and lands, they turne the penny, and they deale with merchandize: and so ye see them as full and as well stuffed as may be. But haue they once swallowed vp all, there will come such a storme, that he which was worthe a hundred thousand crounes, shall find himself so distressed, as he would be glad too scape safe with his bodie, like as a poore man that is in the midds of the Sea would giue all the goods he hath too bee al and that he myght saue his life. Euen so (say I) doeth God suffer riches too choke the men that haue raked them toogither, and too be as it were their hangman: or else he shall be bereft of them and impouersish as soone as there commeth any sodeine storme. Also we see othersome that waste away by peccemeale. Truely men will say, see the euill lucke behold such a one who was verie rich, he had spedde so well by his owne policie, as he was come too that ye see: and now is such a misfortune befalne him, or such a man hath delt amisse with him, or he hath made a foolish bargaine, or else he ieoperded too much. Thus wee looke vpon the meane causes: but wee ought to go to the principall: which thing wee doo not: and therein wee bewray how blind we bee, for that we consider not that when such maner of men are inriched by crueltie, extortion, craft, deceyt, and guile, and haue raked other mennes goods vntoo them without pytying the widowes and fatherlesse: that is the very cause why they bee turned out of all their goods. So then for want of knowing Gods hand, although it shewe it self: we turne ali vpside downe. VVherefore let vs lerne too take better heede than wee doo. And when God giueth vs such examples, that is too wit, that such as haue ben verie riche are not only abated, but also delt withall by God as he maketh them too cast their gorge, so as we see them impouersish before our faces: let vs acknowledge that it is God which layeth his hand vpon them. But whereas it is sayd heere, that their owne bandes shall restore their riches: how commeth it to passe that they which haue so swallowed vp all things, doo stoupe so lowe as to restore that which they haue raked toogether with their owne hands? His meaning is not that they do it of their owne accord. For the wicked would neuer come too that poynt by their good wills, except God graunt them a speciall grace too acknowledge, Alas, I haue doone those men greate wrong whom I haue so polled and beguiled, and therefore I must be-think mee to restore all too them again. If such as haue defrauded their neyghbours can come to this poynt: it is a blissing of God. But here Sophar speaketh of those whom God curseth. How then shall their hands restore the things that they haue taken? It is for that men knowe not the meanes whereby God maketh them too cast their gorge, and too seeme vtterly destitute of wit and vnderstanding, whereas heretofore they had ben so skilfull in dooing their businesse as they coulde discourse vpon their matters how too lay for them afore hand, and say, such a thing must be doone first, and then will I haue that thing doone, and this way and this must we go to woork. Then as they haue ben politik too gather too themselues on all sides: so shall ye see them become stark dolts insomuch that they shall seeme to giue backe

backe again all the riches which they had scraped together, as though they had cost them nothing: and too be short a man would say, that they play the little babes which do and vndo their things. True it is that such manner of men cease not too be as couetouse as euer they were, and to haue their furnace still burning in them, so as they could find in their harts to haue deuoured a hundred worlds. But yet they be so blinded in them selues, as they passe not too lash out that which they hild so streytly before. And wherof commeth that, but bycause God disfigureth them of all wit and reason, too impoverish them after that sort? Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first part of this sentence. But now, although the wicked doo swallows vp things in that manner, deuouring one and fleecing another, and seeming to themselues neuer to haue ynough, though their goods increace still more and more: yet let not vs cease to behold that thing by fayth, which wee see not as yet with our eyes. Looke mee vpon a wicked man that enricheth himself, he scrapeth vnto him on all sides. VVell, what shall I think of him? wee must haue an eye too that which is sayd heere. True it is that wee shall not forthwith perceyue how our Lord doeth the cure that I spake of, in making them to restore the things that they haue so swallowed vp and deuoured. But let vs behold that thing in his word which wee conceyue not of our selues, nor see not evidently: and it will make vs that we shall not be tempted, to doo euill. For what maketh vs so couetouse too take away other mennes goods? It is bycause we beare our selues in had that those things shall continue with vs for euer. But on the contrarye side, see how God threatneth vs, too the intent it should serue for a brydle too restreine vs, that wee myght not be tempted too stretch out our haudes to other mennes goods or to enrich our selues by the losse of our neyghbours. Now immediatly it is sayd that if euil bee sweete in his mouth, he will hold it there. See here the trim and fit similitude that Zophar vseth. For it expresseth at what poynt the despyzers of God be: that is too wit, that looke where they take any pleasure, and looke where they finde any sweetnesse, there they hold themselues and feede their humor: as for example, when a couetouse man can gather any goodes, that is sugre and honnye to him. Surely it is as if a man were hunger staruen, for although a peece of meate were nother tastable nor sauerie, yet will he chop it vp. And it commeth to passe (as Salomon sayeth in his prouerbes) that he which is throughly a hungred thinks the meate that he eateth too bee sweete, although it bee bitter in deede. The wicked then are in the same case: that is to say, in all their misdooings they find some sweetnesse. And how commes that too passe? Bycause the diuell sauceth them. Looke vpon a whoremaister: if he bee once chafed with his owne lust, the diuell blindeth him, and makes him find his sin so sweete, that all his delyght is in it. If a man be giuen to dronkenesse, or to gluttonie, he serues them of the same sauce. Thus ye see how the wicked and the despyzers of God, doo fynd sweetnesse in all their misdooings. For they play as these liquerouse folk doo, who licke their lippes and hold it as if it were sugre, yea and sometymes keepe it vp to the roof of their mouth, to hold the sweetnesse of it the longer, and they be loth to swallowe it downe too soone. VVe shall see some of these liquerouse sort that (as another bodye sayeth) could find in their harts too haue cranes necks, to the intent that the fauour of the meate might tarie the longer with them? And if they meete with a cup of good wine, they think they haue neuer emptyed the glasse ynough: but they would faime haue the sweetnesse of it to tarrie longer, and that there were a spring in it to runne continually. So then Zophar sayeth that the wicked doo find fauour in iniquitie, like these liquerouse folk, who when they haue a delicate morsell in their mouthe, doo hold it vpon their tounge, rub it too their palate, and licke their lippes and are as well at ease as can be. Lo in what point the wicked are: but in the end they find a bitternesse hidden vnder it. And wherof commeth that? when a man will giue one poyson, he must season it with honnye and sugre, that the bitternesse of it be not felt at the first taste. But as soone as the poyson is swallowed downe, it woorketh verie sharply, and the bitternesse of it becommeth much feerer and deadyer, than if he had felt it at the first receiuing of it when the morsell was yet in his mouthe. So also when the wicked haue swallowed downe their sayd sweetnesse, Zophar sayeth that it shall bee turned in them to the gall of an Adder. Now must we indeuer too beare this in mynd. And surely although that by the declaracion of this similitude, euery man sees it too bee a meetly common doctrine, and such a one as may bee vnderstoode euen of the rudest and vniernedest sort: yet notwithstanding our cold practyzyng of it doeth alwayes shewe that wee haue not taken heede ynough of it. Neuerthelesse there is such a grace in this similitude, as a mā may well see that the holy Ghost did set it downe to the end too stirre vs the more to remember what is conteyned in it.

So then when we perceyue that the diuell commeth to tempt vs, and layes his bayts for vs: let vs beware we bee not allured by him, for vices will at the first syght haue alwayes some sweetnesse in them so as we shall be deceyued by them. But they bee full of hooks. The hungrie fishes doo no sooner byte the bayte, but immediatly they bee stricken and hang fast by the hooke. Euen so is it with vs when we suffer our selues to be seduced and beguiled by our owne vices. Yea and euen the heathen men haue often vsed this similitude, (according as Plato sayeth) that looke how manie lustes and affections there are in men, so many baytes and allurements are there, which Satan offereth them too throwe them headlong afterwarde intoo destruction. True it is that at the beginning there will bee some likelyhold of sweetnesse, and it will seeme too bee the sweetest thing in the world. But in the end, that which is conteyned heere must needs shewe it self: that is to wit that the sweetnesse which the wicked shall haue felt in all their misdooings, shall bee turned intoo the gall of an Adder.

And forasmuch as heere is mention made of the despyzers of God, that is too wit, that alfoone as they shall haue chawed the poyson, and swallowed it downe although they feele not the bitternesse at the first, yet must it shewe it self in the end: let vs pray God that he suffer vs not to find fauour in our vices, but that he giue vs the spirit of wisdom, that we may discern aright, and not be deceyued by the vayne sweetnesse that we feele in our sinnes at the first taste.

Then let vs not be allured by that, but rather let vs seeke true and liuely sweetnesse in his grace, which is communicated vntoo vs by our sauiour Iesus Christ, too the end he may fill vs with the sweetnesse of that hope of the euerlasting life wherewith hee colleth vs. Furthermore, let it not greeue vs though we bee kept hungry in this life, and haue not wherewith too fill our selues, but rather be pyned at Gods hand with many afflictions and miseries, let it not greeue vs I say too beare it, asit, assuring our selues that wee shall bee partakers of the heavenly inheritaunce, where we shall haue full fruition of the inestimable sweetnesse that God hath promised to those that are his, which as yet is hidden from vs.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledging of our sinnes, praying him, that he will not suffer vs to yeld our selues too Sathans deceits: and that although of our owne nature wee bee readye to turne aside vntoo the enticements that he offereth vs, yet we may bee so held backe and restrained by his holy spirit, as none of the lustes and affections of our flesh may carry vs away, to tesse and tormoyle vs, as they are wont too do, but that wee may stedfastly withstand them, vntill that by the power of his holie spirite wee haue gotten full victory, and bee come too the marke which our good God hath set afore vs, that is, that being conformed too his glory, and vnited too his sonne in his heauenly kingdome, wee may haue wherefore too glorifie and magnifie him, and too reioyce fully in him. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only too vs, but also too all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The lxxxv. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xx. Chapter.

This Sermon goeth on still with the exposition of the xv. verse and then with the text following.

16. He shall sucke the venim of the Adder, and the toung of the Viper shall slea him.
17. He shall not see the riuers and the streames that flovve vvith honnye and butter.
18. He shall restore that vvich he hath gotten, it shal not tarie vvith him according to the surenes of his chaunge, nother shall he inioy it.
19. He hath gathered toogether and he shall bee made poore, he hath spoyled the house and not builded it.
20. He shall not feele any contentation in his belly, nother shall hee bee able too keepe his desyre.

Mong the other corruptions that intyce vs to drawe from God, and to giue our selues too euill dooing, one is that men are simply persuaded that it is a desirable thing to be riche, without regarding wherein riches consist, or that the end of possessing the is to enioy them. The world the is blind, so as it knoweth not what it is too bee riche, nor too what end and purpose men should bee riche. And so we see that the wretched vnbeleuers are wedded to this affection, namely that a man must be riche by what meanes so euer it be. Heerevpon they fall too snatching, polling and extortion, passing not how they come by things so they haue them, and in the meane whyle knowe not that God curseth them, and that when they haue gathered greate abundance of goods so as they may seeme to haue swallowed vp the whole earth, they shall reape no fruition of the goods that they possesse. And why? For God will plucke their goods out of their hands, or else make them so too melt away as they shall feele no profit by them. So much the more doeth it stand vs in hand too marke well the sentence that is conteyned heere. For first it is shewed vs, that men beguyle themselues when they beare themselues in hand that when they haue gathered greate goods they shall inioy them. And yet notwithstanding, that is the thing that all couetous folk doo ground vpon. If I may get lands and possessions (say they) I shall take the reuenues, so as I shall not neede too goe seeke for corne or wine out of myne owne Cellars, and Garners, but I shall haue too make monie of besides. Again I shall haue diuers other things, so as men shall be faine to seeke to mee, and I shall haue neede of none of them. I shall be honored, I shall be credited. If any man hang the groyne at mee, I shall haue monye in my pouche to wring him with. Now when men make such account, they may soone come short of their reckening: & (as the commo prouerb sayeth) they reckē without their hoste. For God may well suffer such mēro gather, and to gaine, and to heape vp greate store: but when they bee fully fraughted and charged, then must they lay vp their stomaks again. Thus ye see what is ment in the first place by saying, He hath deuoured [greate] goodes, but he must spew them vp again. And why? For God will plucke them out of his belly. How comes it to passe that the vnbeleuers beare themselues in hand, that the goods which they haue gotten shall continue alwayes with them, and that they shall neuer be bereft of them? It is bycause they perceiue not that there is a God in heauen which must call them to account as it is shewed vs here in this streyne. For it is rightly sayd that couetous folk doo make iust reckening that they be sure of all the goods that they possesse. But the holie Goste bringeth vs backe to this iudgement of God. VVhen a man (sayeth he) shall haue swallowed vp all the goods that he is owner of, so as he hath it, not only in his cofers, or in his garners, or in his cellars, but also in his belly: is not God able to plucke them out again? So then let vs assure our selues it is to no purpose to haue deuoured them. In our getting of goods, it behoueth vs aboue all things to be able to protest truly that we hold all of God, that is to say, that we haue gottē the by meanes lawfull & allowed of God, so as he hath put them into our hāds. Lo here the principall point that we must ame at: I mene eue then when the case standeth vpo gathering of the goods of this world. The let vs no more be so foolish as to imagin that all our happinesse consisteth in being riche. But rather let vs bethink our selues that the true richnesse is not the hauing of greate abundāce of worldly goods, gottē by right or wrong: but the blissing of God, so as a mā be contented with that he hath: & therewithall also be able to inioy & vse the goods that are in his hāds. And this is a speciall gift of God. Furthermore let vs bee afrayde of this threate that God will make vs to spew vp that which we haue deuoured, notwithstanding that the stomacke & bellie haue consumed it. Let vs lerne (I say) to take that which God giueth vs by his grace, and to be cōtented with it, so as we play not the cormorāts and drunkards, who cram in so much that they are faine to lay it vp again by and by after: but rather as the sober and aduyfed man that taketh his repaste measurably, so let euery of vs take heede too increase increase himself by such meanes as God giueth him, that he be not caried away with so excessiue couetousnes as to deceyue on the one side, to deuour on the other, to rake to him by deceyte one way, and to pill and poll another way. I her ore (as I sayd) let vs content our selues to receyue whatsoeuer God shall giue vs. But here is added yet a greater cursednesse: that is to wit, that such as like to enrich themselues by subtilies, or by crueltie, or by any other vnlawfull meanes, doo sucke the poyson of the Adder, and the Vipers toung shall kill them. This is according to that which was afore, that is to wit, that the wicked mennes meate shall bee turned intoo the gall of Adders within their bowels, notwithstanding that they find it somewhat swete in their mouth, yea & licke their lippes at it, and delight themselues in it with rolling it about with their toung. VVe see that such as neuer think theselues too haue ynough, are wel at ease & verie merrie when they may deceyue any man. And again if they haue any praëlize in hand, o (say they) that will fall out well for our purpose: so as if they once take in hand too get any thing, they will neuer be at rest till they haue brought it about. Thus is there sweetnesse in their tong, but God turneth it all to bitternesse. VVherefore let vs marke well, that when it is sayd heere, that the wicked shall sucke the poyson of Adders, & that the viper shall kill the: it is to shewe vs that God can wel chaunge all the sweetnesse wherwith the wicked do beguie themselues. For if they intrap folk, they think them selues the happiest men in the world. Too bee short, it is their paradys if they can intrap men on all sides. But what? we must go to the end of them. For it is sayd that God will chaunge all, and turne that thing into Adders poyson, which was thought to be as sweete as honnye and suger. Then let vs simply followe the petition wherein our Lord Iesus Christ hath taught vs too aske our dayly bread of God. For vnder that saying is comprehended that when God shall haue giuen vs what to eate and drink, he must also voutsafe to turne the same intoo good nurrishment. For it is not ynough for vs to haue wherevpon to feede: but our Lord must also be fayne too blisse it throughly, and to make it auayle to our nurrishment. But (as we shall see again anon) hee that crammeth and glutte himself with much eating, is so farre of from being suffized: that all of it shall be turned intoo his bane. True it is that he may well be filled: but that shall be after the maner of a wretched bodie that hath the dropsie. For were a dropsiman purged of that humor that is in his bodie, he should bee better at ease with one half cup of wyne, and one bit of bread would doo him more good, than all the meate in the world. But forasmuch as hee is full of naughtie humors within: he might drinke vp the Sea and the fishes to (as men say) and yet be neuer the better. Euen so is it with them that haue deuoured all things cruelly like wyld beastes. God must be fayne to turne it all to their bane. And so folowing the admonition of Moyse, let vs lerne to pray God too bee our fosterfather. For euen therfore did God feede his people in the wildernesse by the space of fortie yeeres without bread or other vitayles, by giuing them Manna from heauen. God (sayeth he) hath maynteyned thee after that sort, too the intent that thou shouldst knowe for the tyme too come, that man liueth not by his owne labour, so as thou myghtest say, it is by the diliigence of myne owne hands that I haue gotten these things: no: but like as thou seest that God fed thy fathers in the wildernesse with Manna from heauen: so when he giueth thee bread, receyue it thou as of his owne hand. Now let vs go couet riches and rake them to our selues: [But therewithall] let vs marke what is sayd heere, that is to wit, that they shall bee so farre off from turning to our welfare, that God conuerteth them into adders poyson, and maketh them like the biting of a scorpion. Yea and we myght knowe this by experience although it were not written. Let vs open our eyes, and we shall perceyue that God executeth his iudgements in the world, after the same maner that is specified heere. But what? we be blynd: I say not that wee be vterly ignorant, but that we shet our eyes bycause we would not see them. True it is that sometyme they cannot be discerned: for euen the good men are troubled with much feare. But yet for all that, God setteth markes vpon his iudgements, to the end we myght receyue some instruction by them. Therfore it is long of vs and of our wilfulnesse [that they be not seene] bycause we turne away our sight from that which God sheweth vs. Then let vs lerne to bee somewhat wizer, and wheras it is told vs heere, that we shall come so farre short of being nurrished by the goods that wee get by rauening, that the same shall become our bane, and they shall sooner burst vs than satisfie vs: let vs lerne to content our selues with the little that God shall giue vs, so the same may doo vs good. Now it is sayd immediatly, that the wicked shall not see the riuers nor the streames that flowe with butter and bonnie. Heere we be done to vnderstand, that the wicked shall be depriued of the blissing that God hath promised specially to the faythfull, which is to giue the such abundance, as if the riuers flowed with wine, honnye and butter. True it is that we see not this: but yet for all that, when we be susteyned by Gods grace, and knowe him, and rest vpon his goodnesse and fatherly loue, assuring our selues that he careth for vs too nurrish vs as his children: if the riuers flowed full of honnye and butter, we should not be so well contented as we be. For all things in this world may perish and fade away, sauing this fountayne (that is too wit the hand of God) which neuer drieth. So then it is not without cause sayd heere precisely, that such as feele not the sayd nurrishment of God, but play the wyld beastes, way well burst themselues, and when they haue all the pitts and all the welsprings in the world, yea and the greate riuers to: yet must they be athirst in the middes of them, and al their abundance shall not be able to suffize them. And what is the cause? It is for that they be destitute of Gods blissing. For (as I sayd) that is it wherin consisteth all the rest and contentation of men: and that is the meane to fill them and satisfie them, that is to say, to make them say ho, that they may prayse God and alwayes go on foreward in their race. Then if we haue not this blissing of God, all the goods in the world cannot suffize vs. These sayings are common ynough as it should seeme: and yet who is fully perswaded that they be true? For if it were so, surely we should see equitie and vprightnesse reigne among men, and there should not neede so many lawes, nor so many iusticers to repress the extortion that are committed. Yea there should not neede so much teaching and exhorting. For euery man would bee his owne schoolmaister and teacher, and euery man would carie iustice with him inclozed in his hart, so as it should not be needfull to come to the iudge, there should neede no Seriants, aduocats, nor processes. For we would prevent the mischief, and assure our selues that God who hath put the goods of the world into our hands, could susteyne vs as he thought good and as he hath promised vs, although we had not one grayne of come, no nor one drop of water. And in good sooth we be conuincid hereof by experience. For by crauing our ordinarie foode at his hand, we be fed like little babes by his goodnesse.

If we

If we haue not much, yet let vs content our selues. For hee sheweth vs the grace too nurrish vs, as if Manna fell vpon vs from heauen: If we haue much: he will haue vs to put it to the right vse: which is, that we must not be as cormorants to keepe euery of vs to himseife that which we haue receiued, but must communicate it to suche as haue want and neede of it. So then, seeing that our Lord auoucheth himseife to bee the fosterfather of those that are his: let vs not feare that wee shall be left destitute of that which he knoweth to be needefull for vs, but let vs hold ourselues contented with so faire a promise. Certainly if wee had that discretion in vs, euery one of vs would be refrayned, and there should neede no threatenings nor lawes to say, Absteyne ye from euildoing, hurt not your neighbours, do no man wrong, do no more to others than ye would haue done to your selues: for euery man would bee bridled of himseife, and be induced to vprightnesse, and we would not go to violence as we do. But now it is seene, that mes lusts are so outrageous, as they cannot by any meanes be tamed, no cords nor cheines are able to tie them. Then (I say) there shoulde neede no such constreints, but our handes would of our owne accord be as it were tied vp from doing euill, yea and we would be desirous to serue euery mans turne and to do them good. For these causes we oughte to minde this lesson well. For it will be ynough to draw vs backe from all vanitie and loocenesse, from all excessiue lusts, and from all the wrongs and extortions that we haue bin wont to do for the enriching of ourselues. Moreouer, it will stirre vs vp to regard God, by resting vpon his onely blissing, and therewithall to vse well the goodes that he hath put vs in trust with, knowing that wee bee but stewards, and that his giuing of them to vs is vpon condition, that wee should yeld him a good and faithfull account of them, by shewing that none of vs hath deuoured them alone by himseife, but made our neighbours partakers of them, according to the abilitie that we haue receiued.

Thus ye see in effecte what is contained heere. Nowe it is saide, That the wicked shall restore that whiche they haue gotten, and that it shall not abide with them, no verely according to the measure of their change, nother shall they inioy them. That whiche we haue herd heeretofore, is expressed heere more at full. How is it then that the wicked are neuer satisfied, although they haue gathered so much goodes, as they seeme redy to burst: VVherfore do they alwayes want: It is bycause our Lord prospereth not the things that they haue in their hands. For like as a man might cast much goodes into a gulfe and yet they shuld not be seene: so an insatiable man may snatch and catch on all sides, and yet not ceasse to be hūgrie still. And this commeth of two causes. For as it is a singular grace of God when we can content our selues with a little, so as we call vpon his name, and waite to be fed at his hande, according as we haue found our selues to haue bin nurrished by him heeretofore: so on the contrarie part when he suffereth the couetousnesse of the vnbeleeuers to bee kindled, so as they be alwayes gathering, and euermore coueting and neuer contented: The same is a punishment to them. Then let vs marke well, that the first cause why the wicked cannot inioy the great goodes that they haue gathered, is bycause our Lord sets their lusts on fire, and suffereth them to haue a racke within them that neuer ceaseth too torment them: and the deuill still kindleth the fire by Gods iust permission, in the hartes of them that regard not him. Thus muche concerning the first point. The second cause is, that like as God increaceth one graine of corne to the nurrishing of those that are his, and maketh it to multiplie to a hundred, so as a little shall suffice them and make them fat: So likewise on the contrarie part he curseth and withereth all that euer the wicked can cram in. They shall eate dubble: that is too say, they shall gather ynough and too much: howbeit, God will consume it euery whit, (as it is said to the Prophet) and all shall go too naughte, so as a great heape of goodes shall vanish away in a minute of an houre. Ye see then that God rooteth vp that whiche men made great account of: and that is the cause why the wicked cannot enioy that which they possesse. True it is that they will be proude ynough, according also as our Lord Iesus Christ sheweth in the parable of the rich man that had enlarged his barnes. My soule (saith he) be merrie: for now hast thou well wherewith to feede thee: beholde thou hast suche abundance as thou canst neuer wante. Those therefore that are so wedded to worldly goodes, and haue gotten much by their wicked dealings, haue no great cause too boast of their riches: for not withoute cause is it said vnto them, If riches flow vnto you, set not your harts vpon them. For thereby the prophet meeneth, that very hardly shall men bee riche, but that they shall find themselues wrapped in worldly vanities. And that also is the cause why Sainte Paule exhorteth Timothy, to warne the rich men of this world, that they bee not exalted with pride. VVherby he doth vs to wit, that the rich men make an ydoll of their goodes, so as they thinke themselues to be aboute the state of men, and vterly forget themselues. So then, the wicked may well reioice of their gettings, but what manner of reioicing is that? A cursed one, euen suche a one as God must in the end turne to gnashing of teeth and anguish. Therefore let vs marke that we must not stand vpon a day or a yeere when we see the wicked triumph and take pleasure in their state, and beare themselues in hande that there is no felicitie but theirs. But let vs looke to the end, and we shall find that the thing which is conteyned heere shall be accomplished: that is to say, that their ioy is not euerlasting, and that (howsoeuer the world goe with them) the wicked are alwayes in torment and vnquietnesse. And surely if wee could see what is in theyr harts, it would appeere that euen in the middes of their ioyes they be alwayes full of care and perplexitie, and afraid least the earth should faile them. Looke vpon a man that hath gathered great goodes, surely no man shal be able to beare his pride, but hee could find in his harte to set his foote vpon all mens throtes, and vnder coloure of his credite he trāples one vnder his feete, oppresseth another, and makes the third to honour him as God, and when hee is at home in his owne house hee stands tooting vpon himseife as a Peacocke at his owne tayle. All this is seene I say. But yet hath hee secret prickings within, and God will not abide that such as glory after that manner in their goodes, shoulde haue any certayne rest: but putteth a woorme into them whiche gnaweth them in such wise, as they be in continuall anguish and perplexitie howsoeuer the world go with them. And it is said expressly heere, That the wicked shall make restitution according to the lengthening of his chaunge. This saying may at the first blush seeme somewhat darke: but it conteyneth a good lesson. For in effect it sheweth vs, that the wicked must bee faine too restore the thinges which they haue gotten with great labour. This is for the first point, as if he shoulde saye, men are very blynde and witleffe when they take so greate paynes too get goodes: for they must yeld them vp agayne though they haue neuer so muche. And that is a very harde nippe (for wee knowe that the couetouse fort are wedded too their goodes:) it is more than if a man shoulde breake their bones and plucke out the marce of them. For the goodes that they possesse are as deere too them as theyr owne liues. Very farre are they led away, which consider not what goodes were created for mens vse, and that they be but as an income to the present life. And yet notwithstanding we see that the wicked torment themselves for them: and if they haue neuer so little harme or losse, it goeth too the hate of them as if a man had cut theyr throte a hundred times. But yet neuertheless they must be faine to restore them, not with their good will, but by-cause God plucketh them from them, as hath bin saide heeretofore: yea euen according too the prolonging of the chaunges and rechaunges that they haue made, so will God haue his turne too change also. And how is that: VVhen a man is so gripple in gathering of goodes, and God giueth him head, what will hee do? He will so transpose things, as it may seeme hee will make a newe world. Hee impouersisheth him that was rich, he abateth him that had much, and he pulleth him downe that was aloft.

Lo howe the couetouse (as muche as in them lieth) do make a new world. And God (as I saide) giues them leaue for a time to plow vp all things, to mens seeming. Yea but it is with venim and poyson. They stuffe themselves full: but that is but too vomit it vp agayne anone after, yea and to feele horrible bitternesse by that which they haue swallowed downe. But haue they so changed all things: that is to say, haue they made such turnings as that they haue landes and possessions where they had none before: and their cofers filled, whereas they had not three shillings in their purse before: Are they in estimation and credite, whereas they were despized afore? Haue they then changed the whole world? God also hath his turne. If a mortall man presume too displace things, if he practize, if he determine, as who would say I will do this and that: shal not God change al at length? VVill hee sit idle in heauen? Thinke we that any of all these chaunges are made heere withoute his permission?

And when he suffereth the to be done, thinke we that he hath resigned his office and meddles no more with the gouernement of the world, bycause hee winketh at things for a time: No no. But his will is to blind the wicked after that sort, and hee suffereth them too compassse their enterprises, to the intent to cast them downe, and that with the deadlier fall. And on the other side he exerciseth the faith and pacience of the faithfull. For they might be troubled at the sight of such changes. But they haue the discretion to wait quietly for the ende, and not to ouershoote themselves too hastily, whereby God trieth their faith, and by that meanes they be prouoked to returne to God with greater earnestnesse. And so (as I saide) we see that heere is conteyned a good lesson, when mention is made of the pride of the wicked sort, in making chaunges, so as it seemeth that they would spite God, and displace all the bounds that God hath set. For like as he will haue realmes and dominions to be bounded: so also will he haue bounds settled among priuate persons, that euery one may peasably possesse his owne. But what do these raueners, these Gules, these wilde beastes? It should seeme (as I saide) that they are loth too leaue eyther bounds or borders or any thing else, and that they would faine make a newe world. Haue they changed a pace? Hath God suffered them to do it? Hee must afterward change his copie, and set things againe in their former state. Thus much concerning that sentence.

Anon after it is saide, that it is bycause the wicked haue impouersished the good, and spoyle d the houses whiche they builded not. Heere we see that it behoueth vs to consider Gods iustice in all the punishments that he sendeth in this world. Truly it were alreedy a good instruction, if wee knewe no more but that the chaunges of this world are not casuall as men terme them: that is to say, that if there happen any alteration, the same proceedeth of the hand of God. But that is not all. For though wee simply graunt God such a power as to say, he ruleth the world, he doth all things, and nothing is done which hee guideth not by his determination and will: yet if we go no further, it is no glorifying of God as we ought to do. For like as God will be knowen to be almightie, so will he also be knowne to be righteouse. True it is (as hath bin declared heeretofore) that wee shall not alwayes perceiue the saide righteoufnesse by the things that are seene: but yet must we haue these two things: that is to witte, firste wee must knowe that things are not turned heere by fortune and aduenture. And why? For God disposeth al things, it is God that gouerneth and holdeth the bridle. Marke that for one point. And when we knowe this almightinesse of God, wherevnto all the world is subiect: VVe must come secondly to his righteoufnesse: that is to say, we must be fully resolued and perswaded, that Gods turning of things in this worlde is not as though hee dalied and played with vs as with a tennisball. For the wicked fort say that God maketh a sport of men in taking pleasure eyther to exalt men or to cast them downe. But as for vs, let vs assure ourselues that Gods almightinesse is not a tirannicall or inordinate power, but is ioyned in vnseparable band with hys righteoufnesse, so as he doth all things after an vpright maner.

True it is (as I haue saide) that wee shall not alwayes perceiue this righteoufnesse of God, but that sometimes he hideth it, and wee conceiue not the reason why hee doth things. Howbeit that is no let but that there should be very good reason [in his doing.] That is the thing wherein Iobs friends were deceiued: and therein we must not resemble them. They condemned Iob for a wicked mā. And why? For they imagined of him after the common manner. But Gods iudgements must not be esteemed all after one rate. VVhy so? As I saide afore, sometimes God doth things that are to vs incomprehensible. VVhat shall we do in that case? Let vs conclude neuertheless that God is righteouse. Yea but let vs confesse therewithall, that his iudgementes are a bottomlesse pitte that cannot be founded. For God is two wayes commended in the holy Scripture for his righteoufnesse. Sometime when God punisheth mens iniquities in the sight of the world, to the ende he mighte bee feared and honored as it is saide in the Prophet Esay, that if God keepe his court and shew himselfe iudge of the world, then the inhabitants of the earth will learne to walke vprightly: and whereas euery man tooke leaue afore to do euill: we will thinke, Alas alas, there is a iudge whome we ought to feare.

Thus yee see howe Gods righteoufnesse is sometimes shewed openly. But sometimes also God woorketh after a fashion that is straunge too vs, so as when we haue inquired of a thing, why it is come so to passe, and how it is to be taken: we must bee fayne too come short [of our purpose. But yet neuertheless it behoueth vs to acknowledge that God is righteouse, and to honour his secrete iudgementes which are in him as in a bottomlesse pit. Then howsoeuer the worlde goe, (as I saide) God must bee hilde alwayes for righteouse.

But heere he speaketh of Gods righteoufnesse which is apparant vnto vs, and which we may behold with oure eyes. For it is said that bycause the wicked haue beggered the good men, they themselues must bee paid with the like measure. Bycause they haue raked and spoyled mens houses, God must driue them out of them, and turne them quite out of dores, when they make theyr reckening to dwell at their ease. But if wee haue good discretion, no change at all can come amisse, but wee may profite ourselues by all sorts of them. If God do at any time impouerish such as haue liued well: let vs assure ourselues, that if that be done too the greene tree, what shall become of the seare tree? And so let vs tremble vnder the hand of God, praying him to grant vs the grace to inioy the goodes that he hath put into our handes, as his intent is: or if it please him to bereeue vs of them: let vs pray him to giue vs strength too beare paciently the pouertie that he shall send vnto vs. Thus ye see what we haue to marke. And on the other side, when we see that our Lord compelleth the cormorants too vomit all that whiche they had swallowed downe, making them too yelde an account, constreyning them too restore that which they had snatched away, driuing them out of the houses which they had builded by violence and deceits, and bereeuing them of the goodes that they had gathered by lewde fetches: let vs acknowledge that God do: then hold his affyses, to shew vs that although hee nowe and then suffer the wicked to grow rich, it is not too the intent the same should continue with them for euer, but that the things which they haue swooped vp shuld turne to their bane, whereas the goodes of the faithfull should turne to their welfare, and become as good to them as riuers flowing with butter and hōnie. I say let vs acknowledge it, to the end we may behold Gods iudgementes and humble ourselues vnder them. Also let vs learne not to eniue the wicked, when they seeme to liue at rest and ease in their abundance with credite and honoure. For God will turne it: all too their miserie, and put them to open reproch and shame before all men. Thus ye see how it becommeth vs to marke the chastizings and punishments that God sendeth vpon the worlde, that wee may appie them to our instruction, as Saint Paule counseleth vs. My brethren (saith hee) let no man beguile you with vaine words. Truly a man may heare what wicked words are cast forth, and howe Gods iudgementes are scoft at: but be not: you deceiued by them. For (say the Paule) the wrath of God commeth vpon the vnbeleuer for such things. As if hee should say, Tarrie not till God smite vpon your heads: but when he punisheth the wicked before your eyes, know you that he cannot away with vngodlinesse, but must be faine to shew himselfe a iudge when you abuse his pacience too long. Therefore profite yourselues by such chastizementes, and learne to know that he intendeth to make you wise by other mens harmes.

Loe heere what wee had to marke in this sentence. Afterward inseweth this saying, of taking away the houses that they builded not. True it is that God promised his people that they should dwell in houses which they had not builded: but that was a speciall promise of God when he did set his people in the land of Canaan. Againe wee know howe the holy scripture saith generally, that the man is happie which eateth the laboure of his owne hands, and is nourished therewith. Therefore if we intend to haue our goodes to do vs good, let vs learne to haue them in such cace as we may saye, that God hath giuen vs them. For God meddeth not with crafts and extortions. I confesse indeede: that the wicked are not inriched without his will: but yet it is not therefore too be said, that hee alloweth of their doings. Nother is it ment that the wicked acknowledge God to say, I thanke God, I thinke my seife beholding to him for that which he hath giuen me. No: for they hold them as it were of the diuell, and not of Gods blissing. Therefore let vs on our side learne (as I said afore) too make account of thys promise, that we be happie when we eate the laboure of our hands: that is to say, when we eate not any thing but such as we haue gotten by good and lawfull meanes allowed of God. Furthermore let vs assure our selues that it is to no purpose to builde in this world: For all thyngs heere are fleeting and transitorie. Let vs not be like these fooles that make their nest in this world, as who would say, they looked neuer to go out of it. Therefore let vs not be tied to it. For which is our cheefe house? It is our bodie. Though a man haue great palaces and as sumptuous houses as any be in the world: it is certaine that he cannot continue in them for euer, hee cannot keepe himselfe in prison there. So then the peculiarest lodging that euery man hath, is his owne body: and yet wee see what bitterness is in it. VVhat firmenesse hath it: it is nothing but corruption and rottennesse. VVhat is to bee done then? Let vs hie vs to the heauenly building, that is to saye, let vs desyre to be so repaired as Gods spirite may dwell in vs, and wee be made his temples, and that whatsoeuer is now corruptible and transitorie in vs, may be renewed, so as we may be set in the same state that is promised vs. Ye see then that we must not in this world seeke to drawe other mens goodes to vs, to take pleasure in that whiche is none of ours: but liue contented with whatsoeuer God giueth vs, and therewithall pray God so to build vs, as we may be his temples, to the ende hee may dwell in vs by his holy spirite, and not suffer Satan to carrie vs away, or to enter into vs, to nurrish our vices and sinnes in vs: for by that meanes he would make our bodies soule stinking stables. But we know that God cannot dwell in any filthy place. Therefore if wee will haue him to settle in vs, we must first pray him to clenze vs from all vnclennesse, to the end hee may build vs by his grace to be true Temples of his holy spirite. Lo how we may be well builded. But we must vnderstand that al proceedeth of his meeere grace, according as the scripture auoucheth it to be his charge to build vp Sion. The like as generally our Lorde Iesus Christ buildeth all the whole body of his Church: so also let vs assure ourselues that he must be fayne to build each one of vs. And that is the thing that we must ame at, VVe must not be wedded to the sightfull and corruptible things of this world: but we must hie vs to the euerlasting things, and laboure for them more and more till wee bee come fullie too them.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may learne to mislike them more and more, and to take suche hartie remorse, that we ouercome all temptations, and hie vs alwayes to the heauenly glory where our true heritage is, and that we may be so giuen vnto it, as we may seeke nothing but to please our God and to frame our selues wholly to his will, so as we may shewe by our deedes that his calling of vs vnto him is not in vaine, but that we be willing to glorify him in all our whole life, acknowledging the benefytes which hee giueth vs of his meere grace, too the end wee should yeld him praise and do him his due honoure. That it may please him to graunte this grace, not onely too vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth. &c.

20. He shall feele no suffizance in his bellie, nother shall he keepe his desire.
 21. There is none of his meate left: Therefore shall not his goodes be multiplied.
 22. VVhen his abundance is at the full, he shall be in anguish, all the hands of labouring men shall come vnto him.
 23. VVhen he hath vvhervvith to fill his bellie, God shall sende him the dread of his vvrath, and make it to raine vpon his meate.
 24. VVhen he fleeth from the yron vveapons, a bove of Steele shall meete vwith him.
 25. The svword shall bee dravven out and shall cut him: it shall passe through his gall, fearefulnesse shall be vpon him.

Ophar going forward with the matter that he delt with yester day, addeth heere, that the wicked man neuer hathe any contentation nor rest, nor shall faue any thing the better by aught that he leaueth behind him, nother shall his goodes thriue with hi heire or successoure. This sentence hath bin declared already. Howbeit, for the larger confirmation thereof it is reputed once againe, that we may beare it the better in mind, and also be the better perswaded of it. For if we see a man haue abundance of goodes, we are of opinion that he wanteth nothing, and that hee hathe contentation and all felicitie: so as he needeth to do nothing eise but take his pleasure, seeing that all things answer his harts desire after that manner. Marke I pray you how we perceiue not the wretchednesse that is hid in them whome God curseth, but giue iudgemente according to that whiche we see with our eyes. But Gods iudgement is inclozed in thair bones, and in their marce. And therefore ye see it is for our behoofe to heare this sentece often, that we may be the surer of it, and haue the remeberance of it printed in our hart. On the other side, whē we looke vpō a rich man, we thinke that heauen & earth should mingle themselues together to confounde him. And therefore God declareth that although man haue neuer so great welth yet shall the same perish eue-ry whit, and vanish away in such wise, as there shall be nothing for his heire or successor to hope for. VVherefore let vs marke well these two pointes, that wee may learne to set more store by Gods blissing, than by all the welth in the world: and not be tempted to couet cursed riches, which cannot come to a good end, bycause God will scatter them abroad. Lo whervnto this lesson ought to serue vs. So then let vs vnderstand first that our chiefe marke must not bee to be well provided of great abundance of worldly goodes: but that God must be so singularly gracious vnto vs as wee may feele his fauoure, that we may bee sure it is his will too be our father, and that we take our nurrishment at his hand. This is it that will giue vs both contentation and rest. But we see what the couetousnesse of men is, how their desire can neuer be quenched. Agayne what are these worldly goodes? Sure it is that we shall be bleared sometimes euen with blasts: but yet doth God open the eyes of such as are so giuē to gathering of riches, that they perceiue how they are nothing and that they passe away swiftly as a smoke. So then it is impossible that a man should be cōtented and satisfied, whē he looketh no further but vpō the goodes that he hath in his hāds. The only meane to haue rest, & to see when we haue ynough, is that God shew himselfe our father, and that we beleue that he hath his hand continually stretched out to giue vs al that euer we haue neede of. VVhen we haue this regard with vs, we shall haue good rest: and although wee had but one bit of bread (as ye would say) yet notwithstanding for asmuch as we be sure that God is rich ynough to maintaine vs, wee will waite vpon him for that which he promiseth. For he saith that the Lions and wilde beastes (notwithstanding that they be giuen to rauening, and seeme as though they would swallow vp all things) cease not too suffer hunger and scarcitie, whereas God nurrisheth those that are his in the time of death. True it is that they shall not bee alwayes exempted from distresse: but yet will God succoure them when they be come too extreme.

This (say I) is the thing wherein the faithfull reioyce. And that is the benefyte that is spoken of heere. For like as the wicked men haue no true discerning of a benefyte: so the chidre of God esteeme a morsell of bread to be a declaration that God is their father. And the: eby they be also confirmed, that as he hath susteyned the today, so wil he do his duetie to morrow likewise, and that he hath alwayes wherewith to do it, and that his grace and goodnesse are neuer abated. This is the cause why it is said, that the goodnesse of God is laid vp in store for the that feare him. True it is that our thinking vpon our bodily nurrishment is not the principall point wherby God will haue vs to feele what loue and fauoure he beareth vs: but that we must mount higher: namely that although wee were the veriest wretches in the whole worlde, yet hath God prepared riches for vs aloft in heauen wher- vnto wee must hie vs, and therevpon wholly set oure minds. Neuertheless looke whatsoeuer our good God doth tovs here bylow, it is as it were a foretast that he giueth vs of his souereine goodnesse. But now let vs come backe againe too the texte that wee alledged out of the Psalme: Lord how great is the abundance of thy goodnesse, which thou hast laid vp in store for them that feare thee. VVherefore doth the Prophet speake so? Bycause that although God do sheade out his bountifulesse e- uery where, (according as it is said that his mercie is vpon all his creatures, yea euen vnto the brute beasts) yet the wicked and vngodly (notwithstanding that they cram themselues with Gods benefites till they burst) perceiue not the goodnesse that is in him, but are vtterly voide of the knowledge thereof. And why? For God hath laid it vp in store for those that feare him. Thus muche concerning the firste poynte that is shewed vs heere, namely that we must not deeme men happie for the greate abūdance of the goodes that they possesse: but according too their contentation. For it is vnpossible that suche as know not Gods grace, ne haue any care of it, shoulde haue contentation, bycause they knowe not what a benefyte they haue, whiche is all one as if they had it not. Afterwarde it is sayde, that there shall bee no remaynder of their meate. This is a straunge thing, that when a man shall haue heaped vp great goodes, and shall be likely too leaue his children as little kings, God will vndermine all, and there shall bee no remaynder lefte.

Surely

Surely this falleth not out continually, nother (as I haue said) will God haue one vncchangeable rate kept always in the execution of his iudgements in this world: (For what a thing were that? Then should nothing be referued till the latter day.) But yet for all that, we shall perceyue some tokens of them, in that God cōsumeth some mans goodes after such a sorte, as it shall be apparant to mens eyes, and yet not knowe where they be become, nor by what meanes he hath bin impouerished. VVhen we see such things, ought we not to thinke that God executeth his office, and giueth vs occasion to thinke vpon him and to acknowledge him to be our iudge, to the intent wee be not inticed to inordinate lusts as we are wont to be, nor surmise that oure happinesse consisteth in raking much goodes to ourselues, nor imagin that riches are euerlasting, but rather come alwayes backe to this poynt of seeking our ordinarie foode at his hande both to day and to morrow and all our life long? Thus ye see howe we ought to practise this lesson. And when Sophar hath spoken after that manner, he addeth, that when the wicked man is in his chiefe welth, he shall not cease to be in anguish, and that the handes of all labourers shall come vnto him, or else that the hands of all men that are able to do any great acte shall come vpon him. And so the sense may be dubble. The word that is placed there, betokeneth a man that is foreward in executing of things. It may be taken for a man that laboreth, traueleth, or worketh: and it may also be taken for a man that is disposed to doing of harme, wrong, or violence. Howbeit the playne meening is, that euery labouring hand shall come to the wicked [to do the seruice,] and yet the same shall not boote them at all. Lo what the summe is. Sophars meening is, that we ought not to beguile ourselues whē we see the wicked throughly stuffed, and that our Lord heapeth vp goodes in their houles, so as it should seeme hee were minded too giue them a hundred times more than he giueth to other men, and the whole world is redy to do them seruice, in somuch that they haue men in fee, and euery man offereth himselfe vnto them saying, Sir will it please you to employ me? For when they haue all the hands that can be to labour too do them seruice, and to profite them: yet they shall not cease to be in anguish. Behold a wonderfull iudgemente of God, and therefore so much the more ought it to bee sensible too vs, that is to say, we ought to be touched with it so much the more. Is it not a thing against nature, that a man that hath wherewith to do himselfe good, so as he wāte nothing, yea and which (if hee list too haue a great trayne) may haue a great number to take peynes for him that he might liue at his ease and pleasure, should for all this, not be able to inioy his owne goodes, but liue in continuall grieffe, and bee afraid least the earth shoulde faile hym? Surely it is a thing against all reason. Neuerthelesse we see welynough that God doth persecute them after that sorte, bycause they haue gotten their riches by lewde practises, thereby shewing them right well, that all that geere can serue them to no purpose, bycause he curseth euery whit of it. Behold (I saye) a iudgemente of God which is right straunge: so as if wee seeke howe it cometh to passe, wee shall not finde out the meane, and therefore we conclude that it is God whiche worketh so. Ageyne it seemeth too vs, that if wee haue the good willes and loue of men, so as euery man seeke too do vs seruice, all goeth well with vs and we can neuer want. But it is saide heere, that when the wicked haue men after that sort at their commandement, so as they haue as it were a whole host of men that are redy to labour for their profite: it is nothing worth, and all is but continuall anguish. Heere therefore Zophar intended to inlarge that which he had said afore, I say he intended to giue vs a greater certeintie of Gods iustice vpon the wicked. And for the doing thereof, he setteth before vs their wealth, and the good will that men beare them. Thus ye see howe the rich men ruffle it out, and seeme to vs to be owners of all, and that God hathe not (as ye would say) any more power to anoy them. See how men sette themselues in their owne imaginations. But what shall their abundance boote them? Nothing at all. For we see the wicked are in continuall anguish, although they haue wherewith to make themselues merrie, and neede no more but too say the word, and their table is redy furnished for them. They haue seruants at their commaundement, they haue reteyners in fee, and to be short it seemeth that the world was created for none but them: and yet for all that, they cannot eate one morsell of bread at their ease, as the poore man doth that is not worth past the valew of fīue shillings, and betaketh himselfe to God: For such a laboring man, liueth dayly vpon his dayes worke, and when he hath dined he knoweth not wherewith he shall suppe, but referreth it to God, assuring himselfe that at leastwise he is in as good cace as the birds, that lift vp their bills to heauen, whom God feedeth. So (I say,) poore folke are in cace as the yong rauens, according as it is said in the Psalme, and God nurrisheth them by his blissing. VVe see it. VVherefore let vs learne to turne againe vnto God, assuring our selues that we shall not want any thing if he take the charge of vs, and that though he giue vs no great abundance of goodes, his blissing shall suffice vs. I say let vs aduise our selues not to be sorrowfull though God be not so beneficiall to vs as we would haue him. And although hee deale sparingly with vs, yet let not vs cease too haue franke harts. To be short, let vs not martir our selues out of measure, vpon trust that he will neuer faile vs. Further it is a token of vnthankfulnesse in men, when God shall haue shewed himselfe liberall towards them, in giuing them great abundance of goodes, and yet notwithstanding they be still doubtful, & neuer cease their thoughtfull mizing vpon one thing or other. I say it is a token that they neuer were acquainted with Gods grace, or else if they knew it, that they haue not esteemed it as they ought. Then if God giue vs wherewith, let vs learne to content our selues, knowing that he setteth his goodnesse before our eyes, to the intēt we should learne to settle our selues vpon it, and there rest. There is also one other point: namely, that although we haue wante of worldly goodes, and it is likely that many euils and miseries shall come vpon vs: yet must we withstand such thoughtfull conceits. True it is that we cannot be vtterly carelesse, nother must we: but yet must we moderate our pafsions, & specially we must consider what it is to be fed at Gods hand, so as we may seeke foode of him, and also hang vpon his goodnesse withoute greueing our selues too much. VVhen men are fauourable too vs, let vs acknowledge that God doth it for our comfort: but yet must wee not rest still vpon men. For God can curse their labour in such wise, as they shall rise early and go late to bed, and yet speede neuer the better. Then needeth wee no more but Gods blissing, and though we bee destitute of all helpe, his onely grace will bee ynough for vs: but contrariwise, wee may haue the whole worlde on oure side, and yet if God reach vs not his hand, it is certaine that all shall go backwarde..

Thus ye see what is shewed vs by this sentence. If we could practize it, wee had profited for all oure lyfe long. But it is a piteouse case, that when euery of vs shall haue confessed these things, (as we be sufficiently conuincid of them) we cannot settle our selues vpon them: and so we do well shew by the effect, that we beleeue not that there is none other thing than Gods only blissing, that doth men good and giueth them contentation. For we cannot haue an eye vnto him. If he exercise vs now and then, and withdraw his hand and giue vs not such abundance as we would wish: we acknowledge not that he is almightie to succoure vs. And yet notwithstanding, his meening is too call vs thither by afflicting vs, as if he should giue vs some strokes of the spurre to prouoke vs to seeke him, and to desire him to pitie vs. And to our seeming we neuer haue sustenance ynough, except we haue abundance in our hand: nother consider we that if it please God to deale sparely with vs, his only blissing will suffice vs better than all the welth of the worlde. But let vs passe further. It is saide, that when the wicked shall haue filled his lillie, God will sende him the terroure of his wrath, and it shall raine vpon his meate. This is a confirmatiō of that which we haue seene erewhiles. True it is that Zophar passeth further: for he had saide, that the wicked shall liue in anguish, and that although they be thoroughly furnished and stored of all thinges, yet shall they not cease too bee incombered, because God giueth them not cōtentation, but rather stings and secret prickings, in somuch that they be faine to martir themselues continually: yea and although men indeuer themselues to serue them, yet shall it not further them at all.

After that Zophar hath saide so, hee addeth, that it may well be that the wicked shall not feele Gods curse at the first stroke, and that they shal welter yea and boast themselues in their good fortune as they tearme it. To be short, ye shall see the wicked men liue at such ease, (too outward appeerance) as it should not seeme that they feele Gods wrath. But behold saith Zophar, in the turning of a hand God will make it to raine vpon their meate. And what shall it raine? the rage of his wrathe. VVee see that which I haue touched alreedy: which is, that heere is a higher step than that which I haue expounded alreedy. For the anguish whereof mention hath bin made, and the vnquietnesse and comberance that the wicked haue, springeth of their continuall distrust. For they haue no regard of God: and in this world there is nothing to trust vnto: and therefore they be in greete vexation of mind. Neuerthelesse it is saide, that they shall be at their ease for a time, and they shall be dazled, so as too their owne seeming they shall bee happie in their respects. VVell, doth it therefore follow that Gods blissing is vpon them? No. How then? God suffereth the wicked to runne riot so more and more, and when they put their trust after that sort in their riches, they do but prouoke God further. For they know not him of whom their welth commeth, and therevpon take occasion too ouerhoote themselues so much the more. Thus ye see how brutish the wicked become when they haue not the said vnquietnesse to pricke them, but are at rest and contente themselues, weening that all goeth well with them. But so muche the more must Gods vengeance increace. VVhy so? Because they haue gotten their goodes amisse, because they haue them by craft and extortion, because they bestow them naughtily, and because they succoure not such as haue neede, but rather are as gulfes.

Moreover, they lee so vnthankfull and proude againste God, as it should seeme they woulde worke him spite, too whome they bee so greatly bounde, as though they were not beholding to him for any thing. They presume vpon their riches, they make their paradise in this worlde, they thinke themselues peerelesse, and make them hornes too dosse againste God. Beholde (I pray you) the top of all iniquitie, whyche causeth Gods vengeance to be the more horrible vpon their heads. And Zophars intent is now to saye, My friends although ye see the wicked vtterly besotted in their welth, and that they be of opiniō that no harme can light vpon them, yet let vs not thinke their case too be the better for that. And why? For euen when they shall thinke vpon nothing but making good cheere, and all the worlde is in loue with them: then will God send the fire of his wrath, which shall fall vpon them as a tempest and as a raine that commeth suddainely. In Sommer time when a little blast woulde serue a mans turne, beholde there commeth a suddaine storme vnthought of. Euen so likewise Gods wrath shall bee suddayne when hee listeth too punish men. And so ye see there is none other shift for vs, but to shroude our selues vnder the shadow of Gods goodnesse. For then are we in safetie, whither he giue vs abundance, or whither he deale sparingly with vs. VVhen we be vnder his hande and protection, one bit of bread will bee as good to vs for our nurrishment, as Manna from Heauen. And if we haue abundance, we shall perceiue that therein God sheweth himselfe a father to vs, and handleth vs as his children. The faythfull therefore wil euery way fare the better by the things that God sendeth them. But as for the wicked, they may well haue wherewith too buist, but yet must God throw them downe and turne their goodes to their harme. VVee see what befell too the people of Israell. They were not contented with the heavenly Manna, it was too vnfaurie a thing for them: but they had a longing too the meates which they had bin accustomed to in Egypt. VVell, God sent them their meate in such quantitie, as they did cast it vp agayne. But what? while the meate was yet in their throtes (as it is saide in the Psalme) the wrath of God came vpon them.

Thus ye see how God stealeth vpon men vnwares, euen in the twinckling of an eye, vpon them that thinke not themselues subiect to him. So then if our Lorde giue vs any goodes, let vs learne not too intangle oure selues in them, nother let vs make a graue of the thing which ought to be a ladder for vs to climbe higher on, as the vnbeleeuers do, who hie them not too God when they haue goodes, but snarle them selues in them: Therefore they make a graue of them too fasten themselues to the earth withall. But contrariwise, we must make a ladder of the goodes that God giueth vs in this world, too climb vp aloft on it, that we may be led vnto him, and by knowing his goodnesse and fatherly loue, apply all his benefyts too suche vse as he meeneth them too vs. VVhat is too bee done then? Though wee haue meate and drinke, yet neuerthelesse let vs liste vp oure eyes aloft, and desyre God too feede vs. For wee must bee thoroughly perswaded, that it is not the meate that wee take sustenance of, but it is the onely power of GOD that maynteyneth vs. Agayne the meate may perishe although it be in our mouthes: or else it shall be turned into gall and poyson in our bellies. But are wee full fed? Let vs thanke God for hauing care of vs, and for cōtinuing his fauoure toward vs, and by that meane let vs be the more prouoked to serue him. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this sentence. Nowe Zophar addeth, that when the wicked man sleeth from yron weapons, he shall meete with a bow of Steele. VVhereby

he signifyeth, that God hath many wayes to persecute and punish the wicked, so as they shall not be able too scape his hande, what shiftes or attemptes soeuer they make. Truly the wicked will alwayes be seeking how to shunne inconueniences, and to bring it about they will be bold ynough too despize all things. And Zophar also meant to bewray their presumption, when hee said that the wicked shall shunne the yron weapons: as if hee had said, True it is that the wicked are ware and wise ynough (to seeming) to eschue all inconueniences: and assoone as they foresee any inconuenience, streightwayes it must be remedied, and such order and such must be taken for it. The wicked therefore shall not be so fast asleepe, but they shall alwayes haue an eye to the ordering of their affaires. But what for that? do they turne vnto God whē they intend to take order for them? Do they make their recourse to him, to receiue counsell at his holy spirite, that he may bring all their enterprises to a good ende? No. There is nothing with them but pride and stateliness, in somuch as they thinke they shall wel ynough finde very good and conuenient shiftes in their owne braynes. Ageyne they know not how it belongeth too God to guide all things and too leade their doings too their end and marke. The wicked yeld not that honoure vnto God. So then, they cōsult, they beate their braines (as the Prophet Esay saith) they make their discourfes, they conclude, and they beare themselues in hande that they can go through with all things, and bring them to passe as they theselues haue deuised. But God sheweth that all shall fall out cleane contrarie to their attempts, because they haue bin so caried away by their owne fond fancies. Then let vs marke well, that if the wicked be neuer so suttile, and it seeme also too be easy for the to find startingholes, by reason they haue laid so wel for their affaires aforehand: yet notwithstanding God will find them out in the ende, and they shall not be able too scape out of his nettes. This is in effect the thing that is shewed vs here. And why? For God hath diuers meanes to persecute his enimies. He is not as an earthly Prince, who when he hath made great preparatiō, preuailes not by it at all, but is disappointed of his hope, and is new to begin againe. But without remouing, or without deuising any thing, hee needes no more but too speake the word, and it will bring more to passe than all the armies of the world. VVe see how he hath incountered his enimies diuerse times. Did he raise any great host of men when he punished Pharao and all the Egyprians? No: he sent him woormes and filthynesse. Behold how God woorketh when it pleaseth him. Ageyne if he suffer the wicked to scape some harme: it foloweth not that they by their policie haue ouercome Gods hande which was against them. But our Lord suffereth it, to the ende that their condemnation shoulde grow the greater, and that they should waxe wilfull in their opinion, according also as we see it come to passe. For when the wicked escape some aduersitie vnouerwhelmed: they do but shake their eares, and they be quite dispatched, as they surmize: and therevpon they take greater libertie afterwarde. God then doth now and then send but some small aduersitie to the wicked, and pursueth them not with any great rigoure, but lets them go as if they were escaped scotfree. But what? It is to dubble it anone after. For in somuch as they scoffe at Gods pacience, and prouoke his anger more and more: he also must be faine to vtter his roughnesse, and to thunder vpon them, and whereas he had scarce giuen them a ticke with a rod: he must be faine to draw out his sword against them, and too take his bow and shoote at them. And therefore let vs learne to mind this saying well aforehand, too the ende that if our Lord visit vs, we may not thinke to shunne the mischief by oure owne byleapes, but rather commit ourselus vnto him, that in sted of persecuting vs as his deadly enimies as we deserue to be, he may voutsafe to take vs to mercie. And this is the cause why his threatnings are repeted so often in the holy scripture. For it is not heere only that it is said that the wicked man shall flee from the weapons of yron and meete with a bow of steele: But we see how the Lord himselfe speaketh it by his Prophet, saying, It shall be too small purpose for thee to hide thy selfe in thine house: If thou go out into the feelds, thou shalt meete with wild beasts: when thou art escaped from the mouth of the Lion, there shall bee a Beare that shall find thee wel ynough. Heereby our Lord sheweth, that he hath all creatures in his hande, and can serue his owne turne with them to persecute men, so as we cannot make account to be discharged, till wee haue found fauoure in his sight, and that he haue pitie of vs. So then the only meanes to be sure and safe, is that God haue receiued vs. But if we flee aloofe from him, he hath too long hands, and when hee hath drawne his sworde, he hath a bow also, that is to say, he hath so many sortes of chastizings and punishments, as in the end wee must needes fall vnhappily, except we be reconciled vnto him, as I haue shewed alreedy. Now like as God threatneth swords, bowes, wild beasts, and Scorpions to such as lift vp themselues againste him and stoutly harden themselues against his hand: so also on the contrarie parte he sheweth, that hee hath wayes wit roue number too saue those that flee for refuge to his goodnesse, and put theyr trust therein. True it is that we shall be inuironed with many miseries, and many deatnes shall lie in waite for vs: but God also hath diuerse wayes to succour vs, yea which are to vs incomprehensible. Therefore when we be vnprouided of all meanes, so as it shall seeme too vs that we be vndone, let vs be thinke ourselues thus: God hath some issue of death which is knowne to himselfe, and the same is hidden from vs, because he intendeth to exercise our faith, let vs carrie till he discover his goodnesse, and when it shall please him to make his countenance to shine vpon vs, then shall we perceiue that we be in life euen in the midds of death. Ye see then that the threatnings which God maketh to the wicked, ought to make vs too resort vnto him, and so shall wee haue full matter of gladnesse and rest, notwithstanding that wee be in many daungers, and that assoone as wee bee passed out of one, another is at hand, and it seemeth to vs that we can neuer be deliuered. For like as God hath swords to punish the wicked: so hath he infinite deliuerances to succour his faithfull ones. Lo in effect what wee haue to remember in this verse. And for a conclusion it is said, that the sword shall be drawen, and pearce through his gall, and that feurefuinesse shall be vpon him. VVhen hee saith that the sworde shall bee drawne, and pearce the wicked quite and cleane through his gall: it is as muche to say as it shall bee a deadly stroke that shall wounde him to the harte: and this serueth too do vs too vnderstande, that Gods punishmentes shall sometimes bee suddayne. True it is that they are not alwayes so: and therefore it must not be made a generall rule. Also (as I haue told you) the question is not: whither God perfourme his iudgements swiftly: but yet doth he giue vs some shewe of them euen in this life, too the ende wee should the earnestlier herken for the last day, whereas all things shall be set agayne in their full state and perfection. Neuerthelesse (as I saide) Gods iudgementes shall sometime be suddaine: and that is it that Zophar ment too expresse in saying: the sword is drawn and shall strike him quite through the gall: as if he should say, The wicked man shall not perceiue a farte off that God mindeth to punish him, but he shall keepe on his trace still, as if he were out of danger: howbeit the sword shall no sooner bee drawn out of the scabbard, but it shall strike through his body. Now then we see what is the meaning of this sentence. And heereby we be warned to foresee daungers a good while aforehand, to the end wee may flee vnto God and pray him to keepe vs. 10 And it is not only heere that Gods iudgements are shewed vs to be suddaine: but it is also saide that when the wicked shall say, peace, all is safe: Gods wrath shall fall like thunder vpon their heads. Heereby (as I said) we be warned, to looke a great way before vs for the inconueniences that may happen, and wherevnto our life is subiect. And why? VVere it not a corzie to our life to saye that we be miserable, and that it were much better for vs that God had not put vs into this world? No, but it wold teach vs not to fall asleepe in this world, but too runne vnto God, and to assure ourselues that if we be vphild by the power of oure God, wee may outeface Satan and the world, yea and death it selfe. And why? Bycause we shall haue God for our protector and defender. And so let vs marke well, that whereas the wicked perceiue not their owne miserie, it is too throw them downe the rather: and forasmuch as they mind not to call vpon God, but contrariwise beare themselues in hande, that they haue no neede of him: their destruction must needs fall vpon them before they thinke of it. Furthermore hee 30 saith immediatly, that fearefulnessse or terroure shall not go an inch from them. Thus the wicked haue a dubble mischiefe: whiche is that the sworde shall runne them through as soone as it is drawn out of the scabbard: and besides that, God shall neuer suffer them to bee at rest, but although the daunger be past: yet shall they tremble for feare still. And whereat? Euen at the shaking of a leafe of a tree, (as it is saide) and they shall thinke that death hath already caught them, when no man pursueth

thé. So we see wherat the holy Ghost aimed. First he intended to shewe vs, that we must not enuie the wicked when they bee so well garded, as it may seeme that no harme can come neere thé. And why? For god shall strike them through in the turning of a hand, yea euen with a deadly stroke, whereof they may neuer be healed. Marke that for one point. Another is that when we see the wicked in feare: we must vnderstand that there is but only one meane to be in rest: which is to know that we be vnder Gods protection. Therefore let that suffice vs. For although it behoue vs to walke in feare before him: yet shall wee alwayes bee sure of his goodnesse, whereas the wicked and the despisers of his maiestie shall alwayes be so afraid as they shall neuer haue any rest. Therefore let vs learne too retire to our God with all lowlinesse, and too liue with our neighbours withoute doing any man wrong, least the same measure bee moten to vs againe. And when we go so too worke, surely God will make vs to feele his goodnesse, and deliuer vs from all the dangers, terrours & difmayings that can happé to vs.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them and bee forie for them, and too consider better the iudgements that he sheweth vs, that we may dayly more and more bee instructed to withdrawe our selues from the transitorie things of thys world, which are wont to blind men, as though all their felicitie consisted in them, and rather that we may attaine the wisdome and skill too knowe that God draweth vs to him by the troubles that wee see heere bylow: and that if it please him to exercise vs with afflictions, we may thinke it is to prouoke vs to seeke him: and on the other side, that if he hadle vs gétly, it is to the end that we feeling his fatherly loue, shuld sticke the faster to him, and loue and honor him with so much the earnest mind, still passing heere bylow, and inioying the benefits that he bestoweth vpon vs, vntill he bring vs to the true happinesse whiche carrieth for vs in heauen. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

The .lxxvij. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the twentieth Chapter.

26. All darknesse shall be laid vp in his secret places: the fire that is not blowen shall consume him: and cursed shall be the residue of his house.
27. The Heauens shall bevvray his iniquitie: and the earth shall rise vp against him.
28. The bud shall go out of his house as floyving vwater, in the day of his vvraath.
29. This is the portion of the vvicked man from God, This is the heritage vvwhich he shall haue of God for his vvords.

WE saw yesterday howe the despisers of God are afraide withoute comfort. True it is that the godly may bee abashed and afraide, but God comforteth them, and when they runne vnto him they be sure that he will succoure them. As for the wicked, inasmuch as they despised al men, and were so full of pride that they thought themselues subiect to no mischance: God will scare them after such a sorte, as there shall be no remedie for their feare. And therefore let vs learne to stand in awe, that we may walke godlyly. Let vs learne to be well aduised, that we be not carelesse as murtherers, and we shall find that God will make vs safe euen in the middes of all our terrours. Thus then the only remedie not to be afraid out of measure, is to walke warily, and so to know the infirmities that are in vs, and the daungers that compasse vs about on all sides, as we may pray God to voutsafe to reach vs his hande, distrusting ourselues and learning too settle ourselues wholly vpon him alone. VVhen we haue such a kinde of feare, God will glad vs at our neede, and we shall be sure of his helpe. But if wee will play the hardie and stout fellowes, then must God needes bring vs to confusion, and wee shall conceiue such feare, as wee shall bee as good as in hell already in this worlde. Now too expresse the better, that the wicked shall not fynde any meanes of safetie, Sophar addeth: that in all theyr priuie and secrete places, there shall bee darknesse bidden or layde vp. At the firste sighte there seemeth too be no greate matter in this saying. But when it is throughly vnderstoode, it will appeere to be a good confirmation of that whiche was saide not long since. For heere by the Priuie places, are meante the backenookes, which which the wicked haue when God persecuteth them, according as they haue alwayes some lurkingholes too hide themfelues in. VVe see how the wicked man will alwayes haue some blinde byway, he will play the foxe, and digge himsele a denne [with many startingholes,] that he may not bee taken vnwares. And although hee knowe wellnough that God entereth intoo all places: yet will he beare himsele in hand, that there is some little hole where he may hyde him selfe, so as Gods hande may not come at him. But Sophar saith, that euen there 10 be shall finde darknesse. That is to say, although the wicked indeuer too shrinke themfelues into shrowdes, yet notwithstanding when God pursueth them, they shall haue such a terrour within them, as they shall quake although no man follow them. Too be short, he meeneth that whyle the despizers off God are farre of from blowes, they set light by threatnings, and beare themfelues in hande that none euill may come neere them: but when it commeth to the verie pinch, they bestirre themfelues to get couert. For though God lay no hande on 20 them, nor shewe any euident signe that hee is agaynst them: yet shall they haue darkenesse, that is to say, they shall haue vnquietnesse in them. And this teacheth vs to seeke no blinde byways to shunne Gods hand. Then let vs vnderstand that as oft as God citeth vs to himself, we must come foorth to account. And therefore let vs not deuise any shiftes to escape, yea and although the worlde seeme too promise vs neuer so many lurkingholes: let vs assure oure selues that all that is nothing. VVherefore let vs come willingly vnto God, and offer 30 vp our selues before his Maiestie, praying him too receyue vs to mercie. And if his face shine vpon vs, then shall wee bee deliuered and set free from all darkenesse. Yea and although the whole worlde were confounded and put out of order: yet shoulde we alwayes bee safe and sure, being in the custodie of our God. Otherwise, if wee had all the couerts in the worlde, they should so little auayle vs, that we shoulde finde more dismayednesse in them, than if wee were discouered on all sydes, and coulde see the miserie that is vpon vs afore hande. 40 Yet notwithstanding, men cannot refrayne themfelues from seeking of lurkingholes, as it is too be scene. On the contrarie part, what intendeth God when hee sendeth vs his worde? He would haue it to bee as a Cresfet, yea rather as the Sunne to vs, that euery of vs might serche what is in himsele, so as the sinnes that were vnknowne too vs before, may bee layde open to vs, and euerie of vs bee sorie for them: and furthermore espie the punishments that wee haue deserued, so as wee may not bee taken vnwares like the vnbeleeuers which be- 50 hight themfelues peace and safetie, but maye discover Gods iudgements as if wee were on a high watchtower, as it is sayde in the Prophete Abacucke, and preuent the inconuenience that is towardes vs, I say preuent it, euen by prayer, supplication, and repentance. Yee see then wherat God ameth, when he inlightneth vs by his Gospell. But wee drawe quite backe: for (asmuch as in vs lyeth) wee quench the sayde light, and bicause wee be naught, we be loth that the things whiche are hidden in vs shoulde come too light. Too be short, wee couet al- 60 wayes to bee flattered, and it doth vs pleasure too abuse our selues with such flatteries. And what will God doo when his worde hath borne no sway with vs? VVill hee sit still? No. But he accomplisheth that which hee speaketh by his prophete Sophonie: that is too wit, hee entreteth with his Lanterne euen into the deepest caues. For beholde what hee sayth of the Citie of Ierusalem: I will visite thee with my Lanterne (sayth he:) thou hast hidden thy treasures in priuie places, but thou shalt win nothing by that, for thou must needes be winnowed out. So then let vs suffer God to inlighten vs by his worde, and let vs not seeke lurkingholes. And when we be come before him willingly after that sort, surely he will hyde vs in his rent (as the Scripture speaketh,) and hee will not onely giue vs a house, or a chamber to drawe intoo, but also he himsele will be an inuincible fortresse to vs. To be short, the shadowe of his wings wilbe a good saferie for vs. On the contrarie part, we shall feele that which is sayd here: that is to wit, that such as will hide themfelues, and specially which dig deepe dennes (as it is sayde in a place of the Prophete Esay) shall bee found out of God spyte of 10 their teeth, and though there were no more but their owne conscience to pursue them: yet shal they perceiue that they haue gayned nothing by imagining too escape Gods hande. Thus yee see what we haue too marke in this sentence. And consequently it is sayd, that the fyre which is not blowne shall consume them. Heere Zophar threatneth the despizers of God and all the wicked, that although there happen no harme vntoo them from anie creature, yet they shall not misse too bee consumed by Gods wrath. There needeth (sayth he) no artificiall fire: for the wrath of God will be ynough to destroy all them that will not willingly submit themfelues too him. This similitude is common ynough through al the holy Scrip- 20 ture: namely that God is as a consuming fire, and men as stubble that will soone bee consumed, or else as snowe that by and by melteth. And it is expressely sayde that Gods wrath is a fire, not onely too melt snowe, or too burne stubble: but also to cliue rockes and mountaynes, and to make the whole worlde to fall downe, so as neither heauen nor earth shall stande vnshaken, as soone as God giueth any signe of his wrath. And how shall the poore creatures then do which are so frayle? If there be nothing in vs but stubble, what shall become of vs when God shall haue kindeled his fyre that consumeth all things? Nowe wee see what Sophars meening is. For the holy Ghost speaketh by his mouth, and telleth vs 30 that we must not trust in the fauour of the worlde, and that when all things fall out as we would haue them, yet are we not therefore scaped out of Gods hande. And why? For (as he addeth afterwarde) there shall be neither heauen nor earth, but it shall rise vp to execute his vengeance. True it is that too shewe his mightie and incomprehensible power, hee may well nowe and then suffer the creatures to be fauourable towards vs and our desires to be fulfilled, so as nothing shall fall out agaynst vs: but when we bee so at our ease, God needes no more but to shewe himsele our enimie, and the onely fire of his wrath will bee ynough too consume vs, without the seruice of men, or without the employing of any creature about it. For although the holy Scripture (to make vs too perceyue the better howe terrible Gods wrath ought to be to vs) doo sometimes say, that there is brimstone or thunder mingled with it: yet notwithstanding, it addeth likewise, that the same commeth not of mans hande, nor is made by any inferiour art or meane, but is wrought by God only, according as it is sayd in Esay, 40 that hell fire is prepared long ago for the wicked, and for the enimies of God. And when mention is made of fire and brimstone, it is sayde that it is the verie breath of God that blowerh in it. VVhich is all one with this that Zophar sayth heere, namely that there needeth no bellowes from elsewhere, nor any forraine helpe to kinde this present fire. And why? Bicause the force that proceedeth out of Gods mouth, is ynough to consume the wicked vterly, when it vttereth it selfe agaynst them.

Nowe then let vs learne to frame our selues in such wise vnto God, as wee may not feele the execution of this sentence vpon our selues. For it will be too late to crie alas, when God shall haue kindled his inquenched fire. But it is sayde that Gods worde ought to be vnto vs as a burning fire, howbeit not to consume vs, but to clenze away all the drosse and superfluities that are in vs. For like as golde and siluer are fined by pasing through the fornace, ere they can do seruice or be applyed to our vse: Euen so our Lorde intendeth to ridde vs of our wicked Iustes by his worde, (which are things not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull,) that wee may dedicate our selues afterwarde to his seruice. And this must bee done before all other things. Therefore when God purposeth to en-flame vs with the loue of him, too the ende we may bee wholly rauished therewith: the same must bee done by the meane of his worde. But if we cannot abide it, wee must needes become as chaffe or stubble, according as it is sayde in the Prophete. Shall not my woorde be a consuming fire, and as a hammer that breaketh the stones, and shall not this people bee as chaffe? Thus then yee see howe wee cannot disfeate Gods worde of the office that hee giueth vnto it to bee a consuming fire: It must alwayes be so.

Ier. 5. c. 14.
 & 23. f. 29.

Nowe on our side, if we bee diligent in offering oure selues vntoo God, hee will purge vs from our filth, and wee shall be reformed too his rightuousnesse, and inflamed with his loue. But contrariwise, if we play the wilde Coltes, and maliciously and stubbornly reiect Gods woorde: let vs bee sure that (spyte of our teeth, and doo the best and woorst wee can) the same shall burne vs vp, euen bycause wee shall bee but strawe, chaffe, and stubble, whiche is consumed out of hande. Yea and when God hath made vs perceyue oure damnation by his woorde, hee will doubtlesse also put to his hande, and make vs to vnderstande by experience that hee hath not sayde in vaine, that fire shall consume the wicked, yea euen without any blowing, without any kindling, and without putting any mans hande too it, or without the ayde of any creatures by any meane. To bee short, let vs learne too stande in awe of Gods wrath, and not fall a sleepe when wee see things fall out as wee would wishe in this worlde. For that can serue vs too no purpose, when our iniquitie shall come too account before God, and hee shewe himselfe too bee oure iudge. Thus yee see what wee haue too beare away in this sentence. And it is sayde immediately, that all the residue of his house shall go too hauocke, or that there shall be nothing but misfortune vpon the rest of his house. Like as oure Lorde vttereth his goodnesse towards those that are his, by blissing both their household and their children, and all that belongeth too them: So on the contrarie part, he sheweth howe dreadfull his wrath is, by spreading it selfe out vpon all that is aboute the vngodly, according as wee see howe the worlde is generally defyled with vs. For what is the cause that there is neyther heauen nor earth, no nor any corner in the worlde, where Gods wrath and curse is not seene vpon all creatures? Is it not our sinfulness? VVee knowe it is sayde, that there is not one man vpon earth that dooth good, but all of vs are comprised in the generall condemnation of sinne, which is vniuersally in vs all.

Psal. 14. b. 3.
 Rom. 3. b. 12.

Nowe forasmuch as God of his owne nature hateth sinne: wee must needes bee odious vntoo him. So then seeing that all creatures are as it were accursed by reason of oure filthinesse and vncleannesse: both highe and lowe muste bee sayne too feele of that defyling. Euen so standeth the case peculiarly with the wicked. For if a man bee giuen too all vngraciousnesse, so as hee is a dispizer of God, rushing forth intoo all euill: all that euer hee toucheth is as it were defyled by the fylth that is in him. Not onely bicause a naughtie man marreth and peruerteth those that are conuersant in his companie, bringeth vp his children lewdly, and disordereth his wife: but also bycause there is a secrete curse of God vpon his heade, too spread out vpon his children, his household, his cattell, and all that euer hee hath.

 Thus wee see in effect, that when mention is made of the remnant of wicked mens houses, it is too shewe vs, that when our Lorde is agaynst men, they haue good cause too bee abashed. And why? For when they bee sunken and destroyed in their owne persons, the vengeance of God muste stretche yet further. And this is sayde too the ende wee shoulde not enuie the prosperitie of the wicked, when wee see them fare well, considering that their ende is suche as wee see heere. Therefore when the saythfull haue conceyued howe terrible Gods wrath is, they muste bee so touched with it, as they must no more thinke the wicked to bee happie for their slightfull prosperitie. For they do but drawe their lines till they come too their vtter destruction. And so wee conclude, that it is better for vs too seeme miserable (so be it that we stand in Gods fauour) than to haue all that man can wishe, and in the meane tyme God bee agaynst vs. Lo what wee haue too marke in this sentence. Nowe when Zophar hath spoken so, he addeth, that the heauens shall bewray his iniquitie, and the earth rise vp agaynst him. Hee had sayde heeretofore, that fire shoulde consume the wicked without blowing: that is to say, that God without vsing the seruice of his creatures, is able too destroy all them that lift vp themselues agaynst him. And heere hee telleth vs of another kinde of punishment: which is, that God will arme his creatures to execute his vengeance agaynst the wicked. Ye see then howe God worketh in diuerse sortes, when he mindeth to punish the despyzers of his Maiestie. Sometymes (as I haue sayde) hee suffereth all things to go well with them too outward appearance, as so they shall not doubt nor mistrust any thing, and (which is more) they shall sport and wallow in their good fortune. But when they bee drunken after that sort in their prosperitie: beholde, God will ouerwhelme them sodenly, not with naturall fire, but with his secrete and incomprehensible power. Yet notwithstanding, in the meane whyle, it is not too bee sayde that oure Lorde hath not his creatures in hys owne hande too arme them in such wise agaynst vs, as euerie of them shall bee (woordes, bowes, arrowes, and other weapons, which God will stirre vp too destroy vs withall.

And this is made purpofely, bycause that when the wicked bee puffed vp in their pride, they thinke too get the maystrie by their hardhartednesse, as it is to be seene that if these shamelesse folkes bee rebuked for their finnes, yea euen for their notorious finnes which little children can bee iudges of, yet keepe they still a brazen face: for a man shall neuer outface them till they bee conuincid thrice tentymes tolde. VVell then, and after what maner dooth God bring them too reason in the ende? Euen by arming the heauens agaynst them, that is too saye, by discouering their shamefulness by all meanes. For when they shall haue vsed such vnshamefastnesse and scoffed at all the warnings that are giuen them, yea and made a scorne of all Gods threatenings: then muste they bee so persecuted (yea euen without putting too of any mannes hande) that when God alone pursueth them, they shall not knowe where too become come, but chafe vpon their brydle too spyte God with-all. But is their furie once ouerpast? Then must they be rooted out with their shamelesse stubburnesse when they haue abused Gods pacience ouerlong. Thus ye see in effect what Zophar ment too say. And what haue we too doo? True it is that sometyms wee shall bee wrongfully diffamed, and oppressed with false slanders.

But wee maye commend our cace vntoo God, and hee will make oure rightuoufnesse to shine as bright as the morning, as the Scripture sayth: in somuch that when the night is passed, and wee haue had some darke storme that hath suppressed the knowledge of oure innocencie, our God will in the ende shewe himselfe to be our warrant, and mainteyne our cace in spyte of the wicked, and of all their lyes. But on the contrarie part, when wee go about too woorke wyles, and thinke too scape by oure shiftes and hypocrisies: let vs looke for that which is spoken heere, namely that the heauens shall bewraye our iniquitie, and spite of our teeth wee must come too the open light, and be discovered as at midday. VVee will bee in oure lurkingholes: verie well, God will suffer vs too bee there for a little while: but hee can skill well ynough too hale vs oute of oure deepest dungeons, and too bewray oure shamefulnesse. VVhether wee will or no, wee must bee ashamed of the shrowding of our sinnes, which shall then steppe vp agaynst vs, yea, and all creatures with them, notwithstanding that for a tyme it haue seemed that there was neyther heauen nor earth which fauoured vs not. For if God become oure enemie, all creatures must needes shewe themselues too bee subiect vntoo him. True it is that this happeneth not alwayes nor oute of hande, according as I haue declared heeretoofoore, that Gods iudgements are executed diuerly. But yet muste wee alwayes haue this saying before oure eyes, (that is too witte, that the heauens shall bewraye the iniquitie of such as despize God, and the earth shall ryse vp agaynst them) too the ende wee may learne too discouer our owne iniquities vntoo God, as the Scripture counselleth vs too doo. Then let vs of oure owne free accorde acknowledge oure dettes, and confesse our selues blamewoorthis before God. Haue wee so disclosed our owne iniquitie? Then dooth God couer it, then dooth hee burie it, then dooth hee cast it into the bottom of the Sea, so as it shall neuer come too remembrance any more.

Againe, haue wee shewed both too heauen and earth, that oure onely desire is that God should pitie vs, by-cause hee mighte with good right condemne vs? Be-holde, the heauens shall bee as a mantle too vs, and the earth shall lykewise couer vs, so as oure iniquities shall be buried. But I say wee muste confesse our iniquities vntoo heauen: that is too say, before God. And wee muste also confesse them in the earth, when wee shall haue cast stumbling blockes into the Church, and haue liued amisse. For wee must not bee ashamed to yeelde our selues guiltie before men after wee haue sorrowed before God. But if wee minde too shift off things by lying, God muste bee fayne too shewe that hee hathe not spoken this sentence in vaine. After that Zophar hath spoken so, hee addeth, that the bud of his house shall go away like flowing water in the day of Gods wrath. Nowe when mention is made heere of the budde of the house of wicked men, it is to expresse that all the hope which they haue for the tyme too come shall beguile them. For when the wicked are cropped by Gods hande: they hope still to bud againe, and too reneue, and recouer their former state. But it is sayde that God will disappoynt that budding, and make them slide away as water in the day of his wrath. True it is that when the faythfull are smitten by Gods hand, they alwayes releue themselues with hope that their miserie shall not indure for euer, according as it is promised them that gods v rash indureth but the turning of a hande, but his mercie shall last towardes them for euer. So then the faythfull may and ought well to comfort themselues, bycause they knowe that God will make them to spring againe. And the holy Scripture vseth often this similitude, that although they be cropped yet their roote is left still in the grounde. Nowe when they take such hope, doo they presume vpon their owne power? Or is it their intent to spite God? No: but after they haue acknowledged that they be worthis to bee forsaken of god, they trust in him that he will haue mercie vpon their infirmities. Contrariwise, when the wicked hope that their afflictions shall not continue for euer, it is after a maner by defying God, and with a kinde of iustling agaynst him too knowe who is hardest. Be-holde, God is agaynst them, and they on their side sticke to their tackling, that is to say, they are so wilfully bent vntoo sturdinesse, as they determine neuer too bow their neckes, but too continue alwayes stiffe agaynst God.

Therevpon they flatter themselues, and beleue that the miserie which they endure shall passe away, and that when they bee once gone, all shall go well with them.
And wherevpon commeth it that they take such hart of grace? As I sayde afore, it is not for that they haue any trust in Gods mercie: but it proceedeth of a deuillish pride, so as they beare themselues in hande, that Gods hande is not strong ynough too daunt them, by reason whereof they will not in any wise submitte themselues vnto him.

And therefore it behoueth vs too marke well howe it is conteyned in this sentence, that God will make all their budding to fade away like water: that is too say, it shall bee too no purpose for the wicked too take highly vp-on them, and too beare themselues in hande that they shall bee sette vp againe: for God will plucke them vp roote and rinde: and although they haue had some bud left, that is too say, although God haue left them some little shewe, so as it might seeme that they were not vtterly dispatched: yet shall it fade away specially at the day of his wrath. Nowe must we wey this saying. For it doth vs too vnderstande, that wee must not imagin that God is ydle when hee ouerpasse things, and putteth not his hande too the punishing of the wicked. And why? For hee hath his conuenient seasons. Then hath Goddes wrath a certaine determinate day, whiche wee knowe not of. Therefore when wee see the wicked in prosper-itie, and in their triumphes, and it seemeth that no misfortune shall euer befall them: let it come too oure remembrance that the wrath of God hath a day, and that God knoweth when it is time too punishe. I say let vs tarie patiently, and in the meane while learne hereby not to fall asleepe, if God spare vs. And if our Lorde make vs not to feele this vengeance for a time: but let vs alone and handle vs gently, although we haue offended him: I saye let vs not flatter oure selues therefore, for there is not a more daungerous deceyte, than when men sleepe saping in their sinnes, and thinke not vpon Gods wrath, vnder colour that hee beareth with them.
For then doo they gather a great heape of wrath too themselues, as Saint Paule sayeth in the second Chapter too the Romanes. Then let vs learne not too flatter our selues at such time as wee bee in rest: but let vs dayly thinke vpon the daye of Gods wrath, and preuent it: namely by trembling continually before oure iudge, praying him to receyue vs too mercie, bycause wee bee

we be so greatly indetted vnto him: and let vs keepe our mouthes shet when it commeth too the mainteyning of our cace. Nowe if Zophar had applyed this matter rightly, hee had not condemned Iob as he did: but he had acknowledged that of Iob which hee speaketh generally: that is to wit, that whereas the wicked do prosper, and yet notwithstanding Iob hauing led a blamelesse life, is punished for rigorously: it is not to be sayd that God disalloweth him, and alloweth the wicked. For he hath a day for his wrath. True it is that Zophar is as a Prophet of God. But yet doth hee peruert all things as Balaam did, by cause hee discerneth not the fite time of Gods wrath, whereof he spake. And for this cause ought wee too giue the better heede to this saying, to the ende wee haue the sayde skill that I spake of, namely too consider that God hath his conuenient tymes to punish the wicked. To conclude, all the doctrine that wee haue heard, hee sayth in the ende, Such is the portion of the wicked, yea at Gods hand, and at Gods hand also his heritage is like because of his wordes. As touching this conclusion, it is as it were a sealing of that which we haue heard heere before, to the intent it might be of the more authoritie in our hartes, & that we might be fully assured of it, & receyue it without any doubting. Marke then the portion of the wicked. And at whose hand? At Gods. As if he had sayd, True it is that the wicked ruffle it out in this worlde, and play the looce Colts: for they beleue not that there is a iudge in heauen, neyther thinke they vpon him. But yet for all that, they cannot pluck that preheminece from his maiestie, and hee prepareth their indytement. This then serueth expressly too daunt the wicked, which put God out of their minde as much as they can. Also is it a good lesson for all the faythfull, to teache them to say, Go to, wee may do much euill that shall bee pardoned at mens handes, yea and they shall neuer say so much as blacke is our eye for it. But in the ende wee muste come before the iudge, and when we come thither, this forbearing at mens handes will turne too oure double condemnation. That is the counsell which wee haue too gather of this text, when the name of God is expressed heere two tymes. For men oftentimes discharge not their dutie, specially those I meene that are in office to do it. VVee neuer passe of admonishing such as doo amisse, nor of correcting them, but wee winke at them. Yea and the Magistrate which ought to put too his hande to repress offences, doth verie often let all alone. Men then both generally and particularly dissemble and make countenance not to see awhitte. But God is not negligent in his office. For as well they that haue bene borne with, as those that haue borne with them must come to account. So then the name of god, together with the circumstance of the text, ought to wey greatly with vs, sith wee knowe it is not without cause sayde, that such is the portion of the wicked, yea euen at Gods hande. For it serueth too wipe away all these vaine hopes which wee bee woont to conceyue when men giue vs their hande, and eyther winke at our sinnes, or else pardon them. Let vs not trust vpon that. For it will bee a double confusion too vs afore God. And let vs assure our selues that although we bee scaped from the worlde, yet must God shewe himselfe too bee our iudge. Nowe whereas mention is made of portion and heritage, that also serueth to do vs too vnderstande, that we must be fully resolued of this poynt, that God will not leaue the wicked vnpunished. And like as euerie man calleth that thing his portion, which is ordeyned or allotted vnto him: So hath our Lorde already assigned to the wicked, that which belongeth vnto them: that is their heritage, that is too say that same is as theyr patrimonie, so as there is nothing more peculiarly a mans owne, than the punishment that God will lay vpon the wicked. And hee speaketh purposely of their wordes. Howe so? True it is that some men restreine this too the blasphemies that the wicked belke out agaynst God: but the worde that is sette downe heere foundeth none euill. So then it must be taken more simply: that is to witte, that wicked men may well alledge as many excuses as they list, but they shall gaine nothing by it: for they shall be condemned with all their wordes. Surely Zophar had an eye to Iob, and therein (as I sayde afore) hee applied it amisse vnto him: but yet it ceaseth not to bee true and good in it selfe. And it is the holy Ghost that pronounceth heere in generall, that the wicked with all their gay wordes shall bee rooted out by the hande of God. Therefore this worde is not couched heere without cause. For wee see continually howe the wicked are desirous to pleade agaynst God, thinking to worke wonders with their vntowarde allegations. And truly God suffereth them to holde plea so for a time: but at length he sheweth that which is written in Genesis, namely, that his spirite shall not strue any longer with man. God had borne with as outrageous wickednesse as coule be: and when he saw that men abused his pacience after that manner: he sayde I will no longer pleade with you, I must be fayne to put to my hande. Thus ye see howe it is sayde heere, that the wicked maye well file their tongues too iustifie themselves, for they can good skill too chop Logicke with God: but shall that further their cace? No, no. They rather sharpen the swoorde, and God must be fayne too execute the forer iustice, and the terrible vengeance vpon their heades. So then, men may be armed with their tongues to pleade agaynst God: but God hath his hande armed, and will stretch it oute of heauen too confounde all such as shall so pleade agaynst him. And this saying ought to touch the wicked more than it doth. But what? Heereby it is seene that there is a brutishe blockishnesse in the greater parte of the worlde. Nowadayes there is no bowing vnder the worde of God, nor vnder the corrections that are done vnto vs in his name and by his authoritie. For men encounter them with such iturdinesse, as it is well too be perceyued that there is no more religion among them than is among the Turkes and Paynims. And not onely warnings are in vaine that are giuen men in secret: but also if open faults be spoken of in the Pulpit: whereas men ought too aske God mercie, and too sue to him for it with all humblenesse: what is too bee seene, but that men are fully bent to stande stoutly agaynst God? As for example: when I spake the last Sunday of the shamefull outrage that had bene done heereby at Cologny: they fell to iustifying of themselves, and to conspiring agaynst God, and too deuising with themselves, howe too hide the thing that was altogether apparant. The matter is, that the Sermon was broken off in the Church, and yet coule not be obteyned at those roysters handes, to leaue off when they were warned: the matter was complayned of. As howe? Such a thing is not to bee suffered. But men will seeke meenes too colour all, yea and some will picke a quarell as if they had great wrong done vnto them. Yee wretched men, yee shoulde haue prepared your selues too the Lordes supper, and I tolde you of that shamefull disorder, to the intent ye shoulde bee sorie for it, or at leastwise (if ye had not bene become deuils) ye should haue bene somewhat touched to conforme your selues: but you come cleane contrariwise in a rage too worke all mischeefe. Is it not apparant heereby, that you seeke nothing but to fight openly agaynst God? But if wee speake

Chapters.

Gene. 6. a. 3

speake of secreter matters, yet the whole worlde knoweth them. For wee see open whoredomes, wee see blasphemies, wee see drunkenesse, gluttonie, and other excesses, wee see the despising of Gods worde, and allecclesiasticall order, wee see briberies and cruelties, and that there is as much gentlenesse among men as among woolues, so as there is none other meening but to do violence too one, and too poll another, and finally all shame is gone. These things are apparant. But what if there be other more outrageous things, and that a man should speake of them in the Pulpit? A man might well bee the more wearie. And with what conscience come you too receyue the Lordes Supper at my hande? Thou commest euen with the same that Iudas did. But thou shalt bee sure to feele Gods vengeance with trembling, as Cain did, and that thou art a manifest and apparant reprobate. I haue alledged this example, to the ende wee might learne not too stande checking agaynst God. For if hee list to pleade with vs, alas what defence shall wee haue to get the vpper hande in our cace? But yet let vs not thinke that God needeth to studie how to tell a long tale: for he will conclude and execute his sentence without pronouncing it newe againe, for we haue ynouge in the holy Scripture, wherein hee sheweth he sheweth himselfe to bee iudge of the whole worlde. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text: that is too wit, that if wee confesse our faultes afore God, wee shall be forgiuen at his hande: But if wee stande pleading with him, or if wee seeke lurkingholes too hyde our iniquities: we shall not only be conuincd by his worde, but also he will lay so rough hand vpon vs, as we shall be ouerwhelmed vnder him, yea eue without any remedie: and then will it be no time to aske forgiuenesse. Therefore let vs take the conuenient time that God assigneth vs, while he offereth vs the meane to obteyne mercie of him by his Gospell.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God, with acknowledgement of oure faultes, praying him too make vs so too feele them, as it may leade vs too true repentance: and that in steade of hardning of our selues, we may bee so hartbroken, yea euen before he make vs feele the sorenesse of his wrath, as euerie one of vs maye bee his owne iudge: too the ende, that when wee shall appeare before the iudgement seate of oure Lorde Iesus Christe, all oure sinnes maye there bee couered and buried by his rightuousnesse. And so let vs all say. Almightye God oure heauenly father, &c.

And Iob answered and sayde.

2. Heare my vvordes and let it be for your comfortes.
3. Beare vvith me and I vvill speake: and vvhen I haue spoken, mockeyou on.
4. Is my talking vnto man? If it vvere so, hovv should not my spirit faint?
5. Marke me and be abashed, and lay your hande vpon your mouth.
6. Verely vvhen I bethinke me, I am afrayde, and feare taketh holde on my flesh.

It seemeth after a sort, that the woordes which Iob setteth downe heere, are contrarie to the worde of God, inasmuch as hee auoucheth that god punisheth not the wicked, but letteth them alone so as they prosper. But we haue seene heretofore that we must consider the iudgements that God executeth in the worlde, according to the recorde of the holy Scripture. Then at the first sight, this talke of Iobs seemeth vtterly repugnant too all truth: but we must remember what hath bene sayde heeretofore: namely that when the holy Scripture speaketh of Gods iudgements, it sayeth not that hee accomplisheth them peremptorily: for sometimes hee taketh in hande to shewe himselfe iudge of the worlde, but that is not in all poynts and all caces, nor yet after all one rate. Therefore it ought too suffize vs, that God giueth vs some token that the wicked cannot scape his hande, but must come too account before him. Neuerthelesse God doth sometimes dissemble, and wee see it by experience. So then it behoueth vs too acknowledge that God doth by his prouidence gouerne the worlde, mainteyne and preserue the good, and punishe the wicked: as we make it no generall rule that all suche as bee wicked are punished out of hande, and that God delayeth not their punishment till afterwarde, nor vsfeth any sufferance, nor reserueth any thing to the life to come: for then should we enter into a great disorder. VVherefore sithe that our knowing of Gods iudgements ought too be in such wise, as to wayt for the accomplishment and fulfilling of them at the latter day: thereby wee may well dispatche the contrarietie, that seemeth too bee at the first blush, betweene Iobs sayings heere, and the holy scripture. VVhat is it that Iob meeneth? That wee see the wicked prosper, and that God is so farre off from punishing them, as they be caried on still in all pleasures and delightes euen till their dying day, so as they pine not away with long lingring, but rather seeme too bee exempted by priuiledge at Gods hande from all aduersitie.

Nowe it seemeth after a sort that Iob intended too beare men in hande, that all things are gouerned by fortune, and that God hath no regarde of worldly matters, ne careth for them. But his meening is nothing so, according also as hee himselfe protesteth at the ende, too the intent that men should not take offence at his woordes. VVhat then? His purpose is too shewe that when God visiteth a man, wee must not at the first dashe giue sentence of condemnation vpon him, too say, such a one is a wicked man, such a one is hated and forsaken of God: but it behoueth vs too examin well his life. And why? For we must not thinke that God doth alwayes handle men in this worlde wholly according too their deserts. VVherefore see we so many wicked men spared? For it shoulde not seeme that their iniquities are knowne to God, seing he layeth no punishment vpon the m. So then let vs vnderstand that our Lorde reserueth many punishments to the latter day, whiche are not seene as yet: and againe that hee handleth those very rigorously whom he loueth, and haue not offended so greuously as other men, which thing he doth not for their sinnes sake. If we know not why he doth it, let vs humble our selues: for God must be glorified in all his

werkes, although wee knowe not the reason of them as yet. Nowe then wee see what Iob pretended. Howbeit, that wee may the better profite our selues by that which is conteyned heere, let vs lay soorth and serch out the things in order, as hee setteth them downe. Hearken to mee (sayth he) and take heede too my wordes, and let it bee too you for a comfort: that is too say, let it bee in steade of the comfort that you come too giue mee. Truly wee knowe that Iobs freendes came too that ende: howbeit they were sore combered when they sawe him in that plight: and according to mans reason they concluded that Iob was a castaway. See howe they were dazeled with this generall sentence, that God punisheth the wicked. And so they set Iob in the rancke of the wickedest sort, which thing they ought not too doo. Nowe therefore hee telleth them, that where as they bee come too comfort him, hee desireth nothing of them but pacience and quiethearing. And afterwarde hee protesteth againe, that hee shapeth not his talke vntoo men, as these hypocrites doo, who seeke no more but too bee iustified before the worlde, always shunning the presence of God, and neuer come too acknowledge [what they bee] but by force, and till men haue throughly tried what is in them. Iob then sayth, that his talking is not vnto men, that is too say, hee is not led with vayne ambition, to make fayre countenaunces and shewes before men, but hee shapeth himselfe too for prooffe thereof (he sayth) might my spirit I had respect vntoo men? Ye see me here in necessitie, as no creature were able too indure in so miserable state. By all likelihoode I coulde haue benee dispatched a hundred tymes ere this: but sith you see neuerthelater, that my spirite sayleth mee nor: is it not a signe that I knowe the hande of God, and that I submit my selfe too it, and that I rest vpon him? Secing I am not heere as a wauering Reede, can yee not perceyue that I haue a better and surer foundation? For somuche then as you see that I speake as before God: heare mee. And afterwarde hee addeth. Thinke not that I am without feeling. For when I beholde my selfe I cannot but be sore abashed, and I am greatly dismayde at the things whiche I see. For surely Iob was as a spectacle of all terriblenesse: and when wee reade what happened vntoo him, the heares ought too stande vp vpon oure heade. His saying then is that hee cannot thinke vpon himselfe, nor remember the great miseries that were befallne him: but terrible feare must catche holde on him. Therefore when ye knowe my state throughly (sayth he) then will you be astonished, and lay your hande vpon your mouth. That is too say, you will blame mee no more as yee haue done hithertoo. For yee imagine of mee at your pleasure, and it is a signe that yee haue no pitie nor compalsion of the great miserie that is in my persone.

And heere wee haue too marke, first if we will comfort the miserable in their aduersitie, it behoueth vs too consider well howe. For there is required a singular discretion in that behalfe as wee haue seene heceterofore. For afflictions are as diseases: and if a phisition vse one medicine for all diseases, what a thing will that bee? Some disease is whote, and some is colde: some disease requireth that a man shoulde be kept drie, and some other that hee shoulde bee refreshed with moysture: one disease will haue a man kept close, and another will haue him to go abroad. Yee see then that a Phisition shall kill his patientes, if hee haue not a regarde of their diseases: yea and it behoueth him also too bee acquainted with the complexions of his pacients. Euen so ought wee too consider of those whome God visiteth wyth afflictions. First wee muste marke what the persones are, and then howe wee see them dispozed. I say wee must marke what the persones are. For if a man haue liued without stayne, walking in the feare of God, and shewing all tokens of sounde meening: what a thing were it too condemne him when wee see him in aduersitie? Againe, though a man had committed foule offences, and for a time benee in a rage agaynst God: if hee bee daunted by the aduersities that hee indureth, so as wee perceyue nothing but true repentance in him: were it not a beastly and wicked crueltie, too steppe too him neuerthelesse, and too vse great roughnesse agaynst him? Nay we must rather reache our hande too suche as are beaten downe, and helpe them vp: according as it is sayde, that the duetie of them that will teach faithfully in the name of God, is too strengthen the weak knees and feeble hands, and to harden and comfort those that are in distresse, and in anguiste of minde. Yee see then that wee ought too vse great discretion in comforting such as are afflicted. And therefore it is not without cause, that Iob telleth his freendes, it were muche better for them too holde their peace, than too increase his trouble by speaking, and hee woulde take theyr silence for a comfot. Yea and he addeth, that when they haue heard him, he will giue them leaue too mocke on, not that hee meeneth that they might haue reason so too doo: but he rebuketh them for their rashnesse, according as it is sayde prouerbially, that a hastie iudge giueth a swift sentence. For they were ouer hastie in condemning of Iob before they had heard him. And so when he sayth that they may mocke on when they haue heard him speake: he meeneth that there is nothing but disorder and rashnesse in them, and that they descant vpon an vnknowne matter, whereof they were not yet throughly informed. Therefore we haue a common doctrine too marke in this sentence: which is too bridle our selues, when we come to iudging, and not too bee so headie till we knowe the verie truth in deede. And so much the more ought we too minde it, bycause wee see that men are by nature ouermuch inclyned to this rashnesse and ouerhastinesse. For although we woulde fayne be esteemed to be of ripe and settled iudgement: yet are there verie fewe to bee found, that giue themselues to bee so: yea and (which worse is) we shall see a great number that make haste to shewe their fine witte, for feare least men shoulde take them for dullardes. This causeth vs oftentimes too throwe oure selues headlong intoo ouerhardinesse, and to iudge crookedly and vntowardly of oure neighbours, without reason, or without indifferencie at all. Seeing that this maladie is so naturall too vs: let vs learne to examin things before we speake. It is sayde that the wize man will alwayes heare, and the foole haue his mouth open, and neuer leaue babbling. It is not for naught that Salomon sayeth so, and we can well skill to say so too: but in the meane whilie we do yll put it in vre. And therefore what is our cheefe wisdom? Saint Iames sheweth it vs when he sayeth, that we ought to be slowe to speake, and willing too suffer our selues to bee taught. For when we haue the modestie too refrayne from hastie speaking: God will giue vs the grace to knowe the matters: and when wee knowe them, wee shall tell howe they stande. At a worde, wee shall haue profited greatly, when we haue learned too refrayne hastie iudgement. For wee cannot iudge our neighbours after that sort at aduenture, without a double despising of Gods goodnesse. VVhy so? For wee must all appeare before his iudgement seate, as Saint Paule telleth vs.

 the euill, Ifay when wee knowe it, not after our owne imagination, but as it is of verie truth: we may be bolde too condennie it, and we shall not be rashe in so dooing.
 VVhy? For wee iudge not at all: but onely ratifie the iudgement that God hath giuen by his worde. But when wee be so halste [as is spoken of afore:] it is high treason to God, bycause we rob him of the right that is peculiar too himselfe, and pull it to our owne persones.
 And againe besides this, we offende God in taking vpon vs to iudge of secrete matters. But it behoueth vs too knowe our owne measure, and that we haue neede too inquire of the things that we knowe not, and not to say it is so, or so, vntill we be throughly informed of the matter. Those twoo reasons ought too holde vs well in awe, that wee bee not ouerhardie in iudging our neighbours. 20 Furthermore if it behoue vs too keepe this modestie toward mennes persones: what muste wee doo to Gods doctrine? I pray you when euerie man shootes forth his bolt vpon a doctrine before hee haue throughly examined it: is not suche rashnesse worthie too be double condemned? I haue shewed alreadie that wee be tray-tours too God in robbing him of his honour, if wee iudge the persones of our brethren before wee knowe them throughly. But it is certayne that Gods doctrine is much more precious than mennes persones. I go a- 30 bout too infringe some doctrine at auenture, yea, euen some doctrine of the holy Scripture, or some article of the fayth: and is not that an unhallowing of the holy things? Neuerthelesse wee see men bolde and ouerbolde in this cace. For nowadayes, who shall bee sooner beleeued in matters of doctrine, than drunkardes, looce liuers, and heathenish men, whiche can as muche skill of Gods secretes, as can brute beastes, yea as can the the verie Swyne? These must snuffe vp their groyne agaynste Gods doctrine, and dispute with mighte and mayne agaynst the truth, that hath beene well stably-shed by the holy scripture. And what maketh them so bolde? Euen bycause they vouchsafe not too heere.
 But God punisheth them for their presumption, shew-ing that they bee but ranke fooles which alwayes haue their tongues walking, and neuer haue they eares open too heere with pacience. So much the more then behoueth it vs too prastize this sentence and admonition that is giuen vs heere, that euerie one of vs must learne to bee slowe to iudge. And when wee doo so, we shall 50 bee teachable. For hee will neuer proue a good mayster, which hath not beene a good scholer. If a man wil worke maystries at the first day, before hee haue euer beene bounde prentice to the occupation: he shall make fayre woorke and aduantage himselfe greatly. Now if the cace stande so in handie craftes: what is to be thought of Gods doctrine which surmounteth all mans vnderstanding, and is reuerenced euen of the Angelles? And so, we must not onely haue beene scholers, that we may be maysters: but wee muste also perseuer all oure life long in profitting and vnderstanding, when wee mynde too teach others. VVhen God hath giuen a man grace too teach others, he must not thinke that hee himselfe is not bounde too learne any further. But let vs assure our sel-ues, that no man shall euer bee a good and faythfull teacher, except hee indeuer too learne still, as well as other men. To be short, it behoueth vs all, (as well those that teach, as those that learne) to be Gods scholers, and too Proceede further and further in his learning, yea euen til we die. Thus much concerning that sentence. Nowe let vs come to the protestation that Iob maketh. My talking (sayth he) is not vnto men, for were it so, howe should my spirite not fayle? Heere Iob sheweth all the children of God how they ought to speake. He had protested the like alreadie heretofore. Howbeit it is not without cause that he repeateth it again, forasmuch as it is certain that while we wander here bylowe, our talke will alwayes trayle a long trayne of superfluities after it, and wee shall not go to the matter roundly and substantially as wee ought to doo. VVhat is the cause that we are woont to snarle our wordes in such wise, as a man cannot wring out any pure truth out of vs? It is bicause we haue our eye vpon men.

 For besides that, men do bleare themselves, and discerne not things as they ought to do: we on our syde are alreadie enclined too follow it, and the diuell also thrusteth himselfe in, too make a hotchpotch of all things. So then oure woordes shall neuer bee well conueyed and cleere, except we haue God before our eyes, and speake as in his presence. On the other syde, wee are neuer throughly touched, when we talke but with men. For they iudge no further than they see, and we passe for no more but to hide our vices, and we thinke it ynough if the euill be not apparant. Lo howe men fall asleepe in their sinnes, and neuer speake freely as they ought to do, vnllesse thy know that God summoneth them before him, and frameth their inditements, and that they must iustify it, and not tary till God condemne them, but rather they and themselves giltye of their owne accorde. This is the cause why Iob protesteth here that his talking is not vnto men.
 True it is that we ought to haue regard of our neighbors when wee talke with them, that our wordes may edifie them. For if we cast forth light and wandring speches: we shall lay stumbling blockes in their way, and we may hurt them diuerse wayes. Therefore when we speake to men, we must be thinke our selues afore hand: that is to say, we must haue regarde that it might be to their profite. But yet must we haue the thing that is spoken heere of Iob: 40 which is, to put God before. Iob then meeneth not singgly that he despyzeth men, and that if hee see them rude and ignorant he will not in any wise applie himselfe vnto them: no: but that he is not led with such vanitie as too please men onely, and to forget God, or too put him behind them: but rather that when he speaketh, he maketh his reckening afore hande, that he is as it were in the presence of God, so as all his thoughts are knowne too that heavenly iudge, and therefore he must not disguise himselfe, nor thinke too further his cace by concealing the truth. Lo wherewith Iob looked. And so (as I haue touched alreadie) let vs haue the wit to pray god to cal vs through-ly home to himselfe: that is to say, that as oft as he visiteth vs with his handes, he will so touch our mindes and hartes too the quicke, as wee may knowe that it is hee which punisheth vs for oure faultes, and that all oure thoughts are bare before him, and not be dazeled & sot-ted in our owne talke, as they that are so full of babling, onely to please men. Beholde (I say) whereof we bee instructed in this sentence. And it behoueth vs too remember well the reason that Iob addeth. If it be so (sayeth he) howe and wherefore dooth not my spirite faynt? It seemeth that hee leaueth his talke heere as it were cutte off.
 But the sense is that suche as doo so direct their talke too men without regarde of God, shall quayle in the ende, and that when they haue made fayre countenances at the first sight, their hypocrisie will bewray it selfe at the last. And in good sooth wee see it so by experience. For they that are so led with vaine glorie, and are always

alwayes desirous too bee had in reputation among men as the only respect that they haue : will surely tell manie fayre tales, and roll so trimly in theyr Rhetoricke, as their woordes will vtterly bleare mens eyes, and it will bee a woonder too heare them speake. Heerevpon they streake themselues when men sooth them : but in the ende God pincheth them after suche a sort, as hee sheweth that all was but hypocrisie. God then taketh away that starche, as when a woman that starcheth hir face commeth into the sunne, and the heate lighteth vpon hir, by and by the starche falleth off, and hir wrinkles appeare, by meanes whereof hir shame is so manifest as shee is faine to get hir away too hide it. Euen so is it with hypocrytes. For by reason of theyr goodly shewes, they shal be comended exceedingly of the world, and men will thinke there is none euill in them. VVell, God leaueth them there for a time, so as they shyne bright before men : but in the ende hee mocketh theyr hypocrisie, and then are they vtterly defaced, they bee pynched double and treble, till they can no more, all the babling that they were woont too make is layde a water, and beholde all their goodly Rhetoricke fayleth them. Therefore let vs marke well this reason, too the ende wee may learne too come vntoo God of our owne accorde, and to haue a care to speake as in his presence, before he constreyn vs by force & violence. Thus then the reason that is set downe heere, ought to serue vs for a thorn to make vs shunne all hypocrisie, and to follow the vnfeynednesse of setting our selues as it were in the presence of God, and of hauing an eye alwayes vntoo him in our talke. For if wee haue an eye vntoo him, surely hee will giue vs the grace too stande, specially if wee followe the example of Iob. For Cain and Iudas, and such other like were faine in the ende to seele Gods presence, not for that they were moued by it to returne too repentance, but that God brought them therevnto by force. But let vs follow Iob : that is to say, let vs seeke to hold our selues before the face of our iudge, and let vs go to him with al humblenesse, acknowledging his iustice, that we may giue him the glorie which belongeth to him, and which he deserueth. VVhen we go so to worke, and desire too bee succoured by his goodnesse, surely our wittes shall not fayle vs though we were pressed neuer so extremely, yea and seemed to bee vtterly ouerwhelmed. VVe should (say I) be neuerthelessse hilde vp, and in the ende so restored, as God shoulde shewe that all such as seeke him, and come too him willingly, are receyued at his hand, yea euen as it were too bee hilde in his lappe, and that hee will giue them suche a resting stay, as they shall neuer miscarie, bee their infirmitie neuer so great. And nowe Iob (not without cause) addeth, that when his freendes looke vpon it they shall bee amazed, and compelled to shet their mouth, and too lay their hande vpon it to holde their peace. For if wee knewe Gods iudgements in good earnest, surely wee woulde haue more holde of our selues than wee haue. But what is the cause that wee bee so hardie too iudge so at randon, but for that wee examine not thoroughly the things that God sheweth vs. As howe? If wee see a man afflicted, surely we can perceyue well ynough that the same commeth of God : but foorthwith wee fall too raunging : and say that God punisheth such a one for his sinnes : wherevpon wee fall too thundering at him. But (as I sayde) if wee considered Gods iudgements aright, wee shoulde haue better stay of our selues. And why? For too consider Gods iudgements aright, it behoueth vs first and formeist to thinke vpon our sinnes, and that in the persone of one man God intendeth alwayes too instruēt a thousande and many more : and looke howe many chastizementes and aduersities are shewed, so many teachings and instructions dooth God sende too vs all. Then if any man bee scourged, wee must not onely looke what he is, but we must also thinke vpon our selues : and surely then shall wee not lift vp oure hornes when wee come before Gods Maiestie : but wee shall haue suche a reuerentnesse, that if wee iudge oure neighbours, it shall bee with feare and greefe. For it shall behoue euery one of vs too haue iudged and condemned oure selues afore hande, and too haue acknowledged that wee deserue too receyue much greuouser condemnation at the handes of our God. I am a wretched mortall creature, and sillie worme of the earth, and I take vpon mee too iudge my neighbour, and what shall God doo agaynst mee when hee holdeth his assizes? If wee thought of this, I pray you woulde it not strike a terrour intoo vs? On the other side, when wee see Gods iustice vpon a man, ought wee not too perceyue that wee oure selues haue deserued much more, and that hee might handle vs much more rigorously? True it is that wee coulde not blame God of crueltie : for hee is righteous.

Then if hee punishe suche a one so roughly, what shall hee doo with mee? I say, when wee haue such considerations, they will serue too humble vs, and too make vs walke in awe before God. And not onely that, but also it will strike vs in a feare, and too knowe the condemnation that hangeth ouer vs, if God had not had pitie and mercie vpon vs, as hee maketh vs too perceyue it. But aboue all, when wee see the iudgements of God, which are notable, that is too say, which are worthie of remembrance, and vnaccustomed : that ought to touch vs more to the quicke, and wee ought too conceyue so great a feare, as to abashe vs that we dare not open oure mouth. As for example. VVhen wee see but the common aduersities, whereuntoo wee bee as it were inured by custome : yet must wee not bee so grosse headed, as not to acknowledge the hande of God, and at the knowledge thereof bee stricken downe and humbled wyth feare. But when wee see God sometimes stretche oute his arme after such a sort as wee see things that wee neuer knewe nor thought of before : (as there are dreadefull punishmentes :) Howe then? That is straunge, there was neuer any such thing heard of. Such things (say I) shall wee see, and it behoueth vs too thinke yet better vpon them. For when God seeth vs asleepe, and ouerslouthfull, hee wakeneth vs. And like as if a man were faine intoo so sounde a sleepe, as hee could not answer when hee is called, and yet notwithstanding must needs wake if hee bee iogged, or pulled harde by the arme : euen so dealeth our Lord with vs. For inasmuch as we be not moued with the common corrections that he sendeth vs, but are dull and retchelesse : he sheweth vs great and excessiue punishmentes, such as wee haue not heard off before, as if he ment too waken vs perforce. VVherefore let vs bethinke vs too profite oure selues by Gods iudgements : not simply to bee stricken in feare by them, nor too bee so affrighted as wee shoulde shunne him : but too bee stirred vp too runne vntoo him, and too walke in his feare. Also let vs desire him too holde vs by strong hande, and not to suffer vs too stumble, seeing it cannot bee otherwise with vs, except hee holde vs vp and preferae vs. Thus yee see too what ende it behoueth vs too bee astonished at Gods iudgements. But contrariwise wee see that men seeke nothing but too forgette them, for too their seeming they bee to Melancholike matters. If God smite any man, all of vs must must profit our selues by it, as I haue declared alreadye. On the contrarie part there are verie fewe but they suppress such doctrine: and (which more is) although God bend himself too vs, and beate vs with his rods: yet doo wee labour too intangle our myndes, and too seeke vaine shifts too hyde Gods hand withall: and although wee feele the strypes wellynough, yet will wee not bee acknowledged how it is God that visiteth vs. See how wee would burie the remembrance of Gods straunge iudgements, which ought too fray men, yea and to moue euen the very stones. Yet are wee (I say) so wicked as too 10 with too burie them, as we haue seene by examples heere. VVhen our Lord hath executed so terrible iudgements as mens eares ought too glowe at them: a man needes not too speake of them: For these good defenders of the honour of Geneua make complaynt of it. I say, when a man speaketh of the man whom God would haue to be an horrible spectacle, and a feare and terrour too all men, if a man bring that thing to remembrance, and shewe that the blasphemers which spited God and 20 all religion, was as ye would say, straight [of his witts,] insomuch that the moother which bare him in hir wōbe, deposed that the diuell brought him in: they will say that men dishonour the cite. Behold these good men that are so zelous of the honour of Geneua, they could find in their harts that the Towne were sunken (it is well knowne who they bee, and a man needes not too poynt them out with his finger, nor too call them by their names, for they bee knowne wellynough) and yet for all that they pretend a desirousnesse too the honour of the 30 cite: but it is well seene of what hart their dooings proceede.

Yee see then how the wicked would fayne burye the iudgements of God, bycause they bee desirous too plucke him out of his seate if it were possible, that they might not bee subiect too his iurisdiction. But yet when hee woorketh after a terrible fashyon, needs must wee be woorse than brute beastes, if we be not moued at them: and yet for all that the gallants would fayne that all were buried. Furthermore let vs marke that which is 40 shewed heere: that is to wit, that when God lifts vp his mightie hand, and woorks after an vnaccustomed maner: it is to waken them that are to fast asleepe, and too bring vs to such awe and feare, that being abashed we may resort vntoo him, and lerne too hyde our selues vnder his shadowe, and pray him too guyde vs, and not suffer vs to fall into the bottomlesse pit. This is it that wee haue too marke in this text. Now when Iob speaketh of stopping 50 their mouthes. it is a maner of speeche that is verye rise among the Hebrewes: as when it is sayd that the Prophet and the wise man will lay their hand vpon their mouth: it is to do vs to wit, that things shall bee so confuzed as the skilfullest and best practized men that are, shall not knowe what too say, but shall bee vtterly past their wits. And so sayeth Iob now, that such as are so abashed must lay their hand vpon their mouth to keepe 60 silence. And why? For the iudgement that God executed vpon the persone of Iob, was terrible and dreadfull too mannes vnderstanding, and if a man should iudge of it after the flesh, he could not bee but amazed at the sight of Iobs persone. But now let vs gather the common doctrine of this: which is, that when God woorketh after such a maner as wee are not acquainted with, wee haue to glorifie him: for when he sheweth vs the reason of his woorks, and will haue them knowne too vs, then he putteth woords into our mouth that we may be able too speake of them. Again when we see that Gods woorks out passe our vnderstanding, so as we know not why he disposeth the things so which wee see: what is too bee doone? VVee must lay our hand vpon our mouth, that is too say, wee must not be so bold as too prattle of them. VVherfore let vs lerne to knowe our owne abilitie, that we fling not our selues altray ouer all the fields: but rather followe alwayes the right way. For the dooing hereof, wee neede to knowe no more but what is giuen vs: according also as Sainct Paule bringeth 80 vs to the same rule, namely to knowe no more than God leadeth vs vnto. So long as he reacheth vs his hand, let vs go boldly: but when he leadeth vs no further, we must stop there, and be as dumbe. True it is that we must alwayes haue our mouth open after one sorte: that is, to glorifie God. But when we presume too bring him vnder the compasse of our vnderstanding, and would haue him to too referue nothing too himself: whither go we then? Is it not an open despit of God? He intendeth to hyde the thing from vs. And why? Too the intent wee should knowe our owne ignorance, and yet not cease to acknowledge him to be rightuouse, and to honour his woonderfull and incomprehensible ordinance. So then (as I haue touched alreadye) whensoever God sheweth vs the reason of his woorks, let vs thank his goodnesse, and say, Lord thou comest downe 100 lowe to vs wretched creatures, when thou voutfarest to shewe vs why thou doost this or that: and thy goodnesse deserueth well to be magnified by vs, when thou communicatest it so familiarly to such as are not woorth it. But if God hyde the reason of his woorks from vs, and that it bee too hygh for vs to reach vnto: Let vs shet our mouth, that is to say, let vs not be talkatyue to babble after our owne fancie: but let vs glorifie God, and not be ashamed to be ignorant. For the verye wisdom of the faythfull is to knowe no more than it hath pleased 120 God to shewe them. Therefore let vs make silence vntoo God after what sort so euer he work, till the last day of discoverie be come, when we shall see him face to face in his glorie and maiestie.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs feele them better, so as we being cast downe in our selues, may not seeke to be set vp by any but by him, and that wee may bee taught to pitie our neyghbours, and to reache them our hand, and not to be cruell 140 iudges when we see other men in aduersitie, but that eueryone of vs may bethink himself, to the end that when we our selues be in perplexitie and our God afflicteth vs, wee may assure our selues that he will pitie vs, as no doubt but he will shewe himself a pitifull father too wards vs, if wee returne vntoo him with true humilitie and obedience, and graunt vs the grace too hold our selues contented with that which he maketh vs priuie vntoo as now, till he haue gathered vs too himselfe too bee made like vntoo him in glorie. That 160 it may please him to graunt this grace not only too vs, but also too all people and Nations of the world, reducing the poore ignorant persons from the miserable captiuite and bondage, &c.

The lxxix. Sermon, which is the second vpon the xxj. Chapter.

7. Why do the vicked liue and growe old and vvelter in riches?
 8. Their seede is maynteyned before their eyes vvith them, and their generation is in their presence.
 9. Their house is quiet vvithout feare, the scourge of God is not vpon them.
 10. Their Bull cometh to gending, and his seede misseeth not: their covv calueth, and is not barren.
 11. They lead forth their little ones like sleepe, and their children daunce.
 12. They play vpon the Taber and the harp: and make merry vvith the sound of the Organs.

WE sawe yesterday for what intent Iob did set downe a saying which at the first sight might haue seemed euill: which was, that God leaueth the wicked vnpunished. For that seemeth not to be agreeable too his office: but rather that inasmuch as he is iudge of the world, it is his dutie too redresse the mischeues that are doone heere beneath. Ought he not to resfreyn men when he sees them out of square? Or when he seeth himself despized, ought he not to maynteyne his owne glorie, and to pull downe those that are so mounted vp in pryde and rebelliousnesse? But wee see that the wicked doorage against God and abyde by it. It seemeth then that God is a sleepe. Therefore doeth not Iob blaspheme God in making such complaints? No: for his meaning is to shewe simply, that although God bee the iudge of the world, yet it foloweth not, that the chastizings and punishmētts which he executeth vpon sinnes should alwayes be apparant, so as mē might see them with their eyes, and point at them with the finger. Then if God delay his iudgements, it behoueth vs too stay our owne wisdom, and not to suffer it to raundge abroad after the imaginacions of mannes brayne. Least we be to haustie. And though we see that the punishments are not so executed as were to be wished, yet let vs not be troubled nor offended at it: but let vs quietly wayt till the conuenient time be come, which God knoweth & not we. Now the we see in effect what Iob intēded. Howbeit he intermedleth it also with the tēptatiōs which the faithful may haue. For inasmuch as god maketh such delay, & seemeth to the to be ouerslow: it cānot be but they must needs receiue some greefe and wearienesse: but yet must we resist it. Now let vs see after what maner Iob speaketh, Wherefore (sayth he) do the wicked liue? wherefore become they old? wherefore increase they in riches? As if he should say, Among all their desires mē think the chief & happiest to be in heith, & secondly to haue long life, and thirdly to haue abundance of goodes. These are the things wherein men doo willingly place their felicitie. But all these are to be found in the wicked. Their cattell prospereth, their offspring cōtinueth, and all things stand out as they would haue it, and whē they haue led a ioyfull life, they go to their graue in the turning of an hand, that is too say, they linger not in payne as the godly do, which droope all their life lōg, and are full of diseases, & pulled downe with many miseries. So the wicked liue at ease, and in the end God taketh them out of the world without any great greefe. By reason whereof it seemeth that the worst fort are moost favored of God. But in what case were we if we should thinke that God intendeth too execute none other punishments vpon the wicked, than we see him execute at the first sight? Now although wee haue in effect all that Iob saith heere, yet shall it be good for the better insightning of the whole, to vnderstand Zophars errour. True it is that all the sentences which we haue heard in the former chapter are good and true. Howbeit (as I haue sayde) they bee misapplied, bycause Zophar ment to conclude that if we see a man sore afflicted, we ought to say hee is an enemy of God: and that when we see a man liue at his ease, wee may knowe thereby that he is in Gods fauour, and that god loueth him. But we must not go so to work: and in very deede it is the erreure of the Saduceis. For although the Saduceis thought not the soule of man too be immortal, but that men liued in this worlde as brute beafts, and that there is nother heauenly life nor resurrection: although (I say) that they were so brutish: yet did they not thinke but there is a God, and that men ought to yeld themselues to the seruing of him, and to walke in vprightnesse and in a good conscience, and that God regardeth such as leade a holy life, to aide and succour the and to shew them his goodnesse, and also that hee punisheth the wicked. And how can this geere hang together, seeing that commonly such as feare God haue a very euill life in this world? For the Saduceis say, that God recompenceth his seruants in this world, and likewise punish those that despise him. And so by their imagination, men should haue no hope for the time to come, but the good or euill that euery man should receiue, should be Gods well or ill dealing with him in this life. But to resist such imaginacions, and to repressē so pernicious an erreure, our Lord of set purpose doth not alwayes punish the wicked, to the intent we should know how there is another principall iudgement which is not yet seene. Againe, God doth not alwayes shew signes of the loue that he beareth to his children. For he leaueth them vp as it were to the spoile and to the wide world, so as they be martyred and assayled, and yet haue no succoure at his hand. And why? To the end we might know that there is a better and more excellent welfare laid vp for vs in heauen. See how our Lord summoneth vs to the latter day: and looke how oft the wicked are not punished as they haue deserued, but are spared, or the good are afflicted as much as they can beare, and seeme not too be hearde though they call vpon God, nor it cannot be perceiued that God hath the pitie vpon them, but rather seemeth too turne his backe to them, and to haue shaken them off, and not to be minded to deliuer them from the miseries vnder which they faint. so often doth the trumpet sound in our eares. Now then we see what the heattlinesse of the Sadduceis was, to thinke that men were wholly mortal, and that there was no heauenly life for them, and that the good that we can hope for, or the euill that we can feare, is but only in this world. But yet were they hardened in that grosse and brutish opinion: and Zophar and his companions were after a sort wrapped in the like conceit. Behold (say they) God is iudge of the worlde: and therefore if men be beaten with his rods, it followeth that he hateth the, and that they le vtter castaways. This conclusion is sound and naught. Why so? For it proceedes of this of this diuclish error that mennes soules are mortall, and that there is nother resurrection nor kingdome of God. But contrariwise, these two things may verie well agree: that is too wit, that God is the iudge of the world, and yet neuertheless that the wicked may be as it were cursed heere, and their life subiect to many miseries, whereas the wicked shall liue merily and prosper, and triumph and haue whatsoeuer they wish. Those two things (I say) are not repugnāt. And why? For Gods iudging of the world is not at our appoyntment so as he should bee 10 fayne to execute his iudgements when the toy taketh vs in the head: no: but God is iudge of the world and yet notwithstanding he may well dissemble, so that when mē become froward and offend him out of measure, he shall not neede to make any countenance of punishing them, for (as I haue sayd afore) he reserueth the iudgement till another tyme, and he is not bound too shewe him self a iudge too day or to morrowe, nother is he like men which lose the occasions of dooing their businesses. VVhen I haue a thing in hand, and the matter is casie for mee too 20 compasse, if I take not the oportunitie, it slippeth away from mee: and if I would do it afterward, I shall come out of tyme. And why? For therby God purposeth too stirre vs vp to be diligent, and to enter when he openeth vs the gate, and too go on when he sheweth vs the way. But as for himself, he must not be subiect to our state, as who shuld say, that if he woork not out of hād, the oportunitie will scape him. No: he can alwayes recouer the tyme, houre, and meane at his owne pleasure. And so let vs mark that we must not conclude that God must pun- 30 nish the wicked in this life, although he bee the iudge of the world. True it is that we may conclude, that he doeth it in part. As how? God is iudge of the world: therefore it foloweth that he seeth the misdeeds that are doone, and that he noteth and inrol. eth them. Again he hath a care of the good and of such as walk in his feare and seruice and trust in him and call vpon him, and he will succour them. And in verie deede the faythfull perceyue that God is neere them and warcheth for their safegard. They knowe it by experiece, bycause he addeth them by some meanes 40 or other. The wicked also doo spyte of their teete the feele his hand when he persecuteth them. But is it therefore too be sayd that Gods iudgements are alwayes apparant? No. Or that he punisheth euery man heere after the measure of his defects? No. But God giueth some signes whereby it is knowen that all things must come to account before him, and that men must passe through his hands. Also he giueth some tokens, to shewe that he neuer forgetteth those that are his, but that he hath them vnder his proteccion and safekeeping. Behold (I pray you) what we 50 haue to conclude when the holie scripture telleth vs that the world is gouerned by Gods prouidēce, and all things must bee ordered by him. But (as I haue declared alredy) if we would haue our Lord too shewe vs fully and perfectly as now that he is iudge of men: what should bee reserued to the last day, which is our whole hope? VVhen the holie scripture incorageth and exhorteth the faythful to liue well and holily: it sayeth, my freends lift vp your harts to the latter day. For it is impossible for vs to sticke 60 vnto God firmly and stedfastly without swaruing at any time, except we ouerleape the things that are heere beneath, and mouit vp with our mynds, that our anker hold be fastened wholly there. So must it be. Thus then wee see that Iob incountered heere, against the false and cursed opinion of the Sadduceis, who thought that God executed not his iudgements but in this transitorie lyfe: and ment too shewe that the wicked may well prosper and haue all things as they would wish, and yet for all that,

Tit. 2. d. 13

that wee must not bee out of quiet as though all thing<sup>s</sup> were gouerned by fortune and that there were nothing but disorder heere bilowe. No: but it behoueth vs to gather our wits toogether, vntill our Lord shewe himself, who is as it were hidden so long as things are cōfounded, and are not in so good order as wee would desire. Ye see then that God doeth not alwayes shewe his countenance, and yet in the meane whyle it behoueth vs to see clearer than our naturall senses can. As for example, when it is fowle wether we see not the sunne: and yet we be not so vnwise but wee knowe wellynough that the Sunne shyneth still about the clouds. If a man should aske a little child where the Sunne is: he is quite gone, would he say. For he is not so farre lerned as too know that the light which we haue commeth of the Sunne whatsoeuer let is betwixt the same and vs. But wee that knowe by experience, that the sunne keepeth his ordinarie course after he is vp, notwithstanding that the clouds do take away the sight of him from vs: ceasse not to say, The Sūne shyneth, but the wether is not so faire and calme that we can see him where he is hidden. So also when our Lord sendeth troubles intoo the world, and wee see iniquitie runne abode vbridled, ouerflowing all things as a waterfud and we perceiue not that God is minded to withstand it, but rather seemeth too let all things, go too hauocke, so as good men are borne downe, and God maketh no countenance to succoure them although they sigh and grone to him: I say when we see all this: it behoueth vs to haue a hygher reache than our owne moother wit, and to be fully resoluēd that God will yet still asist vs. And also, forasmuch as we see he suffereth not the world to be vtterly ouerwhelmed but holdeth it still by a secret brydle, so as he restreyneth the wicked, and al things passe not into bludshed and murder: let vs assure our selues that God reigneth still, although it be after a dark maner. Again, do wee see that the good are not ayded and deliuered at his hand? Yet doeth he maynteyne and preferre them. For without that, they should perish at the first brunt. Although then that they bee tormented with afflictions: yet is it not to be sayd that God hath quite turned his backe vpon them, and regardeth them no more. Contrariwise euen in the middes of dark and thicke clouds, he alwayes maketh them feele that he is neere at hand to reskew them at their neede. Therefore it behoueth vs to be alwayes perswaded that God guideth the iterne, yea euen after a secret maner. Thus as now we not only haue Iobs meaning: but also we see too what vse and end wee ought to apply his woords, to gather a good lesson of the same. It cannot but greeue vs to see things so farre out of square as they be in this world. For we be as tender and weakeharted as may be. And again wee alwayes inclyne to euill, and on the other side the diuell prouoketh vs to distrust. Then if we see not our Lord repress the wicked, nor correct such as haue doone amisse, nor contrariwise giue releef to the good: surely it may well greeue vs. For it may be that we shall conceyue some sorrowe and hartburning, and demaund of God why he dissembleth, (for it will seeme that he is asleepe): but yet must wee not be hastie to boyle out after that sort. And why? For our Lord knoweth wel ynough how he should execute his iudgements, and it is not for vs to set him to schoole. No? But now were the tyme or neuer. And who are we? Is it for vs to set any appointment? Again if we say, we haue wayted to long: let vs assure our selues we looke no further than before our feete.

But there is yet another life, and the passage wherein wee be as now, is nothing too that. VVhen men haue liued heere neuer so long, at length they come to the end of their way, and it is but a small race in comparison of the time that is endlesse and of the life that is euerlasting. So then, when we shall haue considered that men are not only created to be here for a certaine tyme in the circuit which they make, but also that God calleth the further: we wil not thinke that God is too slowe, although he do not at the first dash execute his punishmets vpon the wicked as were to be desired For (as I haue shewed already) he will soone recover the occasion which we thought too haue ben lost. Lo how wee ought too warre against the lewde fancies that come in our way, when things be not brought to such order as we would well wish. Therefore let vs lerne to knowe, that although to our seeming God woork not at all: yet can he at all tymes finish his woork when he listeth. Only let vs tarrye and be quiet: and the end or falling out will shewe that he was not a sleepe, though we perceyued not that he regarded the things heere bilowe. Thus then ye see how we ought to practize this lesson of Iobs. And wheras some will say on the one side, If God gouerne the world why redresth he not the number of euils that are committed? why deliuereth he not those that are his whom he seeth tormeted with such extremitie? VVe haue to answer, that it is his wil so too exercise the faith and patientnesse of his children, and that he allureth the wicked and vnbelecuers vnto him by gentlenesse, howbeeit that he make them the more vnexcusable, for turning his goodnesse into occasion of hardening, and inhaunceth their damnatio so much the more. Again, if we be at any time tempted too wish that God should make haste: we must be ware that we set not him to his taske. True it is that we may well mourne and say, Lord, how long will it be? But yet must all our desires and requests be ruled by pacience, and we must be subiect too God in all caces, and suffer him to dispoze the whole according to his owne will. VVe may wish: but yet in our wishes we must not thinke to make God subiect too our lustes: but rather thereby giue a tryall of our obedience howsoever hee woork things otherwise than wee would imagin. Behold which is the true practizing of this lesson of Iobs. Howbeeit aboue all things, let vs alwayes indeuor to be stablished in the hope of the last iudgement. Lo how we ought to procede & to acknowledge that god is rightuouse, according as it is his office to gouerne the world. VVhen we haue once lerned those two points, it is a good foundation to build vpon. It is Gods office too gouerne the world: for we must not imagin him to be as an ydoll. If we acknowledge God to be an incomprehensible Being, so as we can say that God hath all maiestie in himself: and yet in the meane while rob him of that which is peculiar to him, & can not be separed fro him: we make him but an ydoll and a dead thing. As in good sooth, if he gouerne not all creatures, if all things be not vnder his dominion, if all things be not ordered by his power and wisdom: I pray you is it not a rending of him in peeces? Is it not a defacing of his maiestie? Yes surely. So then we must be alwayes fully resolued of this point, that God gouerneth, & that all things are directed by his guiding and prouidence. And we must adde yet further, that he is rightuouse, so as he gouerneth not after a disordered fashyon, nor vnaduisedly, nother is his reigning al only to shewe an absolute power as tirants do, who to get themselues estimatio, take libertie to do wrongfully and crookedly whatsoeuer they themselues list. But Gods power is such, as is rightly ruled by his rightuoufnesse. And haue we once these two points: we must thenceforth be stablished in the hope of the resurrection by the troubles that are in this world. How? VVe see how the wicked doo liue and growe old, we see they leade their dayes in mirth, and make greate good cheere, we see that all things happen as they would wish, bothe in their children and their cattell, and in their household, so as it shuld seeme that God dandeth them in his armes. and therefore we must conclude that there is another iudgement: and so let vs cheere vp our selues with the hope of the comming of our Lord Iesus Christe. VVe see that good men are vexed and troubled here: and yet are they the heires of the world. And where is the inheriting of it? Sometimes they haue not a bit of bread to eat: they be lurches: they call vpon God, and are not deliuered. Therefore wee must thinke that God holdeth backe the shewing of his loue that he beareth towards those that are his, and that he will not as yet in all poynts performe the grace that he hath promised the: to the end that by meanes thereof they might be moued too seeke the heauenly inheritance that is promised the, alwayes laboring and traueling thitherward. So the, wheras of our owne nature we be inclined to stumbling, and to starting out of the way, when wee see things misordered: let the same serue too stablish vs, and let it be as a stroke of the Spurre to pricke vs foreward, that we may drawe still too the sayd heauenly life, and say, well Lord, we see the wicked haue their full scope heere, but yet must not wee enuie their prosperitie, for thy curse wayteth to fall horribly vpo them: and therefore it were much better for vs to be miserable, (so that thou keepe vs mercifully in the meane time) than to be wrapped in the confusion which is redie for those that do now triumph. Yea go too Lord, thou haste promised too be a father to vs: wee call vpon thee, and yet we see not thy help at the first push: wherby wee see well Lord, that this is not the place that we must rest in. It is in heauen, it is in heauen then: for that is the place which thou callest vs vnto. And so let vs not regard this present life, nother let it greue vs to be tossed with many waues and whirlwinds, sith that by that meane our Lord forceth vs to come vp vnto him, as though he spurred vs. Ye see then the principall vse that we ought to put this text vnto. And so, Iob is so farre off heere from ouershooting himself as he hath handled the cheef articles of our fayth, by shewing vs that wee must not fight against Gods prouidence, when it sheweth not it self at the first dash, nor followe the fashyon of the Sadducies in appointing a full perfectnesse of all Gods woorks here bylowe: but contrariwise, alwayes haue an eye to the last resurrection. I ycause that that is the time wherein all things shall be set in their state, and whatsoeuer is now confuzed, shall then be put in dew order. Furthermore if wee be preuented by any temptation, let vs not lose our corage, but let vs returne to the conclusion that Iob maketh heere. For (as I haue sayd already,) wee feele too much by experience how weake we bee, and that we saynt out of hand when we haue any temptation that pincheth vs. Therefore when things go crookedly and ouerthwartly, so, as we be oppressed and the wicked haue the full scope: verely it will greue vs and we shall conceyue such a bitternesse in our hart, as will make vs to enter into disputation as Iob doeth heere. Then shall wee surely fall intoo disputing, for it cannot bee but that wee shall bee troubled at the first syght, and say, what meeneth this geere? what intendeth God to doo? But wee must not abyde there: and therefore when wee haue disputed, and asked what this geere meeneth, let vs come too that which the holie scripture sheweth vs, which is that if God kept so vnchangeable an order here as nothing might be out of square: where should our Paradise bee? what fayth, what hope should we haue more? Howbeeit for so much as our Lord mindeth too traine vs further, he leaueth things in doutfull balance as now, so as we may say, where are we? but
Bb ij. of their

but that is to the intent we should haue an eye to the resurrection. VVherfore let vs not be discouraged although our nature be greatly inclined to many euil temptations: but let vs lerne to resist them, and let our conclusion bee such as Iob maketh heere: that is it to say, that although we haue be shaken at the first brunt, yet neuerthelesse we may cōclude, that God is rightuouse in all his doings: and that although he delay his iudgements, yet for all that he forgoeth the occasion of executing the whē he listeth. For his forbearing of the wicked, is but a tarying til their turne 10 be fully come. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this sentence. Now Iob hauing already spoken of the prosperitie of the wicked, sayeth heere expressly, That they runne after the sound of the Taber and flute, and daunce at the sound of the Organs, and lead their dayes in mirtb and gladnesse, & go downe into the graue in the wrinckling of an eye. Here Iob meeneth to expresse somewhat more than he had doone afore in saying that the wicked liue and growe old, and all things fall out as they would wish: namely, that they also for their part do take the benefite of the time, and as it were besotte themselues with the good things that God 20 sendeth thē. They be two diuerse things to haue helth, ofspring, cattell, greate possessions, riches, and honour: and to take such pleasure in thē as to set ones whole felicitie in them: VVhyso? Abraham was riche, healthie, & strong of bodie, as Iacob reporteth well of it, in that he sayth that his owne dayes were unhappie in cōparifon of the dayes of his fathers. Ye see then that Abraham was strong and in good lyking, and also it was promised him that he should die in a good and lustie old age, whē he was satisfied with 30 liuing here bilowe. He was riche: for although he had no inheritace nor possesiōs: yet had he bothe a greate household, and much cattell as the scripture sheweth. But was he in the meane whyle besotted in them? was he bleared with his riches? No: but he was as a wayfarer in this world he knew that God called him to a further thing, he grouded not himself vpon his owne strength, he was not like those that royst it out and play the looce colts whyle God giueth them lustinesse and helth of bodye: but he was al- 40 wayes as a man well tamed before God, ceasing not too humble himself, so as his examptic may do vs verie good seruice. But when the worldlings and such as looke no further than the earth, haue riches and bodily helth, they become so drunken with it, as they forget themselues and regard God no more. And like as we see that at one table a itayed man will well and soberly take his repaste of that which is there, without misbehauing of himself: and another wil glut himself till he burst, specially if there be store of wine: and as we see some labour nothing so much as to play the very beafts, and it seemeth to themselues that 50 their throte is not wide ynough to guze in wine, but they streyne themselues as it were vpon the racke, to fill their paunches the better: euen so some men may haue greate prosperitie and yet wil not burst out into excessse, but will alwayes hold themselues in feare and awe. But the wicked (as Iob sayeth here) will abuse Gods benefits and gifts, & when he doeth as it were lay the brydle in their necks: then they sing ouer all the feeld, and think not that there is any more subiection for them: inso much as they frisk about at the sound of the Taber and the Flute and there 60 is none other talk with them but of dauncing & making good chere, wherat they play the brute beafts altogether. This was it that Iob mēt to vter in this sentēce. And wheras he maketh vs a discription of the despizers of God, shewing vs them as in a picture: it is to the end we shuld lerne too retire out of such brutishnesse. And therefore when God giueth vs abundance of welth: let vs lerne not to sotte our selues in it, but to walk continually in feare, holding our selues in awe and being watchfull. For (as S. Paule sayeth) wee bee not the children of darknesse. 1. Ibes. 5. 5 God hath inlyghtened vs with his woord, and he will haue vs to walk as at hygh none day. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. Again when God sendeth vs not our ease and pleasures: Let vs vnderstand that he cutteth vs our morsells bycause he seeth that we bee not able too diet our selues. A man will not giue his chyld more to eate than he knowes is meete for him: if he doo he shall cough mee a soole: and euen so doeth God deale with vs. He hath his hand alwayes reached out too doo vs good, and he is no nigard of his expenses as though he were afrayd that he should want himself: but when he seeth our lustes disordered, so as there is no rule nor measure in them: he handleth vs as he himself sees best for vs, by giuing vs a conuenient portion. Then let vs knowe that if we haue not wherewith to make greate cheere, nor wherewith to feede our pleasures: it is Gods dooing too cut vs out our pitāce. For he knoweth what our stomack can brucke, and that abundace would but marre vs. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the second part of this sentēce where it is said, that the wicked runne after the sound of the Taler and the Flute. Neuerthelesse wee see it is no noueltie in the children of this world to exceede measure in the vanities which God condēneth, as in dauncing and such other like loocenesse: it hath ben so at all times. For the diuell (all whose drifts tend to blind men and to drawe them from the regarding of God and from the spirituall life) hath had these knacks from time to time, and men haue willingly folowed that which they haue liked of and which pleased the flesh. Therefore wheras nowadayes we see many men seeke nothing but to royst it, inso muche as they haue none other countenance but in seeking to hoppe and daunce like stray beafts, and to doo such other like things: let vs vnderstand that it is not of late beginning, but that the diuell hath reigned at all times. Howbeit let vs knowe also, that the euil is neuer the more too be excused for the auncietnesse of it. Men haue alwayes doone so: yea, and that was bycause the diuell hath alwayes reigned: but must God therfore bee quite dispossessed? Furthermore (as shall bee declared more fully to morrowe by Gods leaue) it is true that the Flute and the Taber and such other like things are not to be condemned simply of their owne nature: but only in respect of mennes abusing of them, for most commonly they peruert the good vse of them. For certainly the Taber doeth no sooner sounde to make mē merrie, but there is alwayes lightly some vanitie, I say not superfluousse, but beaftly. For behold men are so caried away, as they can not sport thēselues which a moderate mirth, but they fling themselues into the ayre as though they would leape out of themselues. Thus then Iob ment to note heere a cursed mirth and a mirth that God condemne. VVherby we ought too take warning too restreine our selues, and wheras we see there are many whose whole delight is too seeke such pastymes, let vs say, a mischeef on them. And if we wil not haue the same curse too light vpon our selues: let vs lerne to absent our selues from such looce and wanton pastymes: but let vs rather aduisedly restreine our selues, and set God alwayes before our eyes, to the end that he may blisse our mirth, and we so vse his benefits, as we may neuer ceasse to trauell vp too heauenward. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to apply all our mirth to this end, namely that there may be a melodie sounding in vs wherby the name of God may be blisted and glorified in our Lord Iesus Chriſte.

too make vs so too feele them, as wee may bee hartely forie for them, and in returning vnto him desire him to mortifie our whole nature, ruling all our thoughts and affectiōs by his rightuousnesse, and making vs new creatures, to the end we may so passe through this world, as we may not be hindered by any stumblings blocks and by-lets that are in it, nor cumbered and thrust out of the way by the miseries that we haue to indure here, nor by the aduerfities that God sendeth, nor tempted by the prosperitie of the wicked: but that we may fight stoutly against all temptations, euē till he gather vs intoo his heauenly rest, and make vs inioy the inheritance that he hath promised vs, whereof we bee yet destitute for a time, that our sayth and hope might be exercized. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the world, reducing the poore ignorant persons from the miserable captiuite and bondage, &c.

The.lxxx.Sermon, which is the third vpon the.xxj. Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the reste of the declaration of the xij.verse, and so forth of the texte that here followeth.

13. They spend their dayes in vvelth, and sodenly they go dovvne to the graue.
 14. And yet they say vnto God, depart from vs: for we desire not to knowv thy vvayes.
 15. VWho is the almightie, that vve should serue him? or vvhat shall it profit vsto pray vntoo him?

I was yesterday declared, that Iob here speaketh of those that abuse the benefits which God bestoweth vpon them during this mortall life, so as they be caried away with pleasure, and are as it were dronken therewith. And hereby we ought to take warning so to reioyce, that there be always a measure in vs, and that wee bridle our selues. For the thing that ought moste too put vs in remembrance of God, is the receyuing of the benefits that he bestoweth vpon vs, which thing ought to drawe vs vnto him and make vs too loue him. Contrariwise we see that they which reioyce without measure and ordre, forget God, and are so glad that they thinke no more on him, neyther will any more be subiect vntoo him. So then let vs folow this modestie or meane that I haue spoken of, and learne so to moderate all our pleasures, that we bee not caried away with the world. And therewithall also, bycause here is mention made of the flute, of the taborer, harpe, and other instruments of musike: let vs note, that the things which of their owne nature bee good, ought not by vs to be put too an euill vse. As musike of it self cannot be condemned: but forasmuch as the world doeth almost alway abuse it, we ought to bee so much the more circumspect, and this place warneth vs thereof. VVee see at this day that they which vse musike do swell with poyson against God, they become hardharted, they will haue their songs, yea and what maner of songs? full of all villanie and ribauldrie. And afterward they fall to dauncing, which is the cheefest mischeef of all. For there is alway such vnchaste behauiour in dauncing: that of it self and as they abuse it, (too speake the truth at one word,) it is nothing else but an enticement too whoredome. So then it is not without a cause, that Iob intending too declare that the children of this world, and the dispisers of God doo passe measure in their reioycings, speaketh of the sounde of the taborer, of the flute, and of other instruments of musike. As I haue already touched, he doeth not so condemne these things, as though they were euill of their owne nature: but he considereth the abuse that therein is committed: for men do neuer so well kepe measure, as to vse musike modestly. This vice then is here to bee noted, to the end that we may so thinke of it, as wee may take some profit thereby. To be breefe, let vs as long as we list excuse the vanities that are committed in musike: yet do we see that the spirit of God condemneth them, bycause that men delight to much in them: and when they set their delight and pleasure in these base & earthlie things, they thinke not a whit vpon God, nother do they ascribe the whole vnto him.

This is the summe of that which we haue to note out of this place. Now at length it is sayd, that God will suffer the despisers of his maiestie too go too their graue in a minute of an boure, after that they haue spent their whole life in greate ioye and pleasure. This thing also is very well noted in the threescore and thirteenth Psalme, although he vseth an other similitude there, which is, that the wicked go too their death without any impeachement or hinderance, and that they haue nother bands nor cords. And therby the Prophet ment to shew, that the children of God in this world doo nothing but pine away and hang the wings: for sicknesse and diseases, and other such like things are as it were bands that drawe vs vnto death, and pull vs backe again from it. On the one side, when we be sicke, we see that death threateneth vs: for we are thereby taught how fraile a thing our life is: yea they are all of them messengers which God sendeth too saye vntoo vs: Prepare your selues: for you haue nothing certaine nor sure in this worlde. These then are the bands of death which drawe vs vntoo him.

And again we go on pinyng and cannot die: yea a man would thinke sometye that wee should not liue half a yeare to an end at the moste, and yet we go forth on, and in the meane season the disease continueth still with vs. This we see in the children of God, but in that whyle the wicked spend their tyme in mirth and ioye, yea they are lustie and full of courage: and when they come to their death, it seemeth that (euē as they would wish) they lay them downe to sleepe. This will seeme very strange: but let vs kepe in remembrance, that which hath be already declared: that is to wete, how Iob ment to shewe, that although God punish not all trespasses here in this world: yet must we not thinke that he is a sleepe, nor that he hath giuen ouer his office: And why? bycause he deferreth to giue iudgement vntill this presente life be paste. Yee see then how we must list vp our mindes about this fraile life, knowing that when a man hath in this world gotten all that hee would desire: yet ceaseth he not too bee miserable, nother must wee therefore attribute any felicitie vnto him. And why? because he must come before his iudge. And therefore let vs

let vs not be tempted too become like vntoo those that despise God, and giue themselues too sporte and plaie, so as they become dronken in their pleasures. But let vs rather desire to be miserable, and too taste of Gods goodnesse, and be contented therewith, knowing that our chiefest felicitie, is that he loue vs and bee mercifull vnto vs: & that we lerne to looke vnto this heavenly heritage. This is it whereof the faithfull are admonished in this place. Now herepon Iob sheweth, that the wicked do vtterlie reiecte God. They say vnto him, depart from vs: for we desire not to knowe thy wayes. Truth it is that the wicked wil not spew out such blasphemie as to renoūce God: but in effect they do well declare how they passe litle of him, and desire nothing else but to be rid from his subiection: and although they cannot bring that to passe, yet they labour to go as farre from him as they cā: this we see. And for profe therof, when men liue without remorse of conscience, and willingly and wittingly become brute beastes, so as they make no differēce betwene good and euill, but thinke that all things are lafull: is it not as much as too say vnto God, departe from vs? For if God be nere vs, we must haue him before our eyes as our iudge, nother must we thinke or say anie thing but as if it were in his presence, nother must we attēpte any thing but as thogh we wold be iudged by him. Then as for all such as would haue libertie to liue as they list: It is all one as if they wold driue God farre off from them, and haue none acquaintance with him. And verely the next wordes, (namely we will none of thy wayes) declare the thing which we haue heere to vnderstand. For to be neere vnto God, or to go farre from him, is not referred too the maiestie of God: For his diuine being sheweth not it self, it is not visible vnto Creatures. True it is that we may well haue some vnderstanding of it, and we may knowe that his being is infinite, and spreadeth out euery where: but yet notwithstanding the cheef knowledge that we haue of God, is by his vertues, wherethrough he communicateth himself vnto vs, and cheefely in that he telleth vs his will, and teacheth vs what maner of one he is, and sheweth vs how we ought to walke, and how our life ought to be ruled. Behold, we be then neere vnto him, when we suffer our selues to be taught by his woord, acknowledging that it is he which speaketh and sheweth himself familiarly vnto vs, too the end wee should come vnto him, and there rest our selues. Furthermore when men will not yeeld themselues teachable, but refuze all instruction, and desire to be stark doltes, so as if a man bring them any good doctrine they make no account of it: then in stede of drawing neere vntoo God, men withdrawe themselues from him. And therefore I sayd, that Iob declareth here the thing which he had intended afore: that is too wit, that inasmuch as the wicked and the despisers of God, are loth to submit themselues to Gods wayes: they withdrawe themselues from him as much as they can. Therefore, we will none of thy wayes (say they) that is to say, get thee away from vs. And this is a text wherof wee may gather a good and profitable lesson. For first of all it is shewed vs here, what is the roote and foundation of good life: namely too haue God before our eyes. True it is that we cannot eschewe him: no: but it behooueth vs on our parte, too come neere vntoo him. And this is the cause why that when the holy scripture intendeth to signifie that a man hath led a holy life, it sayeth that he hath had God before his eyes: and contrariwise

Gen. 5. e. 22. when it sayeth that a man hath turned his backe to God,

Iere. 2. f. 27. it sheweth that he regarded not God, or that he had no

Eccl. 32. f. 33. mind of him, and it is all one as if it were sayd, that a man is runne astray, and giuen ouer to all euill, and finally past recouerye. This maner of speaking therefore is a notable thing. Why so? wee be inclined alreadye by nature vntoo all vncleanesse. And how can wee get out of it? It is a hard thing for men too alter themselues and too offer force and violence too all their pleasures and delights, so as a man might knowe them to be renewed, and say that they bee no more the men that they were. This I say is a hard thing. For a man will alwayes run farre astray intoo euil, if there bee not a wonderfull power and force too make him turne head, and to giue ouer his owne will, witte and reason. And (as I haue sayd afore) men will continually go forward vnto euill vntill they bee reformed. And who is he that shall reforme them? They cannot do it of themselues, nother is there any creature that can bring it to passe. Therefore God must be fayne too worke. There is no way too helpe it but Gods presence, so as a man may be brought to say in himself, go too, it behoueth mee too walke before my God, who is my iudge, and I can by no meanes escape his hand. If a man haue that consideration: then may he fight against all his wicked lustes, so that whereas he had bene giuen too all euill; he shall bee ready to followe all good. Again besides that our wicked affections do cary vs away, we be also so blinded that enery of vs maketh himself beleue, that euill is good and we discern not vntill God inlighten vs. For so long as we walke one after another, we be like mice in the chaffe, as the prouerb sayeth: that in too say, there is no order amongs vs, but euery man will abuse his neyghbour: we are like wretched beastes: he that goeth before guideth the way very ill, like a poore blinde man, and is like too deceiue them that go as they were wont to go: for we make custome a lawe. Then is there no other means too shew vs which is the right way, but too looke vnto God, and to haue him neere vnto vs. You see two reasons that do well declare vnto vs, that this thing is more than necessary for vs. Let euery man thē present him self before God, let vs drawe neere vnto him, and let vs take heed that we estrange not our selues from him: for this is the only bridle that can tame vs, and that can subdue vs too that which is good: whereas otherwise we should take a beastly libertie, which would drawe vs to euill. And again, God which giueth vs wisdome and discretion, knoweth very well what is good for vs, and what is necessary to stay vs, too the end that none of vs should wander in his owne foliish fantasies, but folow Gods plain will which is the rule of all rightiounesse and equitie. So then will we walke as it becommeth vs? Let vs begin at this ende, that is too say, let vs drawe neere vnto our God. How shall wee drawe neere vntoo him? First let vs knowe that there is nothing hid from him, that all things must come to account before him, and that he must be the iudge euen of our thoughts also: and thus much concerning the first. Farthermore, let vs knowe, that God will iudge vs by his worde: and that it is not without a cause named a sharpe swoorde with twoo edges, and that it must examine the most secret thoughts, and that there is no mary within the bones, nor any thing so secreete, that shall not bee examined by this worde. Therefore when wee knowe this, it will bee a meanes too make vs drawe neere vntoo God, that wee may alwayes haue him before our eyes, and attempt nothing but vnder his obedience. So then folowing that which is here conteyned, whereas they which like too be ignorant in the wayes of God, and shut their eyes at the lighte, doo thrust God from them as much as they can possibly: let vs seeke to knowe thē. And hereby we be taught how we ought to esteeme

Heb. 4. 12.

the worde of God. For our cheefest felicitie is that God draw neere vnto vs, and we vnto him. And how shall this be done, and by what meanes? It is done when he on his parte commeth downe to vs, deliuereth his worde vnto vs, and doeth testifie vnto vs that he will dwell amongst vs: and when we receiue this worde, it is as much as if we receiued God, and did him homage, too the end that he might raygne ouer vs. For as much the as God is present with vs by the means of his worde, we see that there can no greater misfortune happē vnto vs, than whē God suffreth vs to wāder in our own fantasies without his guiding, & whē we haue not the doctrine of saluatiō by the which he draweth vs vnto him. And cōtrariwise the greatest and most inestimable treasor that we haue, is that God gouerneth vs, that we be taught his will, that we haue a certaine testimonie that he will receiue vs vnto him self as his people. But this the world knoweth not & therefore so much the more is this place well to be noted of vs. Farthermore let vs know, that all they which are stubborne, and cānot bow their necks vnder Gods yoake, do as much as thrust him far from them. Truth it is that they think themselues greatly iniuried when men call them mortall enimies to God, and say that they seke nothing else but to thrust him out of all authoritie, that they might more easely tread him vnder fote. Oh (say they) we mean no such thing, yea but will they make the holy Ghost a liar, who hath plainly taught, that all they which will not submit themselues to the doctrine of saluation, fight against god to the vttermost of their power, & wold banish him out of the world, and cannot abide that he should raigne, and enjoy his authoritie? you see what the holy Ghost sayth of thē For as much then as the case standeth so: if we will not be guiltie of such a sacrilege, let vs learne to humble our selues: and whensoever God sendeth his worde amongst vs, let vs tremble at it, and therby declare that we seke nothing else but to be present with our God, always to beholde him, and to walke as they that know very well that we must make an accompt of our whole life before him, and that we can not escape his hādes. And moreouer let vs long for the presence of God. For it is not inough that we haue our eyes vpon God: but we must desire to be alwaies in his sight & vnder his guiding, for sometime the most wicked will haue an eye vnto God, but it shall be as the galee slaues doo, who fall to rowing when they see themselues fast chayned and surely beaten: then they must needs do it, but it is of force and constrainte. So the wicked when God speaketh, do knowe that he is present there: but if it laye in them they woude destroy his Godhead which is against them, they woude also thrust God out of his kingdom, or else they woude flee from him, as the holie scripture reporteth of them, that they shall say vnto the mountains, Couer vs. You see how the wicked do alwaies flee from the presence of God, because it is terrible vnto them. Now on our behalf (as I haue sayd) we must not only knowe that he is neere vnto vs, but we must desire always to be in his presence, knowing that our state and condition is miserable, when God doth not beholde vs. VVhether can we go but into destructiō, when God is not our safegarde? For if we think to saue our selues, wher is our assurance? what guides are we? So then let vs lerne to praye vnto our God, that he neuer departe from vs what soeuer happen: And that we may so do, let vs pray him to make vs feele and taste the infinite goodnesse which is in him, that through his inlightening of vs by his worde we may knowe that he is the iudge of the whole world, and that we must render an accompt before him, not only of all our doings (as we haue sayd) but also of all our thoughts. Truth it is that by this only we cannot be drawn vnto him with our good willes. VVhat must we do then? we must acknowledge him too be our father, as in deed he sheweth himself so. VVhē we know him so good and pitifull: it is certaine that we will seek boldly to come neere vnto him: and when we be come thither, we wil desire nothing els but to cōtinue there euē to the end, and by no meanes in the worlde to swarue frō him. Thus much we haue to note out of this place: namely that not only we should haue God before our eyes, but that also we should desire him to looke vpon vs and too guide vs. Now after that Iob hath here shewed forth such blasphemie of the wicked and despizers of God: he addeth moreouer, that they say: what is the almightie that we should serue him, and what profit shall we get by praying vnto him? Here Iob setteth out the pride that is in all the faithles and wicked men. And it is a place worthie to be noted: for the holy scripture sheweth, that the principall vice that is in all the wicked, is this pride: as contrariwise humilitie is the chiefest vertue that is in the faithfull. And why? for if we haue this humilitie, besides that therby we learne to be displeasēd with our selues, yea wholly to cōdemne our selues, and to spoile our selues of all opiniō of vertue, and to come vnto our God to seke our whole felicitie in him: besides this (I say) we shall know that it behoueth vs to be subiects vnto him that hath all rule ouer vs. You see then how humilitie is the mother and roote of al vertues. On the contrarie parte, when pride beareth rule in men, they must needs in their whole life be frowarde, and wicked. Now this pride is here attributed too the faithlesse. For first of all they conceiue meruelously of them selues, they trust in their owne wisdom. And we see that they cā neuer come to an end, bicause they are so puffed vp with presumptiō: For they will be wise, yea in despite of God, and they think they should abase themselues to much, if they should forsake their owne iudgement for to harken to that which is set forth vnto them in the name of God. And farther, haue they such confidence in their wisdom? Then will they giue themselues the bridle in all their delights and pleasures: & if they be reprovēd therfore, they think they are greatly iniuried. You see the that the faithlesse are always drowned in presumptiō: & for this cause the prophet Habacuk setteth this hautinesse against faith, signifying therby that faith alwaies leadeth men to a true humilitie and obedience: and contrariwise that a faithlesse man must needs alwaies exalt and lift vp himself against God: for it is impossibill for him to do otherwise. And therefore it is not without cause, that Iob here speaking of the wicked, armeth thē with such pride, that they think they should not submit theselues to God: but say, who is the Almighty that we should serue him? Truth it is they will not vtter such words with their mouth, excepte God discouer them: as sometimes it happeneth that the ypocrites spew out horrible things. And then who is the cause therof? it is God that constraineth them. For they woude gladly hide themselues, to the end that their filthinesse might not be knowen to the worlde: but God will not suffer it, according to that which is said, that they, who when they know God, did not glorifie him as God, are deliuered vnto a reprobate mynde, so as they are giuen too all wickednesse, and get themselues an euil name through their owne follie. God then will sometime suffer the wicked to speake as is here sayd of them: but although they holde their peace, and make goodly protestations that they will serue God: yet in their heart they beare such spite against God, that they wish he had none authoritie ouer them, saying in themselues, what is the Almighty that we should serue him? As for example, the worst men that can bee chosen, will say at the first, that there there is one God, and that it is meete he should be honored of vs. Yea in generall termes they will in deede confesse so much: but whē they come to the clozing (as they say) and that a man goeth about to rule them, and sayeth vnto them: what hath not God declared his wil vnto vs, in what sort he will haue vs to walke? then you shall see they will not heare on that side. If a man would pull a couetous person from his couetousnesse, or reprove an ambitious man of his vice, or a whoremonger, dronkard, or blasphemor of their faultes: by and by they kicke against God: for they would sayne haue full libertie to do euill. And although they do not vtter these wordes with their mouth: what is the Almighty? yet do they swel like roades, and will not yeede themselves to be subiect vnto God. Here then we see that Iob accuseth not onely them which with open mouth haue vttered this blasphemie whereof he speaketh: but also all those that are so swollen in themselves (as they say) and are filled with such arrogancie, that they will not humbly submit themselves to God, nor acknowledge it meete that he should haue foueraintie ouer them. To be short, if we will not be condemned with these men: we muste compare God with our selues: that is, for asmuch as he is our creatour, we must acknowledge, that he ought to haue the whole dominion, and all things ought to be subiect vnto him. And thus much more for an Item: that seing he hath redeemed vs by the death and passion of his onely begotten Sonne, he hath well deserued too haue all foueraintie ouer vs. And now that he hath purchased vs so dearly, we must no more be addicted to our selues, but be wholly dedicated to his seruice. Furthermore for as much as he is our father, we muste bee his children. And for this cause also he sayeth by his Prophete Malachie: if I be your Lord where is the feare? if I be your father where is the loue and the honour that you owe vnto me. By this God declareth that we can not be truely his subiects, vntill we acknowledge the right that he hath ouer vs, and giue him all his titles and dignities. He is our Mayster and Lorde: we must then giue him all reuerence: and seing that we acknowledge him to be our father, it is very meete that we should honour him, yea with a true loue. For a childe, (if he be not such a wicked monster as euery man abhorreth and detesteth,) will honour his father, which it is certaine he can not do, vnlesse he loue him. You see then how we must looke vnto God. And when wee be so come to our selues, (alas poore creatures that wee bee,) what is there in man whereof he may glorie? There is nothing in him but cursednesse. And yet for all that, how hath God honored vs? He hath created vs after his owne image and likenesse: & although this image be blotted out in vs by the sinne of Adam, and we bring nothing frō our mothers wombe but the curse: yet had God created vs after his owne image. And this is one very great and excellent honor. And beside that, he hath vouchsafed to redeeme vs by the blood of his onely begotten Sonne Iesus Christe, whom he would not spare. And moreover he hath called vs to be of his housholde: and not only to his seruice, but as his owne children and heyres. VVhen we shall then haue made these comparisons, if we had harts of yron or steele, should they not (I pray you) be softened? Yf we should swel with arrogancie so that we should burst withall, ought not all this poyson to be purged, and we with true humilitie come to the obedience of God? And for this cause, when he intendeth to make vs willing to obey his commaundements, and to acknowledge the auctoritie that he hath ouer vs, he vseth this preface in his lawe: I am the Eternal thy God. VVhen he sayeth I am the Eternal, he bringeth vs backe to our creation to shew vs, what we are, I haue fashioned you (sayeth he) of nothing as I haue created this world, and you are but a parte thereof. You muste then holde your being of me: and if you do me homage, and knowe me for your creator, you will tremble vnder me. Nowe when he hath thus spoken, he sayeth farther, I am thy God, to shew that he is a father of his people, and of all those whom he wil instruct by his worde. And this fatherhood ought (as I haue sayd) to bring vs to a louing reuerence. And then thirdly he rehearseth the benefites by the which he had made his people bounden vnto him. VVell, now there are greater and more excellent benefites bestowed vpon vs: for he hath not drawn vs from an earthly bondage, but from the depth of hell: and that not by Moyses, but by our Lorde Iesus Christ. Seing it is so, we see how wee be by all meanes bounden vnto him. And therefore it is not meete that henceforth we should be any more addicted to our selues, but euery mā should be ready wholly to dedicate himselfe to the seruice of God. And concerning this that Iob addeth moreover, it is certaine if wee knowe what is taught vs in the holy Scripture, we will not say any more, what profite is there in praying vnto him? Our Lord might well say vnto vs, serue me, do that which I commaunde you, without setting forth vnto vs any hye or reward: for we are bounden vnto him, as we are taught: when you haue done al that shall be commaunded you, yet are you vnprofitable seruants: that is to say, God shall neuer be in our dette, but we are bounden to giue our selues wholly vnto him, God might then simple comaunde without adding any promise: and yet he doth applie himself vnto vs, and seing wee coulde not bee brought to serue him vnlesse he made vs some promise: when he sayeth serue me, he addeth and I will be your father, I will be the defender of your life, I will ayde you in all your necessities. And beside this, he is not content with all these promises: for in deede they should not auayle vs, vnlesse he went farther: which thing he doth when he sayeth, I will forgiue you your sinnes, I will receyue you to me in mercie, I will blot out all your iniquities: and afterward I will vphold you, and although you be frayle, and serue me not altogether as you ought to do, yet will I take well in worth this halfe seruice that you do mee: for I am your father: I will not straightly examine your doings. Thus many promises then doth God make vs to bind vs vnto him, hereby it is seene that we haue none excuse to say, what profite is it to serue God? for though we flee from him, yet can wee not be without a mayster. They that wil walke at randon, and (as they say) with the bridle let loose, spite of their teeth they shall serue, but it shall be their owne lustes, and the Diuell. The heathen men could say that the most miserable seruice, and straightest bondage that is amongst men, is to be subiect to their owne vices: lo thus haue the Heathenmen themselves spoken of these diuclish mistresse the lustes. Is it not then more than shame for vs, beyng taught by the woorde of God, that we wil be halfe Kings, & haue such an vnbrideled libertie as there can be nothing more vnruely, then eue to do what we lust? Now it is certaine (as I haue sayde) that we could be in no more miserable and cursed bondage. And beside that, the Diuell hath the whole rule ouer vs, so that wee can not escape his subiection, when wee will be exempted from rightuousnesse. And this is it that S. Paule meaneth when he sayeth in the 6. to the Romanes, you were freed onely from rightuousnesse. He vseth this similitude of bondmen, who in times past were franchysed that they might be no more subiect to their maisters, but bee of a franke and free state and condition. And fo, (sayeth he) when men had not Iesus Christ, they were freed: so as they had libertie too do euill, and were not subiect too the rightuoufnesse of God, but what then? were you therefore in true libertie? Nay, cleane contrary, (sayeth he) you serued sinne, whiles you tooke no hold vpon the rightuoufnesse of God. And now in what case are you? he directeth his talke to the faithful, and sayeth, you are ashamed when you thinke vpon your life that is passed: now you know that the Diuell had rule ouer you, and that it was to your ruine and destruction. You are ashamed in your selues, when you call too remembrance that you were so forsaken of God, and wandred like brute beastes. Such is the state and condition of all those ci. at exempt themselves from the seruice of God. On the contrarie part, when we serue our God, it is certaine that that seruice is more honorable than to enioy a kingdom, as here before hath bene declared. God doth not call vs to the end that we shou.d be in the state and condition of seruants: but to take vs for his owne children. Seing then it is so, wee see very well that it is no losse labour to giue our selues to the seruice of God, neither muste wee any more alledge and say, what profite shall we get thereby? seing that our Lorde and maister doth tell vs, that all our blessednesse is to walke in his feare. And contrarywise there can no greater misfortune happē vnto vs, than to exempt our selues from his seruice? Thus much then we haue to note. Furthermore lette vs extende this same farther, as Iob also doth: for he meaneth, that the wicked when they are in prosperitie, giue themselves too sporte and play, and thinke that it is all one to liue well or ill, and making a mocke at God, thinke that he fauoreth thē, if at the first stroke he do not throwe them downe. And howe? when God spareth the wicked that passe their bounds in their wicked doings: therevpon they become harde harted. And why? they thinke that all goeth well with them when they doo not perceiue Gods plagues: they begin to despise and to rebell (sayth Salomon) you see then how the wicked thinke that there is no profit in seruing of God, & that it is much better for them to giue themselves to euill, when God at the first doth not execute his iudgements. Now on the contrarie part, we must thus conclude in our selues, as the Prophet Esay speaketh of it, say yee, surely it shall go well with the rightuous. Therefore when wee see a confusion of all things in this worlde, and it seemeth vnto vs but a mockerie to serue God: yet muste we stil continue in this sure perswasion that our Lord and maister will not disapoynt them that wayte vpon him, and that they haue not bene led with a vayne hope, in looking for a reward at his hand: but that they may say with Dauid, the Lord is my reward as also he sayeth vnto Abraham, Abraham walke before me, for I am thine exceeding great rewarde. Thus must we fight against this temptation which is very cōmon, namely that men begin to mistrust the promise of God, when they see the wicked prosper, while the poore faithfull are afflicted and tormented on euery side. VVel there is yet another woord to note. which is, that after that Iob hath spoken of the seruice of God, in the second place he setteth here prayer, that is to say, the reuerence that men do vnto God in humbling themselves vnder him, and in making request vnto him. It is not without cause that Iob did vse this worde. Truth it is that God will be honored and serued of vs in charitie, brotherly loue, temperance, humilitie, & other such like things: he will haue vs to loue one another, to seeke to relieue our neighbours, and euery man to submit himself to that which is cōmaunded him, as his calling requireth: and to liue together, and euery man to applie himself to his labour without deceyuing any man.

This is the seruice of God, and they are all of the acceptable sacrifices vnto him: but yet to serue God well, wee must begin at this end, namely to honour him in giuing him the prayse that is due vnto him: and that is done by supplication and prayer: As for example: if a man walke without doing any euill, so as he can not be accused that he hath deceyued any man, that he hath bene cruell, that he hath troubled his neyghbour, nor can bee conuincied either of whoredome, or of drunkēnesse, but (to be short) hath absteyned from all notable vices in the sight of men, and yet haue nother religion, nor sayth in his harte, but hath quite forsaken God: shall his life (for all this) be accepted of God? No: for it is nothing but vanitie: all this is nothing but filthinesse before God. And why? what is it to haue giuen vnto men that which appertayneth vnto them: and to deceyue God, & robbe him of his preeminence and authoritie? And shoulde not God haue a greater priuiledge without comparifon, than al creatures? So then it is not without cause that Iob minding to shew what is the true seruice of God, putteth downe this speciall kinde of seruice (to wete prayer,) when we come to present our selues before him in prayer. According to this, the holy scripture sheweth that it is the chiefe sacrifice which God requireth of vs: as it is sayd in the fiftith Psalme, that he hath refused al the ceremonies, wherwith the hypocrites make a shew of seruing him. For whē they haue done many goodly outward things: they thinke that God is greatly bounde to heare them. VVhat is it then that God requireth of vs? Call vpo me in the day of thy neede, & I will heare thee: and so shalt thou glorifie mee. The chiefe seruice therefore that God requyareth of vs, is that we call vpon him, knowing that when we come vnto him in truth, he will make vs partakers of all his benefites, and so gouerne vs by his spirite, that we shall neuer be bereft of his graces. For this cause then Iob minding to shewe what is the seruice of God, sayeth that to pray vnto him is a thing moste excellent of all. To be short, wee learne hereby, that if wee intend to leade a well disposed life, and suche a one as God alloweth and accepteth, wee muste first of all put our trust in him, knowing that wee bee wretched creatures, when wee haue not recourse vnto his goodnesse. But contrarywise if we stay our selues vpon it, wee shall want nothing that he knoweth to be expedient for our saluation. Furthermore lette vs take heede that we giue good example to all men, that wee be not cruell to our neighbours, but rather indeuer to helpe them at all times and in all caces, bearing with the weake, and communicating the things that we haue, vnto the needie. VVhen our life is thus ruled: that is a true seruing of God. But if wee robbe God of his honour and make a pretence to serue him, and yet liue like Cattes and Dogges among our selues: it is true that with our mouth wee shall make protestation that wee serue God, but it will appeare in deede that we are his mortall enemies, and that there is nothing in vs but rebelliousnesse, and that wee do nothing but make warre against him all our life long.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our fauts, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue heretofore done, to the ende we may be sorie for them, and therewithall seeke the remedie in him: so that being purged and clenzed from our finnes, wee may seeke nothing els but to cleaue vnto his rightuoufnesse: And that we may so do, let vs alwayes looke vnto him, knowing well that he hath placed vs in this world to the end that we should alwayes go forwarde vnto him, yea in suche forte as we doubt not but that he hath a fatherly care ouer vs. And in the meane season let vs desire to be instructed by his woorde, and that he would alwayes lighten vs, not onely in our outward workes, but also in all our thoughts and affectiōs, so that with harte and minde we may be wholly giuen to him, to the ende that his holy name may be glorified in our whole life. That it may please him too graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the worlde, &c.

The lxxxj. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the .xxj. Chapter.

16. Their prosperitie is not in their ovvne hande: let the intent of the vicked be farre from me.
 17. How is the candle of the vicked put out? and their destruction commeth vpon them, and God deuideth their lines in his vvrath.
 18. So that they be as the chaffe before the vvinde, and as the stubble in the vvhitlevinde.
 19. The Lorde hideth his strength for his Sonnes, and payeth him, and he shall see it.
 20. His eyes shall see his destruction, he drinketh of the furie of the Almightye.
 21. And vvhath pleasure leaueth he in his house? he seeth his dayes shortened.

WE haue before shewed what the minde of Iob is: that is to wit, that the iudgemēt of god in this world are not so apparant to the eye, that a man may therevpon certainly conclude, that according as every man liueth well or ill, so is he punished, or receyueth at God his hand his due wages: but rather that in this transitorie life there is a confusion of things, so that the wicked liueth at ease, and the godly is tormented all the dayes of his life. And yet for all that, Iob doth acknowledge that God ceaseth not to be a righteous iudge, and that men should not stay vpon the present estate of things, and that it is no true felicitie which the wicked enjoy, whiles God winketh at their faults in sparing them. VVee see then in a brieve summe the discourse that Iob maketh here: and it is a thing very profitable. For first of all, when we consider the matters of this worlde, it is a very harde thing to perswade vs that God doth guyde them as he thinketh best, and that men are so vnder his hande and gouernance, that they muste needes come to an accompt before him: this I say can not enter into our heads: or els if at any time wee do perceyue it, yet are we not fully perswaded therein. For we see howe the hypocrites thinke to deceyue God. And on the contrarie parte also when we suffer any harme, or when wee see that things are not well ordered, and that God suffereth the wicked to passe their boundes, so as it seemeth that he mindeth not to punish them: we begin to doubt, and enter into terrible thoughts, saying: VVhat? if God had any care of the worlde, and things were guyded by him, should wee not see an other maner of gouernment than we do? thus much then for one poynt. And againe forasmuch as wee be carnall, if God do not worke according to our minde, we thinke he shal neuer come in time: and if we see not his iudgemēt to day, we thinke to morowe it will be to late, and we can not haue such pacience and quietnesse in our selues, as to say, God knoweth the conuenient time, he will execute his iudgements when he shall see good, it pertayneth not vnto vs to appoynt him the day nor the houre: that lieth not in our hands. And why? because we be fleshy. So much the more then must we remember this lesson that is here containyd: that is to wit, that wee passe aboue all this worlde, and that our fayth surmount the things here beneath, that when wee see the wicked to bee in prosperitie, and the good to be maruelously afflicted, the same do not stay vs, nor so hinder vs that it should make vs to faynt: but let vs lifte vp our selues by fayth, that we may know: wel, it is true that God so letteth loose the bridle to the wicked that a man would thinke their life happie: contrarywise we see the good and godly to be tormented, and to be in payne and anguish, so as a man would thinke that God had forsakē them, and that he thought no more of them, but let vs tarry his leysure, & go on foreward. Thus must we practise this doctrine that is here taught vs by Iob. Now we haue seene wherefore he thus reasoneth, that is, because his friends would make him beleue that he was a wicked man, for that he was so afflicted by the hande of God. This was a grieuous temptation for him and very offensive. VVee muste then arme our selues with this that is here set before vs, to the ende that if God visite vs, and we be handled roughly of him, we may not be so oppressed with confusion, that despayre get the vpper hande of vs: but let vs know that God ceaseth not to loue vs and to pitie vs although he shew himself so rough for a time. Thus you see how in the second place we must applie this doctrine to our selues. Now let vs note things particularly. Iob here protesteth, that although the wicked bee not punished at the first fault, yet ought no man therefore to thinke them happy, for he knoweth that their felicitie shall not continue, but that God shall make an ende of it: Their prosperitie (sayeth he) is not in their owne hande. As if he should say, you reason that God dealeth with every man according to their deserts: but now wee see the cleane cōtrarie, so that I thinke the wicked shal not escape one whit the better cheape. And why? for they bee not Lordes of their owne state (as they say) but God holdeth them in a bridle, & he can depriue them of all their pleasures, and of the things which they thinke to make to a full and perfect felicitie: yea they are so blinded in the selues, and so puffed vp with pride, as they thinke themselves half Angels, and to be brieve, do reckon themselves to be out of all daunger. VVell, their prosperitie is not in their owne hande: that is to say, they deceyue themselves with a vaine imagination, and they do but dreame, when they say their life is so happie. Therefore their intent is farre from me: that is to say, I will not be blinded with this present felicitie that me do see in the wicked, as they that are made dronken with it. VVee see then what Iob ment to declare by these woordes: And therefore that we may the better profite in this doctrine, lette vs note, that when we see the wicked preuayle, God holdeth a secrete bridle in their mouthes, so that all that they haue to day, shal be taken from them to morrow: and they haue nothing in their owne power. If this were well printed in our hart, we should not be so troubled, as we be, with the things, which we beholde with our eyes. And why? because we thinke that what soeuer we see to day, shoulde continue for euer. True it is that we will graunt that the world goeth rounde, and that things are chaunged every minute of an houre, and that nothing is certaine, nor nothing is sure and constant: wee do affirme it playnely ynough with our mouth, but wee thinke it not with our harte.

harte. And that it is so, if to day we be in prosperitie: our head is so incombred with it, that wee thinke all is ours, and wee make the reckoning without our holste. If wee haue any affliction, then wee say, and will it alwayes bee thus? wee thinke we shall neuer see an ende of it. If at any time wee be grieued with the prosperitie of the wicked, wee imagine that they shall neuer come too decay: and if we stande in feare of them, we are taken with such feare, that we thinke there is no remedie: and if any man say vnto vs, let vs abide patiently, and God shall prouide: we can not stay our selues vpon Gods prouidence. Thus we see how present things do carie vs away, and wee are so encombred with them, that wee haue no stay in our mindes, neyther to call vpon God, nor to committe our selues to him, nor to know that he will prouide for things in due time and place. So muche the more diligently must wee learne this doctrine, where it is sayde, that the prosperitie of the wicked is not in their owne hande: that is to say, that men may be in prosperitic, but their life hangeth by a threede (as wee haue seene here before) and all that which they thinke they haue, they haue it but by way of borowing, and in a moment all shall be taken fro them. Let vs know this: and when wee know it, if God bestowe his benefites vpon vs concerning this presente life, let vs acknowledge ali to come of him: yea and bee as readie to be spoyled of them, as we were to be clothed with them, beholde Lorde, thou haste giuen me where-with too liue: but I am not certayne and sure thereof, I must not make mine account to enioy it for euer, but so long as it shall bee thy good will and pleasure. Thus it shall come to passe, that the faithfull in possessing things shall be as if they possessed them not as S. Paule sayeth: For they do not perswade themselues that the things are theirs for euer: they know that they may become poure when it shall please God, and nothing shall be straunge vnto them when it shall happen. As also on the contrary parte, if God sende vs pouertie, let vs thinke thus: well Lord thou haste riches in thy hande, and thou couldest bestow them vpon vs, if thou diddest see it good: in the meane season lette it bee thy pleasure to feede vs, and as thou seeest our neede, vouchsafe to helpe vs, and suffer vs not to be afflicted beyonde measure. Also when we see the wicked to glorie in their wealth, it is nothing: lette vs know that that which they thinke they haue in hande, they haue it not. And why? Bicause our Lorde is aboue them. This is it that we muste keepe in remembrance. And furthermore when it is sayd, let the intent of the wicked be farre from vs: let vs learne, that wee must not be as it were in the darke to fall a sleepe in things present, and to stande too much in our owne conceyte for our wealth and aboundance, nor be angrie with God if he handle vs not after our owne minde. We must not then become such: for what is the intet of the wicked? it is that when God sendeth them the thing that they desire, they are so puffed vp with pride, as a man can no lenger beare them, they will not acknowledge themselves any more to bee mortall men, but they exalte themselues aboue their degree, and ascende so high, that in the ende they muste needes fall and breake their necke: a man shall finde nothing in them but arrogancie and spiritual drunkennesse, wherewith they become so beastly, that if at any time a man speake vnto them of death, of sicknesse, or of pouertie, they thinke that it can not come neere them, & that a mā doth them great iniurie to say so vnto them. If any man will go about to humble them, and say vnto them: let vs know howe weake and frayle our state and condition is: they will answer, yea but am I as other men are? am I to be couēted in the number of them that are so dealt withall? Thus the wicked become so proude in their prosperitie, that there is no dealing with them? To be shorte they forget that they be men and creatures, and perswade themselues that they are no more subiect to the corrections that God layeth vpon vs in this world. Furthermore if they bee afflicted: then they rage, they gnashe the teeth and bite the nayle against God, and a man shall see them some at the mouth in their rage. And why? bicause they haue not yet learned to submit themselues vnder the hande of God, and to offer themselues vnto him for a sacrifice, to the ende they may be dedicated vnto him, to bee dealt withall as it shall please him: they know nothing at all what all this meaneth. So then when God dealeth with vs fauourably, wee muste bridle our selues, knowing that he declareth vnto vs his fatherly loue to the end he might drawe vs vnto him, and that we should come vnto him with true humilitie as it becometh vs, saying: well Lord seeing thou shewest thy selfe so fauorable, it is very meete that I should cleaue vnto thee. And how? it is not in placing felicitie here: but contrarywise when thou shalt afflicte mee, I shall say, well Lorde thou doest waken me, least I should stay my selfe and become carelesse here beneath, putting my trust and confidence in this world, and in earthly things: thou wilt humble mee and tame mee, to the ende I should so much the more couragiously looke vnto thee, that I might atteyne vnto thy heauenly kingdome. Thus must we haue our intents seuered from the wicked, that is to say, our mindes may not be here so entangled with worldly things, that they should make vs become brute beastes, and so drunken that wee should nomore thinke vpon God: but contrarywise wee muste contemne and despise all those things wherein the wicked are wonte to delight, knowing that although wee bee poure and miserable, yet our state is not the worse for that, bicause we haue good hope that God will haue pitie and compafsion on vs. This is the sūme of that which we haue to note out of this place. Now Iob addeth: How is the Lampe of the wicked quenched? How is their destruction come vpon them? and how hath God settled their liues? or their forrowes? This is a confirmation of that which hath bene already harde. By this woorde Lampe Iob setteth out their prosperitie: according as the holy Scripture vseth that maner of speech, namely of comparing the goods of this worlde to brightnesse, and the afflictions to darkenesse. He sayeth then, that the lampe of the wicked shall be quenched: but he speaketh of it as it were with an admiration, bicause this same is so done as it passeth mans wit, and otherwise than wee can conceyue. For (as I haue sayd) we haue our eyes so bleared, that wee can not see a farre of what God mindeth to do, neither what he hath plainly spoken. VVhen we see the wicked prosper, we thinke that this prosperitie of theirs shall neuer be quenched: we can not comprehend it, although the Scripture speaketh of it, although wee haue experience of it dayly, in that we see that God throweth downe the wicked, after they be exalted, euen as it were vp to the clowdes. VVhen we haue seene this? we thinke no more of it, neyther do we thinke that the thing can euer come to passe: and yet God hath shewed it vs, and as it were poynted it out with his finger. So then for as much as mans wit doth not ascende so high, and wee are so fast tied to things present, that wee can not conceyue what God mindeth too do: Iob speaketh here as of a straunge thing. How (sayeth he) is the lampe of the wicked quenched, and their destruction come vpon them? when hee sayeth, that their destruction commeth vpon them, he sheweth, that when God entreateth the wicked gently for a time, wee muste not fasten our eyes vpon the earth, for

for when we reason whether God be iudge, and whither the wicked shal be punished in the end: we must not consider what may happen on this behalfe or on that. No: for whereas they be drunken in their wealth, whereas they be lifted vp in their pride, and whereas they thinke that no harme can happē vnto them, and that all creatures are appointed to serue them: all this is nothing. And why? for God shall sende their destruction from aboue. Nowe whereas we should looke vp on high: it is not ment that we should looke according to our outward sense, for we shall not attayne vnto God: there is to great a distance, we should fainte by the way. VVhat must we do then? let vs behold God by faith, and let vs lift vp all our inward senses about our selues. Thus then must we iudge of the fall of the wicked: that is to say, we must not consider so much what may happē vnto thē according to the world, as what God is able to do. And what is the power of god? It is infinite, & a power that passeth our capacitie. So then this serueth to teach vs, that when things seeme impossible to mē, we must not sticke to cōclude thus: God worketh after a fashion that is hidde and vnknowne vnto vs: euen in such sort as we shalbe cōstrayned to wōder when we heare how the same is done. Yea, for God will shewe vs that he is not subiect to any worldly meanes, and that the things that he doth muste be maruelous in our eyes. This is the summe of that which wee muste remember. Now it is sayd, that God will stretch out their cordes in his wrath. True it is that this woorde Cordes, is by some expounded Sorrowes: as also it may be takē: but the naturall sense is, that God in his wrath will set out the portions. For this woorde cordes in the Scriptures is taken for portiō, bicause that in old time when men would lay out ground by the aker, that is to say, measure ground, they vsed lines. And the holy Scripture applieth this similitude to this order of Gods prouidence, that euen as lande is measured to set out the meeres & bounds, and to deuide the possessions, to the ende that euery man may haue his right, that things may not be cōfused: so God by his prouidence doth bring into order that which is confused. It is as much then as if he did stretch out the lines. Now it is sayd, that God will stretch them out: yea, but it shal be in his wrath. And why? it is to teach vs, that we should not be to much amazed when things come not well to passe at the first. As for example, if all things shal seeme vnto vs to be turned vpside down in this world, and that there be no more bridles nor cordes, but that the wicked take their pleasure, that they cast themselues ouerthwarte the fields, that good mē are troden vnder foote, that they are assaulted with great crueltie & extortion, that no remedie appeareth, but the euil waxeth worse and worse, that God maketh as though he turned his backe, that there is no more any iustice in the worlde, that the mightiest carieth the bell away, & to be short, that we are here as it were in the midst of great stormes, that all things in the world are turned vpside downe: yct must we not be swallowed vp with desperation. And why? Let vs tarie till God spread out the cordes in his wrath: for although to day he hyde these cords, & doth not set out the bounds, in so much that things be not brought into good order: yet hath he always the cordes in his hād, and will well declare that he knoweth howe to spread them out and to make the partition. And why doth he it not at the first? bicause it is not yet due time. It is true that he neuer ceaseth to be the iudge of the wicked: but he will not at the first shewe his vengeance vpon them, he will not so soone put in execution that which he hath decreed in himselfe, and also it is not expedient for vs. Furthermore it behoueth that the wicked be made more vnexcusable: which thing is brought to passe whan God calleth them to repentance (as sayeth S. Paule) by bearing with them. For so much the more are they to be blamed before him, in that they haue so abused his goodnesse and pacience. Besides this, when the good men are tormented, they haue wherewith to humble themselues: it is meete that by this meanes their faith should be exercised, to the ende that they might patiently wayte for helpe from God, knowing that their saluation is hid, for as much as it lieth in hope: and that hereby God stirreth them vp to come vnto him, to the ende they should seeke their inheritance without this worlde. See then how our Lord (not without cause) deferreth his iudgements: for the time is not alwayes conuenient to execute his wrath, as he knoweth it better than wee. This is the summe of that which we haue to learne out of this verse. Now it is sayd moreouer: that then they shall be as stubble before the winde. VVhereby Iob meaneth, that there is no roote in all the felicitie wherein the wicked do glory, & are so proude. This similitude is much vsed, so that it needeth not to be expounded: for it is a thing very well knowne vnto vs also, how the stubble is caried away with the winde and tempest. So then Iob protesteth here that the felicitie of the wicked is not so rooted, but when the whirlwinde of Gods wrath cometh vpon it, it shall vanishe and melte away quite and cleane, so as there shall be nothing lefte, and therewithall lette vs note, that he sheweth howe the wrath of God shall come in a minute of an houre, when as they shall not thinke of it: as it is sayd, that the wicked shall be taken suddenly, and when they shall say peace and safetie, beholde sodayne destruction shall ouerwhelme them, and it shall be as the throwes of a woman with childe, that take hir sodenly when she thinketh not of it. Iob then would expresse this same, to the end that it should not so grieue vs that wee should pine away, if God sende not things as we would wishe. And in deede what is the cause that wee be so impatient, when God suffreth things to go to hauocke? it is bicause wee thinke he needeth long preparation, and wee would haue our God to shewe some tokens of his working, and wee would haue some sight of them long before. To be short, we will haue God to belike a mortall man, as though he shoulde bee maruelously troubled when he taketh any worke in hand, and should neede to seeke helpe and ayde to bring his purpose to passe. Thus wee would make God and his whole maiestie subiect to our state and condition. VVhat must we do then? let vs knowe that in a minute of an houre he can finishe his worke, yea when there shall be no meanes, nor things any whit disposed thereto. So lette vs learne that all the felicitie of menne is but a dreame: specially when they thinke themselues happie, and become proude in their prosperitie, all is but a fonde imagination that soone vanissheth away. And why? bicause there is no roote. It is much better than for vs to bee miserable to the sight of men, and in the meane season too haue a liuely roote in God, to knowe that wee shall neuer bee destitute of his strength and ayde: let vs knowe that this is the chiefest felicitie, and that it is sufficient for vs to haue it, and that all the reste is nothing in respect of it. And in the meane season, although it seeme vnto vs that the wicked shall alwayes remayne in their state and condition, and that God hath so established them here, that they shall neuer be moued, and they also be puffed vp with this pride (as it is sayd in the Psalme, there shal neuer any haime come neare them): let vs not cease to cōprehende this iudgement of God as it is here declared, that is to say, to claime, and that he shall not neede to order things long before: for God is aboue all this cōmon ordre of nature, so that he can worke after a fashion that is new and strange to vs. Nowe Job addeth herewithall : that God not only punisheth the wicked in their owne persons, but also extendeth his chastisements and punishments euen vnto their children : and that the wicked shall in ther life time knowe that there is nothing but vanitie in their state, yea and (will they will they) perceyue that they stande vpon an vnshure ground, before that God haue cast them downe. It is true that they cease not from their pride for all that : but how soeuer it be, God vrgeth them so farre, that they perceyue they can not alwayes continue so. This is the summe of that which Job meant to intreate of here. Now we haue to note, first when he speaketh of the children, that it is according to the common doctrine of the holy Scripture, that is to say, that God blesseth not onely the faythfull themselves, but also continueth his fauour vpon their children. Thus you see that God beareth vs such loue, as he is not content, nor thinketh it ynough to haue a care of our saluation, and to giue vs that which he knoweth to be meete and profitable for vs : but also he embraceth our children, and sheweth himselfe a father to them likewise. VVee see then how the goodnesse of God is described vnto vs in the holy Scripture, that is, that when he hath receyued vs vnto him, and testified vnto vs that we are vnder his hand and protection, he sheweth also the same fauour vnto our children for our sakes. Seeing it is so : wee haue good cause to repose our selues on him, for we must conclude, that if for our sake he continueth his fauour towards them that succede vs, by a more strong reason wee shall alwayes finde him a mercifull father. Ought we then to mistrust him & his goodnesse, seeing that he is so favorable, as to haue a care ouer them also that come of vs. Now on the contrarie parte it is sayde, that God curseth the race of the wicked. And how ? for they are destitute of the guyding of the holy Ghost, so that all must go to naught, and herein we haue none occasion to murmure and grudge against God, as there are some that will thinke it very strange. VVhat (say they) is it possible that God should punish the children for the fathers sake ? is it not sayde, that hee that sinneth shall beare his owne iniquitie, and that the Sonne shall not be punished for the fathers sake ? yes truly, and that in such sorte, as the Sonne hath no cause to complayne, as though he were righteous, and that God, notwithstanding that the punishment is due vnto his father, causeth it to fall vpon him who is innocent and guiltlesse : for that can not happen. But when it is sayde that God will requite the iniquitie of the fathers into the besome of the Sonnes : it is not for that he doth them any wrong : but it is for that he leaueth the wicked there. Now when wee are forsaken of God, what can wee do but mischiefe. Thus we see then that God sheweth not such fauour to the wicked as to giue them his holy spirite : and so the Diuell must needs raigne ouer them, and stirre them vp to prouoke the wrath of God more and more, and to hasten their own destruccion. The children then are wrapped vp together with their fathers : for when a house is cursed of God, the same is in the possessiō and thraldome of Satan, & the spirit of God ruleth not there. Therefore the children are so punished for their fathers, as it is a iust iudgement vpon themselves also : they can not say, we are guiltlesse : for they are found faultie before God as well as their fathers. And on the contrarie parte, when the children of the faithfull continue folowing the steps of their fathers, then the blessing of God appeareth, so that men haue not wherefore to glorie in themselves : the children will not say, this heritage appertayneth vnto vs, God causeth vs to prosper, because our fathers were worthie to haue such a succession. No : but the whole must be attributed to the onely free goodnesse of God, who worketh being not bounden vnto men, neyther owing them any thing, but because it so pleaseth him. This is it then that we haue to learne when it is sayd, that although God punish not the wicked at the firste, yet he will addressse himselfe to their children, that is to say, he will reserue punishment for them. And this is to prosecute this matter, that we must not giue iudgement vpon the prouidence of God, by that which may be seene in this world, but must quiet our mindes & stay our iudgement vntill God shewe that his time is come. It becometh not vs then to appoynt the times. Men are slowward when they make such haste. But you see that God hath a peculiar fashion in his doings, which is sometime straunge vnto vs, but yet must we humble our mindes & say, Lord, we will like well of it, what so euer thou shalt do although it be not agreeing to our fantasie. This is it then that we haue to note vpon this woord, to hyde or reserue, when it is sayd, that God reserueth for the children of the wicked the punishment that he hath executed vpon their fathers. True it is that this can not entre into all mens heads, neither is it a common doctrine. And this is the cause wherefore I sayd that we must here vnto applie our whole studie : for men of their owne nature are so hastie and impacient, that they woulde haue God too set before their eyes, what he mindeth to do : neither can we giue place to his prouidence, except he make his hande very manifest. And on the contrarie part, vpon what condition are wee placed in this worlde ? Is it not that wee should be in continuall combats, knowing that in this worlde wee muste be tossed and turmoyled this way and that way ? And so lette vs exercise our selues in these reseruatiōs that are here mentioned. VVhen wee see the wicked so triumphe, that it seemeth that God hath giuen them a priuiledge aboue all other men : well, let vs wayte still. And why ? for here is mention made of reseruing or of hyding. VVee see not yet what is meant by it : and therefore let vs take heede that we iudge not of things vnknowne : for so might we be reprobued of rashnesse. But when shall we see ? when it shall please God to open our eyes, and to execute that which he hath determined in himselfe. In the meane season also let vs put this doctrine in vre that is taught vs here, concerning the reseruatiō of benefites, which God hath prepared for his faithfull. For it is sayd, that they are hidden. Then if we will repose our trust in God, and confort our selues in that which he hath promised vs, we must ascende aboue the worlde, and behold the things inuisible : for whosoever shall stay himself vpon that which is manifest vnto him, renounceth fayth and hope, and to be short, shetteth vp the gate of saluatiō to himselfe. Furthermore (as I haue already touched) Job shewed that the wicked shall well perceyue that all their case is nothing but vanitie and follie, but he meaneth not that they feele it in deede, nother that they be touched with it : for if ambition did not blinde men, and that they were not altogether dulheads, it is certaine that as soone as they perceyued theselues to be miserable in exalting themselves, they would yeeld themselves obedient vnto God, & not haue such confidence in this world. How happeneth it then that the vnfaithfull exalte themselves, and are at this day so madde in their arrogancie & presumptiō, that they will not submit themselves to any equitie or reason, but do things in despite of God, despising both him and his grace ? whence cometh such rage ? it is because they know not what is prepared for them, & in seeing they see nothing at all of it : that is to say, although God shew the many tokens of his wrath, yet will they knowe nothing.

True it is in deede that they be punished, & haue within them some prickings that torment them very much. But how soeuer it be, yet are they not touched to the quicke that they might know their destruction that is at hande, but are touched with the harme that might happen vnto the according to the iudgemēt of the world. For they are in deede in great perplexitie, and say, I muste prouide against such a danger whereinto I might fall. You see then how the case standeth with the wicked. And it is a thing which we ought to note well: for it is not ynough for vs to be touched lightly with a puffed to make vs feeble our fraytie: that were but a small matter. God doth in deede constrain the wicked so farre, and yet they are neuer the better for it: for we see them still obstinate, what soeuer befall them. VVhat muste wee do then? when we heare any mention made of the vanitie of this world, and of the things of this present life, lette vs know that although men take great paynes to aduance themselves, yea and bring their enterprises to passe: yet all this is nothing, bicause that not onely they shall not enioy the riches which they haue heaped together, as they thought too haue done: but their successours also shall be cursed in them, and shall haue no ioye of them. VVe may not the treat at the prosperitie of the wicked, for it is but frayle & changeable, & it can not but turne to their curse & destructiō. Thus then must this doctrine be put in vre. And againe when God shall sende vs prosperitie, & plentie, let vs know also that the same shall not continue for euer: for wee muste still come to this poynt, namely that God will draw vs beyond this worlde. Therefore let vs consider the vanities that are here beneath, as it may not greeue vs when we see our selues certaine & sure of nothing here. And why? For if we desire to be rooted here beneath, we shall renounce the kingdome of heauē. But whosoever knoweth that our life is with God, and that it shall be reueled vnto vs at the cōming of our Lorde Iesus Christ: it shall not greeue him to be tossed in this world, and to see that there is nothing but chopping and changing, nor any thing certaine and sure, & that therefore we must long for the heauēly life, to the which God calleth and biddeth vs dayly by his woordes, yet in the meane season in the midst of all these worldly troubles, & things so disordered as we see: let vs not be ignorāt that God so guydeth and gouerneth the worlde by his providence, as nothing is done here beneath without his will. And although the reason thereof be not manifest vnto vs at the first: yet for all that, so it is. Our duetie is then to be quiet, and to tarie patiently vntill God shew vs by experience that the end of the wicked shall be cursed, and that the afflictions of the good men shall be turned to their saluatiō. Howbeit whilest we waite till God shewe vs this same in effect, let vs walke still vnder him quietly, & let vs not be haue our selues frowardly for any thing that happeneth vnto vs, but let vs be ready to suffer afflictiō when it shall please him to lay it vpon vs: & if he sende vs prosperitie, let it be a meanes to make vs taste of his fatherly goodnesse, & to draw vs vnto him more and more. Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, desiring him so to inlighten vs in this world, not only by giuing vs that which he knoweth to be good for vs, but also by his woorde, that in the midst of the darkenesse of all the afflictions which we haue to suffer, we may not cease still to feele his goodnesse & fauour, and so to folow the way that he sheweth vs, as we may neuer be turned there frō for any thing that happeneth vnto vs. And in the meane season also that our eyes be not blinded neyther with prosperitie, nor with aduersitie, nor with any thing whatsoeuer it be: but that wee may behoid this glasse which he hath giuen vs, that is to say, his holy woorde, and that by the same we may be alwayes guided vnto him to be trāformed into his image, vntill such time as he haue clenfed vs frō all our innes, & haue vtterly abolished in vs all that cometh of our corrupt & sinful flesh, to gather vs fully to himself, that we may be partakers of his glorie which he hath prepared for vs in heauen. That it may please him to grant this &c.

22. VVho is he that vvil take vpō him to teach god knowlege, vvhō iudgeth the highest things?
23. This man dieth in his full strength, at his ease, and quietly 24. His breasts or teates are full of milke, and his bones flowe vwith Marie.
25. And another dieth vwith great payne, and neuer eateth vwith pleasure.
26. They are layde both in the dust, and the vwormes shall couer them.
27. I am not ignorant of these things, and how you go about to do me vwrong.
28. For you say, vwhere is the house of the Prince, and vwhere is also the Tent of the vicked?
29. Aske them that go by the vway, for ye can not denie their signes.
30. The vicked is kept vnto the day of destructiō, they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath.
31. VVho shall sheve him his vway to his face, and vvhō shall tell him againe of that vvhich he hath done?
32. He shall be brought to the graue, he shall be layde into the tombe.
33. The grauely earth shall be svucte vnto him, and euery man shall go after him, and the number of them that vvent before him, is infinite.
34. And you comfort me in vaine: for in your ansvvers there is nothing but lyes.

Ob here persecuteth the matter that was treated of yesterday, that is too wete, that although it seeme strāge in our fātasie that god should intreate men so confusedly: yet it becommeth not vs to reprove him, nor to wage the lawe against his iustice, nor to murmure as though he did euill: but we must humble our selues before his maiestie, knowing that his providence & government is a wisdom to high and to profoude to be comprehended of vs. This is the cōtents thereof. Now to shew that it is so, he sayeth, The one shall die in distresse, and the other shall die with ease: that is to say, we shall see some that at the dayes of their life shall do nothing but pine away in great miserie: & at length they die, being wery to liue any longer, bicause in their life time they had nothing but trouble & tormēt: the other are fat & in perfect health, yea they are riche & wealthy. This is it that Iob meaneth by this similitude, their breasts are full of milke, and their bones are full of marie, that is to saye, behoide beholde they are fatte euery way. Nowe when wee see this diuerſitie, the cauſe thereof is vnknowne vnto vs. For if any would ſay, howe happeneth that ſome do ſo proſper, and ſpende their whole life in pleaſure and eaſe, and other ſome liue in continuall payne? what meaneth this? he ſhould ſee no manifeſt reaſon thereof. It is truth that there be ſome of Gods iudgements (as it hath bene touched here before) ſo well knowne vnto vs, that if we would open our eyes wee might well marke and ſee the cauſe why God dealeth ſo with men: but it is not alwayes ſo: for God intendeth to trie our obedience by holding our eyes cloſed, ſo as we know not the reaſon of his worke, but are as it were blinde in that behalfe. Then if we giue him the glory, and confeſſe that he is iuſte and true, although the ſame be not manifeſt vnto vs: it is a good trial of our fayth and ſeruice that wee yeelde vnto him. On the contrary parte, if we will be ſharpe witted, and ſuttle, and be to curious in ſearching things, ſo that we wil not allow God for rightuous vnleſſe he ſhewe vs the cauſe why: this is a Diueliſh pryde, and therein wee declare our ſelues that wee will not be ſubiect vnto God but by force, and when it ſhall pleaſe vs. So then lette vs note that Iob here ſpeaketh of the iudgements of God, that are yet hid from vs, as the moſte parte of them bee. VVell, what muſt we ſay in this caſe? who is he that will teache God knowledge? that is to ſay, who is hee that will ſhew God his office? who is he that will teache him his leſſon, and ſay, he muſt worke on this faſhion, or on that? Shall we be they? Can we aſcende ſo high as to come to the infinite height wherin God is? Alas there is too great a diſtance. And if we will liſte vp our ſelues ſo high, God can bring vs downe well ynough to our ſhame and confuſion, for it appertayneth vnto him to diſcuſſe high matters. Shall we walke aboute the Angels of heauen? VVee muſt with all humilitie reuerence the ſecrets of God and his incomprehenſible iudgements: and ſhal mortall man, that is but duſte and aſhes, take vpon him to ſearch them out, and to know a reaſon thereof? Then muſt we humble our ſelues too beholde the iudgements of God: and when they ſhall ſeeme vnto vs not to be reaſonable, yet let vs learne to be content with them, brideling and as it were imprifoning our mindes, leaſt God ſhould be diſguyſed by vs, and his maieſtie & glory transformed. VVee muſt acquaint our ſelues (I ſay) to beholde things, and to conclude that God doth them according too reaſon, although it ſeeme not ſo in our owne eyes. And why? for (as I haue already ſayd) during this life our God will ſee whether we will confeſſe him to be iuſt, wiſe, and good, although we haue no knowledge of his rightuousneſſe, goodneſſe, and wiſedome. True it is that he ſheweth vs ſignes ynough of it: for he will not be glorified of vs, and in the meane while leaue vs ignorant how, nor wherefore: he miniſtreth vnto vs matter ſufficient to glorifie him: but yet he doth many things wherein wee are as it were blinde. Men muſt not then vſurpe that which appertayneth not vnto them, that is to wit, that they ſhould ſay, well, we may iudge according to that we ſee. Yea? & where is then the prayſe which thou oweſt vnto thy God and thy maker? wilt thou meaſure him by thine owne capacitie? thou arte nothing. VVhat are thy minde and vnderſtanding? Are they of ſuch coſtancie and force, that the whole glorie of God can be enclouſed and copriſed in them? doeſt thou not herein take too much vpon thee. Therefore when we ſee things in this world turned vpside downe, what muſt wee do? let vs know that for all that, God diſpoſeth things as is meete, & knoweth the reaſons which are hidde fro vs: and in the laſt day, that which is now as it were buried, ſhall be made very manifeſt, & we muſt ſuſpend our iudgemēt till that time. Truth it is that we may pray God to make vs to perceyue wherefore he doth afflicte vs, when we be afflicted. VVhen a man is in ſuch payne and findeth himſelf in great anguiſh and miſerie: he may runne to his God, and ſay, Alas Lorde this thing ſhould ſeeme very ſtraunge vnto me, and therefore I might leeſe my paciēce, were I not aſiſted of thy goodneſſe: and euen that which is for my wealth and profite, ſhould turne to my hurte and confuſion: and although I perceyue not the cauſe wherefore thou puniſheſt me ſo: yet muſt I know that it is for my wealth. Neuertheleſſe vouchſafe to let me vnderſtande, to what end thou doeſt afflicte me. Yf a mā be at his eaſe, he muſt alſo bridle himſelf, and pray vnto God that he would not ſuffer him to abuſe the benefite that he hath receyued, as to ſay, I am more worthie than other men to be loued of God: for he dealeth with me after an other ſorte: I ſee a great nūber of men very miſerable, and yet I haue what I can deſire, which is a token that God is very well pleaſed with me. So then let not this pryde and arrogancie enter into our heads: but leaſt we be tempted with it, we muſt pray vnto God that he make vs to vnderſtande, wherefore he ſpareth vs. VVee may then deſire of God that he would ſhewe vs the cauſe of his workes: yea ſo farre foorth as it is expedient for vs: but we muſt alſo come with all humilitie, not taking vpon vs to make God ſubiect to our iudgement, to ſay, that he muſt diſcloſe vnto vs in euery poynt wherefore he doth this or that. No: but let vs tarie patiently vntill he declare vnto vs, that which we know now but partly. And for aſmuch as wee cannot atteyne to the full knowledge of Gods workes and to the cauſes of the ſame, vntill we be transformed into his image: when we haue in this life gotten ſome ſmall taſte of his goodneſſe, rightuousneſſe, and wiſedome, ſuche as it pleaſeth him to communicate vnto vs by his holy woorde, where he teacheth vs that which he knoweth to bee expedient for vs at this time: let vs cōtent our ſelues with it. VVhich thing can not be done, vntill we haue renounced this curioſitie that is in vs, & the deceyueable boldneſſe wherevnto wee are too much inclined and giuen. Lette vs then keepe this ſentence well in remēbrance, where it is ſayd, who is he that will teache God his duetie? Are we ſuch great doctours that we can teach God his leſſon, and controll him? Now when men murmure ſo agaynſt the prouidēce of God, and finde faulte with it: it is as much as if they would take in hande to teach God. And what arrogancie is it, that a creature, in whom there is nothing but all beaſtlyneſſe and ignorance, ſhoulde take vpon him too teache his Creator? Then is it a curſed monſtruouſneſſe and agaynſt nature, when men do ſo highly exalte themſelues, as they wil gayneſay and replie agaynſt the workes of God. True it is that wee thinke not of it at the firſt: but yet all the murmurings and replies that wee make, and all the miſlikings that wee haue of that whiche God doth contrarie to our iudgement and appetite, are as many blaſphemies: for it is the taylor of al our euil thoughts. To be ſhorter, who ſoeuer is not content with Gods prouidence (yea and that with all humilitie,) confeſſing generally that what ſoeuer proceedeth from him is good and rightuous: the ſame (as much as lieth in him,) would pull God out of his heavenly ſeate, and ſpoyle him of his maieſtie, and ſet himſelf in his rōume and place. VVee make fayre proteſtation that wee meane no ſuch thing, but the thing it ſelfe declareth otherwiſe. To be ſhorter, as ofte as wee be tickled with this curioſitie to be too ouer inquituiue of heauēly matters, and in the meane ſeaſon haue ſuche boldneſſe mixte withall, as wee rage agaynſt God: lette vs note that we muſt come to this cōpariſon,

what art thou? and what is God? hee is thy creator, and doest thou set thy selfe agaynst him too dispute of hys workes, as if thou were his fellow? And what presumest thou to do? halt thou any thing in thee, wherefore thou shouldest enter into so deepe matters, and make all things subiect too thy iudgement? VVhere art thou become wretched creature? VVhen wee are once come too this comparison, it must needs be, that wee bee worse than mad, if this pride wherewith we bee puffed vp, bee not quite throwne downe. This is it that Iob ment here too teach in saying, who is he that wil teach god knowledge? Furthermore, bicause men be so bolde, as they can hardly be brided, vnlesse they be holden by violence, and as a man woulde say bounde with Chaynes: hee sayeth, yet shall God iudge high matters. As if he should say, well, when men wil vsurpe that which doth not appertain vnto them, as to plead agaynst God: what shall they get in the ende? Truely, they may alledge this and that: but yet God shall not bee diminished. Let men then exalt themselues as muche as they can possibly, yet shall God alwayes remaine in his place spite of their teeth. And hee shall not onely remaine safe and sounde: but hee shall also sit aboute as iudge of high matters, and we shall leape here like frogges. Shall we flie aboute the cloudes? and although wee had wings too flie so high: yet are the Angels farre more glorious and excellent. But yet are the Angelles Gods fellowes, or equall with him? No: Contrariwise it is sayde, that they hide their faces wyth their wings: as wee haue seene in Ezechiell vnder the figure of the Cherubins, and that the Angelles (although there bee a great Maiestie in their nature) neuerthelesse when they beholde the brightnesse of God, are contrayned too hide themselues before the glorie that is in their Creator. Seeing then, that so noble and excellent creatures, are as it were astonished, when they should come neare vntoo the Maiestie of God: what shall we doo in comparison of them? Seeing that God iudgeth high matters, shall wee presume too exalt oure selues agaynst him? VVell, we cannot come so farre, and whatsoeuer wee shall throwe agaynst him, shall doo him no harme: but it must all returne too our owne confusion: it is as much as if wee should cast stonnes ouer our owne heades, they must needs fall againe vpon vs, and yet wee shall not bee able too reache vntoo God. VVee might peradventure strike a blowe at him, if hee were on the one side or on the other of vs: but seeing he is aboute vs, yea and so high that we are not able to reach vnto him: if we list vp our selues agaynst him, it is as much as if we shuld cast a stone on high, which (as I haue sayde) must needs fall againe vpon our owne heades, and ouerwhelme vs. So happeneth it too all them that will make suche arguments, and after their owne fantasie dispute of Gods workes, and replie agaynst him. They do in deede throwe stonnes, but the same must needs fall againe vpon themselues. And this is it that is ment by that is sayde, that all they which shall dashe agaynst this stone, must needs bee brused and broken: yea and in the ende this stone shall fall vpon them too crouse them, and quite ouerwhelme them. Let vs note also, that GOD iudgeth high matters, not onely in that hee is the fountaine aboute all creatures: but in that he dooth set himselfe specially agaynst them that do so highly esteeme of themselues more than becommeth them, and aboute their degree: for he sayth that he is a mortall enemie to all the proude. Let vs learne then, that if there be any such that will so exalt themselues, the same must needs turne to their ruine: as it is written, he that will humble himselfe, shall bee exalted: and contrariwise, hee that will exalte himselfe, must bee brought to nothing. It is the peculiar office of God to do things in this sort. Let vs note then that there is nothing better than to bee wise, onely so farre forth as it pleaseth God to instruct vs, and let vs knowe that too obey him, and too submit oure selues vntoo him in all things, is our true wisdom. And when things come not to passe as we woulde wishe, so that wee bee easily stirred vp to enter into some disputation: let vs stay our selues, and say, yea but God hath such a perfection in him, that there can nothing proceed from him, but it is good and righteous, and his will onely ought to suffice vs: for it is the rule of all well dooing, this is the fountaine thereof, let vs draw out of it boldly. So when hee sheweth vs the reason of his workes, let vs giue him thanks, and wish all humilitie receyue whatsoeuer he teacheth vs. But if hee hide them from vs, let vs be content too bee ignorant, so farre forth as it shall please him, knowing well that hee reuealeth vntoo vs whatsoeuer hee knoweth too bee profitable for vs. Howsoever it bee, hee will keepe vs within a certaine measure, too the ende wee shoulde learne what it is too obey him, and too confesse that he is iust, although hee shewe vs no reason of his doings. This is the summe of that which we haue to learne out of this place. Nowe too shewe the greatnesse of this temptation, it is sayde afterwarde, that both of them are couered in the dust, and that the woormes eate them. In deede when wee see that a like ende happeneth to them both: although we haue bene diuersly delt withall in this worlde: it might seeme that God playeth no more the iudge. But our sayth muste surmount the graues, and whatsoeuer wee can beholde with the eye. And this is it that is often tymes taught vs, that sayth is a sight and beholding of things inuisible. VVe shall see some good man that shall haue serued God all the dayes of his life, and shall haue walked verie vprightly and sincerely: and neuerthelesse hee shall bee in continuall greefe and paynes, and God shall not ceasse too sende him manie tormentes euen to the death, to the which also he must go pining on a long time. And others that shall runne headlong too all euill, shall die at their ease. As I haue sayde this is the confusion of things. And what is the ende of it? they come to the graue. Are they in the dust? they consume away there, the woormes eate the, it seemeth that he that toke paynes to serue god hath lost his labor. And why? Beholde they are all gathered into one heape, the good & the bad: as well those that haue liued here in great mirth and pleasure, as they that haue found nothing but sorow & trauell in this worlde. VVhat shall we say to this? It is certaine that we shall bee amazed if we stay our selues vpon that which may be sene with the eie. VVhat is to be done then? VVe must ascend higher, and knowe that God reserueth vntoo himselfe a iudgement that appeareth not presently. Yea truely. For faith beholdeth things inuisible & things that are hid. Let vs know then that although in death all be like, yet there is a farre diuers condition. And when shall that bee? our God shall declare it in time conuenient. But in the meane season it is our dutie to walke alwayes in his feare, and to conclude, that seeing hee is iudge of the worlde, iniquitie shall not remaine vnpunished. And they that haue taken paynes to obey him, and to walke according too his rightuoufnesse, shal not haue labored in vaine, nor be disappointed of their expectation. Thus must we conclude & go still forward. And we see also that God ment to declare the same vnto vs by the mouth of a deceiuer. For although Balaâ endeued to ouerthrow al truth, & to turn it to a lie: yet God hilde him as it were on a rack, that he was forced to say that the death of the righteous isto be wished, wished. Let my death (sayth he) be like vnto the death of the righteous. He sayth not this of his owne head. For he woulde (as much as lay in him) haue brought to naught, and vtterly abolished the maiestie of God. But yet seeing God maketh him speake thus: it is more than if hee had sent all the Angels of heauen. God, I say did then authorize this doctrine with a peculiar marke, whē he did constraîne and inforce a wicked man, & an enemye of the truth to speake on this wise. This is it then that we haue to learne: to wit that we must not fasten our eyes vpon the graue, when wee see that all is there brought vnto one heape, and that there is no difference betweene the good and the bad, betweene the rich and the poore, betweene those that haue liued at their ease, and those that haue alwayes benee in sorrow and paine.

It is true that in deeth al things are turned vpsidedown: but God knoweth howe to bring all things into an order and perfect state: as it is sayd that at the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, when he shall appeare to iudge the worlde, then shall be the restoring of all things. If it be so then that Iesus Christ shall come to restore the worlde: It followeth that the worlde at this day is out of frame, and things therein are out of order: but in the meane season let our fayth surmount all these things here, and let vs patiently abide till God finish his worke, and find a remedie for all. Nowe Iob addeth furthermore that the thoughts of them that went about to confound him, are not vnknowne vnto him, nor the wayes that they vsed to do him wrong: as if hee shuld say, I see wherto ye tend. For ye are as it were suborned of Satan to bring men to dispaire. But I will holde me fast in the hope that I haue in my God. And although I be here so much oppressed as is possible for any man to bee: yet will I still continue calling vpon him that hath promised to be my sauour, and I shall not bee overcome for any of your temptations. Thus then doth Iob arme & defend himself against al that was objected against him by his freendes: For he saw well ynough that they tended to no other end nor purpose but to bring him to dispaire. Nowe this place here conteyneth a profitable doctrine: which is, that wee shoulde alwayes learne to knowe the subtilties of Satan when he goeth about to bring vs into dispayre: and that we shoulde be armed agaynst hym. For if wee haue the wisdomē to take heede of the malice of men, when we see that they go about to hurt vs, and seeke our vtter ruine and destruction: must wee not much more sharpen our wittes and spiritēs to resist Satan, who is the Prince of all iniquitie. The thing then that we ought to knowe, is that when men go about to doo vs harme, wee must stande vpon oure garde, and consider the force and strength that is in oure enemies. And if we cannot overcome him by force, wee must fall to pollicie. If wee see a man go about to beguile vs by wicked flight: wee will beware of him well ynough. But Epb. 6. b. 12. (as sayeth Sainct Paule) oure fighting is not agaynst flesh and bloud: that is to say, when wee haue to deale but with men, it is nothing: but we haue to deale with spirituall enemies which are principalities. Behold Satan vttereth all his force, and we haue to fight agaynst the Diuelles in the ayre, which winde about vs, and inuiron vs on all sides: and they haue drie dartes wherewith wee shoulde be striken downe incontinently, if wee were not well furnished and armed at all poyntes. Therefore, it standeth vs in hande to bee watchfull in this case about all things and to be acquainted with Satans wiles, according also as Sainct Paule speaketh of them in anoier place. This is it which we haue to marke in this streyne: namely that forasmuch as Iob was fenced agaynst all the temptations that were put too him by those whome the Diuell stirred vp agaynst him: when wee see men go aboute too leade vs too destruction, wee muste haue our eyes open too espie their flightes, that we may prouide too disappoynt them. And if wee haue this aduisednesse in respect of men, let vs much more haue it in respect of Satan. For hee is oure cheefe enemye whome wee haue cheefely too resist, that wee maye repulse all the practises and deuises whiche hee can attempt agaynst vs.

And heerevpon let vs marke, that all excuses are taken from vs, if we bee surprised by the temptations whereof euerie man ought to take heede. If we steppe awry, euery of vs will alledge that there was some meanes or other, and that hee was seduced by some other man. And finally, wee put the same thing in vre which was shewed vs by our father Adam, when he sayde; The woman which thou gauest mee hath deceyued me. Yea, Gen. 3. b. 12. but our Lorde hath giuen vs discretion ynough, so be it that wee can finde in oure hartes too bee watchfull. But as for them that will bee wittingly rocked asleepe: muste not Satan needes snarle them in his snares, and make them too wander heere and there? Are they not well woorthie of it? Yes: For they seeme to bee willing too breake theyr owne neckes, and too haue fought pittes too fall intoo, and that they bee well at ease when they finde anie meanes too start out of the way. There are many that seeke stumbling blockes, and afterwarde say: Oh, beholde, such a one hath beguiled mee. But if we kept watch as God warneth vs, wee shoulde alwayes be preferued from the daungers wherewith we be snared.

Thus yee see what wee haue too marke vpon this place. And immediately Iob sayeth, Inquyre of them that go by the waye, you cannot denie their signes. This streyne is expounded diuerse wayes. There are that take these Iourneyers or wayfaring men, in an allegoricall sense for the faythfull, bycause they bee pilgrymes in this worlde, and haue no resting place: but that is too muche streyned. Some vnderstande that Iob ment too saye heere, that hys freendes tooke hym as a wayfarer, that is to say, as an vnknowne man. As if hee shoulde saye, yee handle mee worse than you woulde doo a wayfarer or an vnknowne man. Other some take it after an other fashion: but let vs holde vs too the plaine meening: whiche is, that Iob meeneth too saye heere, that if his freendes, (or at least wyze those that bare the name, and were come vntoo him vnder that pretence) had a sound and vncorrupted iudgement, they woulde not haue vsed suche flanders agaynst hym. His saying then is, yea, aske the wayfaring men, the thing whereof yee haue hitherto reasoned, and euerie one of them can tell it you. And why? Bycause they are not ill mynded. For inasmuche as theyr heades bee not forepossessed with cruell iudgement, they will speake the truth and as the thing is. It behoueth you then too bee likewise moderated. This is the summe of that whiche hee ment to say. Nowe by this wee are taught, that there is nothing so contrarie too reason and truth, as an euill affection that a man shall haue nourished and conceyued within himselfe: for hee shall bee soo blinded therewith, as hee shall not bee able too discern any more, and the light shall bee vntoo him alwayes as it were darknesse. This maye helpe vs muche, if wee applie it too our vse as it behoueth vs. Wherefore? VVe see how euery man letteth looce the bridle to his affections. VVhen we iudge of any thing, haue we respect vnto reason to bee guided by it? No surely, but our affections do so rule vs, that we see nothing, because wee are beforeoccupied with some fantasie fantasie. One is caried away with his pride, and hee will not turn whatsoeuer happen. And if a man aduertise him of it, he will not hearken to it: what reason soeuer a man shal vse vnto him, it shal preuail nothing with him. VVhē a man is so hardned agaynst God and all equitie, he thinketh he could not get better estimation, than too remaine stubburne to the ende. Againe, an other is poysoned with some hatred or dispite, wherevpon hee will iudge rashly hauing no power to enquire whether the thing bee so or no. Forasmuch as this vice reigneth so in vs, & doth preuail: so much the more ought we to note this place where it is sayd, that euē the wayfaring men shall teach vs. That is to say, that they which iudge of a thing at the first sight, and as it were passing by the way, shal be better and more vpright iudges than we be. And why? They shall not be forepossessed with their euill affections which hinder the from iudging aright and according too truth. This is it that Iob ment to say in this place. Nowe he addeth in the ende to conclude his matter which he hath in hande, that the wicked is referued to the day of his destruction, and that such men shall be as it were trayned on to the day of wrath. This is a meane that we should not runne headlong into rash iudgement when God punisheth not the sinnes of men so soone as wee thinke good. And when he afflicteth the good men, and holdeth them as it were vnder many torments and troubles: then let vs say, yet is the wicked referued to his day. If we had this woorde Referued, (as it was yesterday handled) well printed in our mindes, it would be a meane to keepe vs in a feare, that we should not bee so muche caried away as we be, seeing the troubles and disorders that are in this life. But we can finde in our hartestoo referue any thing vntoo God, and wee thinke if hee bring not this matter too passe to daye, too morrowe hee shall not come in time. The cause that all things are peruerted, is for that wee haue our mindes encumbered: And againe, wee speake so hastily and vndaduisedly, as in the meane season we giue no place vnto fayth, nor knowe any more of God and his rightuoufnesse, than experience teacheth vs. And by this meanes wee exclude the whole woorde of God, and say that it helpeth vs no more, and that wee will beleue nothing that is therein conteyned: but that we will beleue our owne eyes. Is not this asmuch as too separate our selues from God, and to estrange vs from his schoole to be no more his sc̄ners? Is it to be marueyled, if after this, men become so madde, that a man can doo no more good wyth them, but the diuell possesseth them and caryeth them cleane away? as we see many suche nowe adayes? No, we must not maruell, it is a iust iudgement. So much the more must we marke this doctrine where it is sayde, that the wicked is referued to the day of his destruction. To bee breefe, when we see the wicked here to bee at their ease and prosperitie, and too triumph: it is true that it cannot bee chosen but we must bee tempted, and haue some greefe inwardely [so as we thinke thus with our selues.] And howe, what meeneth this? that God is ydle in heauen, and seemeth to be asleepe and careth not for things here beneath. There might in dede such fantasies come into our heades. But we must beate them backe, and say, well Lorde, thou teachest me that I should looke further than vpon this worlde. At the first sight it woulde seeme vnto vs that thou wart asleepe: but yet it is cleane contrarie. For inasmuch as we see there is another iudgement vpon the wicked, which is vnknowne vnto vs: we muste also knowe that there is an euerlasting rest for the godly. God then giueth vs already a declaration of his rightuoufnesse, that there is a iudgement referued, in the which all things shall be reduced into good order. Thus must we take some profite by the examples that are before our eyes. Therefore if things come not to passe as wee woulde haue them, so as the wicked triumph, and God maketh no countenance to punish them: and contrariwise, the good be tormented, and we perceyue that they be not succored nor ho'pen, but many iniuries and violences are committed agaynst them, and in the meane season God putteth not to his hand to prouide for them: let vs run to this that is said vnto vs, wel, there is another iudgement: for the wicked is referued to his destruction. And forasmuch as the wicked at this day are spared, let vs note that their vengeance shall be so much the more horrible: Their market is nothing the more amended for that: but their condemnation is augmented euery day more and more. And why? the time is dearely bought, for that they haue so mocked at the goodnesse of God, and haue abused his wisdome, and continued still in euill, yea and hardened therein, and exercysed their malice agaynst the good men and children of God. So then the faythfull ought to reioyce in the middes of their sadnesse, when they see the wicked so referued too the day of their destruction. True it is, that for a time the wicked shall be in this worlde as it were in a Paradise: But shall it be alwayes so? No, for this life is short and frayle, and they must needs come to an account. And when it shall be cast in their teeth, that they haue mocked with God, and dispised his maiestie, what shall become of them, what horrible vengeance shall be prepared for them? Let vs then conceiue such horror of the finall state & cōdition of the wicked that wee may be stayed from complayning with them, least we be spotted with their vices and infections, and be wrapped together with them in the wrath of god. Furthermore, are we oppressed? do we see the godly men to be in trouble and anguish? VVell, let vs knowe it to be true that our life is miserable in sight: but it is to make vs go forwarde: they are as it were prickings with the spurre for to encourage vs, and to stirre vs vp to the beholding of the heauenly life, that whylest wee labour to come vnto it, wee might contemne and dispise all those things wherein the wicked are woont too delight, and place their whole felicitie here in this worlde. Nowe in the ende Iob sayth, who is hee that can iudge in the face agaynst him, who is he that shall pay him agayn that which he hath done? It seemeth at the first sight, that hee speaketh heere of God: but it is spoken rather of the wicked. Neuerthelesse it tendeth too approue the iustice of God, and too shewe that the wicked, although they haue escaped the handes of men, shall not faile but come before the heauenly iudge. This is the summe of that which Iob ment to say.

So then although the wicked haue so passed their life as no man durst set himselfe agaynste them, and whylest they liued, it seemed that they were exaited vp to the cloudes: yet shall they not fayle but come to the graue. And it is true, that according too mans iudgement, the same might alwayes be alledged for prooue of the temptation: as howe? VVe see that all are equall. But Iob heere concludeth agaynst his enimies, that although (to the sight of men) the ende bee like, yet there is a iudgement of God about that, and men muste not become so brutishe as to stay themselves onely vpon the graue, and vpon the things that are seene here, but they must know that god shall so restore things, as the goates shall be separated from the lambes, when God shall declare himselfe to be the iudge of the whole worlde: but the tyme is not yet come. This is the comparifon that Iob maketh heere. Nowe againe he repeateth that which he had sayde, that is to say, that a man cannot discern betweene them both by the outwarde appearance. And why? This is the man that will be glad of the grauelly ground, but it is that his bodie may bee buried therein: it is all one too him after death, and they are laid both together in the graue. Beholde this is the state and condition of mankinde, as it is said in the Psalme, that they bring to the graue the bodies of the great and little, of the old and yong, and that all go like flockes of sheepe to the graue. So then by the outward sight wee can not discern the iudgements of God. And wherfore saith Iob thus: Is it bicause he mindeth to make a confusion of all? No: but it is good and profitable for the children of God (as we haue already declared) to be armed long time before against the temptations that might happen vnto them, when they see the ende of the Godly and of the wicked concerning the outward appearance to be like: to the end that when they themselues be afflicted, they might call vpon God, knowing that if their state & condition be poore and miserable in this world, there is a joy prepared for them, the hope whereof may well diminish and mitigate all the heauinesse and troubles that might happen vnto them in this world. It is good that me should know the temptations that may happen vnto the. It is true that we must not be herein to hastie, so that whe we heare any mention made of the deliuerance that god will send vs in our aduersities, we begin by and by to repleie. Yea, but when shall it be? we must not stay vpon such fantasies: but wee must generally learne to be pacient in all things, least we fall headlong into fleeing fantasies, and conceyue in our mindes things that God wil haue yet to remaine vnknowne of vs. Let vs then leaue the iudgement to him, vntill he reueale it vnto vs, and let vs know perfectly, that he doth such things as we cannot presently comprehend. This is the cause why Iob sheweth here that all go to the graue, and that all are brought thither: and it is to the ende that we should gather thus: well, it is true that in death all are lyke, wee put no difference betweene the godly and the wicked: and (as Salomon sayeth in his booke of the preacher) a liuing dog is better than a dead Lion: and the death of a man is like the death of a dog, inasmuch as the bodie of a man shall rot as well as the carkasse of a beast. VVe see all these things: but yet we must not stay there. Let vs then beholde that which is shewed vs in the mirrour of Gods worde. That is to wit, that there is a greater iudgement which God reserueth, and will execute when he shall shewe himselfe to bee the iudge of the whole world. Thus behoueth it vs to know temptations, & when we haue known them, we must resist the, & go forward: and let vs not be so foolish as to say, Oh whofoeuer shall find prosperitie in this world let him enjoy it: for in death there is no hope. But contrariwise, we must say, if we haue aduersitie in this worlde, let vs know that a better hope is layd vp for vs: and this is it wherunto God calleth vs. If we haue prosperitie in this world, let vs thanke him for all: but let vs not put any confidence in it, for prosperitie may be takē from vs betwene this & to morrow, specially when we abuse the same. Thus I say must we wey things present, and thinke with our selues, that if we iudge of the according to mans iudgement, all shall be done out of order: and it is to the ende that sayth might preuaile in vs, and that the worde of God might guide vs, so as it may be as a candle to shew vs the way in the midst of the darknesse of this worlde, vntill we come to that heavenly brightnes where there shal be no knowledge in part, but all perfection, at which time we shal behold God face to face.

Psa. 49. 15

Ecl. 9. b. 4.

1. Cor. 13. d. 12.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our God, with acknowledgement of our faults, desiring him to make vs haue a better feeling of the, and that we may be more & more touched with them, so as wee may be displeas'd with them, to the ende wee maye enjoy the grace that is promised vs in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ. And that when our sinnes passed, bee forgien vs of him, it woulde please him to guide vs by his holy spirit, so as we may alwayes more and more aspire to the perfection of the heavenly richesse, to the which hee calleth vs, where being rid of all our imperfections, and infirmities of man, we may bee clothed with his heavenly glory, which hath bene purchased for vs by the blood of our Sauour Iesus Christ. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely vnto vs, but also to all nations, &c.

The lxxxij. Sermon, which is the fyrst vpon the xxij. Chapter.

Then Eliphaz the Themanite answered, and sayde,

2. Shall a man be profitable vnto God? the vwise man profiteth himselfe.
3. What careth the almighty if thou bee righteous? or vwhat shall he gaine if thou vvalke vp rightly?
4. Is God afraid to reprove thee, or to come vwith thee into iudgement?
5. Is not thy vvickednesse great, and are not thine iniquities infinite?
6. Thou hast taken a pledge of thy brother vvithout a cause: thou hast spoyled him that vvas naked.
7. Thou hast not giuen vvater to drinke to him that vvas a thirst: and hast denied bread to him that vvas hungrie.
8. And the mightie man had the earth in possession: and he that vvas in authoritie dvvelt in it.

Hen we haue too doo with men, if wee can charge our aduersary with any thing, or can finde any thing too reprove in him, we thinke wee haue halfe obteyned our matter: yea I say, when we our selues are in the fault, and there needeth no other iudge to condemne vs, but our owne conscience. If any man accuse me and I finde my selfe culpable: I seeke if I can finde any thing for mee to snatch at in him. And that will I alledge for mine owne discharge: and why so? For me thinketh that I shoulde so much the more diuert and turne away the mindes of them that shoulde be iudges of my cause, to the ende that they should not wholly stay vpon mee, and that the euill whiche I haue committed, might bee as it were darkened and wrapped vp. The common practise therefore that we vse one with another, is that wee seeke some starting hole, & the same must serue vs to shift off the matter: as when we ca say, what? I haue done such a pleasure for a man: &

if I haue afterwarde offended him, the same ought to be layd in the ballance. Thus we would diminish the fault that we haue committed: or else we alledge thus: though I haue offended in this behalfe, is this man altogether innocent? Now when we come to God, & these things fall to the ground. It is true that we would vse the same talke with god as we do with mortall men. But we are deceyued. And why? what is that we can charge him withall: what can we find blame worthy in him? what seruice can we alledge that we haue done him, to say that he is be-10 holding or bouiden vnto vs for it. Our mouth must needs be stopped in all this, so as there is no more to do but too cōfesse the debt, & with all humilitie to acknowledge the condemnation to be iust without making any replie, or without attēpting the law any further, for we shal get no thing therby. And this is the argumēt that is here handled by Eliphaz. And so we see that of this talk which he hath, may be gathered a good lesson: and he had spoken verie well, if he had applied the same as he should. But he did not wel in applying it vnto Iob. This is it wherein he was 20 deceiued. Yet is this doctrine in it selfe & generally profitable for vs, that is to wit, that whē God doth summō vs before him, & stirreth vs vp to acknowledge our faults, it booteth not to seke any reply, or to say, if I haue offended in this behalfe God ought to pardō me: for behold I haue serued him in such a thing, and he ought to acknowledge it, and the same deserueth wel a good turn. Let vs then remoue all these toyes, for they take no place when we appeare before god. And why? For we bring him no gaine, he is made neither hote nor cold (as I say) by vs: and as we 30 can do him no good, so also can we do him no harm. This once concluded and agreed on, we see that al presumptiō must be thrown down in vs. And there is no other remedie but with al humilitie to acknowledge the condemnation to be iust. But to the end that this same may the better bee vnderstanded: let vs debate the things in order as they are here cōteyned. Vberim (saith Eliphaz) shal aman profit God? The wise man profiteth himself. True it is that at the first sight we think we deserue much at Gods handes, when we indeuor our selues to serue & honor him. But 40 we be to much blinded herein. For we imagin that God might receiue some commodiū by vs, as though he had neede of vs. But contrariwise, he can neither increase nor diminish: he is in such sort the fountain of all goodnesse, that he wil bōrow nothing of another man: & that which men bring vnto him, is not to releue his necessitie, or to augment him in any wise. If I had neede (saith he) would I come vnto thee? Are not all the creatures in my hande? Furthermōre, we know that God seeketh nothing without his owne Maiestie. So the let vs put away this foolish 50 fantasie, that we do bring any cōmoditie or profite vnto God. And rather let vs confesse with Dauid in the xvj. Psalme, that our goodnesse shall not reach vnto him. For let men enforce themselues as much as they will: yet can God receiue nothing at their handes, wherby it might be sayd that he fareth the better: yea and if God should bestow as many benefits vpon vs as wee woulde desire: yet could we make him no recompence, as it is sayde in the Cxvj. Psalme. What shall I giue vnto the Lorde, for so many things as I haue receiued of him. I can do nothing 60 but call vpon his name. So farre off is it then that we are able to make God bounden vnto vs, that when hee shall haue bestowed vpon vs all the benefites that may be, we are not able to giue him the like againe, neither can wee do him any seruice at all for it. Thus much concerning the first thing that we haue heere too note. Now if any man would aske the question, wherefore then doth God require of vs, that we shoulde be diligent to serue him?

Psal. 115. b. 12. 13.

It seemeth that he hath some respect to himselfe. No: there is no consideration but of vs, and of our saluation: God hath no respect of his owne profite, when hee giueth vs the rule of good liuing, and commaundeth vs to abstayne from euill, and requireth of vs to do this or that. God then in the whole lawe hathe no consideration of his owne profite, but considereth what is good for vs, and expedient for our saluation. Let vs do well, and the same shall returne vnto our selues: let vs doo euill, and the same shall returne too oure owne losse and hinderance: as for God, he remayneth alwayes safe and sounde. It is true that (as muche as lyeth in vs) we offende his Maiestie, and abolishe his iustice, and are guiltie thereof. But yet can it not be sayd that we can diminish any thing of God, or that wee can robbe him of that which he hath, or that we can reach vnto him, too do him any iniurie. No truly. Therefore a man shall hurt none but himselfe: and likewise the profite that cometh of him returneth to his owne person. And herein we see the inestimable goodnesse of our God. For hee commaundeth vs diligently, and declareth vnto vs howe wee shoulde liue. And why doth he so? Is it bicause he woulde play the good husbāde? To say, I shall take some profite thereby? No surely. But bicause he procureth our wealth and saluation. If I should serue without respect of mine owne profite, and be so carefull of some mans benefite, that I should go and sollicite him, saying, hee must doo this and that, and bee at him euening and morning too pricke him and stirre him forward to set some order in his affayres, and of all this no profite should redounde vnto my selfe: were not this a token of a rare and singular loue? And euen so dooth our God deale with vs. And yet what is hee? *V*When wee perceyue his infinite Maiestie, and consider how he vouchsafeth too thinke vpon our saluation, and too be so carefull of it: must wee not needes be touched too the quicke. Yea and as it were rauished and astonished at such bountifulnesse? and now what an vnthankfulnesse is in men, seeing that whereas God can win nothing by them, they are become so hardharted and dull, that when hee sheweth them the way of saluation, and exhorteth them too come vnto it, they will not vouchsafe too go one foote forward, but rather go backwarde. There is no excuse when we bee so vnthankfull to the bountifulnesse of our God. There is yet another thing, namely that although our God receyue nothing of vs: yet pretendeth as he were bounde vnto vs. Haue I neede (sayth hee) of any thing that ye bring me? No: for hee can receyue nothing of vs. It is true: neuertheless God 50 accepteth our dooings, and maketh account of them, as though they were of some value: according as we see he likeneth himselfe to a husband man that hath a vineyard, which when he hath caused to bee dressed, he gathereth wine of it, or that hath a feeelde, and reapeth corne of it. God in vsing such similitudes, declareth that he doth so account our workes, that they are vnto him as pleasant and sweete sacrifices. And also he sayeth that when we doo good to the poore, it is as if wee did it euen to him, and he accepteth it as done vnto himselfe, euen as our sauiour Iesus Christ himselfe speaketh of it, saying: whatsoeuer ye shal do to one of the least of my members, I accept it as if it had bin done to mine owne person. Seing then that our God abaseth himselfe so farre as too make himselfe subiect to the state and condition of a mortall and corruptible nian, and sayeth that he receyueth whatsoeuer we do vnto our brethren, although we can bring him nothing, and willingly bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he is not in our debt: on our part, when we see al this, must we not needs be rauished with admiratiō of this so great a gentleness as our God useth towards vs? So then let vs note well how it is sayd in this place, that when a man shall haue taken paynes to leade a godly and vpright life according to the commaundements of God. It can not be sayde that in all his life he hath profited God any thing at all. He hath onely done himselfe good. But yet oure God to encourage vs to doo well, will accept the things whereby he taketh no profite. He requireth it as though he were the better by it, and declareth that wee shall not lesse our labour thereby, neither that it shall bee a thing vpprofitable for vs. This I say is the intent of our God: when he encourageth vs to lead a good life. Furthermore let vs knowe to what ende this is spoken vnto vs in this place: for we must keepe in remembrance this circumstance that I haue spoken of, that is to wit, that when wee come to make our account before god, we must forget all these foolish imaginatiōs which we conceiue, that we can bring him such gaine as we shoulde deserue ought at his hand. Let all this (I say) be throwne downe. And why? He is not as a creature that needeth the ayd and helpe of another, he standeth in need of nothing, but is content with himselfe. Forasmuch then as our God is by no maner of meanes bounden vnto vs: let vs learne to humble our selues before him, and let vs be sory for our sinnes, yea euen so as we may be vtterly ashamed of them, and desire God too forgie vs them. But why shoulde hee forgie vs, them? It is not for that I can say, hee knoweth that I haue indeuered my selfe too leade a good life, and I haue done this thing and that. For what is there that we can so alledge? Surely nothing at all. And therefore let vs forget all these delays, and acknowledge oure selues guiltie: for when wee haue vsed all these replies, yet can they not reache vnto God. VVhen we haue too doo with mortall men, and vse such flourishes too cover our faults withall: yet are we maruelously ashamed, if it happen that our lie do appeare. VVhat shal then become of vs when we come before our God? And herein we see how the Papists are deceyued. For although they can not deny but that they be in daunger of Gods curse, if he would vse any extremitie towards them: yet will they alledge their satisfactions, and therein play the marchants with God, so that if they haue made default in one poyn, they can make amendes for it another way: yea they haue their workes, which they call workes of supererogation, which God neuer commaunded, these serue to fill vp the holes, when they haue comitted any euill, wherwith God doth vrge them. VVell (say they) if we haue sinned, here is it that shall make amendes for all: yea if the matter were tried by the ballance, yet would there be some ouerplus. To this point are the Papists come, that they thinke it a great absurditie that forgiuenesse of sinnes should be frank and free, and that God should pardon vs of his mere goodnes. They will easily graunt it to be true concerning the trespas, but concerning the punishment, it pertaineth vnto vs to re-deeme it. VVhē men be caried away with such pride: must we not say, that they haue quite transformed God, & that they know no more what maner a one he is? So much the more must we note wel that which is cōteined here: that is to wit, that we shal easily persuade our selues, that God is something profited by vs: which is but mere folly, & a vain fancie. And so whē we shal haue conceyued how high he is, let vs learne to acknowledge our faults with all humilitie & make no reply: for we cā lay nothing to his charge, neither cā we alledge vnto him that he hath receyued any thing at our hands, nother that he is in any thing bounden vnto vs. Thus much for one point. Now it is saide moreouer, that god careth not whither we do wel or ill, or whither we walk vp rightly or no. VVhē Eliphaz speaketh thus: he meneth not that god shetteth his eies, & that there is no difference of good & ill with him: but he meeneth that for himselfe he forceth not of it. It is true that God as he is the fountaine of all iustice and right, loueth equitie, & if we lead an vpright life, then become we the Image of God. For it is certain that we haue no goodnesse in our selues: But it is as we see the sun shineth here beneth, when he casteth forth his beames. The brightnes that we see here beneth cometh not from the earth: we see the brightnesse vpō the houses, and vpon the earth, and yet it procedeth not from thence: but it is a brightnes reflected (as they call it) which returneth againe as the earth receyueh it: it resteth then vpon the earth. For when we beholde our selues in a glasse, the glasse hath no face: but the face of a man presenteth it self there, and the glasse representeth it haecē againe. So then when we do well, it is not of our selues (for there can nothing be drawne from vs but al filthinesse and beggerie, as we are corrupted of nature) but our Lorde poureth his goodnesse & rightuoufnesse vpon vs. Then if he shew vs the fauor in regenerating vs by his holy spirit, that we liue holily, we are as glassees in the which his image is as it were represented: and this is a brightnesse which commeth frō above, but sheweth it self here beneth. Now for as much as god acknowledgeth al that is good to come of him: this is the cause why he loueth that which is good: as it is impossible that he should do otherwise, seing that he is the wellspring and fountain therof. Otherwise he forceth not in respect of himself: that is to say, for his owne profit, or advantage that he receyueh therby, he careth not how men do liue. VVhen men do the worst they can, shal they thereby take away the rightuoufnesse that is in God? Can they diminish his maiestie: can they abolish his glory & honor? can they shorten the bounds of his kingdom? No, they can not. In this sense then is it sayd, that God careth not what men do: but concerning vs, let vs cōsider if it be not our felicitie to submit our selues vnto him, & to yeeld our selues his obedient subiects. And seing that he hauing no need of vs, neither of our life, nor workes, is yet so carefull that we should lead a godly life: let vs hereby know the loue that he beareth vs: as it hath alreedy bene sayde that hee doth vouchsafe to ioyn vs vnto him, and so to vnite vs, that if we liue well, he sayth his kingdom is established: if we liue yll, he sayth he reigneth no more. And howe is that? Can we so hinder God, that his soueraine dominion should not remaine vnto him for euer? No. And why then doth hee vse such maner of speech? It is (as I haue alreedy sayd) to declare vnto vs howe hee loueth vs: as it is sayde in the eighteenth Chapter of the Prouerbes, where the wisdom of God is brought in saying, that his pleasure and delight is to dwel among men. God speaketh thus to declare vnto vs, that hee will not keepe his goodnesse shette vp and concealed in himselfe, but will poure it out amongst vs, that we may be partakers of it: and that hee taketh suche pleasure so to lighten vs, to the ende we should not bee as brute beastes, but knowe him, and conceiue of him as hee teacheth vs, in such sort as we might be lifted vp on high into his kingdom. After the same manner dealeth hee in all other things: for he delighteth to bestowe his benefites vpon vs, and to giue vs such fruition of them, as hee ioyneth himselfe vnto vs, and vs vnto him. God then is carefull ouer vs, that wee should leade a good life, but not for that hee hath any profite or harme thereby. This is the summe of that whiche wee haue to note. It is saide moreouer. Is it for feare of thee that he will reprove thee, or goe to Lawe with thee? Heere it is shewed vs yet more playnely, that wee shall gette nothing, by seekeing delays wyth G O D, as wee are woont too do wyth our fellowes and mates. For what is the cause that men vse so muche cauilling in their controuersies and debates which they haue with men, but to defende themselues to appease the partie: or else to make him afearde, that he should no more prosecute the matter with such rigour?

 As for example. VVhen any man is assaulted, hee will consider: this man pursueth me liuely: what shall I do? then will hee vse some way to scape: or else hee will set some one at his aduersaries taylor, to put a flea in his eare, as they say: Thinkest thou not that thine aduersarie is to strong for thee? Or else he will styrre vp agaynst him something vnder the grounde: so that the man draweth backe, and waxeth colde, and dareth not prosecute the matter as he had begonne: for he feareth least the mischeefe should fall vpon his owne head. So then bicause we are wont to make mortal men afearde, to the end we might escape their hands, and shew them our teeth, and giue them signes that we haue wayes and meanes to be auenged of them: we thinke wee are able to do the lyke with God. And what a follie is that? must we not needes be voyde of sense and iudgement? but bicause men be so arrogant as to thinke to practise the same things with God which they doo to their neighbors: therefore it is sayde, thinkest thou that God holdeth his peace for feare of thee? Nowe what is the cause that moueth men too put their aduersaries so in feare? bicause they consider, this man woulde do me iniurie, I must stay him: and although he set vpon me, I will giue him the repulse: or else I will finde some meanes by the lawe too repress him. The thing that stayeth vs from troubling one another: is that when we purpose to defende our selues, and the wicked seke to annoy vs, we haue the law that setteth it selfe betwene both parties: for when we make that our refuge, it stayeth them from executing that whiche they purposed to do: and thus wee proceede, when wee haue too doo with mortall men. But let vs not thinke that God is ledde with any such affection. For why? what can wee do vnto him? can we make him hote or colde, as I haue sayde? So then God dooth not pursue vs for feare least wee shoulde preuent him, and sette our foote vpon his throte: for if he woulde but blowe vpon vs, wee must needes bee ouerthrowne: and they that so rise vp agaynst God, what doo they but breake their neckes? It is as much as if a man shoulde breake his fi-newes and veynes, whiles he laboureth to go vp on high, and can not: hee must needes misse of his purpose, and if hee will force himselfe beyonde measure, hee shall breake and bruse his whole bodie. This is then a deadly fall. So happeneth it when men are come to this diuel-lish pride to lift vp themselues agaynst God. VVe must not thinke then that our God is afearde of vs: for hee will mocke at such ouerweening, as it is sayde in the seconde Psalme. VVell, it is true, that men make much ado when they conspire together. And especially if kings and princes confederate and ioyne together agaynst the liuing God, and the people also agree with them, they make much ado: but it is but here beneath, and men are but as Grasshoppers, as the prophet Esay speaketh of the.
 The Grasshoppers haue so long legges that they can leap: but they must needes fall downe againe by & by. So then they wil kepe a great stir here: but will they leape about the cloudes? No. And in the meane season he that dwelleth in the high places will laugh them to skorne. This serueth to shew where Gods feat is, that is to wit, about the heauens: so that men can neuer reach vnto him: he shall there aboute in his rest laugh them to skorne, whiles they shall make here much ado. So let vs learne, that when God doth cite vs to appeare, and layeth matter to our charge, it is not for that we bee able to doo him any hurt: it is not for any respect that he hath of himself to stay vs, lest we should preuent to giue the onset vpon him first: no surely. VVherefore then? It is to make vs feele the euill that is in vs, that we might be thereby stirred vp to seeke some remedie, and with true repentance come vnto him, to be gouerned according to his wil. God therfore when he punisheth men, seeketh their helth, and in condemning mindeth to acquite them: or else when they be chastised, he mindeth to ratifie & confirme his iustice, to shewe that no euill shall remaine vnpunished. And therewithall also he intendeth too abate mens pride, for that they delight in their sinnes, and glorie therein. God will bring down all those things, when he bringeth them to iudgement. And so let vs learne, no more to flatter our selues, when wee haue any remorse inwardly, and bee condemned by the woorde of God, and men shewe vs oure faultes, and rubbe vs on the galled backe.

 Let vs learne, I say, no more to vse any startingholes: for we shall do nothing else but marre our market, for wee may bee sure that God is not afearde of vs as though we coulde do him any harme: but hee stirreth vs vp too the feeling of our sinnes, that wee might bee displeas'd wyth them: and by this meanes he reacheth his hande vnto vs, to leade vs to saluation: or else he mindeth to double our condemnation, that we may bee so much the more vnexcusable in that wee resist him, and beside the naughti-nesse that is in vs, do also become so wilful & stubborn, as we wil not bow, whē he goeth about to bring vs back vnto him. This is the summe of that which we haue to consider. Nowe Eliphaz addeth moreouer. Is not thy malice great? and are not thine iniquities infinite? Truly this is verie yll applyed to the person of Iob (as hath bene alreadie noted) but in the meane season we must holde vs to the generall doctrine, too the ende wee may applie it to our selues, as it is needfull for vs. Let vs note then, that by the mouth of a rude man, which had not such wise-dome as hee ought too haue had for the apt applying of the truth to his vse, the holy Ghost dooth shewe vs what we haue to doo, when wee come too reckon with God: namely too knowe that wee are in euerie poynt guiltie, and by all meanes bounde vnto him, and that hee is nothing at all bound vnto vs: and furthermore also that we can do him no harme. And that when he bringeth vs to the lawe, and condemneth vs, it is not for his owne pro-fite, but for our saluation and wealth? Yea let vs assure our selues that euen when we be condemned, it is to the ende that we might be afterwarde acquit by him, least we shoulde fall into that condemnation whereinto the wicked shall be contrayned to come in the ende. On the other side, let vs know, that when God bringeth vs thus to iudgement, it is to examin our sinnes, and too search out our whole life, to the ende we shoulde be displeas'd with oure sinnes. But in the meane season when wee shal haue ripped vp al that is in vs, & think that we know what is there: let vs vnderstande that wee haue not yet perceyued the hundred part of it. I speake euen of them that haue a cleare sight, and flatter not themselues nor foster any euill. For howsoever it bee, for as muche as men bee dull, and haue a short and dimme sight, it is certaine that they shall not perceyue the hundredth parte of theyr sinnes. But God who hathe a farre more cleare sight than wee haue, knoweth them.
 If wee fall intoo a sinne too daye, and bee manifestly conuicted thereof, wee will committe another by to morrow in the Morning: yea and the daye shall not passe without a great number of offences and transgressions. And we are euer new to begin againe. For we shall nor be conuinc'd of one fault onely, or of two, or of three, but of an hundred. And so what shall become of vs then? VVhen a man hath well examined his conscience, and findeth himselfe so many wayes guiltie, and then concludeth that God knoweth yet a hundred tymes more: where can hee become therevpon? Must wee not needes bee astonied at it? must not our heares stande vpright vpon our heades, and we bee plunged in the bottome of death? Thus much wee haue too note vpon this place: that is too witte, that as oft as in hearing the woorde of God preached, the vyces wherewith we be spotted, are condemned: euerie man muste enter intoo himselfe, and make his owne processe, and tarie not till God prosecute the lawe agaynst him, but say within himselfe, Alas I haue offended on this wyse, and not onely once, nor twice, but so many tymes and more. And if I haue offended on this wyse, there are diuerse other wayes: so that if God would turne vp my filthinesse, what a thing would it bee? I should be vtterly vndone. This I say would bring vs too humilitie and repentance: so as wee should not bee so slacke as wee haue beene too approche vnto our God: or at the least wee should bee no more so stubburne to stiuie agaynst his corrections. Yea and let vs bee so much the more carefull too doo thus, because wee see the moste part of men delight and glorie in their sinnes: and where they should fighe and grone, and bee vtterly ashamed, they will bee counted good Christians, yea of the perfectest that maye bee founde. In dedde they will saye generally: I am a man, and all men muste confesse themselves sinners: but yet there is none that doth better than I: I knowe none that hath a better will too liue well than I. And who are they that say thus? Filthie naughtypackes, yea and so filthie that the ayre stinketh of their wickednesse: and yet will they in thys case make a plaine mocke at God. Nowe (as I haue sayde) if wee examine our selues well, there shall remaine vntoo vs nothing but vtter confusion, infomuch that we must needes acknowledge our selues guiltie, not for one sinne, nor for two, but throughly and wholly, knowing that wee are accursed of God, and most miserable, were it not that hee hath pitie and compassion on vs. To bee breefe, wee are heere taught, that men must not confesse themselves sinners before God lightly, and as it were for fashion sake: (as they doo whiche thinke it ynough to say: oh I do not denie but that there bee some faultes in me.) No, we must not do so: but we must make the burthen so heauie as wee can beare it no more. For indeed so shall God be truly glorified: which is not when men say that they haue some small infirmities and imperfections in them: but when with Dauid they speake of the greatnesse of theyr sinnes, and of the multitude of their iniquities. And as Daniell speaketh of it in his confession: who was an Angell in comparison of other men, and yet hee sayeth, I haue confessed my sinnes, and the sinnes of my people. Hee speaketh not as of some small fault: but he sayeth, oure sinnes, O Lorde, are great and outrageous. And so let vs learne too acknowledge what wee are, yea and that in suche sort, as God may bee truly glorified throughly and for the whole. Thus muche for one poynt. And what hope may wee haue that God will receyue vs, and bee fauourable and mercifull vntoo vs, if wee bee not as it were ouerwhelmed with our sinnes that wee haue committed? Oure Lorde Iesus sayth not, Come vntoo mee all yee that say, I am a sinner, there are infirmities in mee: no hee sayeth not so. But all yee that are loden and wearie, whose shoulders dou bende vnder the weight of your sinnes. These are they that bee called of Iesus Christ, too the ende they may finde mercie in him, and in his grace: and not they that so mocke with God, making a light confession, and beeing not once touched in their hartes. This is it that wee haue to note vpon this worde. Furthermore, to come to such a knowledge, wee must particularly examine the sinnes wee haue committed: for a man shall neuer truly say, I am as it were throwne intoo the bottome of hell, vnlesse hee bee well searched out, and haue considered his sinnes, and marked them well one after another. Vnlesse then we do thus particularly examine our selues, we shall neuer perceyue our iniquities to be infinite and innumerable. For this cause is the matter here couched in this order. For Eliphaz after hee hath pronounced in generall termes, that the sinne of Iob was great and his iniquities infinite, sayeth: Hast thou not spoyled him that was naked? hast thou not taken a pledge without a cause? Hast thou not withdrawne the brcal from him that was a hungred? Hast thou not denyed him water too drinke that was a thirst? And in the same season wast not thou confederate with men full of violence? This is the cause why God dooth nowe persecute thee. It is true (as we haue already sayde) that Eliphaz doth Iob great iniurie and wrong: but in the meane season the spirite of God intendeth heere to teach vs the order which we must kepe for to be truly humbled before God, lest wee become hard harted, and by that meanes prouoke his vengeance in stryuing agaynst him. To be breefe, let vs note that men shall neuer feele themselves sinners as they ought to do, except they doo particularly consider themselves, and afterwarde enter into an account as it were by parcelmeale. True it is that wee can neuer make an ende, but wee must alwayes conclude with Dauid: VVho can vnderstande his faultes? But yet wee maye not therefore say, that things muste bee passed ouer lightly, and not bee searched out to the ground. If an earthly iudge can bee sharpe witted, and attentiu too heare a processe, which is but for the life of one man: must not we, I praye you, when wee haue offended oure God, haue therein a greater care? yea and when the processe is not criminall, but onely for some small summe of money: yet must the iudge looke ncerely too it, too see whether there bee witnesses too it, whether in their processe they haue proceeded aright, and that the things be verified: and yet the controuersie shall bee but for ten or twentie Florens, for an hundred crownes, or for some other tryfle. And if the iudge doo not his duetie, hee muste needes bee counted guiltie before God as a theefe: for he is worse than a theefe, seeing that he stealeth an other mans goodes and substance, and that which appertaineth to one, he giueth vnto another. And when God dooth so farre honour vs as too make vs iudges of our owne liues, yea and doth it for our saluation: shall we, I praye you, be excused, if we be negligent, and close vp our eies at that which is so good & profitable for vs? It is certain that we shal not. So the let vs wey wel that which I haue touched: that is to wit, that men shal neuer truly know themselves sinners, as they ought to doo, and as it is requisite, vntill they haue examined their liues particularly. And in dedd we see how Dauid vseth the matter. For one fault onely bringeth him into the middes of the sea: when he seeth that hee hath committed so heynous an offence before God, as too bee the cause of the cruell murder, not onely of one man, but of many, whyles he went about to kil Urias. Therefore whe he saw the wickednes of his sin, the enormitie therof constraineth him, not only to think vpon that fault alone: but also to consider himselfe more ncerely,

Dan. 9. 1. 20

neerely, yea and to behold himselfe as in the mids of the Sea, and to condemne himselfe vterly. Thus also must we do. And therefore the popish shrifte was a diuelishe thing, when they would haue men shriue themselues in the priests eare for to spew out their sinnes there, as if a drunkard should goe spew out his wine, when he hath taken in somuch that his stomake is not able too beare it. God then wil not haue vs to make such a confession: for it is cleane contrarie and repugnant to his word. On the other side also hee will not haue vs too saye at one word, I haue offended: and to passe ouer the coales lightly (as the prouerb is heere in this countrey) but to consider ourselues neere at hand, and euery man to enter into his owne conscience, and too acknowledge thus: well, I am not only gilty before God for one fault alone, but for such a fault and such a fault: and not only for one time, but I still fall to it againe. VVhen we examine ourselues thus after suche a speciall sorte, wee may well conclude: Lorde our iniquities are infinite, our transgressions are innumerable. This is it wherein God will be glorified. Thus must the poore sinners be touched too the quicke, and wounded in their conscience, that they may be displeas'd with their sinns. In deede they that confess themselves in generall termes and saye, I am a sinner as all other men are: do well declare that they be not touched inwardly in the bottome of their hart, and that they cannot tell what it is to know their sinnes for to be displeas'd with thē. But as for vs, let vs learne to searche all our sinnes euen to the bottome: and when wee haue gathered any number, let vs knowe that there is a hundred times more, and let vs be ashamed in ourselues, and acknowledge the condēnation, sighing before God, and saying: alas Lord it is true that our sinnes are many in number, and our iniquities infinite: but let the multitude of thy mercies be poured vpon vs, as Dauid spea- Pf. 40. c. 13

all oure sinnes, is when it pleaseth God too couer them, and of his goodnesse to do them away, and to cleanse vs from them by the power of his holy spirite.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults desiring him to make vs haue a better feeling of them than we haue had: and on the other side too make vs behold his holy maiestie, to the end that being as it were quite thrown downe, wee may bee raysed vp againe by none other meanes but by his mercie and grace which he hath shewed vs in our Lord Iesus Christ. And in the meane season let vs come and yeld ourselues to the great sauoure, as he calleth vs vnto him to reward vs with the crowne of glory, hauing no respect to so many miseries as are in vs. So shall we all say, O God most mightie and heavenly father. &c.

The lxxxiiij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the xxij. Chapter.

This Sermon doth prosecute the exposition of the sixth seuen and eight verses, and after ward of the texte beere adioyned.

9. Thou hast let the vvidovves go emptie, and the arme of the fatherlesse hath bin broken.
10. And therefore the snares do compass thee about, and sodaine feare doth trouble thee.
11. And darknesse maketh that thou canst not see, and the great vvaters couer thee.

Man mighte maruell howe and for what cause Eliphaz heere accuseth Iob of suche crimes as were neuer found in him. For (as we shall see hereafter) Iob had bin a very courteous and liberall man all the days of his life: as he protesteth that hee hath bin the defender of the fatherlesse, the protectoure of widowes, the eye of the blind, the leggs of the lame, and that his hād was neuer closed to the needie. VVherefore then doth Eliphaz accuse him too haue taken away the goodes and substance of his neighbours by violence: that hee was not pitifull, that hee had bin a cruell man, that he had deuoured his goodes himselfe alone? It seemeth that in these things there is no reason. But we must note that Eliphaz iudgeth of the person of Iob by the affliction: and this is the cause that hee mistaketh all things: as we haue shewed before, that we must beware when God punisheth a man, that wee do not conclude therevpon that hee is a wicked man, and that he is handled according to his deserts: for that is a setting the cart before the horse, as the Prouerb saith. Euen so dealeth Eliphaz, and therefore his iudgement is corrupted. Furthermore that which hee heere propoundeth, must not be simply vnderstanded: but it is as much as if he should exhorte Iob well too consider his whole life, and seeing that he is so afflicted after a straunge fashion, he should conclude that he had bin a wicked man, and that his offences were so outrageouse, that God had powred a horrible vengeance vpon him. As if he should say, see if in the time of thy prosperitie, thou hast not bin cruell: Looke if thou haue not constreynd poore men too euill things: Consider if thou haue not denied him aide that required it of thee? VVay with thy selfe whither thou haue not bin a cōremner of God: & seeing that now thou remainest yet in it, and wilt iustify thy selfe: it is a token that thou makest a piaine mocke at God, for it is time for thee to humble thy selfe now or neuer. And seeing thou art thus thrown downe, must thou not needes acknowledge thy iudge, and condemne thy selfe? But now thou still continuest in the minde too fight againste God: I must needes therefore conclude that thou arte a mocker & a scorner. Thus doth Eliphaz heere proceede. Heereby we see what a thing it is to iudge so rashly: for we consider neither that which is good in men, nor the vertues that God hath placed in them, and wee vse trifling and light coniectures where no coloure or shew is. Had Eliphaz euer seene in Iob that thing whiche heere he layth to his charge? No surely, as Iob doth afterwarde declare it. VVhy then doth Eliphaz thus reprove him? bycause he is foreincombered with this foolish fantasie, seeing that Iob is grieuouly punished of God, it must needes be that he hath committed some crimes, yea and that God hath vterly reiected him. This is an euil conclusion that Eliphaz maketh. And why? God will sometimes punish his seruants not according to their faultes that they haue committed: but to trie their pacience: and beside that, to shew, that if he deale so with a green tree, what shall become of that which is drie? Furthermore he intendeth to mortify them concerning this world, and to teach them, that the miseries which we suffer in thys world, shall be no hinderance to the blessednesse that is promised vs. though it be hidden, and is not shewed in this world. VVe see then that God hath many causes to afflict his. Now if we cōclude thervpō, that his afflicting of thē is for that they led a cursed & wicked life: it is the next way to peruert al. But yet ther is a thīg behind that is worse: which is that we enter into foolish cōiectures. And what are they? This mā hath bin to mēs sight a man of a good cōuersation: & how then shall we find in him the cause wherfore he hath deserued to be so delt withal? This is it that giueth vs occasion to dream, and dote as Eliphās doth here. VVherfore we must be more sober & refrain our selues whē we go about to giue iudgemēt vpon our neighbours. And therefore let vs not go to it at aduētures, but let vsexamin well their life: and whē we know a man to bee a wicked person, and a despiser of God, so as his faults be notoriouse: then we may well say, that God punisheth him. And why: to the end that we should be taught by his example, and that the same might be a profitable lesson for vs. Besides that, whē we perceue not in a mā the cause why god shuld punish him seuerely: if any calamitie happē vnto him, let vs stay our iudgemēt, & practise that which is here alledged out of the psalm, that is, let vs be rather pitiful & inclined to the good part, & think, alas, if our Lord would deale with vs according to our deserts, what shuld becom of vs? For we ar no better thā this mā: yea we may say that we be worse, and yet we see how he is plagued. By this let vs lern, that God wil lead vs farder, & sheweth vs that our life is nothing: & that moreouer he intendeth to exercise his diuers battels, and whē they shal haue shewed thēselues patient in the mids of their afflictions, he will haue thē comfort themselues in this, that they knowe there is a better rest prepared for thē in another place. Thus then must we in this cace procede. Now let vs particularly examine that which is touched heere. Eliphās saith, Thou hast taken a gage of thy neighbour without cause, thou hast spoiled him that was naked. Heere we see that our sinnes ceasse not to be odious in the sight of God, although mē cōdemne vs not. For if a mā be so cruell to take a pledge of some poore man when he lendeth him at his neede: if he take from him either the couerlet of his bed, or his coate wherwith he shuld be clothed: no mā will sue him in the law for it. For if he should be sued there, he shuld be acquitted. And why: he hath lent him his money, and it was lawfull for him to take a pledge for his assurance. Before men, hee can by no meanes bee constreyned: but we must not therefore thinke to be acquitted before God. And therefore when we thinke and perswade ourselues to be iust and innocent before God, by cause wee haue not bin reprobud before men: wee are deceiued. For worldly pollicie serueth not to bring vs to the perfectiō, that God requireth of vs as of his childrē: it is sufficient that by it we be so maintained that euery man may inioy his right, that the strōgēt carrie it not away, and that deceit, extorcion, iniuries, & outrages be punished. To this purpose should worldly policie serue. But whē we come before God, it is not ynough for vs to alledge, I haue bin no theefe to be led to the galowes, or to bee whipped, I haue murdered no mā that I shuld be condēned to death, I haue committed no crime that bringeth with it eyther bodily punishmēt, or infamie. VVhē we shal haue alledged al this, it is to no purpose. And why: for if I haue born my neighbour but a secret grudge, I am already accounted a murderer before God. If I haue attempted to corrupt & abuse an other mans wife, or if I haue looked on hir vnchastly: lo I am cōdemned as a whoremonger, if I couet an other mā's goods, and seke to draw thē vnto me although mē do not cast it in my teeth, yet am I takē for a theefe before God. VVe may thē out of this place gather a profitable doctrine: which is that we may not flatter

ter ourselues whē mē cannot charge vs in our whole life that we haue bin sued in the law for any our misdeedes. To be short, though men may iudge vs as righteous as may be, yet must we not thinke that wee bee scaped for that. And what is the cause? he that shall haue taken a pledge for the assurance of his money, is counted before God sometime for a murderer. It is here said expressly, to take a pledge without a cause. And why? for simply the thing is not euil of it selfe, neither doth God vtterly reiect it, that is to witte that a man should take a pledge. For if it be lawfull to bie another mans goodes, it is lawfull to take a pledge. Behold, a feild or a medow is layd to pledge, which thing God doth not cōdemne: & likewise if they bring some part of their mouables: the same of it selfe ought not vtterly to be reiectēd: but it is sayde that it is euil to take a pledge without a cause. And how is that? Eliphās addeth his mind, so that we neede not to seeke any other glofe. He saith that Job hath taken a pledge of his neighbour, that he hath spoiled him that was naked. And this is according to that which our lord declareth in his law, namely that the pledges which we take, should not be of that which serueth to a mans ordinarie neede. For if a man be spoiled, and be a colde, if we be so cruel as to take his coate, the same is a kinde of murder. If a mā forgoe his bed for the releefe of his hunger, or lay his couerlet to pledge for corn or other things necessary for his sustenance: he that taketh it, is very vnkind. For so farfoorth as lieth in him, he killeth him: onely he chāgeth the kind of death: & it is asmuch as if a mā wer in danger to be hāged by his own hands, & I wil vntie the rope for him, but in steed of that, I will cut his throte. So then when a poore man shall haue nothing to eate, and shall be constrained to giue away his bed to get meate: this is to villanouse a crueltie, & such as can by no meanes be excused. And therefore our Lord saith in his law, take heed that the pledge of the poore man remaine not with thee al night. VVhē thou seest that the same serueth him to his necessary vse, & that he cannot be without it but he must susteine harme by it: restore it him againe: & if thou let the poore mā haue his bed againe and releue his necessitie, his sides shal blesse thee: & if thou haue restored vnto him his garment, so that he be not a cold, his body shal blisse thee. Cōtrariwise when a poore mā is put frō his bed & diseased through thy wickednes, for that thou hast bin so vngentle that thou woldest lēd him nothing without a pledge: although the poore mā do not cry for vēgeāce, but is as he wer dumb, yet shalt thou be accursed, & his necessity shal be sufficiēt to cal thee to accompt before the iudgemēt seate of god. This is now the mind of Eliphās. Yea saith he, thou hast spoiled him that was naked: that is to say, whē a poore mā came vnto thee, & required to borrow money of thee, thou diddest not cōsider when thou tookest a pledge of him, whether he gaue thee his coate, or his bed, or his potte, or his pāne, so that when he had bread, he knew not how to eate it: for thou hast takē frō him the thing wherof he stood in great neede. VVe see thē that for to walke sincerely before God, & to liue together as brethrē, it is not ynough for vs to kepe the earthly lawes & to do nothing against worldly policie: but we must ascend higher, that is, wee must keepe this equitie of nature, to do nothing to any other mā, but that which we wold that other men shuld do to vs. Therefore let euery man consider well what he wold that other mē shuld do to him, that is to say, what he wold iudge to stād with equitie, if he were in the like neede. Nowe there is none but can say very well, why should we not: for our Lord cōmādeth vs to cherish one another: and when I am hungrie, I am in dāger also to be a colde:

acold: and he that pulleth my coate of from my backe, dothe not he declare that hee seeketh nothing else but too cut my throte? wee can alledge this reason very well for our selues. Then if we do the like to another, shall there neede any other iudge than ourselues too condemne vs? This is a breste summe of that which we must learne out of this place. Nowe it foloweth afterwarde. Thou hast not giuen him water too drinke that was arbyst: thou hast withdranne thy bread from him that was biigrie. Heere Eliphaz sheweth that it mighte bee 10 that Iob was punished of God for that hee had not bin so pitifull towards men as to releue them in their neede. Nowe that we may gather some frute out of this doctrine, wee must leaue the person of Iob, as we haue before touched: and therefore let euery man consider himselfe when God visiteth vs, and dealeth with vs so rigorously, so as wee are compelled too feele our sinnes: I say lette vs examine the matter well, whether it bee not bycause wee haue not shewed suche courtesie towards oure neighbours as was commaun- 20 ded vs, and as wee ought too shew. Heere it is saide, that hee that stoppeth hys eares when the pore crieth vnto him, and requireth aide at his hande, shall crie himselfe, and shall not be hearde. Behold God threatneth vs, that if wee will not voutsafe too helpe them that require aide at oure handes, when wee haue power and meanes too do it, he will suffer vs to fall into some mischiefe, yea the richest and those that lyue most at ease: for God hathe in his hande many rods too chastize vs withall, whiche wee at the firste do not conceiue. Truth it is that they whiche are rich hope 30 they shall neuer fall intoo any perplexitie, and thinke that although trouble and confusion shoulde happen through the whole worlde, yet shulde they remayne in peace. But our Lorde declareth that they whiche will not helpe their neighbots at their neede, nor make any accounte of them, shall come intoo theyr place, and shall not be holpen, neither shall there be any to releue them: no they shall not bee hearde from aboue, and if they flee vnto God, the gate shall bee shut vnto them: 40 as it is saide, There shall be iudgement without mercy to him that would shew no mercy. And it is the most horrible threatning that can bee vsed against vs, when God declareth vnto vs that he will deale with vs without mercie. For what can wee looke for if God haue not mercie and pitie vpon vs? wee must needs all bee swallowed vp. Vndoutedly, God depriueth vs and barreth vs from all hope of his goodnesse, when we be so cruell towards oure neighbours. Therefore if God visite vs, and our afflictions bee great, let vs learne too searche out diligently the cause wherefore, and too examine the matter thus: goto, I haue had meanes to help those that stooode in neede of worldly goodes. But how haue I holpen them? haue I discharged my duetic heere- in? if there were any that had neede of my helpe, haue I indeuered my selfe to help him? if any came vnto me, was I redy to communicate my goodes vnto him? If we knowe that wee haue not done our duetic in this behalfe, let vs sigh before God, and knowe that he sheweth vs great fauoure to put vs in remembrance of our 50 faults. Furthermore let vs note, that all these are fond & foolish startingholes to say, VVhat? shoulde I leaue my selfe bare of mine owne goodes? is not that which God hath giuen me mine owne, to dispose thereof as muche as shall seeme good vnto me, and no more? And if I haue goodes, I haue not stolne them: and if I do no man wróg heerein, why shuld it not be lawfull for me to inioy that which I hold of God? For I giue him thanks for it, acknowledging that it was giuen me of him. I say we will thinke it wel done to alledge al this. For although our lord do giue vnto the riche that whiche they possesse, and though they haue it by a lawfull meane in suche sorte, that they can protest that they haue it of him: yet followeth it not that they may vse ic in suche sorte, as they shoulde haue no regarde vnto the necessitie of another man, or that they should do it but lightly. For wher God bestoweth riches vpon vs abundantly, he doth vs the honoure to make vs his stewards and receiuers. Nowe we see that a receiuer hathe not onely the charge to receiue and heape vp goodes, but also to distribute them when his master commandeth him. Seeing then that our Lord appointeth vs as stewards of the goodes which hee putteth into our hands: hee will also haue vs to distribute them. And where? VVe knowe that he hath no neede of vs to disburse any for him: he wold haue vs then to help our neighbours and those that stand in neede: and therefore they that haue abundace of welth must not alledge, 20 O this is mine owne, yea it is so indeede: howbeit with this condition, that thou shuldest helpe those that stand in neede thereof. But that thou shouldest deuoure it thy selfe alone, God hathe not giuen it thee too that ende. Truth it is that no laue can bee made in this behalfe as saint Paule declareth. For it is not as if a Prince should leuis a subfodie, for he will require some quantitie of the goodes that euery man possesseth, and therevpon must the cessment be made. God dothe vse no such proceeding: for hee loueth those that offer vnto him of theyr 30 mere liberalitie, and (as saint Paule saith) with a cheerefull hart. The rich then must not giue vnto the poore as of necessitie and constraint: but with a free and fráke hart. And therefore if our neighbours bee hungrie and thirly, and we knowing of their necessitie do not releue them: we be not to be excused. For then we haue deuoured and abused the benefits that God hathe put into our hands. VVhen we do thus, I say, it is certayne that God will count vs giltye as murderers. And thus much concerning this verse where it is saide, that hee 40 which is punished of God hath denied to giue a poore hungrie man bread, and hath not giuen him water too drinke that was thirly. No v it is added furthermore, themightie man in the meane season possessed the earth, and he that had authoritie dwelt therein. This serueth to shew that the riche men haue no compasfion bycause they liue at ease. For they knowe not what it is to stand in neede, they knowe not what necessitie meeneth: and therefore they are not touched therewith. To be shorte, when they be full, they thinke that all the world is so as well as they. This is the summe of Eliphaz mind in thys place.

Nowe hee applieth the same to the person of Iob. Hee vpbraideth him that the earth was not made for a smal number of men as the rich men thinke, which haue neuer ynough, but dayly are purchasing more and more, saying thus too themselues: This would serue well for my purpose, I must needes get in such a peece of ground. They neede but fixe foote when they haue their full measure, that is to say when they shall be buried: and he that hath goodes ynough to find a hundred persons is yet aferd he should starue for hunger. Like vnfatiable whirlpooles as they are, they wold not content themselues if they had the whole earth in possession, but woulde (if they could) pull the Sunne out of the skie. For it greeueth them that the poore shuld haue so much in common with them as to inioy the brightnesse of the sunne: Thus these whirlpooles would deuoure all, and thinke that the worlde is made for none but them.

Eliphaz

2. Co. 9. b. 7.

Eliphaz reproveth heere such vanitie, according also as it is worthy to be condemned: howbeit he doth not well to applie the same to the person of Iob, and yet this doctrine is profitable for vs. So then let vs vnderstand, that if a man abuse his credite, and cease not to gather deceitfully by cause hee hath alwayes wherewith to compass his matters and too bring them too passe, but is of vnstauncht and vnstanchable couetousnesse, and saith, I will haue such a thing, and I can yet wind in such a thing, and therefore nippeth and pincheth on euery side: it is al one as if he would haue the earth to be made for him alone. And this is it that is ment heereby, saying, that they whiche haue authoritie in the earth dwell therein. True it is that our Lord would, there should be gouernment: it is not amisse that there be rich men and poore: and both are created of God saith Salomon. In so saying he meeneth two things, that is to witte, that the riche should not despise the poore for as much as they are the creatures of God: nor the poore condemne the rich, for as much as God would there should be both riches and pouertie. So then it is very lawfull for a man to haue riches in possession, and to inioy that which hee hath: But yet must he know, that we liue in the world with condition to vse mutuall participatiō one to another, and God doth not only giue an habitation or dwelling to the that can liue on their owne, but also saith that he hath giuen the earth for an inheritance to men. And the same is spoken generally. And therefore although there be some in the world that haue not one foote of lande: yet must they haue a dwelling place in the world, at leastwise for their money, if they haue it not of their owne: yea euen in a straunge country, if they bee not in their natie country, and if God will so trie them. And if the riche that dwell by them, go about to driue them a farre off by spreading of their wings abroad: it is as much as if they were angry with God, and in despite of him would take the whole world into their hand. This is it that we haue to note in this place: and it is a profitable lesson, to teach them which are aduanced too credite, not to be blinded with pride, nor to abuse their authoritie as they are wont to do. Then if a man be rich, let him consider that hee must not therefore occupie the whole earth. If he be in authoritie, hee must not therefore despise the poore which are of no estimation. No: but they must support one another & so behaue theselues, that he which is rich may offer some meanes to the poore to liue with him, and that they may get their liuing honestly when they trauell for his aduantage. Let him that is poore (although he haue nothing of his owne) content himselfe, seeing that it pleaseth God to make him able to get his liuing without doing iniurie too other men: and let them so deale one with another, as the common societie may be mainteyned, and euery man be nurrished and susteyned. Thus then are the rich men warned not to despise the poore so proudly as they were wot to do: and the poore also to walke according to their degree and small habilitie: and all men to liue as though they were lodged in this world by the hande of God and nurrished by his grace. This is the summe of that which we are taught in this place. It is said moreouer, that Iob had sent away the widdowes without any succoure or aide, and that he had broken the arme of the fatherlesse: that is to say, that he had so throwen them downe: that whereas the poore fatherlesse should haue bin succoured, they were rather oppressed. And heere is speciall mentiō made of widdowes and fatherlesse children, by cause the Lord doth specially commend them for that they haue lest succoure. For the wife is vnder the shadow of hir husband and vnder his protection so long as she hath him alieue: and he also that is come to mans state, is already able too mainteine himselfe. But a poore widdowe hath neither Counsell nor meanes: and a poore fatherlesse child knoweth not what things meane. These therefore are more redy to be spoiled, and therefore our Lord would haue them so muche the more commended: for we are wont to pleasure them of whome we looke for recompence. But contrariwise God intendeth to proue our charitie, whither we will do good to them that are not able to requite vs. And besides that, looke where men be oppressed, there must wee applie such meanes as God hath giuen vs. The same is to be seene in widdowes & fatherlesse children: & therefore God hath commended them vnto vs. Hee ioyneth also straungers with them, by cause they haue not many kinsfolke, nor are alied or lincked too a long traine of friends by whome they might be maintained. So much the more it becommeth the children of God to haue pitie vpon such persons. To be brieue, we see that God in his lawe and throughout the whole holy Scriptures, declareth himselfe to be more greuously offended when widdowes and fatherlesse children and straungers are afflicted: than when any other men are hurt or harmed, by cause that they be destitute of all succoure. And therefore so much the more must we haue pitie on them: and by cause they haue no meanes to requite vs, we shewe ourselues to bee the children of God, when we extend our charitie to them, and also God doth acknowledge the same, and putteth it in his accounts: and therefore let vs not doubt but it is much more profitable so to entreat the straungers, widdowes, and fatherlesse children, than if men had already recompenced vs. Contrariwise when we vex those that as now do lie open to so many iniuries, and do adde euill vpon euill: we are come to the accomplishment of all mischief, and it is a token that wee are voide of all humane iudgment, and become like vnto brute beasts: and therefore Eliphaz (to reprove thys sinne) saith heere, thou hast reiected the widdow and not succoured hir: thou hast not holpen the fatherlesse when he was troden vnder foote. To be short, let vs assure ourselues that the Lord would haue the weake to bee supported by them that haue best meanes and are most able. If we do not so, we shew ourselues not to be the children of God. For wherevnto doth God looke? or wherewith doth he chiefly exercise his mercie and pitie? vpon them that are oppressed and can beare no more. It is saide that wee must resemble our heavenly father. The triall whereby we should shew that we are not called in vaine to be his childre, is when we are become like vnto him. Now we know that although God be pitifull to all hys creatures; and although his goodnesse be poured out vpon all men: yet neuertheless he telleth vs specially that he regardeth them that are troden vnder foote and oppressed through iniuries and violences, and that he will helpe them, and be the defender of the fatherlesse, and mainteine the widdowes and strangers. Seing that God declareth thus much: it behoueth vs to be like vnto him in that behalfe: and if wee do the contrarie, it is a token that we forsake God, and the fauoure that he hath shewed vs in choozing vs to be his children. Thus much we haue to note in this place. Now let vs com to that which Eliphaz saith: For this cause do snares compass thee on euery side; and sodaine feare maketh thee astonished. We must alwayes remember that which hath bin declared afore: namely that this was misapplied to the person of Iob. But therewithall let vs beare in mind generally also, that these things are laid before our eyes, to the end we should know that all miseries and calamities are chastizechastizements which God layth vpon vs for our finnes. Truth it is (as hath bin alreedy saide) that God will not punish the finnes of men all alike: neuerthelesse we suffer not any thing but we are thereby admonished to examine our liues, and to sigh and grone before God, acknowledging our selues gilty before his maiestie. Thus much for one point. Furthermore, although God purpose some other end than the punishing of our finnes: yet it behoueth euery of vs to consider himselfe when he is visited of God, and not to shut our eyes when God doth shew vs the light: if the at any time we be afflicted: Let vs vnderstande that God hath laid his snare for vs. And why? For that we were as wild beasts. For if we had walked as the shepe of his fold, he would not haue layd his snares to take vs. No man will lay snares for Eawes and wethers: they are beasts that are easily handled: a mā needes but whistle and they come. So then if we would willingly com at the only voice of our god: he shuld not neede to hunt after vs, nor to lay snares for vs: for so me are wont to do with wild beasts. Let vs know then that if God deale rigorously with vs: it is for that we haue rebelled against him: and therevpon let vs examine oure liues, and enquire whether we haue not offended him. And moreouer when such feare commeth vpon vs that we be astonied therewith: bycause we haue not walked quietly in the obedience of our God. For vnto the that are at peace with him, he promisseth that he will keepe them, although they were beseeged of their enemies: and that although they were in the midds of many dangers, yet shall they be alwayes in safetie, and sleepe quietly and rest vnder his shadow. Therefore if we be astonied with feare: let vs vnderstand that God punisheth vs bycause wee haue not simply walked vnder his obedience. To be shorte, euen as peace is a singular gifte of God: so troubles that come vpon vs, are curses sent from him. I said that peace is a singular gift of God: and howe is that? when we shall haue called vpon God with a true assurance that he will heare vs, and that he requireth nothing else but that wee shoulde come vnto him: it is an inestimable benefyte, and such a treasure as can neuer be sufficiently valued: neither can we obtaine the same but by the meanes of faith, when we know that God is our father in our sauioure Iesus Christ. Now this is not vnderstanded onely of the eternall saluation of oure soules: but also for that in this world we haue the priuiledge to runne vnto God, and to commend our liues into his hands, and to seeke him in all our needes and necessities. VVhen wee shall haue gotten this peace, that we can stay our selues vpon the prouidence of God, and cast all our careks and cares vpon him, it is a singular benefyte that God hath bestowed vpon vs. Contrariwise, whē we are troubled, it is said it is an extreme curse. And why? Is not the state and condicion of man most miserable when hee is in such feare and astonishment, as hee seeth nothing but daungers on euery side of him, and yet cannot come vnto God for to find rest and assurace in him? when man is in such feare, is hee not alreedy as it were in hell? Yes surely. And therefore let vs assure oure selues that although all thinges come too passe as wee woulde wishe: yet if wee haue not peace, it is nothing. Howbeit lette vs note also, that wee must not seeke oure peace in this world, as the wicked do: for so long as they are not troubled nor molested, they perswade maruelouse thinges to themselues, they triumph therevpon, and do all things to spite God withall. VVe must not haue a peace that procedeth of retchlesnesse and blockisnesse. And why? For they which so triumph in this world, haue neuer any peace, but while they forget God: and that is a cursed peace. It were better for vs to be in trouble that we might come vnto oure God, and seeke meanes to be reconciled vnto him, than too bee so past feeling. Let vs note then that our peace may not be only while we liue at ease: But it must be grounded in God, and haue respect vnto him. In the meane season, let vs know that when we are in trouble, it is God that visiteth vs for our finnes: yea and also by this meanes he calleth vs vnto him to the end we should seeke such peace as he hath promised vs from him. In deede Eliphaz sheweth, that the troubles whereof hee speaketh, and the feare wherewith Iob (as he thought) was seized, were only for that he could not trust in the goodnesse and fauoure of God. And this is a very profitable thing and worthy to be noted. For it may happen that euen the faithfull shall be in great troubles and anguishes (as they are not altogether without feeling) and yet God ceaseth not to giue them light. VVhen they see themselues in this case, as it were in deepe dungeons: yet haue they alwayes some light from God: they feele his goodnesse: and when they haue receiued some comfort, he leadeth them stil foorth so as they be stayed vpon his promise whiche is infalible: To be brieft, what assault soeuer they haue, they alwayes lift vp their heads looking for their saluation fro him. It is as when a man is ready too bee drowned, and God reache him his hand: Behold hee is as though hee were restored to life againe and looketh vp to Heauen. But when we haue no light, and darknesse compasseth vs on euery side, so that wee can perceiue no goodnesse from God, nor that he is minded too shewe vs any fauoure: then are we in a wofull case.

Therefore if we will be assured in all these spirituall battells which we must abide in this world, which are so many feares and troubles as God sendeth to trie oure constancie and stedfastnesse: Let vs determine with our selues to set our eyes vpon this lighte that hee sheweth vs, that is to say, vpon the promises that hee maketh vs which are conteyned in his word. And if we herken diligently vnto them, to stay and repose our selues wholly vpon them: Let vs not doubt but hee will giue vs suche quiet and rest, as we may say, Lord I will not be aferd of any euill, although I shoulde walke in the shadowe of death so that I be vnder the shadow of thy wings and in thy protection.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, desiring him to giue vs such knowledge of them, as it may not onely cause vs to confesse them, but also to hate them, and too bee displeas'd with oure selues for them, and too seeke meanes to be absolued of God from them, beseeching him also that he will so guide vs by his holy spirit, as we being wholly in his subiection and obedience, may seeke nothing else but to yeld ourselues obediēt vnto his will. And for as much as he commandeth vs to liue together in this world as brethren: let vs continue in this brotherly vnitie which he hath consecrated among vs, and let euery man employ himselfe to help his neighbours to the end that wee may vnfeynedly call vpon him as oure father, and that he may acknowledge and auouch vs for his children: as he hath giuen vs the testimonie of this adoption in our harts by his holy spirit, and by the grace that hee hath shewed vs in our sauioure Iesus Christe. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs but also to all people and nations of the earth. &c.

The.lxxxv.Sermon,which is the third vpon the xxij. Chapter.

12. Is not God on high in the heauen? and behold the heighth of the starres how high they are.
 13. And yet thou saist, how should God know? can he iudge through the Cloudes?
 14. Do not the clouds hide him that he cā see nothing? & he vvalketh in the circle of the heauē.
 15. Hast not thou marked the old vvay vvherein vvicked men haue vvalked?
 16. VVhich vvere throwvn dovn before their time & their fōundation vvvas as a riuer dried vp.
 17. And they said vnto God, depart from vs, vvhat can the almightie do vnto vs?

As we saw before, Eliphaz did wrongfully accuse Iob, as though hee had liued wickedly among men: And now perceiuing that Iob did not acknowledge the condemnation too be true: he addeth, that hee is a despizer of God, as in deede men fall into such extremitie when they be giuen to euil, that being corrected at the hand of God they do not returne, but are rather somuch the more hardned. Therefore whē the scourges of God cannot tame vs, it is a token that we are vtterly past hope of recouerie. For the true medicine too bring vs againe into the way of saluation, is that God should shew vs our faults and make vs feele them. They then that so kicke against the hand of God, declare thereby that they are past amendment, and that their diseases are incurable. True it is that this is ill attributed to Iob, but yet we must follow the order whiche wee haue hitherto kept, that is too wite, that seeing the doctrine is good and holy, euery one of vs must take some profyte by it. Let vs firste note, that they which do not bumble themselues vnder the hande of God when they be chastized by aduersitie, declare that they haue no religion nor faith in them, nor aught else but the cōtempt of God. For although we haue bin so foolish as to stray out of the way, and too continue our wicked lyfe while God did wink at vs: yet it is time to amend them or neuer, when God dothe visit vs and as it were constreine vs by force. If God did but speake vnto vs: it ought to be ynough for vs: but when hee striketh vs, hee doth as it were adde some helpe to his word, bycause we are too dull vpon the spurre. Now if this will not amend vs: what should a man say, but that we be as it were children past grace? This is it then that we haue first to note. And concerning the person of Iob, seeing that he which was (as wee haue already declared, and shall see heereafter more at large) of such perfection, was for all that blamed and susteyned such reproch, as to be accused to haue bin a cruell man and an vniust dealer, and finally was counted a contemner and despiser of God: If at any time mē do condemne vs so wrongfully let vs learne to be patient. For God wil suffer vs so to be blamed, to the end we may learne to walke as it were before him, and not to be led away with ambition, nor to hunt after the glory and praise of men, but to content ourselues when our consciences be quieted before God. VVe know that of nature we are inclined to such foolish pride, as we woulde be prayسد: and if there be any goodnesse in vs, we woulde that all the world should know it, and that no man shuld refuse vs. Now you see heere. how ambition is mixed with it, insomuch that it is ynough for vs if mē esteeme vs, and that our pertnesse may bee rayfed heere in thys world: and in the meane season God is quite forgotten. And therefore it is for our profite that our Lord suffereth men to do vs wrong: and that when we go about to do well, they turne it all to euil, so as we be blamed and slandered by them: this tendeth to our profite, to the end that we should learne too haue God for oure iudge, and content our selues when we be allowed of him: and then 10 although the whole world reiect vs, let vs set light by it. And if we thinke this too hard: let vs set before our eies the example of Iob, who farre passed vs in all holynesse, and yet we see how he was wrongfully misused: and this was not done without the will of God, to the ende that he might learne this lesson that I haue spoken of, namely that we must not seeke to be honoured of men, but that it ought to suffice vs to be allowed of God, and that our consciences do testifye vnto vs that hee doth accept vs. Now let vs come to the reasons that Eliphaz vsfeth here.

20 VVhat knowest thou not that god is about? Behold the heighth of the starres how high they are. For as much as Eliphaz accused Iob of vngodlinesse & cōtempt of God: he vsfeth an exhortation. At the lestwise (saith he) behold God. And indeede the only meanes to awake vs whē we are false asleepe, and when we thinke not on our sinnes, or when there is any pride or rebellion in vs, is only too thinke vpō God, and the same will be sufficient to bring vs againe to reason. And why? For whiles wee remayne heere in this world, we conceiue such a fleshy assurance, that we care for nothing, and no maruell: for we see nothing neere vs that can trouble vs, considering that already of our selues we are full of pride. VVell then we must come to God: and when we behold his maiestie, the spite of our teeth wee must learne too cast downe our head, and to reuerence the infinite highnesse that is in him. And therefore the order that Eliphaz keepeth heere is very good: and we ought to obserue it for a rule. As oft as we are not touched with our sinnes, nor do thinke vpon the vengeance of God, but are drunken with oure pleasures, and too bee brieft, do delight in mischief and cannot be broughte too repentaunce, the very remedy is to thinke thus with ourselues: VVell, there is a iudge before whome we must render an account. And what is he? is he a mortall creature? alas, No: when we come to conceiue the incomprehensible maiestie and inestimable highnesse that is in God, wee must needes bee so abashed as to humble our selues, and be no more puffed vp as we were.

40 This is the mind of Eliphaz. Is not God (saith he) on high in heauen: VVhy doth he thus speake of the feate of God, but too discerne him from the creatures and things of this world? Truth it is that God (as he is of an infinite essence) is not inclosed in the heauens: hys maiestie is spred through the whole worlde, hee doth also fill the earth, as it is declared. The heauens do not comprehend thee, (saide Salomon) when hee dedicated the Temple: and God himselfe in his prophet Esay saith, Heauen is my royall throne, and the earth is my footstool. God then is not enclosed in Heauen: and yet is it not without cause that the scripture speaketh so. And why? there is in heauen as it were such a marke of maiestie and glory, that when we lift vp our eyes thither, we must needes be moued therewith. Lette vs beholde the earth heere beneth: true it is that the works of God that are ther to be seene, do stirre vs vp to magnify him. Howbeit for as much as we are not touched with suche a reuerence whē we haue walked about here and ther beneth, as whē we looke vp to heauen, bycause there is a

mark and print of the maiestie & glory of god: let vs not think it strange that the holy scripture, whē it intēdeth to moue vs to honor God, saith vnto vs, that he is there aboue in heuē. And indeed if it shuld be said vnto vs, god is in this world: forasmuch as we be carnal, and our wits alway bēding downwards, we wold fastē him to a pillar, to a house, or to a mountain, or else we wold set him ouer hed & cares in som riuer: such as the fantasies of mē. Now to the end that whē we think vpō god, we might lern to imagin no erthly thing, but passe beyōd this world, and not stay on our own senses & fātāsies: it is said that god dwelleth in the heauēs, to the end we shuld know that it lieth not in our power to inclose him in this world, & to conceiue what he is (for we can neuer cōprehēd him: our senses haue to smal a measure) but rather that we shuld lern to reuerēce him with al humilitie. For this cause it is said that god is aboue in heauē. And if this same wer wel known vnto vs, it is certain that al superstitiō wold easily be redressed: as in deed it is sprong of this, that mē wold comprehend god according to their own capacite, wher as they are not able to hold him. For alway their senses wold faine be occupied in searching out curiously what God is, & ther vpō they forge him, & cōceiue him to be such a one as semeth best to thē: as though god were carnal. And this is the cause why he draweth vs so carefully frō thēce, & sheweth vs that we must imagin nothing of him as we think good: for it is blasphemy & sacrilege so to trāsform him, for that we turne his truth into a lie, as S. Paul speketh of it. Al they that forge idols, & trāsform God according to their own brain, are falsaries: nor for falsifying any publik writing, or matter of record, but for abolishing the maiestie of God: & this is such a heinous treason against God, as it passeth all other. Therefore all they which build such foolish fantasies according to their own appetite, ar gilty of such treson. So much the more thē ought we to remēber wel this lessō which is taught vs here: that is to wit, that god is aboue: to the end that as oft as we speak of him, we may know that our senses shal faile vs, & vanish away an hundred times before we can com to that highnes: & that we must worship him humbly, cōceiuing nothing els of him, but as he hath taught vs by his word. For that is al our wisdome: and (as I haue said) if this doctrin wer wel printed in our harts, the world shuld be purged of al superstitiōs that haue alway reigned in it. How hapneth it that men haue so forged idols, & thought that God was not nigh thē, except they had some remēbrāce (as they say) or figure of him: It was for that men toke leaue to comprehend God, & to think of him that which was nothing so. This was then the fōūtain of all superstitiō: and whē mē did thus make them visible shapēs, it was bicause they knew not the highnes of god, nor his incōprehēfible maiestie. And this is it that we ar taught, whē the people of Israel requiring to haue some visible signe to represent God, saith, we will haue him go before vs: that is to say we wil haue him there as a subiect vnto vs. Howbeit we must not so preace vnto God: but as (I haue saide) we must reuerence him with all humilitie. And furthermore, when men thought to serue God after their owne fashon, and framed lawes for themselves, saying this will be good, & such a thing wil be acceptable vnto God: it was bicause they would make him like vnto thēselues, as though he delited in all the smal toys which they had inuēted: that is to wit, outward things: & so doing they trāsformed god, as though they would pul him out of his heuēly seat, to draw him down hither, or as though he wer a creature, and a fleshy thing. So then wee see, that all these fonde deuotions vsed in the papacie, & termed there the deuine seruice, sprāg of this, namely that they knew not the highnesse of God: For thē wold they haue cōcluded thus. God is not delired in the things that seme good in our own eies: for he is of another nature than we be: he is a spirit, & therefore must we serue him after a clean cōtrary fashon vnto that which pleaseth our nature: nother must we in this case presume to attēpt any thing of our own heads: but we haue his law, in which he hath declared his wil vnto vs, he hath prescribed vs our rule, let vs hold vs vnto that. This is the sobrietie which God requireth by his word, & wher vnto he wold haue vs to submit ourselues without swaruing any thing at al therfrom. Here vpō Eliphaz saith, Behold the height of the starres how high they be. This is according to that which I haue already said: that is to wit, that forasmuch as the creatures here beneath do not moue vs sufficiently to the feare and reuerence of god: we shuld behold the skie: for thē are we the more liuely touched. True it is that it is too villanouse an vnthankfulness yea & a want of senses, whē we are not moued to honour God, though we opened our eyes but only to cōsider the things that lie at our secte. For doth the earth bring forth so many fruts by his own strength: the foode that we receue thēce: cometh it of his own nature & disposition? And therefore although a mā shuld loke no farther but at his feet, it is certain that if he opē his eyes he shal be cōuincēd that ther is a God, whom he ought to worship: but for asmuch as we be dull & grosse headed, that doth not greatly moue vs. VVhat must we do thē? To helpe such ru Jenesse & infirmitie, let vs looke vp on high: & thē must we needs be very brute beasts, if we be not moued at the sighte of the skie and of all the order which is to be sene in the starres, & so goodly & exquisite a disposition, which doth sufficiētly testify vnto vs, that ther is a wōderful maiestie of God. Men then must needs be astonied when they behold the skie. Furthermore sith we know that the sunne and the starres are so noble & excellēt creatures: ther vpō let vs ad that which is taught vs heere: that is to wit, that god is aboue, & that we cāno: reach vnto him. VVhē we know this, must we not needs be rauished with much greter admiratiō: we see that the heathen men which were not taught, were moued to idolatry by beholding the sun, the Moone and the starres. And why? for they saw ther such glory & dignity, as they thought they shuld haue done great wrong & iniurie to the sun, if they shuld not haue worshipped him as god. And it is certain that men in this case can do no otherwise whē they haue no better directiō: yet say I not that the heathē ar therefore to be excused for they haue cōceiued that the sun & the Moone are creatures, yea euē liuelesse creatures which haue no feling: but yet they hauing no scripture nor law to be taught by, could not but be touched with this glory & highnes which appeared in the sun & Moone. By reason wherof they were moued to worship thē & to make idols of thē: & this error shal serue to our cōdēnatiō after another maner. For seeing that God speaketh vnto vs, & declareth himself so fully to giue vs record of his maiestie, & sheweth vs the way to com vnto him, & therwithall doth offer vs as it wer autētick seales in the sun and Moone to ratifie that thing vnto vs which he had spokē by mouth (as ther we see a prooue of it in effect: ) I pray you shall we not bee duple gilty if this cōsideratiō do not moue vs & make vs to worship this gret God & his incōprehēfible maiesty, & to humble ourselues vnder the same. This is the sum of that which we haue to learne out of this place. Let vs now com too that which Eliphaz casteth in Iobsteeth: namely that he did not thinke that God marketh things here beneath. For he chargeth him with this vngodlynesse to say, that God walketh in the circkle of heauen, and: that the clouds are a stop vnto him, so as he seeth not the state of mé to gouerne them. The thing that Eliphas doth heere lay fallly vnto Iobs charge, is to be seene in all the wicked men of the world. For in asmuch as they perceiue not that God is heere neere vnto them: they conclude; that they are so farre off from him, that they may sport themselues as though he sawe them nomore. They be like these blind wretches, who when they haue no visible shape of God, thinke themselues vterly vndone, and that God is no more among them. If the Papiſts see not a crucifix that may mow vpon them, or if they see not their marmosets, they will say, what now? VVhere is God become? They can no more skill of religion, they know not what christianitie meeneth, they pray no more vnto God, vnlesse they haue their marmosets, and may kneele downe before a blocke, or a stone. And so were the heathen always wont to do. For we see that when the heathen rayled at the law of Moyses, they said that the Jewes worshipped the cloudes and an vncertaine and secret Godhead, bycause they looked but vp to heauenward, and had no images to forge them selues a God after their owne desire. The wretched Papiſts proceede after the same manner at this day, and are altogether like the heathen: and it is impossible that men should do otherwise, vntill such time as God declare vnto them, that it is by another meane that he is neere vnto them.

Now in the meane while what do these wicked mé, which haue no deuotion in them? they thinke, Oh, God is aboue: but he is there in his glory: and what careth he for things here beneath: he will not busie himselfe about them nor meddle with them: neither is it a thing pertaining vnto him or comely for his maieſtie. Thus the wicked take occasion to estrange themselues from God, and to giue themselues libertie to all mischief, saying that God seeth them not. And wee must note this thing well: For were it not that we be staide by the hande of God, and that his word doth stand vs in stead of a bridle: VVe should fall into the like confusion. For when our Lord doth declare vnto vs, that he dwelleth on high, and that hee beholdeth things heere beneath, and that there is nothing hid from him: VVell, wee are thereby admonished too walke as it were before his face. And hath he declared so much vnto vs? Yea, and he worketh also in vs by his holy spirite: he openeth our eyes to the end that we should thinke vpon his maieſtie in all oure deedes and thoughts: and for a greater confirmaton, hee addeth, that his word which is preached vnto vs is as a twoedged sword, so as it examineth all the thoughts and affections, and proceedeth euen vnto the marce of the bones: as is said of it in the Epistle to the Hebrues. To be short, when God declareth vnto vs that he hath giue such a property to his word: the same stayth vs: and if we had not such a bridle, what shoulde become of vs? Let vs note well then this sentence where it is saide, that the wicked vnder the shadow, that they do not perceiue god by their naturall witte, thinke they are scaped his hand: and then they triumph, and willingly perswade themselues, that God careth not for any thing that is done heere beneath, and that heere is nothing but confusion of all things, and that the same commeth not vnto his knowledge. Concerning this which is heere said of the Clouds, that the Cloudes are as a couert vnto God: that is very true, howbeit in farre other sense. For when the scripture speaketh vnto vs of the maieſtie of God: it saith indeede that he is hid in the cloudes: and to what purpose saith it so, but to the end that we should not curiously gad affray as we are wont to do? For we see that men are so ticklish as nothing can bee more: and when they speake of God, they dispute of him to no purpose or reason and without all modestie, saying: yea but how is this? and how is that? And when they reason of God, it seemeth they do not only speake of him as of their companion, but as of some one that were inferiour vnto them. VVe see then such diuelish boldnesse in men, that they will enter into the deepest secrets of God, and that they will turne vp all things, and leaue him nothing vnremoued. To be shorte, God must be as it were subiecte vnto them. See wherto we are now come. For this cause the holy scripture saith vnto vs, that God hath the darke cloudes as places to hide himselfe in. And wherto saith it so? It is to mocke at the phantasticalnesse that is in vs. For will we purchase vnto God? VVill we comprehend all his secrets? Let vs come but only to the cloudes, yet are we not come to the starres by a great way. Behoulde, one cloude only doth so lette vs as wee cannot see the sunne. And although his brightnesse come vnto vs: yet know we not in what place he is. VVhen the sunne shineth at noone dayes, if it be a close and a raynie wether we cannot marke the place of the sunne, to say, it is now in such a place. If a cloude let vs that wee cannot see a creature which sheweth himselfe dayly: I pray you how shall wee comprehend what God is? So then the holy scripture mocketh at such pride as is in men, when they will enquire beyond their measure and more than apperteyneth vnto them, and dispute of God at theyre pleasure, and so discouer him, as too leaue him nothing at all. He is then hid in a cloude (saith the scripture:) yea, but it is not for that he seeth not: it is in respect of vs: for we cannot comprehend him: the cloude letteth vs, and our senses are too weake. And for this cause saint Paule saith in the place that I haue alledged, that men do vanish away in their owne imaginations. VVhat is ment by saying that they vanish, but that after men haue wandred this way and that way, they fade away as smoke? Euen at this point are we: but God on his behalfe hath so cleere a sighte, that he can passe through all the cloudes of the world, so as there shall be nothing darke vnto him. And for this cause it is said that he dwelleth in vnapprochable light. This saying is very notable. God then cannot be knowne of vs. And why, seeing that there is nothing but brightnesse about him? This word vnapprochable importeth that we cannot come neere him. The more a man will lift vp himselfe, the further he shall go from him. I meane to lift vp himself with pride and presumption, as to say I can tell what God is, and I will comprehend him as I list. And indeede is not this a diuelish ouerweening? For (as I haue said) no man can attaine to the brightnesse of God, and againe there is nothing in vs but pouertie, weakenesse, and vnabilitie. So then men of their selues cannot approche vnto God: but hee must approach vnto vs, and we must conceiue him to be suche as he doth offer himselfe by his word, contenting oure selues with that which is there contened. But it is sayde that although this way be such, as by it we cannot come vnto God: yet he dwelleth in brightnesse, that is to say, that his eyes are not blinded, but that he seeth and knoweth all things. Now then wee vnderstande howe the cloude is a couert for God to hide himselfe in, yea so as men cannot come vnto him: but yet it is not a couerte in respect of himselfe, so as a man might say, that he gouerneth not all things by his providence, or that he seeth not plainly, not only all that is done here beneath, but also whatsoeuer mé do here cōceiue in their minds. Nowe in the meane season wee must note, that certaine men thinking to honour God thereby, haue imagined that whiche is heere saide, whiche for all that is an horrible blasphemie:

Rom. 1. c. 21.

1. Ti. 6. d. 16

blasphemie: and thus whiles men will honour God after their owne fantasie, they marre all. Some foolish men therefore haue thought, that it was not meete that God should be troubled with vs, & that it should be great derogation to his maiestie thus to gouerne al things. VVhat (say they) shall God be carefull for a flie, for a worme, for a birde of the ayre, and for this and for that? that were a proper thing in deede. Thus whiles men attribute vnto God such an honour, as seemeth good vnto themselues, they spoyle him of his power and maiestie. VVhat must we do then? Let vs learne to honor God, as he requireth it of vs: and let vs not (as hath bene already declared) do him such seruice as we haue forged in our owne brayne: but let vs simply herken to that, which God hath spoken and declared of himself, to that which he hath spokē with his owne hojy mouth: let vs hold vs to that resolution, & let vs know that when wee shall haue knowne God such as he sheweth himself in the holy scriptures, we may glorie him, as it becōmeth vs, for that is also the due honor, which he requireth, and alloweth. Now when it is sayd in the Scriptures, that the prouidence of God and his mercie is stretched out euen vnto the brute beasts, & that there is nothing but it is suitered by his hand & power: herein is first declared vnto vs his power: and besides that we see his infinite goodnesse in that he is carefull eue for the wormes of the earth, and in that a birde of the ayre falleth not to the ground without his wil, foresight and ordinance. And behold: what goodnesse is there in God, who vouclisafeth to haue care of so vile and despized things, which we also set so litle store by? Furthermore thereby we may also cōclude, what loue he beareth vs, according to the reasons and proufes of our Sauour Iesus Christ, how much more worth are you thā litle sparowes? Now if they be nourished of your heauely father: thinke you he hath no regard to maynteyne you, or thinke you that you are not alwayes vnder his wings, or that he turneth not all things to your saluation, or that any thing happeneth vnto you without his good wil: Thus must we honor God, not bringing him in subiection to our senses & fantasie, but accepting al that he declareth vnto vs of himselfe in the holy Scripture. If we do so, we will no more say, God walketh in the circle of heauē, & therefore medleth not with our matters, it were an vnseemely thing for him to be troubled with humane and earthly affaires: wee will speake no more on that sorte. And why so? for God needeth not too take pleasure in idlenesse. It is a beastly opinion which they conceyue of God that would shut him out of this worlde, and thinke that all things are not gouerned by his prouidence and power, saying: tush God is of such glorie, as he muste be aboue in a happie life: he must haue no care of any thing. This is as much as to change God into an other shape. For our God (as I haue already sayd) is not like vnto mortall men, which do place a great parte of their felicitie in liuing at ease, or in rest and idlenesse. God is not troubled as we are: he needeth not to breake his braynes about things, to trauallye with his hāds, with his feete, or with any thing els: he gouerneth all things: & by what meanes doth he it? Is it by remouing himself? by going? by cōming? by framing of things? by making great discourfes? No truely: but he gouerneth & mainteyneth all things by his worde alone, which is of such strength, that all creatures muste needes obey it. So then we know that God doth not walke there aboue as it were in galleries, but filleth the whole world: and we muste behold him as alwayes neere vnto vs. And bicause that on our behalf we be neere vnto him, we must walke as before his face, knowing that we cannot go one toote but he beholdeth vs, and that all things are marked out before him. This is the brieve summe of all that wee haue to note vpon this place. Now Eliphaz asketh Iob: Whither he haue marked the way of the elders, and what is the come of the wicked, who (sayeth he) are rooted out, broken and ouertrowne, and their foundation, that is to say, as their stabilitie was as a riuer runne out and dried vp. Here againe Eliphaz confirmeth that which he had sayd afore: that is to witte, that from the beginning men haue knowne the wicked to be punished. True it is that God (as wee haue declared) hath alwayes giuen some exāples of his iudgements, to the end that men might be kept in feare: according to the saying of the Prophet Esay: The Lorde shall execute his iudgements, and the inhabitants of the earth shall learne rightuoufnesse. Therefore when wee see that the Lord stretcheth out his arme, to chastise the wicked, and sheweth himself to be their iudge: it ought to moue vs to feare him, and to loue him. God then hath at all times giuen some tokens that men must needes come to accompt before him, and that iniquitie shall not remayne unpunished: but yet he doth not punish thē, that offend him, all alike. And therefore we may not make it a general rule, that the wicked are punished in this worlde: for then it needed not to referue any iudgement to the latter day. VVhat should become of the immortalitie of mens soules? what should become of the hope that we haue of the resurrectiō? all that should come to nothing. So then Eliphaz marreth all, when he maketh a general rule of the particular examples that God hath shewed. But the thing that we haue to note is this: that when God hath punished the wicked that lifted themselues vp against him: although the same haue bene done but once, yet we muste conclude, that, although there be many wicked mē which are spared euen to the end, and after they haue liued in al voluptuousnes, die in a minute of an houre without any languishing, yet must they needes come to accompt. But when shall that be? let vs patiently tarie till that which is now hid frō vs, be reueled. This is then the brieve summe of that which we haue to note vpon this place. Now in the meane season let vs waigh the wordes that are spoken here: which are, that the wicked for a time may vaunt themselues, yea euen so farre as to rayle against God, and to do things in despite of him: As Eliphaz here reporteth of them that they say: Get thee from vs, and what can the Almighty do vnto vs? VVe shall see then this rage so furious in the wicked, that they will by no meanes knowe God, but do things to spite him withall, as though he had no more power nor authoritie ouer them: But in the end God can pull thē downe well ynough. Now in the meane season Eliphaz vpbraydeth Iob here that he sayde, that these menne missed not to haue their houses furnished with goods: for it seemed vnto him, that by this Iob ment to denie the prouidence of God. But it is cleane contrarie: for the confesion which Iob made is altogether such as we ought to hold it: that is to say, that when God spareth the wicked, and they seeme to be so happie, that they do nothing but mocke at al religion, & the same remayneth unpunished: neuerthelesse we must surmount such temptations, and not be afraid to cōclude, that God is iudge of the world, and will shewe himselfe for such a one although presently wee see it not. Lo then this is a right and sound confesion which Iob hath made. But it was mistaken by Eliphaz. Now we haue already declared these wordes: to wit that the wicked will say vnto God, Get thee from vs. Not that they so speake: but that they see from al knowledge as much as in them lieth & willingly and wittingly become brute beasts, as it is seene. If a man speake to these scoffers, which seeke nothing els but to take their pleasure, if a man speake vnto them, (& say) of the iudgement of God, and threaten them therewith: it is a matter to stirre vp their choler. Yea and if it lay in their power they would haue the whole holy Scriptures brēt, that men might neuer more speake of it. And wherefore? it is euen as a maifestour which neuer would see neither gallows, gibet, nor iustice, nor any thing els. To be short, he would that there were no more gouernement in the world. So the wicked coulde finde in their hearts to destroy the maiestie of God, if it lay in their power. In the meane season they refuse all doctrine, they stop their eares, and they blindfold their eyes, that they might neither see nor heare. To be shorte, they withdraw themselves, as much as they can, from the obedience of God, and would by no meanes be subiect therevnto. And also euen among our selues we see some that counterfait the great Christians, which are contented to say at one word, well, we must obey God, and the woorde must be preached: but yet they would haue a man tell them a tale, of I wote neere what, so he rubbe them not on the galled backe. Such men (what protestation so euer they make) do well declare that they seeke nothing else, but to be estranged from God: and to say vnto him, Get thee from vs. For although they vtter not this blasphemie with their mouth: yet men see well ynough what their minde and will is. Well, for our part, let vs learne to walke before God in feare and carefulnesse: and for as much as he is come once neere vnto vs, let vs pray him so to continue with vs, that we may neuer be estranged from him. And seyng that his woorde is so familiar among vs (as he doth daily communicate the same vnto vs, by the preaching of his holy Gospell:) let vs beholde him in the same, and desire him to lift vs vp above the clowdes: yea euen vnto heauen by the sayth which he hath giuen vs, and that wee may increate more and more in the same, vntill he haue fully ioyned vs vnto himselfe: to beholde perfectly that which is now hidde from vs: and to be fully fashioned accerding to his image in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ.

Now let vs fall down afore the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faultes, desiring him to make vs so to feele them, that wee may learne to be displeased with them, and to sigh and grone, not for our calamities and afflictions which wee suffer, but especially for the offences which wee haue committed: knowing that when our good God layeth his roddes vpon vs, it is to drawe vs to suche knowledge of our sinnes as might make vs sory for them, and driue vs to aske forgiuenesse of the same, and seeke the remedie which he hath promised: that is, that we running to him, and seeking to be ridde of al our sinnes, should couet nothing but to please him in all things, and to dedicate our selues to his honor and glorie: praying him so to augment in vs the graces of his holy spirite, as wee may constantly perseuer in his obedience in the middest of al the stumbling blockes and afflictions that may happen vnto vs, vntill he haue gathered vs into his heauenly rest. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to al people and nations of the earthe, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errour and darknesse, to the right way of saluation, for the doing whereof, it may please him to rayse vp true and faithfull ministers of his word, &c.

The lxxxvj. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the xxij. Chapter.

This Sermon doth still prosecute the .15. .16. .17. verses, and some other part of the Texte therevnto annexed.

18. Yet hath hee filled their houses vvith treasure: lette the intente of the vvicked bee farre from mee.
19. The righteous shall see them, and laugh at them, and the innocent shall mocke them.
20. Oute substance surely hath bene hidden: and the fyre hath deuoured the remnant of them.
21. Acquainte thy selfe vvith him, and deale vvith peace, and thereby thou shalt haue prosperitie.
22. Receyue the lavve of his mouth, and lay vp his vvordes in thy heart.

He beganne yesterday to declare to what end this saying of Eliphaz tedeth, where hee reproveth Iob for saying, that God suffereth the wicked to prosper, and punisheth them not, as it is truth in deed, according to the iudgement of the worlde. Eliphaz and his fellowes had sayd, that God doth neuer so delay his iudgements, but that they appeare heere amongst vs: which is against experience: So that the saying of Iob is true, that wee must patiently abide till our God set all things in order againe: which shall not be done in this world. VVe must then walke in hope. And hope importeth so much, that wee shoulde not haue our syghte stayd vpon things presente, but that although all things were out of order, yet we must quietly abide Gods pleasure. Eliphaz groundeth himselfe vpon this point, that if we consider the couise of the world, we shall see that god hath at all tymes punished the wicked. True it is, (as wee haue oftentimes sayd) that God hath always giuen some tokens of his iudgements, for to keepe men in awe: but so farre off is it, that hereof we shuld make a general rule, that the same is contrarie to all reason and truth.

Now let vs come againe to that which hath ben already begonne to be handled. Eliphaz speaking of the wicked, attributed vnto them suche a pride, that they vtterly refuse God, and will not haue him come neere them, Nor that they doe vtter suche wordes with their mouth: but bycause they can not abyde that God shoulde bring them vnder his subiection, as it is scene. Then till suche tyme as God hath tamed men by his holie spirite, they can not beare the yoake, euery man woulde haue liber-tie too doe as hee listeth: But heere is mencion made of them whiche haue bene hardened a long tyme, and are wearie of all good doctrine, and so hate it that they would wishe that they myght neuer heare more wordes of it. The number of such men hath always ben to greate as it is at this day. Furthermore when they are gone so farre astraye, as they refuse the Doctrine of GOD: they do all things to spite him withall, as though he could doe

do nothing against them, and say, what can the Almighty do vnto vs? Truth it is that they will not spue out such blasphemie: but yet they walke boldly like murderers, so as they care no more for any threating, but make a mocke at all things: and vntill the hande of God vrgeth them, and constraineth them, they will go on still in their wickednesse. Nowe this is asmuch as if they should affirme, that they cared not for any thing that God can do vnto them: and so to be short, we see, that Eliphas ment here to declare howe far men passe their boundes, when they have a while continued in mischief, and are become so diuelish, that they can not abide to be admonished, and brought into the right way: namely that they desie God as though he had no more authoritie ouer them. And it is not onely in this place that we see it so: would to God we had not exaple therof before our eyes. But let vs note that which hath bene touched: namely that the holy Ghost ment to shew vs here as in a glasse, whether men fall headlong when they are a long time noozled in their finnes: that is to say, that there is such brutish beast inesse in them, as they runne with their heads against God. For there is no more remorse of conscience in them, as Sainct Paule sayth: their consciences are rockt fast a sleepe, so as they make no more doubt of any thing. And it serueth to the end that wee should walke in feare, and pray vnto God that he suffer vs not to come into such extremitie. Now let vs go on foreward with the saying of Eliphas. He asketh of Iob, whither he haue marked the way of such men or whither he hath taken good beede of it. They which expound this sentence, as though Eliphas reproched Iob for folowing them, or fashioning himself like vnto them, are deceyued: but rather he intendeth to say, that Iob is a man al togidier without iudgement, for that he doubteth whither God punisheth the wicked, seing he hath alwayes perceyued that he doth it. But herein is he deceyued, for that he sayeth alwayes. That might haue well bene: but yet God hath not ceased to reserue many punishments vnto the time too come. He ouerthrew the citie of Sodom with the others neere vnto it: but hath he done the like to all other townes, that were so giuen ouer to euill? No truly. He did once send a flud ouer all the world: yea but it was but once: and yet we see that men haue not ceased to prouoke his vengeance vpon them. Yea: but we must not appoint him a lawe to punish finnes alwayes alike: he will deale as it pleaseth him, and we must content our selues with the order that he taketh. Yea truly for (as wee haue shewed) if he reserued no punishments, it would seeme that there should be no iudgemēt, and that we should no more come to any accoūts. And if all things were so perfectly restored in this worlde, that there were no more to be wished for, nor any thing to millike: then would there be no more of the resurrection. Therefore it behoueth our God to vse suche meanes, as he do: but only giue vs some examples whereby we may know that finnes shall not remayne before him vnpunished, & that whereas he delayeth vs as now, and holdeth vs in suspēce till the latter day, it is to the ende that wee should not fixe our mindes here beneath, as though things were already so accomplisshed, that there were no more to be wished for. This is then a brieue summe of that which Eliphas minded to say in this verse, hast thou not marked the wayes of the worlde? for this worde worlde significth sometimes antiquitie: as if he should say, it is not now that God beginneth to punish the wicked, but the histories of olde times do shewe vs that he hath alwayes done so: it is so long ago since Sodom and Gomorrah perished, it is so long ago since the fludde was. Know thou then that God hath brought the worlde vnder this rule, that he wil deale with men according to their deserts. Furthermore Eliphas hauing spoken of the punishment of the despisers of God, and of those that were gone so far out of order that they mocked at his power doth yet more aggravate their malice when he sayth, neuerthelesse God hath filled their houses with treasure. For if menne were not bounde vnto God, they might well excuse themselves in that they do not yeelde themselves subiect vnto him: but all excuse is taken away, and men are guiltie of such vthankefulnesse, that they must needs remaine amaze, when hauing perceyued that God by fayre meanes draweth the vnto him, yet they haue set themselves against him, and would not by any meanes abide that he should winne them. Nowe we see what Eliphas ment by saying, that God had filled their houses with treasure. It is true that all men generally are bounden vnto God, for asmuch as they be created, placed in this world, and mainteyned there by him: but when God declareth himselfe vnto man more peculiarly: that is done to make him so much the more inexcusable. As how? Thus: to a man that is in prosperitie God sendeth all things as he would wishe: the same man hath lesse cause to murmure against God, than an other which is afflicted and tormented many wayes: and when the riche menne, and those that liue so at ease, turne the head againe, and play the restie lades, it is certaine that the same is to be compted a more haynous offence. And not without cause for this gentie handeling which God hath thus shewed vnto them, ought to soften their hearts: and although they were stubburne of nature, and had some fearcenesse in them, yet God when he intreated them so gently, he meant too winne them by that gentlenesse. Seing then that they be so wilde: their offence is doubled. And this is it that Eliphas ment in this place. And therefore lette vs on our parte learne to way aright the graces which God bestoweth vpon vs, and the benefites which we receyue at his hande, which are vnto vs as many warnings to yeelde our selues obedient to him: and so fare forth to honour him, as to committe the gouernement and maystetship ouer vs into his handes. For if we bee bounde vnto a mortall man: although he vsurpe authoritie ouer vs: yet wee will take it at his handes. And why so? I am bound will we say, nature teacheth vs that. And howe much then shall wee acknowledge our selues bounden vnto our God, for the benefites which he hath bestowed vpon vs, to him that hath created & fashioned vs, to him that maintayneth vs, to him that so many wayes sheweth himselfe a father vnto vs. How can wee yeelde vnto him that which wee owe him? And therefore (as I haue already touched) let euery of vs looke well into himselfe, and consider the benefites that God hath bestowed vpon him, to the ende they may all be helpe vnto vs, to bring vs to his obedience, so that he may peaceably raigne ouer vs, and guyde vs, & we by no meanes rebel against him. And specially when God shall haue dealt so fauourable with vs and poured our his liberallie vpon vs: let that serue to make vs tractable vnto him, and lette vs not desire God too estraunge himselfe from vs. For if he should withdraw himselfe from vs what shoulde become of vs? should wee not thinke that all the benefites which wee haue and receyue, proceede of nothing else but for that God is neere vnto vs? And if God were not with vs, what good thing coulde wee haue, seing that all cometh from him? So then the state and condition of men is miserable, whē they assay to flee from the presence of God: seing they seeke nothing but all mischief. Wherefore let vs learne to tumble our selues when God shall haue filled vs with treasures: and let vs not do as horses that are to satte, which kicke agaynst their mayster: as God

Dcut. 32. 15. Vpbraydeth the Jewes in Moyses song. Lette vs not be like vnto hories which are to well fedde, but let vs submit our selues vnder the subiection of our God: knowing that although wee haue receyued a great number of good things at his hande, in a minute of an houre he can bring vs to pouertie: if he haue made vs fatte, we may in short space become leane: he needeth but to blow vpo vs, and behold all our wealth shal vanish away. Seing it is so, then lette vs walke alwayes in feare, acknowledging the good things which we inioy, to come of God, and doing him homage for the same: knowing that wee could not inioy them, if it pleased him not to continue his grace and fauour towards vs. Thus the riches shal be happie and blisfed, and honours and pleasures and suche like things shal not be meanes to make men dronke and to bring them asleepe: but rather to make them watchfull, and to put al things in Gods hands: as if they should say, Lorde it is truth that hitherto thou hast vsed such goodnesse towards vs, that wee haue liued at our ease. But what? if thou shouldst but turne away thy face, behold we were vtterly vndone. So Lord, as thou hast mayntained vs and preserued vs vnto this time: let it please thee so to continue euen to the ende. Nowe Eliphaz sayeth here, that these were destroyed before the time, and that their foundation was as a riuer that is runne out. VVee shall see it sometime happen to the despisers of God, that when they haue hoped to atayne vnto maruolous things, God shall throw them downe, and they shall be disappointed of the vayne hope which they shall haue conceyued. VVee see it then: yea and although God suffer the wicked to liue and die in prosperitie: what is that to the purpose? for if we consider the present life: I pray you of what continuance is it? VVee liue in deede: but yet man shall be alwayes such, as the holy Scripture describeth him to be, that is to say, as an hearbe that is greene. But alsoone as the winde bloweth vpon it, it withereth away: alsoone as the sythe passeth ouer it, the graspe becommeth haye, his sappe is dried vp, & it perissheth by and by, there needeth but one broyling heate of the sunne, and all is burnt vp. So then wee knowing the frailtie of our life, ought not to thinke it strange, that we be compared to a riuer that is runne out and dried vp: or to a riuer which runneth in such wise, that if there be some water as now: shortly after it is not such as we haue seene it to be. This is a naturall thing. But Eliphaz speaketh here of a riuer that is so broken out of his bankes, as afterward it drieth vp, and hath no more his course. Eue so fare the wicked, which are become so bold, as they thinke they shall neuer faile: but they shall be so wasted, that there shall not remayne one droppe of strength in them. So then if wee take not this sentence according to the minde of Eliphaz: we may gather a good and profitable doctrine out of this place: that is to say, that although God do not punish the wicked at the first, eue in this life: but spareth them: yet they cease not to be like vnto a riuer that runneth out: there is no soundnesse in them, yea and they shall perissh before their time. And why, before their time? because they persuade themselues that they shall liue here for euer, and thinke that their felicitie shal continue alwayes: but God cutteth off there life, and laugheth them to scorne: And when they say my soule fill thy selfe, and thinke that they should swallow vp the whole worlde: they shall be but a straw breadth from their liues ende: for God throweth them downe. It is not without a cause then that he sayth, that they perissh before their tyme, for they are disappointed of their hope when they promise themselues long life: and our God cutteth them shorte, as it is sayde of them, that they are, as if a man should cutte the threede of a weauers webbe. It seemeth that the threede shoulde go still on, when wee see the weauers worke apace, but the threede breaketh and the webbe ceaseth. So happeneth it to the lyfe of man, when we thinke to go forward, and it seemeth vnto vs that we shall neuer haue an ende, we are become dronken with our selues, and beholde, in the meane season God cutteth of the threede, and there is no more to do. Let vs then minde this doctrine here, so that when wee know the shortnesse of our lyfe, wee may so consider the heauenly inheritance which is promised vs, that our expectation may be settled there, knowing that all they that lay their foundation in this worlde, haue no great surenesse, because they builde vpon the water, or in the ayre. All that then muste vanish away: as wee see that God punisheth the presumptio of them that buyld in this world, & put their trust in things present: he sheweth the that they do nothing else but buyld in the water, or in the ayre, as we haue sayd. There is nothing but the kingdome of heaue that is certaine & vchageable. VVee must then be grounded there: that is the true stay, as the Scripture speaketh of it. This is a brief note of that which wee haue to marke out of this place. And that wee may yet profit more by this doctrine, lette vs way this saying, before their time, that the wicked shall be destroyed before their time, because our God taketh them hence, as if he should pull them vp by the rootes by force. For they fasten themselues here vpon earth, as though they should neuer be taken away: they take roote here, but it is onely in imagination. The wicked then and the despisers of God shall take such roote in their pryde, that they shall thinke they haue a foundation an hundreth foote deepe in the earth, and that it is impossible to shake them: yea, but God will giue them but a litle fillup, and they shal be ouerthrowne: for this roote is but imagined. And so it is not without cause that he sayeth, the wicked perissh before their tyme. Neuerthelesse, let vs hold fast that which hath bene shewed: that is to say, that if the time continue long, and we do not perceyue that our God will repress the wicked and despisers of his maiestie: let vs not therefore be discouraged. Let vs walke on still, and suffer God to vse his libertie: that is to witte, if it seeme good vnto him, let him chastise the wicked in this worlde: if not, let his iudgement be hidden from vs vntill wee come to the latter day, when all things shall be disclosed. Eliphaz sayeth moreover, that the righteous shal see them and laugh at them, and the innocēt shal make a mocke at them. It seemeth at the first sight that this is not couenient, seing that the children of God ought to folow their heauely father. VVee know that God is inclined to mercie and pitie: and when men mocke at them that are afflicted, the same is not without crueltie. How is it then that the holy Ghost attributeth such an affection to the children of God, as to mocke at the wicked, when they see them so throwne downe? Let vs note first of al, that for to behold the iudgements of God aright, & to take some profite thereby, we must be purged of all our carnall affections: we must not be led with a desire of vengeance, nor be moued with excessiue passions, as wee are wont to be: all that muste be ameded in vs, and we must haue a pure and cleere sight to behold the doings of God. If we be thus disposed, we may then without any crueltie mocke at the wicked, whē God destroyeth them: as in deede wee muste like well of the iudgements of God: and finding them good, wee muste also reioyce at them, because that our saluatio is thereby aduanced, and God thereby declareth his loue that he beareth vs. Let vs learne then that when God punisheth the finnes of the wicked, we haue matter to reioyce at. Yea but wee muste knowe wherefore. There are two causes:

we haue cause to reioyce, for that God thereby declareth himselfe to be a iudge, and his glorie and his maiestie do therby appeare. Lo this is a matter of reioysing: for as oft as our God sheweth himselfe, & giueth vs some triall of his strength and power to glorifie him, it behoueth vs to reioyce at it. For what greater ioy can we require, than the presence of our God, and that he should thus draw neare vnto vs? And for the second cause, God thereby declareth that he hath a care ouer vs as ouer his children when he punisheth our enemies, and those that troubled vs and deli- 10 ourrageously with vs. God thē by chastising the wicked, doth ratifie & cōfirme the loue that he beareth to the good & faithfull men. This is againe a secōd cause of ioy. But yet wee must (as I haue sayd) be cleane purged of all detire of vengeance, and of all malice. To be short, when we haue put of all that is of our flesh, & the spirit of God guydeth vs, we shal haue a right and pure zeale, to reioyce at the fall of the wicked, and to take some profite by the iudgements of God. There is yet one thing to be noted, which is that where it is sayd, that the righteous shal mocke 20 at them whom God ouerthroweth and destroyeth: the same is not ment of all those that are afflicted: for there be many whom God chastiseth for their wealth, whiche are not men altogether past amendment: and he punisheth them only in their bodies, to the end that their soules might not perishe. But heere is no mention made but of the reprobates. VVee know not whom God hath vtterly reiectēd, except he shewe them vnto vs, as he did them of Sodom and Gomorria, and those that were destroyed by the floude. Here we haue a certaine testimonie of the extreme 30 vengeance of God, for there was no place of repentance left for those wretched persons, bicause they made themselues vnworthie of mercie. Of these then & other such like we may reioyce. But when God shall chastise our neighbours, and wee know not yet whether he will haue pitie on them, we must haue cōpasion on their miseries, and be so moued with the iudgements of God, as we may conceyue hope that he will send some release to them that are so afflicted. Too bee shorte, thus muste wee put this texte in practise. True it is that this doctrine thus briefly touched, might bee darke: but if euery man note well that which I haue touched, he may afterwarde more at large thinke on it: and so the things that are thus briefly touched, may neuerthelesse content vs. First of all I haue sayd that we must vse such gentlenesse towards all our neighbours, as to wish their health, and to be sorie for their euils: as S. Paule teacheth vs that 40 the rule of charitie requireth. Lamēt (sayeth he) with them that suffer. And we see that the children of God haue alwayes had this affection and zeale. Yet if we see that God punisheth finnes, we may also reioyce at it: yea and for as much as God therein declareth and sheweth himself vnto vs, our faith muste be the more and more ratified and confirmed in him, when wee see that he hath a care ouer mankind, and that all things are guyded by him. Now it followeth, that our substance is not consumed. True it is, that worde for worde it is, if our substance be not consumed or bidden. For the Hebrue worde signifieth two things: properly it signifieth to hide: but bicause when a thing is hid, it is no more seene, & it seemeth that it is quite gone: by 50 the likenesse that is betwene them, it signifieth somtimes to cut of, and to bring to nothing. Furthermore it seemeth that he ought to haue sayde, was not their substance destroyed? referring the same to the wicked. And in deede the place was so translated by the Greekes. But if we beholde it narrowly, it seemeth that the natieue sence is this: yet our substance was not bidden. And let vs note, that it is a manner of speach much vsed among the Hebrues, which importeth a greater affirmatiō: as if it were sayd, yea, it is certaine that our substance is hid. Also the word Substance importeth our state, our being, that which we haue in hād & the way to preferue vs, or restore vs. I ouerpasse the expōitiōs that they giue vpō this place, which do not agree with it: let vs simply hold that which Eliphaz meeneth to say. He maketh here cōparison of the rightuous with the wicked, and of the faithfull, with the despisers of God. As concerning the faithfull (sayeth he) of a truth our substance is hidden. Now when he vseth this worde, by de, he me- 10 neth not that their substance is perished or lost: but cōtrarywise, that it is layd vp in safetie, as a treasure. How cōmeth it to passe, that in the midst of so many dāgers as we are in, yet we remayne vpriight & are vpholdē, if we were not as it were vnder the wings of God? To be short, if we were not as it were in secrete & layd vp as a treasure: it is certain that our life euery minute of an houre should be takē frō vs one way or other. So then we haue here a very good doctrine, whē it shall be thus vnderstāded according to the sence of the texte. For thus shall the righteous say: Our substance and state (that is to say, the power to mayntaine vs & preferue vs,) is all of it hidden: But as for that which is left vnto the wicked: it is deuoured by the fyre: That is to say, God leaueth them nothing at all, in somuch that they must needes be destroyed with all their wealth. It is true that during this mortal life, it may seeme that we are swallowed vp & quite ouerwhelmed, that we are in great distresse, and to be short, that we haue nother strēgh nor substance. But so much the more must we practise this doctrine & apply it to his right vse by following that which S. Paule teacheth vs, namely that we are dead and our life is hidden. S. Paule shewing what is the state and conditiō 20 of the faithfull, whyles they are in this world, sayeth that their life is hiddē, as if it were not at al: But it is hidden in a good storehouse: for (sayeth he) it is hiddē in God, with our Sauour Iesus Christ. The life of Iesus Christ being in heauē in that glorious bodie in the which he was rayfed vp, is not made manifest vnto vs, for if we loke where Iesus Christ, or his kingdome is, we shall not perceyue by our naturall wit, what is become of him. Neuerthelesse 30 seing our life is hiddē in heauē with Iesus Christ, we may be well assured of it. So then wee note in the first place, that God minding to proue our faith & hope, will suffer vs to be cōpassed about with many dangers, and our life to hang, as it were vpō a threed: and the windes to carie away our substance euery way. To be shorte, in steade of hauing one drop of life: he will suffer vs to haue a thousand deaths before our eyes, so as we shall thinke that we should perish a thousand wayes. But let vs not feare for all that, seing that God keepeth vs vnder his shadow. For so long as we haue that place to retire vnto, we shall be in good safetie. Thus then must we practise this doctrine. And afterwarde when we cast our eyes vpō the wicked & behold their destruction, let vs be so much the more assured of Gods goodnesse, & take an occasion so much the more to magnifie him, saying: O Lord what a priuilege is this, that thou hast giuen vs, seing that our life is in thy hand, and that thou art become the keeper thereof: & yet wherein do we differ from them whom we see to be cō- 40 sumed? we see them come to destrucciō, we see that that which is left vnto them, is cleane wasted: & Lord wherein do we differ from them? In nothing truly, sauing that of thy meere mercie it hath pleased thee to choose vs vnto thy self as thine inheritance, that thou mainteynest vs, and giuest vs grace too walke in thy obedience, and that thou doest continue such benefits in vs, as thou hast begōne, and guydest vs in the way of saluation. Frō whence Lorde cōmeth all our wealth. And yet we see what a pri- 50 wiledge thou giuest vs, as though wee were exempted from all the miseries of this frayle life, as though we were no more to be counted amongst men. Now Lorde seeing that thou doest this honour, and bestowest this benefite vpon vs: must we not needes magnifie such goodnesse of thine towards vs? Thus I say, when wee haue knowne what fauour God sheweth to his faithfull seruants, we ought to be so much the more confirmed therein, and also stirred vp to giue him thanks for the same. And because it can not be done vnlesse we beholde the destruction of the wicked, and reioyce thereat: therefore also it is good for vs to knowe, that when God punisheth the wicked, and poureth out some token of his vengeance vpon the, it is done to assure vs the more of his fatherly fauour and loue that he beareth to vs ward. Nowe when Eliphas hath thus spoken, he exhorteth Iob to acquaint himselfe with God, and to be at peace with him, saying, that the same shall turne to his prosperitie. And after that he addeth, That he should reioyce the lawe of God, and place his wordes in his bart In saying that Iob should acquaint himselfe with God, his meaning is that hee had erst withdrawn himselfe from him: And in saying that he should be at peace with him, he signifieth that by his wicked life he had declared himselfe as an enimie to God. This euill applied to his person as wee haue alreadie seene: but yet the doctrine of it selfe is true and very profitable. And howe is that? first of all it is here declared vnto vs, that when menne runne astray, it is as much as if they estranged themselves from God. Therefore when we be given ouer to our vices: wee spyte God, and are a let vnto him that he doth not drawe neere vnto vs: and it is as much as if we should take our leaue of him, or els runne away from him without talking any leaue at all. And in deede it is not without cause that the Scripture sayeth, that men haue not the feare of God before their eyes, & that they knowe God no more, when they take such libertie vnto themselves. VVee see then that men growe, as it were wilde, and become such brute beasts, that they be nomore of the household of God: and yet thinke they be in good case when they be so departed from him, so long as they thinke not vpon their vices and sinnes. Thus much for the first. Secodly it is shewed vs, that men make warre against God. There needeth no Herault nor trumpet to make a solemne defiance: for men shewe themselves mortall enimies of God and wage warre against him, so oft as they runne astray, and depart from his obedience. If the subiects should rise vp against a King, I pray you were it not a warte much more wicked, than if there had bene some colour of reason, and the solemnities obserued, as it is wont to bee? Nowe when men giue ouer themselves to wickednesse, they put themselves in armes against God: for it is most certaine, that looke how many wicked affections and lustes be in vs, so many men at armes haue we ready to fight against God and his iustice. So much the more then behoueth it vs too note well this place, that is to wit, that we can not take vnto our selues such libertie to do euill, but it is to take away all the familiaritie that wee haue with God, and to become wilde beastes, and so to stray from him, that we be nomore vnder his hande and obedience. But yet there is a greater mischief & further out of square, which is that willingly and wittingly wee raunge our selues in battle agaynst God. How so? Behold what a horrible thing it is that the creature should lift vp himselfe against him that hath fashioned him. And what shall we get by it? who shal haue the victorie? we see well that we are worse than madde, seeing that we ceasse not yet to runne thus ragingly against him. This is it that we haue to note vpon this place. And on the contrarie part, let vs follow the exhortation that is giuen vs here: which is, that if for a time we haue gone out of the way, and our lustes haue caused vs so to stray and scatter abroad, that we are become wilde beasts, so as our God can lay no hande on vs, and that wee haue not kept our selfe vnder his gouernement as it behoueth vs: let vs seeke to acquaint our selues with him, that is to say, lette vs indeuer to winde our selues into his familiaritie. And how shal that be done? we know that our God calleth vs vnto him by his wordes. And when he seeth that we be gone astray and out of the way, he sayeth, come againe, come agayne. God then causing his wordes to be preached vnto vs, tedeth to no other end, but to make vs tame, where as wee haue bene wilde: that is too say, to be taught and to be layd hande on at the first. VVhen we haue learned this lesson, we shall haue profited well for our whole life: whereto tendeth the whole holy Scripture but to make vs familiar with God? True it is that our God for his part doth shewe himselfe so familiar, as that there can be nothing more: he is as a nurse and as a mother: he doth not onely compare himselfe to the fathers which are louing and gentle to their childre, but he sayth also that he is more than a mother & more than a nurse. Seing then that God vseth such familiaritie with vs: let vs be no more like wilde beastes: and if we haue bene, let vs not continue so still. And when we see that we haue bene so froward and so madde as to moue warre agaynst him by our sinnes: lette vs seeke meanes to be at peace with him. And how shall that be? It lieth not in vs to do it: but hee muste preuent vs by his infinite goodnesse. VVhich thing hee doth when the Gospell is preached, which is named the doctrine of peace, and (as S. Paule speaketh of it) it is the message of reconciliation. Seing then that God calleth vs to him, of his owne good will, and preuēteth vs, not tarying till we come to seeke peace with him, but cometh before vs, and seeketh nothing els, but to be reconciled with vs: let vs not be so vngracious, as to reiect him through our vnkindnesse, and to make no accōpt of the benefite which he offereth vnto vs: but let vs with true humilitie yeelde our selues subiect vnto him, knowing that he is ready to receyue vs in the name of our Sauour Iesus Christ, and will cause vs to feele that he will be a gentle and pitifull father vnto vs, if wee be true children to him.

19.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, knowing that if he would deale rigorously with vs, we should be a hundreth times swallowed vp, and also that we are not worthie to be maintayned in this mortall life: & therefore much lesse worthie of the heauenly inheritance and infinite glorie which hee hath prepared for vs in heauen. So then acknowledging our sinnes and vnbeliefe wherevnto wee are so much inclyned, let vs pray him that of his mercie it will please him to beare with vs, vntill the attonement be made betweene him and vs, and that wee may take such profit by all the chastisements that he sendeth into the worlde, as wee may alwayes acknowledge him to be the iudge of the worlde, and that he will leaue no iniquities vnpunished, how long soeuer he tarie. To the ende that by this meanes wee that are his children may be moued to feare and honour him as our father, knowing that he prepareth for vs an eternall inheritance in heauen, notwithstanding that as now wee be in a poore and miserable state here in this worlde. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, &c.

The lxxxvij. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the xxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is still vpon the xxij. verse: and afterward vpon the text which is herevnto annexed.

23. If thou returne to the Almighty thou shalt be buylt vp, and dryue avvay iniquitie far from thy Tent.
24. Thou shalt lay golde vpon the dust, and as the pebble stone of the riuer, the golde of Ophir.
25. The almighty shall driue avvay thine enemies, and thou shalt haue a strong tortresse.
26. Thou shalt take pleasure of the almighty, and lift thy handes to God.
27. Thou shalt makethy prayers vnto him, and he shall heare thee, and thou shalt pay him thy vovves.
28. Thou shalt determine a thing, and it shall be established vnto thee, and his light shall shine vpon thy vvayes.
29. If the vvicked be throvne dovvne, I am lifted vp: and God shall saue those that looke lovvly.
30. The innocent shall deliuer the Countrie: and it shall be preserved by the purenesse of thy handes.

According to that which I haue already declared, we must take this as an exhortation that is made vnto vs all, to shew vs what true repētaunce is. Surely Eliphaz hath misapplied this too the person of Iob: but yet the holy Ghost meant to deliuer vs a generall doctrine and such a one as might be greatly to the profite of vs all. Here before we haue scene what it is to be acquainted with God, after that a man hath gone astray from him. For when men giue ouer themselves to euil, they quite forget God and turne their backe to him, and become as wilde men. But like as they that runne astray after that sort, do alienate themselves from God: so must wee acquaint our selues with him, suffering him to gouerne vs, and shewing our selues easie too bee guyd by him, so wee may become like lammes, and not play the wilde beausts, when he giueth vs any signe to come vnto him. After that Eliphaz hath spoken thus: he addeth, That he which hath gone astray ought to take the liue at the mouth of God, and place his wordes in his heart. This is a very notable point: for the rule of good life, is that we should heare God speake vnto vs, and know that the way which he sheweth vs, is that which wee ought to hold. Seing then that men go astray from the way of saluation so soone as they swarue from the lawe of God: Therefore it is sayd expressely in this place, that we must receyue the lawe at his mouth. Howbeit for asmuch as our allowing of that which is spoken vnto vs, is not all that we haue to do: Eliphaz addeth that we must settle it in our hearts. For although a man yeelde himselfe to the obedience of God concerning the outward appearance: that is not the chiefe point: we know it shall not greatly aduantage vs too obtaine from doing euill onely as touching our eyes, hands and feete: but the hart must go before and guide all the rest. Will we then profite well in the schoole of God? his worde must take deepe roote in our hearts, according as it is sayde, that he regardeth truth, and contrarywise abhorreth all hypocrisie. Now we see in what wise wee must turne to God when wee haue bene as it were bannished from him: that is to say, wee must become his scholers, and he our mayster. And thereby wee may gather, that all they which walke not according to the pure worde of God, are gone astray, although men allow well of them: as wee see oftentimes, how men thinke there is nothing but all holinesse in those which follow their owne foolish deuotions: And it hath bene an ordinarie abuse euen frō the beginning of the worlde, (which raigneth yet at this day too much) that men will needes be gouerned at thei. own pleasure, and yet thinke that their doings ought to bee well allowed of before God.

Contrarywise what is auouched heere? It is sayde that all they which walke not according to the woorde of God, are gone astray. No doubt but they will perswade themselves that their life is good and holy, and it may be that men will clappe their handes in token that they like well of them: but there is but one only competent iudge that can giue sentence in this case with authoritie, which is God: and we heare what he pronounceth of it. Therefore wee must no more replie to iustifie our foolish deuotion, nor say wee thinke that such a thing is good. All our owne fancies muste be layde downe, and wee muste harken what God sayeth, and suffer him to haue the mastership ouer vs to shewe vs the way that he will haue vs to folow. This is it that wee must first learne. True it is that this doctrine is oftentimes tolde vs: but yet is it not without cause that the holy ghost speaketh of it so much: for wee see how men are wedded to their owne will, wee will alwayes be wise in our owne conceytes, and wee can not finde in our hearts to giue God such honour, as that he should haue all the mastership ouer vs, and we should be his subiects. And thus (as the Prouerbe sayeth) wee do more than is commaunded vs, to become the Diuels seruants. Lette vs examine all the things that are termed by the name of Gods seruice in the Papiſtrie. What shall a man finde there but meere inventions of menne? there is not one sillable in the holy Scripture to warrant that the things wherein the Papiſtes trauayle so much, are acceptable vnto God, but cleane contrarie: and yet wee see how they are wedded to them. And wherefore? By reason of the sayd diuine inspyde, that men can not abyde to be subiect to God, and too receyue the lawe at his mouth. It is true that at the firste they wil say it is good reason that God should haue the dominion ouer vs: but yet wee see what rebellion they vse. Wherefore is all our chiding now adaves, but by cause we require that nothing should be added or diminished frō the pure lawe which was deliuered vs frō heauē. If the Papiſts could be contented to be gouerned by the pure doctrine of God, we should soone agree together, there should be no more disputation but they wil haue their own lawes & statutes to be obserued, and in the meane season none account to be made of that which God ordeyneth. This is the matter whereaboutes we striue. Now although we know that all is but abuse and superstition, when mē walke after their owne will: yet notwithstanding, men can not be stayed, but they will go on still beyond all measure. And we see how hard a thing it is to stay mē with this bridle, of bowing their neckes downe in all caces to receyue the yocke that God will lay vpon them. Yea and when we haue cast off the tirannie of the pope, we cannot quietly yeelde our selues obedient vnto God without gainesaying: but if any thing seeme to bee hard and troublesome, wee kicke against it. And what is it that maketh vs so bold, but because there is such a wilfull lostinesse and presumption in the mindes of men, as they cannot content themselves with the simple lawe of God? we see then how needfull it is for vs to be oftentimes put in remembrance of this point, to wete that we must hearken what God speaketh vnto vs. And hereby we be put in mind, that we be like wretched beastes, that there is neither wisdom nor discretion in vs, and that we can neuer knowe the ryght way, til God reache out his hand vnto vs, and shewe vs which way we should walke. Thus much for one poynt. Furthermore it is also declared vnto vs, that we shall still be carried away with our euil affections, till wee haue learned, and inured our selues too obey God without any gainesaying or repie. For so long as wee reserue any libertie to our selues, it cannot bee chosen but wee must striue and wangle against the doctrine of God, if it presse vs too much, that is to witte, beyond our capacite. What must we do then? let vs lay from vs all stryuing, and all the fayre reasons that we can inuent for the defence of our fancies and wicked lustes: and let vs become as meeke as lambes, and suffer God to handle vs as he list, so sone as he shal giue vs a token to come vnto him. Finally it is shewed vs, that we must not be like shaking reedes to suffer our selues to be led this way and that way: according as the Papists will in deede confesse that we must follow that which God comaundeth: but they mixte therewithall their owne foolish toys, yea and (a worse thing than that,) they so esteeme of mens inuentions, as the holy Scripture is despised thereby: and they make such a confused mixture of al things, as a man cannot tell who should preuaile, God or men. But here (as I haue touched) the holy Ghost maketh a distinction betweene God and his creatures, signifying that wee shall neuer be well gouerned, nor haue any right reformation in our liues, vnlesse God aboue reigne ouer vs, and become our teacher and master, & that we know that the whole perfectiō of our life consisteth in this simple obeying of him: Thus much concerning this saying, we must also beare well in remembrance that which Eliphaz addeth: concerning the settling of Gods lawe in our hearts, for (as I haue already touched) it is no seruice of God to make but fayre shews. Men may well iustifie vs, when they see nothing in vs that they can reprove. And why so? because they cannot behold the secreete affections: for it is peculiar vnto God to search mens hearts. But although men deeme vs to be as Angels: yet if our hart be not right and pure, and settled in that vprightnesse and soundnesse whereof the Scripture speaketh so much: all the rest shall vanish away like smoake. And so if we will leade a holy life, wee muste not begin at the feete, nor yet at the hāds, to say I will refrayne my self from doing euill, in such sort as I will not be found blame worthy: but euery of vs must enter into himself, & know that all our euil appetites are rebellious against God, and that he cannot raigne ouer vs, vntil such time as the same be quite put away. Then let vs see to it, that we purge our hearts, to the end that we may walke soundly before God: & if we intēd to bring forth good fruits al our life long let vs looke to it, that there be first a good roote. And this is it that is ment whē it is sayd: if you liue by the spirit, walke also according to the spirite. Here is set downe life, & afterward workes. VVe must first liue by the spirit of God, that is to say, the spirite of God must dwell in vs, to beate downe all that is contrarie to the worde of God and his rightuousnesse. And afterward the same must appear in our whole conuersatiō and life, that men may know what trees we be by bringing forth such fruit. For this cause also it is sayd, that the worde of God hath the propertie of a sharpe two edged sword, to examine & trie euen to the marce, so as there may be nother thoughts, nor affections in men, but the same should bee wholly discovered. And also in an other place it is sayd, That they which profite in the woorde of God, ought to be reprov'd in themselves, that is to say, they must appeare as it were before God, & present themselves before his heauenly seate, and there discover their offences which before were hidde: for this cause haue I specially declared, that to profite well in the schoole of God, wee must take his woorde in our hearts. Now it followeth by and by: if thou returne vnto the Almighty thou shalt be buylt, and shalt driue away iniquitie far from thy Tent. And afterward, Thou shalt lay golde vpon the dust: and thou shalt haue substore of the gold of Ophir, as there be pebble stones in a riuer. Here Eliphaz (the better to stirre vp Iob) sheweth him what profite shal come vnto him, when he shall be so conuerted vnto God. Now we must alwayes leaue the person of Iob, because these things are euil applied vnto him: But yet the doctrine ceaseth not to be good for vs, and meete for our saluation: accordingly as we see that God vseth the like stile whē he exhorteth vs to repētance, that is to wit, he doth not simply commaunde vs, that which we should do, but he addeth a promise, to the intent to incourage vs the better vnto it. And in deede if we should heare but onely our dutie, and not be certified of Gods good will toward vs, it would be a meane to stay vs and hinder vs, so as wee should haue no zeale nor affectiō to draw neere vnto God. VVhen a man is in doubt, and knoweth not whether he shall do himselfe good or no by cōming vnto God, he becōmeth carelesse. Therefore that we may be willing to returne into the right way, wee must be assured that God doth wayte vpon vs, and is ready to receyue vs, yea and doth already reach out his hand vnto vs. Yf we haue not this assurance in our selues: we can not moue one finger breadth: and much lesse cā we come vnto him as we ought to do: nay rather (which worse is) men will alwayes assay to runne backe, when they doubt of the good will of God: yea & his maiestie shall be fearful vnto them. If we conceyue in our mindes that God will deale rigorously with vs, and that he is our iudge. VVe must needs be so afraid of him, as to runne from him as much as is possible for vs. Thus (to be short) we see that vnles we haue tasted this fatherly goodnesse of God, and be assured that he is ready to receyue vs to mercie, a man shall neuer cause vs to do so much as to come to repentance. For this cause it is specially sayd in this place, that if Iob returne, God will blisse him euery way: that whereas he hath bene spoyled of al his substance, he shal be enriched againe more than euer he was: he shal haue plentie of golde and silver: he shall haue all things at his will: and God will so prosper him, that there shall be nothing but cause of ioy & thankesgiuing. VVe see then briefly what is the minde of Eliphaz: namely, that Iob shold be stirred vp to returne vnto God by cōceyuing the sayd good hope that he shall not come to him in vaine, nor be disappointed in seeking God, because he is alwayes ready to forgie vs our offences whē werūne vnto him, and will of his infinite goodnesse blot out all our finnes. True it is that Eliphaz doth alwayes passe measure in that he thinketh, that God maketh those whom he loueth to prosper all alike in this world. That is to great an ouersight. For we see how God afflicteth his and proueth their paciēce, by making thē subiect to many miseries, and yet for all that he ceaseth not to loue them. Therefore mē must not deceiue themselues by imagining that God will sende them all their hearts desire when he is mercifull vnto them. But we must come againe to that which is sayd in the lawe, that is to wit, that like as all ad-

3. 4. 15. 16. wife whē he receyueth vs vnto him, if we come with re-Deut. 28. a. penance, we shall be handled so louingly as he will cause 12. b. 15. 16. vs to prosper so farre forth as shall be expedient for our saluation. Howsoeuer it be, this doctrine is true and very profitable, that when we returne vnto God, iniquitie shall be drinen from vs, and by that meanes we shall prosper. For what is the cause that we are thus afflicted, one with pouertie, an other with diseases, and an other with many torments that are layde on him? Is it bicause God (who is our father) taketh pleasure in dealing roughly with vs, no surely, it is not therefore: but it is bicause we are not meete to enioy the benefites which he hath prepared for vs, and is ready to bestow vpon vs. He seeth that we can not abide that he shoulde deale with vs according to his naturall inclination, that is to say, that he should sende vs all that we would desire: for if we had welth, health, and ease at will, we would by and by become drunken in our pleasures, and kicke against our God, as horses that are to well fedde and pampered. God then perceyuing that we can not vse well the benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs, cutteth them off: not bicause he is a niggard, (as we haue sayde) but bicause he knoweth what we can beare, and is constrayned to bestow his benefites vpon vs by small portions, to the end we may hunger and thirste for them, bicause we are so inclined to spend them riottously, and also that there followeth after them this wicked taylor of spirituall drunkennesse, that we make no more accompt of him, but become so wanton with them, as he can not any more enioy vs. For this cause are we afflicted so many wayes. Furthermore let vs consider the offences that euery one of vs comitteth: and if God should let vs alone vncorrected, there should not be one man but he woulde fall a sleepe in his finnes, and become so hardened in thē, that his boldnesse would increafe more and more. God then perceyuing that if he bare to muche with vs, hee shoulde suffer vs too runne into destruction: findeth a remedie for this mischiefe. And therefore wee are so much the more beholding and bounde vnto him. To be short, we constrain God to deale so rigorously with vs as he doeth: For if wee would giue place too his goodnes, it is certain that he would make vs prosper euery way, & this world shuld be vnto vs an earthlie Paradise, where shuld be nothing but rest and ioy: we should haue cause alwayes to lift vp our heads before him, according as mentiō is made heere. For this cause then is it sayd, that if we retourne vnto God, he wil chaunge all our aduersities & miseries into welth, & our life shal be so happie, as we shall haue cause too reioyce fully, and to giue him thāks for that he hath ben so good a father vnto vs, and for that we haue found him too bee such a one. This is the brief summe of this place. Now haue we a good and profitable lesson to gather out of it: which is to humble our selues so oft as we are afflicted, and not to do as we are wont, that is to wete, not to snappe against God by chafing and fretting at him as if he had done vs some great wrōg. If a mā feele some want of things necessaie for the mainteyance of his familie, and matters come not to passe according to his minde, he is displeasēd and murmureth in his heart against God: if an other be stricken with some disease, if an other be yet more oppressed with pouertie, a man shal heare murmuring on euery side. Thus then our fleshe prouoketh vs alwayes, and pricketh vs forward too kicke against God. And wherfore? Bycause wee consider not that his chastizing of vs is of purpose to bring vs too the knowledge of our finnes, to the end that we should sigh in our selues, and be ashamed of the euils which we haue committed and dayly do committe, and retourne vnto him desiring pardon for the same. Furdermore we must apply to our vse that which hath ben touched, that is too say that our God seing vs too slowe of nature to returne vnto him when we are gone from him: calleth vs louingly vnto him, and putteth vs in good comfort that we shall be receiued of him, and not seke him in vaine. What wil we haue more? when we haue offended our God, we deserue to be cast off: yea and although we should aske him forgienes an hundred thousand times, yet might he refuse vs. Now then sith that contrariwise he cometh to vs, assuring vs that he requireth nothing else but to be at one with vs, and that if we wil seke attonemēt with him, he is already wholly disposed therunto: must it not nedes followe that we are verie hardharted and stifnecked, if wee come not vnto him, and yee'd not ourselues wholly too him with hart & mind? Furdermore let vs note wel that the only remedie for vs to retourne vnto God, is to call to our remembrance the promises that he maketh vs: for otherwise we should alwayes flee from him (as I haue sayd) and although we made a shewe as though we were displeasēd with our finnes, or had some hartbiting or remorse of conscience for our wicked life: yet could we neuer haue any minde to change our life, nor zeale to giue our selues vnto god, vnlesse we know that he wil be mercifull vnto vs. And this is a thing very profitable for vs: neuertheless it is very ill practised at this day. As for exāple, amongst the Papiſts there is talking of repentāce, but they knowe not what it is: for the diuel hath so bewitched them, that their repentance is nothing else but to fast certain dayes, to mumble vp certain pater noster, and to play the hypocrites. The very true repētance is, that a mā forsake him self, and put off his old skin, and be al wholly renued not only to outward apperance, but in the inward affections. But this is vtterly vnknowne amongst the Papiſts. How bee it let vs graunt that they know what repentance is, and how they must retourne vnto God: yet want they the principall point, for that they do not assure the wretched sinners that God wil be merciful vnto them, nother know they what is grace & mercie. They talke much of dooing penance: but how? At al auentures, seing they know not whether it be but lost time, or whether they shall winne any thing by indeuering to retourne vnto God. And what shall come of it? euen that which we haue shewed, and that which the Scripture declareth vnto vs sufficiently: namely that men may well tourne their cote, but they shal neuer draw neere vnto God with their good wil, and with a pure and founde affection, vnles they be perswaded of his fatherly loue towards them: according as it is sayd in the Psalme, Lord thou shalt neuer bee feared, neyther will they euer obey thee, til they knowe thy goodnesse. We see then how profitable this present lesson is for vs. And the better to expresse the same, he sayth expressely, that man shal reioyce in God. and afterward, that he shall call vpon him, that he shall be heard, and that he shall pay him his voyces. This saying ought to be wel weyghed, where it is said that they which retourne into the right way, shall reioyce in God: for it putteth a difference betwene the felicitie which the children

dren of this world and the vnfaithfull do imagin, and the felicitie which God giueth vs as vnto his children. If the vnfaithfull haue such aboundance of welth as they be at rest, and God giue them health therewithall: they thinke them selues happie therefore. And why? For their mindes ascende no higher. Carnall and earthly men beholde only the things that are present. Thus are we caught in Satans nettes: for if things come to pas according to our mind as concerning the world: it is ynough to vs, wee desire no more, and our life is happie, as we think. Yea but where is the felicitie which we turnise? Behold, cōtrariwise God affirmeth that we are then happie when we know that he is become mercifull vnto vs, and receiue our welth as of him and at his hand, and giue him thanks for the same, acknowledging them to be recordes of his goodnesse and loue toward vs. So then whē the worldlings reioyce and glorie in earthly goodes they loke no farther. It is all one with them as if they were with God, so they haue al their harts desire heere. Contrariwise, although the faythfull had all things heere, that were possible to be imagined: Yet would they not stay therē. VVherfore? They haue respect vnto the principall: that is to witte, whither God loue them, and be become their father. And in deed the goodes of this world haue no taste nor fauour with thē, if they be not seasoned with this goodnes of God. And vndoubtedly the true sauce (as men terme it) to make vs feele a good taste in the benefites that God sendeth vs, is for vs to acknowledge his goodnes and loue in them, and to take them for as many recordes of our saluation. VVhē the vnfaithfull haue their tables well furnished, they eate and drinke & play the gluttons, and take no farther care: and all their pleasure is in crāming of thēselues. And whē they haue so spent the time, they must eyther returne to feasting againe, or else go sleepe. To be short, worldlings can not be merrie, but when they forget God. And to conclude at one worde, they cannot be merry but in playing the brute beastes: for they must be as it were cast into a sleepe, so as they may haue no regard of God when they intend to refresh and ease thēselues. Contrariwise, although the faythfull man haue meate and drinke: yet hath he no further delight therein, than to acknowledge thereby that God is his fosterfather: saying, seeing that he hath care of this fraile and weak body, it foloweth that he will much rather haue care of my soule, as which is much deerer vnto him. For if in this world, where we be as it were strangers, he vouchsafe to reache out his hand vnto vs: what will he do for vs when we be gathered vnto him in his kingdome? if a faythfull man haue not this consideration with him: he is in such care and anguish of minde, as he can nother eate nor drink. Happie is the man (sayeth Salomon) that hath a chectifull hart, and poureth it out as before God. But is it possible for a man to reioyce, and to be merrie in God, so as he can wholly repose him self vpon him, if he bee not able to conclude that God loueth him? No surely can he not. For the reioycing of the worldlings is rather a brutish beastlynes, than a true ioye. And in dedde we see the same by euident experiance. For when the most parte of them, eate or drinke, how go they to it? euen like brute beastes. If a hogge be in his sty, when his swill is brought him, he fil- leth his belly so long as his meate lasteth: as much doeth an oxe, or an asse: and euen so do the most part of the world now adayes: for they deuour the benefites of God, without prayer, without thanks giuing, or without any acknowledging of him. The faythfull contrariwise thinke on God, knowing well that their meates shoud turne to their condemnation, if they were not sure that they haue them of the meere fauour of God. For otherwise the inoying of their goodes should be but a robbing of God: if they did not by prayer and supplication acknowledge them to come from him. Truth it is that the ceremonie is not ynough: for there are many at this day that praye and giue thanks to God with their mouth, when as their hart in the meane season is not one whit touched therewith. But I speake now of them that looke rightly vnto God. For in beholding the meates, they acknowledge in thēselues, saying: It is God that maketh vs partakers of those his benefites. Vpon what condicion: if we be his children: well, then we inioye parte of our enheritance, & it is as an earnest penny that he giueth vs, to assure vs that he hath created all things for our takes. But if we be not his children: then must it be imputed vnto vs for theft, yea for hygh treason. Now when the faythfull enter into such temptaō, thervpon they must needs be stricken with great sadnes and anguish of minde, so as they cannot swallow downe one crumme of breade with mirth and contentation. This is it that we haue to note vpon this place where, it is sayd, that the man which is truly conuerted, shall reioyce in his God according also as it is sayd in the lawe, thou shalt eate and drinke as in the presence of thy God, and shalt be merry before him. There also our God doth very well separate his children and his faythfull ones from the vnfaithfull, shewing that although the wicked haue meate and drinke aboundātly, yet cease they not to bee accursed, and all their deynties and pleasures shal bee tourned to their confusion. Let vs not then be tempted to become like vnto them: but if we will leade a happie life, and rightly inioye the benefites that God bestoweth here vpon vs: we must haue him before our eyes, and do him homage for all, and knowe that he sheweth him self to be our fosterfather, and causeth vs to feele his goodnesse, to the end that we might be drawn vp higher, & be alwayes more and more assured of this fatherlie loue that he beareth vs, and to be short, that the corruptible benefites which he bestoweth vpon vs in this world, might be as it were helps to lifte vs vp into heauen, there to lay holde vpon the eternall life, where vnto this oure good God hath called vs. Farthermore, the means how to reioyce a right in God, is also immediately exprest: namely, by calling vpon him, and by paying our vowes vnto him when he hath heard vs. This is a good and profitable declaration of this ioye: for inasmuch as there is nothing else but the curse of God in all the benefites that we receyue at his hand, vnles we taste of his goodnes in them, so as we may reioyce and wholly repose and contente our selues in him: it standeth vs in hand to consider well how we may attaine vnto it, and what is the true means. It is here exprest that we must first call vpon him: and after ward paye him our vowes, when he hath heard vs. There are two things here perteyning to our dutie: and the thirde is the promise that God maketh vs, that we shall not call vpon him in vaine, nor our prayers be voyde or vnprofitable. The end therefore whereat we must begin, is to pray vnto God, yea euen before we reache out our hands one way or other to eate or to drinke: For if we do not begin at this end, that is to say, at the calling vpon our God, certainly all order is peruerted. So then let vs learne that the cheefe exercise and studie which the faythfull ought too haue in this world, is to runne vnto their God, and acknowledging him to be the fountaine of all goodnes, too seeke it in him: protesting that they looke not for so much as one droppe of wellfare eyther too bodie or too soules, other than is giuen them by his free mercy and goodnesse. VVhen we haue learned well this lesson, wee shall bee more inflamed to pray vnto God, than other-ways

wayes wee are . And we see how necessitie vrgeth vs in such sorte as we are in a manner at our wittes endes. Euery man can confesse that the pouerties and afflictions wherewith we are inuironed are infinite: and yet how slacke and slowe are we to pray vnto God? whereas there are a hundred thousand causes in one day that vrge vs to pray vnto God: scarcely do we thinke on him three or foure tymes, and yet that is so coldly, as nothing can bee more . Therefore wee shall haue profited greatly if we haue once learned this lesson and can practise it as it behoueth vs, protesting that all the benefites which we receyue, are his and in his hand, and that it belongeth vnto him too giue vs them . And to the ende we should nor go vnto him doubting, as we are wont to do: there is a promise added therevnto that he wil immediatly heare vs. And without this promise all prayers are nothing else but meere hypocrisie . For what is it too praye vnto God? It is a witnesssing of our fayth . VVell if we doubt and wauer, and stand in a mammering and knowe not whither God will heare vs or no: it is certain that wee haue no fayth . And so wee take the name of God in vain, forasmuch as our prayer whiche ought too bee a testimonie of our fayth, declareth that there is nought else but vncertainie in vs: nother must we thinke that he wil heare vs when we go too him in such a sorte . And in deede it is one of the cheefe articles of our christian beleef, to assure our selues by Gods promise, that he is ready too receyue our prayers at all tymes and as often as wee come vntoo him, being persuaded that he tarieth for vs and requireth nothing else but that we should seeke him: for the gate is open vnto vs, so wee come vntoo him in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ.

And hereby it is seene that all Christen beleef hath ben abolished vnder the Pope, and is yet still at this present . For they speake much of their praying vntoo God: But what certaintie haue they that they shall be heard? none at all . For contrariwise they are not ashamed to say that we must go to him doubtingly . This I say is the opinion euen of the great Doctours, and not only of the idiots . They say it is a presumptuousnesse if we pray vnto God with a stedfast beleef, that hee will heare, vs and that we shall obteyn our requestes. But surely it is a horrible trayterousnesse if men wauer and gaze about when they praye vntoo God . Hereof commeth this superstitiousnesse that wee must haue patrones too make intercession for vs vntoo God, and besides euery mannes priuate patrone, they must also haue a speciall warrant . For they haue neuer doone. VVhen they haue patched and peeced toogether, so as they knowe not on which side to turne them, nor wherevntoo too holde them: they are as greate clerks at the end as they were at the beginning: for they knowe not whither they haue gotten any thing by their praying vntoo God . Furthermore, they neuer pray vnto God, but they serue him last: there the patrones and aduocates must haue the first wordes, and as it were the first frutes . Prayer is the cheefe seruice that God requyeth of vs: and what a thing is it when we conuey it ouer vntoo creatures, and God hath but the refuse of other mennes leauings? This is the common dealing in the Popedome: and not only the idiots (as I haue sayd) but the greatest clerks are the followers of the diuelish doctrine that is mayntained there. And so we see that all christian beleef hath ben destroyed and abolished there.

And therefore so much the more ought wee to magnifie the goodnesse of God, for plucking vs out of so bottomlesse pittes, and so much the better ought wee sticke too the doctrine that is declared heere: which is, to beleue stedfastly that we shall not seeke our God in vaine if we call vpon him in truth, bycause forasmuch as he telleth vs that he wil heare vs, yea and that he wil not tarie vntill we open our mouth, but holdeth his hand already stretched out to help vs at our neede as he speaketh by his Prophete Esay . And this is the cause why the promises are so oft tymes repeated in the holy scriptures, and not without reason . For what so euer God promised men, they cannot bee persuaded that he wil heare them . To be shorte, we cannot giue credit vntoo God: but as for our owne lies, we beleuee them too much . For this cause God ratifieth the promises which he hath made that he wil heare vs . But wee must note to what end God, is so graciouse vnto vs, and so readye to help vs in all our necessities: It is too the end that wee should paye him our vowes, that is too say, that we should by our thanksgining proteste that in all things and for all things wee are boande vntoo him . For this worde vowe, importeth a solemne record that men yeelde by declaring that they haue not any thing but of Gods gift from aboue: and that they cannot requite God againe, nor present him with any thing saue only with prayse and thanks: as it is sayd in the Psalme, VVhat shall I giue vnto the Lord for all the benefites that I haue receyued of him? I will receyue the cuppe of saluation and call vpon his name . VVe see then that our God requireth no thing of vs, but that we should do him homage for all his benefites, and acknowledge his liberalitie, and so much the more extoll his mercy which he hath vsed towards vs . Thus then the way for vs too reioyce in our God, is that we knowing how much we are beholding vnto him, should giue him thankes for all his benefites, and thereby be stirred vp too acknowledge him hereafter for our father, and too doo him that honour and homage which is due vntoo him, assuring our selues that he wil neuer fail vs, and that seing wee haue felt him so good and mercifull, hee will continue the same still: And not only hee will make vs to knowe in this world, that wee haue not putte our trust in him in vaine, but trulie and perfittly too inioye his goodnesse when he shall haue gathered vs into the heavenly kingdom which he hath purchased vnto vs by our Lord Iesus Christ.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to touche vs with his holy spirit, as our offences past may be abolished by his meere goodnesse, and also too beare with vs all the dayes of our lyfe, vntill such tyme as hauing wholly clothed vs with his righteousnes, and transformed vs intoo his image, hee make his glorie so too shyne in vs, as wee may feele the frute of the inheritance which is now promised vs . And so let vs all say, Almightye God heavenly father, thou hast promised to heare our requestes which we make vntoo thee in the name of thy sonne, &c.

This Sermon conteyneth yet something of that which concerneth the three last verses, and afterward the text which followeth.

IOb answering sayde:

2. Although my talk be this day in bitternes, and my plage passeth my groning.
3. If I knevve to find him, or hovv to come vnto his seate.
4. I vvould pleade my cace before him, and fill my mouthe vvith arguments.
5. I should knowve vvhat he vvould ansvvere me, & vnderstand vvhat he vvould say vnto me.
6. VVould he debate the matter vvith me by force? no, but he vvould put strength into me.
7. There the righteous shal debate vvith him, and I should be acquitted for euer.

We haue heere to conferre the last saying of Eliphaz with the answere of Iob which we haue now heard. Eliphaz on his be half mayntaineth that God will alwayes knowe them that are righteous, and not only shewe them fauour, but the whole cuntry for the ir sake. Iob answereth to this, that although he be extremelie delt with at Gods hād, it is not because he hath deserued it. And for proof therof he sayeth that if he had leaue and libertie to pleade his cace: he would well declare that it is not for his sinnes that God doeth so punish him. These are the two contrarie sayings that are treated of here. Now touching the first which is the saying of Eliphaz, it is true that our God hath promised to shewe him self mercifull toward them that serue him with a pure hart. And that the same shal extend not only to their owne persons: but also to their families, yea and to whole cuntries. Yet notwithstanding it followeth not that God will binde him self to one certaine rule. For we see how he trieth the pacience of his seruants and of those that indeuer to obey him in euery point. Then dealeth he not all after one rare as we haue declared heere before. And in deed although it be sayd heere That a cuntrie shall bee deliuered by the cleannesse of one mannes hands: we heare the Prophete Ezechiel say contrariwise: if Iob Daniel & Noë were in this Towne, they shall deliuer their owne soules: but yet should their children perish. It seemeth in deed that the Prophet there, hath respect vnto this place heere, too shew that God is not bound to saue a cuntrie for one mans sake only. If he do it, (as it may happen that he wil) it is at his owne libertie but to appoint him a law, were a thing to vnreasonable. Truth it is that it was sayd too Abraham, that if there could haue bē found but siue rightuouse men in Sodome, God would haue spared the whole citie for their sake: and although it was filled with horrible sinnes, yet God would not haue vsed the vengeance which is written in Moyses. Therevpon Eliphaz intendeth to conelude, that alwayes, as of tē as their is but one righteous mā in a cuntrie, for his sake the cuntrie shal be saued: but this ought not to bee racked out so far as we haue declared. But to be short, let vs learne that al the tēporal promises that are cōteyned in the holie scripture, that is to say, those which concerne the state of the life present, are not so generall that we shuld alwayes stay vpon them. for our God reserueth the fulnesse of his grace for the faithfull in the life too come. It is ynough that they haue here some taste of it: nother should it be for their profit to bee altogether filled with his benefittes in this world. If we had our felicitie as we would wish it, (as hath ben declared more at large heretofore) what would become of vs? Euery mā would fall asleepe, and the hope that wee haue of the heauenly life, would bee as it were layd a water, yea bee quite abolished. Therefore it is needfull that God should waken vs with afflictions, too the end we might think vpon the euerlasting heritage which is promised vs, and lift vp our mynds therevnto: for to that end behoueth it vs to be exercized in many aduersities. And that is the cause why I sayd that we must not rest peremptorily vpon the certaintie of the promises of this present life. For God distributeth them vntoo vs according as he knoweth them to be expedient for vs, hauing always an eye to our infirmitie. Neuerthelesse God will also prosper those that are minded to serue him, and make them so to feele his grace, as they shall haue aforehand as it were a pledge of the inestimable benefittes that are prepared for them in heauen: but yet must they not set their minds only vpon that pledge. Again if it please God to afflict such as haue walked vprightly, they must not therfore shrink away, nor be out of hart, nor cōclude that God hath shaken thē off: but rather they must consider that by that meanes God intendeth to drawe them to him, and to kill their fleshy affectiōs, and to cut off the superfluities that are in them to the worldward, to the end they should be the better dispozed to passe out of it, and not settle themselues in things present. Thus must we alwayes cheere vp ourselues in the mids of our afflictions, and make our gayne when God causeth vs to feele his fauour, by considering that it is ynough for vs that we haue some promises of it here, & that the fulnesse therof must not be shewed as now, as the which should not be for our welfare. Hereby wee see that Iob had iust cause to rebuke Eliphaz after that maner. Neuerthelesse he exceedeth measure as he had doone heretofore. And this wil be the better perceiued by the wordes that he vseth. He sayeth that although his wordes be bitter, yet doeth the plage that be indureth farre passe his groning [or complaynt]. VVherby he meeneth that he maketh right greuouse complaints: and yet that if men looke vpon his aduersitie and wey it well, they shall find it farre greuoufer than all his complaints. To be short, Iob intended to excuze himself of that he cōplained so sore, & could not refraine himself nor assuage his owne sorrowe. He sheweth that he hath good cause to be so excessiue, by cause the miserie which he indureth doeth yet farre excede all his complaints. As for this, it might well be borne withall: but immediately he entreth into his old byasse wherein we haue seene him heretofore: which is that he would fayne go to lawe with God, & shewe that if he might atteyn to that, and haue leaue to maynteyne his owne cace: he should do wel ynough, and in cōclusion be quit and cleered. For then (sayeth he) God would not vse force against mee, but deal with mee by order of lawe: and if I might haue such hearing, I should immediately gayne the vpper hand. This matter would be hard to vnderstand, if we called not too remembrance what hath ben sayd heretofore: that is to wit, that although God be alwayes rightuouse, yet is it after two sortes. The one is that which he hath declared to vs by his lawe, and that that is the rightuoufneffe whereby he dealeth with men and wherby he iudgeth them. Then if God summon vs to his iudgementfeate, and there deale with vs by the order of his lawe: that is one kind of rightuoufneffe or Iustice. For no man is able to say but we be iustly condemned when wee be condemned by the lawe of God. For what doeth God require at our hands which wee ought not to do? And if we make default, what can we say to it if he punish vs according to our deserts. Thus ye see one kind of Gods Iustice which wil be grauted to be rightfull without any gaynsaying. True it is that the wicked will not ceasse to be alwayes grunting against it: neuertheless for all their grudging yet are their mouthes stopped forsomuch as their owne cōsciences do so condemne them, as there needeth none other man to giue euidence against them, nor to make long triall of the matter: for they haue a fearyng yron that burneth thē with in. There is also another kind of rightuoufneffe which we are lesse acquainted with: which is, whē God hādleth vs, not according to his lawe, but according as he may do by right. And why so? Forasmuch as our Lord giueth vs our lesion in his lawe, & commaundeth vs to do whatsoeuer is contained there: although the same do farre passe all our power, & no mā be able to performe the things that he hath cōmaunded vs: yet notwithstanding we owe him yet more, and are further bound vnto him: and the lawe is not so perfect and peerlesse a thing, as is the sayd infinite rightfulness of God, according as we haue seene heretofore, that by that he could find vnrightuoufneffe in the Angels, and the verie day sunne should not be cleere before him. Thus ye see how there is a perfecter rightuoufneffe than the rightuoufneffe of the lawe. And so God listeth to vse that: although a man had performed all that is conteyned in the lawe: yet shuld he not fayle to be condēd. But surely our Lord vseth it not. For he applieth himself so farre forth vnto vs, that he receiueth, and accepteth the sayd rightuoufneffe which he cōmaundeth, as though is were thoughtly perfect, notwithstanding that it be somewhat qualified to the state of man, I meene of man before he was corrupted with sin. This matter had neede to be layd foorth yet more at large, specially cōcerning the first rightuoufneffe. True it is that there shal neuer any be found that hath fulfilled the lawe, no not euen of the faythfull. For so long as we abyde in our owne kind, we be so farre of from fulfilling it, that we cannot so much as think one good thought. VVhat is man in himself? A mortall enimie of God and all goodnesse. So then we haue no shift to discharge our selues against God, if he leaue vs to our selues, but contrariwise we shall do nothing else but prouoke his wrath. And again whē he graunteth vs the grace by his holie spirit, to loue the thing that is good, & therewithall putteth such a woorkfulness in vs as our life becommeth a mirroure and example of holinesse: yet do we fayle so many wayes, that if we be able to answer God to one point, we be gilty in a thousand points for it. Yea and (which more is) wee neuer do any good, wherein there is not some blemish insomuch that we shuld be faultie in all respects before God, if he listeth to handle vs rigorously. Howbeit, when God is so graciously to vs as to gouerne vs by his holie spirit, he accepteth the goodnesse that he hath put into vs, notwithstanding that it bee vnperfect. True it is that forsomuch as we do amisse, we haue not so much as were requisite: neuertheless God layth not our infirmities and sinnes to our charge, but shetteth his eyes at them, like as a father is not to inquisitiue of his owne child, and although he see well ynough the faults that are in him, yet he beareth with them. Euen after the same maner doeth God woork towards vs, for hee vseth

the same pitifulnesse in forgiuing all the infirmities wherthrough we do amisse. But now let vs come to that which is sayd heere. Iob knew well ynough that he was a wretched sinner, and he was not so blinded with pryde, as too beare himself in hand that he was throughly rightuouse, and that God did but byte at him without cause. But his meening was that if God would handle him after the ordinarie maner which he setteth foorth in his lawe, which is to blisse such as serue him, and too deale gently with them, so as they may well feele him their good father: after that maner and according too that rule, he could well answer before him. And so his meening is, that God vseth his owne prerogatiue of a rightuoufneffe which is secret and hidden from mē, and dealeth not with him any more by the order of his lawe, but by another consideration which men cannot take hold of nor reache vnto with all their reason and witte. Lo what his meening is. This will be the better vnderstood, by applying of it in forme of an example in the persone of Iob, and in the person of some other man set as it were by his side. Looke vpon a man whom God hath chozen to himself: well, he indeuereth to walk holiy and with a good conscience: and God blisseth him, and there appereth no token that God forgetteth him, but rather that he gouerneth him & hath a care of him. And why is that? Is it by cause that that man hath deserued it? No: for if we seeke for desert or woorthinesse in any creature, it can bring nothing which is not Gods owne afore: and if there be any goodnesse in mā, the same procedeth first of the holie Ghost. Man then bringeth not ought of his owne vnto God: and the goodnesse that is in vs should neuer be woorthie to be well liked of God, but should be reiected, by cause there is always some blemish in it. Therefore when ouer Lord maketh the faythfull to prosper after he hath giuen them a desire to walk according too his will: he vseth the ordinarie rightuoufnesse, that is too wit, the rightuoufnesse which he setteth foorth vnto vs in his lawe. But looke mee heere vpon Iob who is a faithfull man and hath serued God with a pure and rightmeening minde: and yet notwithstanding he is tormented with extremitie: it seemeth that God hath set him vpon a scaffold to shewe there a dreadfull vengeance in him: to be short, for aught that man can coniecture, he was handled rougher thā Cain or Iudas. And what meeneth such a straunge maner of dealing? Here vpon Iob sayeth that our Lord vseth his secret Iustice: that is to say, he vseth not the ordinarie rule that is conteyned in his lawe, but intendeth to trie Iobs paciēce, and to make him an example to the whole world. To be short, he intendeth to shewe what authoritie he hath ouer his creatures. Notwithstanding, in so dooing he ceaseth not to bee rightuouse: I meene euen although he deale altogether after that manner. For I haue declared already, that God vseth not the sayd extraordinary Iustice towards mē: howbeit, Iob thought so. Ye see then that God shal be rightuouse still, although he proceede not according to the rule of his lawe. But now let vs trie whither Iob spake rightly in saying so: no surely, he ouershot himself. And for proof thereof, let vs take the sentēce that is set downe heere: He wil not debate with mee by force: (sayeth he) but there I shal baze reason. How, meeneth he that God wil not deale with him by force? It were to go too lawe with him if he would giue him the hearing. Iob then presupposeth that God vseth an absolute or lawlesse power (as they terme it) towards him: as if he should say, I am God, I will doo what I list, although there be no order of Iustice in it but plaine lordly ouerruling. Herein Iob blasphemeth God: for although Gods power bee infinite, yet notwithstanding, to imagin it to bee so absolute and lawlesse is as much as to make to make

to make him a Tirant, which were vtterly contrarie to his maiestie. For our Lord wil not vse might without right, nother is he lesse rightfull than mightful: his rightfulnessesse and mightfulnessesse are things inseparable. Therefore Iobs saying is euill. Not that he purposed (as I haue sayd afore) to blaspheme Gods: but yet did wandering words escape him, and that came bycause he could not brydle his affections. But now let vs come to the handling of the matter in truthe as it is. Hithertoo wee haue but layd forth the matter. VVheras I sayd 10 there are two sorts of righteousnesse or Iustice in God: that is true. Howbeit the applying of it was according to Iobs imagination, and that was a misapplying. But now let vs come to the pure truthe, that we may knowe how the matter goeth. It behoueth vs to beare in mind what hath ben declared heretofore: that is to wit, that God in his lawe applieth himself vnto vs, and requireth not so much as we owe him, but according to mannes abilitie to performe: I meene not his abilitie now that we be corrupted, but his abilitie when he was in his perfect soundnesse, such as Adam had before he fell, and such as the Angels of heauen haue yet still. Ye see then that God in his lawe hath a respect vnto our abilitie: yea, but let vs consider well after what maner this woord Abilitie is to be vnderstood: for it is not according to the want or wretchednesse that is in vs as now: (for as now wee can do nothing but euill): but according to the state wherein wee should haue continued safe and sound, if corruption had not entered into our nature. And for the better vnderstanding herof, let vs take the Angels for a mirroure. Behold, the Angels indeuer to serue God: they are not 30 tempted with euill affections as we bee: there is no rebelliousnesse nor sin in them: and yet notwithstanding, although the obedience which they yeeld vnto God bee pure in respect of vs: it ceaseth not to bee imperfect if it be compared with the infinite maiestie of God. Now then, God (if he list) could vse vs after an extraordinarie maner: that is to say, although there were no lawe to rule vs by, yea, or although wee had performed all that is conteyned in the lawe: yet might he iustly condemne vs, but he will not do it. And why? He is contented with the rule that he hath giuen, shewing that he pitieth his poore creatures. And that is the cause why the Angels are pure and accepted for righteous before him. But now let vs passe further. God hath promised to blisse such as walke in purenesse of hart and hand: yea, howbeit with condition to referue always to himselfe the preeminence to iudge what is meete and expedient for our welfare. For if God perceiue that we haue neede to be chastized, hee will do it: And although we haue had the 50 mind to serue him and haue put our indenuoure thereto: yet wil hee not therefore misse to handle vs roughly sometimes, so as it shal seeme that we haue offended him more greuously than the wickeddest of the world, by his punishing of vs after that sort. But it is not as Iob thought. And why? For it semed to him that God ought to haue hild himselfe contented with the obedience that he had yelded him, and that Gods punishing of him proceeded simply of an absolute power, as who should say, that God delt wilfully, of set purpose to shew the strength 60 of his arme, in ouerwhelming a poore creature that wist not what to do nor say, and that there was no reason in his doings. But these are words woorthy to be blamed, yea and to be accursed How then? VVheras God hath so afflicted Iob as we see, true it is that he meant not to punish him after the ordinarie maner of his desert: but yet might he haue punished him so, euen by his law. And why? For surely God beareth with vs, and accepteth our works in good woorth which wee do through the grace of his holy spirit, although they be faulty. But is he bound to do so? No. Hath he giuen vs his law to the intent to be subiect to vs, and to be bound vnto vs? No. He doth it of his owne free goodnesse. Now then if a man wold compell him to it, should he not do him wrong? Yes. Therefore Iob misbehaueth himselfe in this behalfe. For when a man shall haue walked as vprightly as is possible, yet shall he be found faultie before God, so as he may iustly send him all the afflictions in the world, and a man must be faine to condemne and humble himselfe, and too acknowledge that he hath deserued yet more.

Thus ye see wherein Iob beguiled himselfe. For inasmuch as God of his owne meere goodnesse beareth with his children, and taketh their works aworth though they deserue it not: it semeth to Iob that God vseth cruelty towards him, or at leastwise an absolute and lawlesse prerogatiue: but he doth not so. True it is that Gods intent was not to punish Iobs sinnes: hee had another respect, and went another way to worke: according as I haue shewed, that it was his mind too trie Iobs pacience, whereas in the meane while there were many wicked men in the world, which made merrie and triumphed at the same time, and God made no ill countenance towards them. And so we see it was not his mind to handle Iob according to his deserts, howbeit that we must alwaies conclude, that God euen according to his law, could haue sent Iob an hundred times more aduersitie, so as he shuld not haue bin able to beare it. And why? The least offence that wee committe, trespasseth againste the maiestie of God. And I pray you what punishment is great ynough for so huge an offence, as the impeaching of Gods maiestie and the casting downe of his iustice? If we were ouerwhelmed a hundred thousand times, yet were it not comparable to the hideousnesse of the crime that wee haue committed. So then, Iob reasoneth awry in saying that God hadleth him not after the rule of his law. Surely if he had said, according to his ordinarie maner, (meaning that God intended not to punish him for his sinnes, but for some other cause:) he had said very well and truly. But he saith, I see well that God vseth an excessive power, he thundreth against me as though hee woulde dispatch me, and therefore I must bee faine to holde my peace. VVhen he speaketh so, doubtlesse hee playeth the horse that is broken looce. Not that hee was at any time out of pacience: howbeit, that pacience of his was not such, but that it now and then boiled with great wallops, and did cast out some froth and skum. Thus ye see the opening of the matter that Iob handleth heere. And forasmuch as these things are very high, the laying forth of the processe of this matter, may giue yet some greater light. Therefore let vs come to that which Iob sayth, after he hath declared that what bitterness soeuer he hath vttered out of his stomacke, yet his greefe surmounteth his complaint. He saith If it were lawfull for me too finde God. And what meaneth he by that? He meeneth to go to law after the manner of men. Out of all doubt, if God should abace himselfe so farre, as to go to law with vs: yet could we neuer win our case. And that is the cause why hee saith in his Prophet Esay, let vs set a iudge or vmpire betwixte vs, too see who shall goe by the better. Esay. l. c. 18. VVhen God speaketh after that maner, he meaneth not to resigne his office, nor too stoupe so low as too submit himselfe too mans trial, that any body shoulde presume too gyue sentence vpon him. No: but hys meening in effect is, that although hee shoulde forbear his authority, and that there were some man appointed too bee iudge betweene hym and vs: yet shoulde wee not sayle to be condemned. VVe might will pleade for our selues, and we might well alledge all our reasons: but yet should be confounded, bycause God would alwayes be able to find some fault or other in vs. Mark that for one point. And therefore Iob ouershooteth himself much in wishing to find God, that he might go to lawe with him, that is to say, in wishing that God should stoupe so lowe, as he might take him for his aduersarie, to pleade his case against him before a iudge. For although he had that priuiledge, and that God should graunt him his desire: yet should he alwayes be put to shame. But what maketh him to beguile himself? It is bycause his torments troubled him in such wise as he was not maister of his wits, but sawe vexacion as in darknesse, or else had his eyes blyndfolded, and considered not that God could find more blame in him than he himself was priue to, if he list to examin him rigorously. And heereby we bee warned to stand vpon our gard when God sendeth vs any afflictions. Therefore let vs take heede that we hold ourselues short. And why? Bycause we shall out of hand be dazeled in our passions, and the mischeef will pinche vs so sore, as we shall no more knowe where to become. So much the more then had euery of vs neede to looke narrowly too himself: and if God send vs aduersities, let vs assure our selues that we should be vanquished and beaten downe out of hand, if he vphild vs not by his grace. Furthermore let vs not beleue our owne likings: but when our fleshy reason alledgeth any thing to vs, let vs say: Alas, what imaginest thou o wretched creature? for besides that thou art no competent iudge in thine owne case, thy miserie hath blinded thee, and thou turnest aside out of the right way. If thou wert in quiet, thou mightest iudge much better than thou canst now, for thyne owne conceyt caryeth thee away. Seing it is so, thou must not take vpon thee to stand in defence of thy case, but thou must willingly yeeld thy self guilty, assuring thy self that thou shalt not be able to cleere thy self afore God, but that thou must be vtterly confounded. Lo what we haue to mark in this text. Now let vs proceede further. Iob sayeth, would God dispute with me by force? No, but he would giue mee strength. Hereby he betokeneth, that god did presently dispute or reason against him by mayne force: But that were a charging of God with things that can by no meanes light into him. And vndoubtedly wheras the doctors of Sorbon say that God hath an absolute or lawlesse power, it is a diuelish blasphemie forged in heil, for it ought not once to enter into a faithful mannes head. Therefore we must say that God hath an infinite or endlesse power, whiche notwithstanding is the rule of all righteousnesse. For it were a rending of God in peeces, if we should make him almightie without being alrighteous. True it is, that his righteousnesse shall not alwayes be apparant vnto vs, but yet ceaseth it not too continue euermore sounde and vnappayred. VVe muste not measure Gods ryghteousnesse by our owne conceyte, (for that were too greate a streyting of it:) but we muste alwayes bee fully resolued, that Gods myghtfulnesse can not be separated from his ryghtfulnesse, bycause God can not be dismembred. But Iob suppozeth heere, that God disputeth with hym by mayne force: that is too saye, that hee sheweth himselfe so terrible, as there is no reason too be had at his hande, bycause there is none other thing with him, but, I am thy God, and I may dispose of thee as I list my self. This is very true: Howbeit, God orderth his creatures in such wyse, as we must not imagin that his righteousnesse is separated from his power, as I sayde afore. And that is the point wherin Iob was cuerseen. when he said, O, then would not God dispute with me by force. For it is certaine that although God had disputed against Iob with force or might, yet it should not haue ben with such a lawlesse might, as should haue born downe right: but with a rightfull might, notwithstanding that men could not comprehend the rightfulness therof. And here we be warned, that when there is any talk of Gods mightinesse ministred vnto vs, wee must reuerence it by contenting the same to be alwayes rightfull. And if we wil so do, then (as I haue touched already) we must not measure his mightinesse by our vnderstanding: for what a thing were that? It is euen the ground & cause of all the grudgings that are heard against God. For when men conceiue not the reason why god doth things, they fall out with him, & gnash their teeth, & chafe against him. Sure it is a diuelish pride & presumption, when we wil haue god to gouerna vs after our own liking, & fail to our controlling of al his doings & cannot conceiue good opinion of the, except he shew vs the reason why. But contrarywise it behoueth vs to honor the said secret mightinesse, acknowledging that ther is rightfulness enclosed in it, which we cannot espy as yet. There are other some, which to proue god righteous, would abolish his mighty power. Of which number are they which in these days cannot abide that a man should preach, that God hath chosen vs of his owne free goodnesse, & that he disposeth al things according to his owne good pleasure, and that nothing hapneth but by the ordinance & guiding of his hand. For, because they cannot brook that geere, they fall to ouerthwarting after this sort: How now? if God haue so chosen some, and forsake the residue it followeth, that he hath created men to damnation: & is that agreeable to his righteousness? Ageine, if all things be done by Gods will, what shall a man say to it, seing ther are so many wicked things done? Now these wretched fooles, or rather madde men, can not fynde in their hearts to stoupe so low as to say: In dede it is a verie strange case, that God hauing created me, wil not also saue the: neuerthelater let vs assure oure selues, that Gods righteousness is to high & to depe for vs to attain vnto as now: but the day will come that our Lorde will make vs able to vnderstand the things that are hidde from vs as now. It is sayde that we know but partly & darkly: but when we be become like to him, we shall not only see him as he is, but also we shall perfectly vnderstand the things that are not yet disclosed vnto vs. These drunken sots that are sotted in their ouerweening, cannot abide to yeeld God so much glorie, as to submit theselues wholly vnto him. For if a man speake to the of gods prouidence, they answer, how can it come to passe, that a man should be condemned for the euil that he hath committed, & yet that the same should be done by the will of God? They cannot discern that man beeing convicted by his own naughtinesse, is iustly condemned for the same & yet that god purposeth an other ende, which is vnknewen to vs. And Iob hath well shewed this, by satering al his afflictions vpon god. For when the theeues had robbed him of all his goods, he said it was god that had doone it: Howbeit in an other respect, than the theeues had done it. Aibeit that these things be strange to vs, yet must wee not fall to slaundersing of Gods righteousness, or to railing at it. And thus the thing which I said was to be noted out of this straine, is that we must not put God vnder such rule, as we be able to conceiue in our vnderstanding: for his righteousness farre passeth the reache of our wit. What is to be done then? VVe must humble ourselues: & when foeuer God worketh after any fashion that is strange & vnknewen to vs, we must not therfore cease to conclude that he is alwayes righteous. For it is the way whereby God will trie whether we honour him or no: namely if when things fall out contrary to our reason & liking, we neuerthelesse do still magnifie his name. For if God had led vs after our owne will, and all the world were gouerned as we had deuized in our head: It were very easie for vs to say, God is rightuouse, God is good. And why? Because we shal haue concluded already in our selues that it must be so. And what should then become of Gods rightuouesnesse? It should bee but a certaine subiection vnto vs: as who would say that if God did as we would haue him to do the should he be wise, but not wise: & that were greate reason. Contrariwise (as I haue sayd) he tryeth our humilitie when he woorketh after such a fashyon as wee cannot find to bee good by our naturall wit, and yet neuerthelesse confesse him to bee rightuouse, and there rest as prisoners vnder the brydle of humilitie. Thus ye see after what maner we yeeld god the glorie that is belonging to him. And therefore although God vse greate rigour towards vs, so as we knowe not on which side to turne vs, and we seeme to be pressed ouer fore. Yet let vs beware that wee say not with Iob, that God debateth with vs in mightinesse of power: let vs take hede that we father not an absolute power vpon God: but let vs consider that there is alwayes in him an incomprehensible rightfulness which it behoueth vs too honour though we perceyue it not, and that it shewe not it self: let vs alwayes make this conclusion, Lord, thou art rightuouse, and thy iudgements are a bottomlesse pitte. This is the cause why it is expressly sayd in the Psalme, Lord thou art rightuouse, and thy iudgements are as a deepe Sea. And therefore man must stoupe in that behalf, for if he presume to enter into the, surely he shall neuer wade out again, but be plunged & as it were drowned in the. Then although we see so great and dark dungeons: yet must wee confesse that God is rightuouse. Furthermore wheras Iob sayeth heere, that God would giue him strength, and not debate with him by prerogative of his power: let vs acknowledge that God giueth vs strength euen in the greatest rigour that he vseth. For if he gaue vs not strength, what a thing were it? God needeth not to vtter any extreme force to confound vs, let him but blowe vpon vs, and wee be dispatched. For what is that? A little rush that is withered by and by, or else a flowre, or a bud of an herb, or whatsoeuer else is lesse: to be short, he is but a shadowe. Therefore if God shewe not his power in maynteyning vs, wee bee vndone, yea euen with the least aduersitie that he can send vs. And what should become of vs then if he vphild vs not, when he listeth to chastize vs somewhat roughlier? But he beareth vs vp in such wise, that whē he smiteth vpon vs with the one hand to strike vs downe, he hath the other hand vnder vs to lift vs vp again, and suffereth vs not to quayle. Therefore let vs conclude, that if God afflict vs, he will giue vs such strength as wee shall alwayes stand stedfast and vnouercome: yea verely, for he is neere vs, that is to say, vs that are his. Inso much then as wee feele such assistance at his hand, it ought to suffice vs, affurnig our selues that he will alwayes haue such respect of our infirmities, as he will make vs too feele His grace more and more, and vtter it in such aboundance, as wee shall be well fenced with it to continue in his hoie calling vnto the end.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs to profit more and more in true repentance, and to open our eyes, that wee may learne to serche the wants that are in vs, and too condemne our selues for them: and therewithall resort vnto him, not doubting but that he is ready to heare vs, and that whēsoeuer we seeke the remedies of our diseases, he will alwayes shewe himself a good phisition in purging vs of all our wicked affections: and that it may please him to open our eyes, too the end we may behold the fauour that he sheweth vs, in adopting vs for our Lord Iesus Christs sake, and in giuing vs the pledge of our saluation, that therby wee may take occasion of comfort and reioycing, yea euen in the mids of all the afflictions and temptations of this world, so as we may ouercome them and all other battels wherwith he listeth to exercise vs heere. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and Nations, &c.

The .lxxxix. Sermon, which is the second vpon the .xxiiij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the .vij. verse, and then vpon the text that is added.

8. If I come afore him, he appeereth not too mee: and if I come behind him, I shall not atteine to him.
9. If I come on the left side vwhere he doth his vvorke, I shal not perceyue him: and if I turne meeto the right hand, he vvill hyde himself and I shall not see him.
10. According as he knowveth my vvay, so doeth he trie mee, and I shal go out as gold.
11. My toote hath hild his path, I haue kept his vvay, and not turned aside from it.
12. I haue not forsaken the commaundement of his lippes, I haue layd it vp, and I haue set more store by the vvords of his mouth than by my liuing (or my custome.)

Ob pursewing the matter that was treated of yesterday, protesteth here, that if God would handle him after his deserts, he should not be so sore afflicted as he is: for alwayes his meening is, if God would procede with him according to the rule of his lawe. And hereby he betokeneth, that he is not punished as an offender, but that God hath some other respect which is vnknowne vnto him. Certesse it is verie true that God dealeth not after his ordinarie maner towards him, when he vttereth such rigour against him. For Iob was none of those that haue transgressed Gods lawe in such wise, as their punishment ought to be an example vnto others. Iob was none of that nuber: he had indeued to leade a hoie life: & he had so behaued himself, not only towards me, but also towards God, as he might haue ben counted more than half an Angell in cōparison of other me. And therefore he hath good reason to say, that the punishment which he indured was not for his sinnes, if so be that he had acknowledged that god might iustly do it, if he thought good. For if our Lord beare with men, it is not to be sayd thereore, that he is bound to do it, and hat it may not bee free for him to chastize them more roughly if he list. Iob therefore doth amisse in this poynt, that he acknowledgeth it not to be through Gods meere grace, grace, that he is not punished for his finnes. Agayne hee doth euill in entering into Gods secret iudgements, and in surmizing that God vseth an absolute or lawlesse power, and in not acknowledging a secret righteoufnesse in him, although his creatures perceiue it not. This is the cause why he saith, That the righteouse myghte go to lawe with God if he would voutsafe to deale by the order of his law. But yet it is certaine, that if wee should go that way to worke, we must all of vs needes be condemned. For what mortall man can boast that he hath fulfilled the law of God? And it is written, cursed is he that perfourmeth not all the things that are conteyned in the law.

Deut. 27. d.
26. c.
Gal. 3. b. 10.

Thus ye see that all mankind is shut vp vnder the curse, if God listeth to extend the rigoure of his law towards vs, according as Saint Paule treateth specially thereof in the third Chapter to the Galathians. Iob then is farre ouerseene in saying that a righteouse man may pleade his cace, if God wil giue him audience according to the rule of his law. For (as I haue said) we must needes yeld ourselues gilty, not only for offending in some one poynte, but for transgressing in all poynts, insomuch as we neuer serue God as we ought to do, nor with such perfection as he deserueth and as our duetie requireth. VVherfore it foloweth that men are transgressors of the law, not in some one part of it, but in euery poynt. Moreouer it is true that the righteouse may shew themselues before God, howbeit not to come to account: for wherein consisteth our blisfednesse, but in hauing our finnes pardoned and as it were buried at Gods hand, as it is written in the two and thirtieth Psalme: And who dareth open his mouth to pleade against the heauenly iudge? It standeth vs then in hand to haue Iesus Christ for our aduocate: and he in pleading our cace alledgeth not our deserts, ne setteth himselfe in our defence to say that God doth vs wrong in punishing vs: but he alledgeth the amends that he himselfe hath made, and that forso much as he hath released vs our dets, we be now quit before God. Thus we see that Iob offended in saying that the righteouse and iust dealing man may pleade his cace before God. Now as concerning the other point where it is said, that if he seeke God before him, he shall not perceiue him: and if he come behynd him, he shall not ouertake him: and if he go on the left hand, he will be bidden from him: and if hee turne on the right hand, he shall not see him: thereby hee meeneth that Gods iudgements are incomprehensible to him: which is a very true saying. Some expound this of the foure parts of the world: and all cometh to one poynt. For according as it is said in the Psalme, who shall giue me wings to flie away? If I go ouer the Sea, the hand of God is too long: it will ouertake me. If I go downe into the deepes, there he will find me out. If I lye about the cloudes, yet will his hand ouerreach me, and plucke me backe from thence. Therefore it is all one in this text, when we vnderstand it to be spoken of the East, VVest, South, and North. Iob meeneth that it is to no purpose for men to make long discourses, for when they haue trotted vp and downe all the world ouer, yet shall they neuer attayne to the great secrets of God, for they surmount all their capacitie and reach. But the sense continueth alwayes the same that I haue spoken of: namely that Iob meeneth heere, that the maner of dealing whiche God vseth towards him, is so high and profound, as mans reason can neuer reach vnto it. And it is a very true saying, so it be well applied: but Iobs fault is, that forasmuch as he perceiueth not the reason of Gods doings, hee imagineth him too vse an absolute or lawlesse power (as they terme it) that is too say, that God woorketh at his owne pleasure withoute keeping any order or rule, and that hee doth as he iusteth, like a Prince that will not be ruled by reason, but foloweth his owne liking. In so saying Iob blasphemeth God: howbeit, that is bycause of the sudden pangs of his passions, wherethrough words escaped him without aduisednesse. Neuerthelesse he sayeth not to conclude alwayes that God is righteouse and blamelesse: hee sticketh euer vnto that in himselfe. But yet notwithstanding, he is not able to bridle his tongue from casting foorth words out of square by reason of his passions. This is it that wee haue to marke in effect. Now, that we may applie this doctrine to our vse, let vs vnderstand, that we must not preache before God too pleade our cace with him: for we must needes be condemned without any long procesmaking on his behalfe: and the more defences and excuses that wee thinke wee haue, so much the more must oure sinfulness needes increace. Then is there none other remedie, but to acknowledge ourselues gilty, and to craue forgiuenesse and mercie. Thus our comming vnto God, must not be to pretende any iustifying of our selues, nor to make any satisfacti- on: but to acknowledge our finnes, and to beseech him to admit vs of his owne meere goodnesse and mercie, and not to open our mouth to pleade our cace. For that maner of debating belongeth not to vs: it is the office that is giuen to our Lord Iesus Christ. Therefore let vs on our part hold our peace, and suffer Iesus Christ to be our spokelman and to make intercession for vs: that by that meanes our faultes may be buried and we be quitte instead of being condemned.

Thus much haue we to beare away in the first place: and that is the meane too deliuer vs from our iudge for euer: according as Saint Paule sayth, who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods children seeing he iustifieth them: VVho shall stand against them seeing that Iesus Christ hath taken their cace in hande to plead it? That (say I) is all our refuge: and without that, we be vndone, and we must not thinke to come vnto God without it. For we should be ouerwhelmed with his wrath as we be worthy. As touching the second point, it behoueth vs to marke, that Gods iudgements are oftentimes hidden from vs: but yet must we not therefore thinke them straunge, so as we should check against them or say, there is no reason in them. Let vs rather acknowledge that Gods righteoufnesse is too high a thing for such rudenesse as is in vs, and that it were too great a presumptuousnesse for vs to desyre to attaine therevnto. This (say I) must we be fully resolued of. I sayde that Gods iudgements are very secret, and that when wee haue soughte, serched, and ransacked to the vitermost that we can, we shall bee confounded: but doth it follow therefore, that God hath no rule of himselfe? No. And why? Let vs make comparison betwixt him and vs, and what a difference is there? My wayes (saith he) are further off from yours, than heauen is from earth. Truly he vseth that manner of speech to shew, that we must not esteeme of his mercy according to our own nature. Neuerthelesse god doth generally shew, that it is against all reason that we should measure him by our span as the Proouerb saith. VVhat remaineth then? VVee must honour Gods secrets when they be hidden from vs, and therewithall confesse that al his doings are disposed with infinite wisdom, vprightnesse, and goodnesse, and that if any man attempt to doubt of that, hee must needes come to shame, according as it is said in the Psalme, Lord howsoeuer the world goeth, thou shalt be found righteous. For Dauid saw wel the diuelish pride that is in men, who will needes be alwayes replying against God and controlling of him. But what win they by it? nothing, but that God must maintayne his his owne right, and they be ouerwhelmed with their malapertnesse. Thus ye see a point that is well woorthy to be borne in mind, when it is said, that if we go from the sunne rising to the sunne going downe, and draw about from North to South, when we haue hunted ouer al the world, yet shall we not attaine vnto God. Heereby wee be informed, that Gods determinations are such a bottomlesse Sea, as wee can neuer attaine too them, and that the rightfulness which is in them, is an infinite thing. Now let vs consider our owne abilitie, and marke what infirmitie is in vs. If a man should bestow all his whole life in traueling, yet could he not know the whole world. And what should we knowe of God when we had attained to the centre, (that is too saye to the bottome) of the earth? [Little or nothing.] And surely if wee could stye vp about the cloudes: yet should we come farre shorte of knowing all that is in God. So then let vs learne two things breely: the one is, that when God woorketh not after our manner, wee must not thinke with ourselues, that the creatures are able to do this or that: or that men haue bin wont to do so: or that the ordinarie manner of woorking is thus and thus: or that this is the order of nature. Gods mightie power must not be shut vp within the order of nature, nor within such bounds. What the? Let vs confesse that his iudgements are so deepe a Sea, as we cannot found them. And therewithal let vs hold it for a sure principle, that God continueth euer more righteouse, notwithstanding that he seeme to deale crookedly and ouerthwartly: and although wee find faulte with his doings, and haue apparant surmizes and colours so to do: yet (say I) lette vs alwayes conclude thus with ourselues: Lord, thou art righteouse, according also as Jeremy sayth. True it is that it greued him to see the wicked haue their full scope and the godly men to be vttery troden vnder foote, so as all things were out of order, and might ouercome righte, and there was no more conscience and vp-right dealing among men. Jeremy lamented it and was sory for it. Agayne he saw the wicked liue vnpunished, as though God had bin asleepe, & had thought no more vpon his charge. Thus ye see it was a very hard and comberfome temptation that the Prophet indured. But forasmuch as he knew, that fleshy wit canot conceiue gods wonderfull iudgements, he maketh a preface before hee enter into his complaint and moane, saying, Lorde, thou art righteouse and thy iudgemts are rightfull. His speaking after that manner, is to shew that he intendeth not to enter into disputation with God, and to pleade with him as with his fellow or match, or too call in question whither God woorketh by reason or no. Jeremy abridged himselfe of that libertie, and cut off the occasion of that which he might haue conceiued in his mind. Therefore before he enter into his matter, he maketh this conclusion: Lord howsoeuer the world go, and although men may surmize that thou dost things without reaso: yet art thou righteouse and vnblamable in all points and all respects. Euen so must we do, and not say with Job, It is impossible for vs to know the reason of Gods workes. That is very true, howbeit it is but faintly spokē. But we cannot mount so high, neuertheless if God worke after a manner that we cannot comprehend, we must not therefore cease to acknowledge him to be righteouse, and to honour him, and to humble ourselues before him. This is in effect the thing that we haue to remeber here. Furthermore let vs take warnig, that we may wel make large discourfes, but we shall gaine nothing therby. True it is that mē may haue great quicknesse in their wits: but yet must not the same giue vs occasio of our weening as we see many do, who bicause they haue their wits wel sharp-

Jerem. 12. 4. 1

ned, thinke themselues able to find out the reason of all things: and that causeth them to run so astray, that in the end they be doted in their owne vnderstanding, that is to say, God punisheth their pride for taking too much vpon them. Therefore let vs consider well, that when we haue trudged vp and downe, we shal be neuer a whit the nerer to the finding out of the end of all things. For our Lorde will shew vs that our wit is too weake & rude to attaine to such height. Our knowing therefore must be but in part, & it must suffice vs to tast in some certaine measure the things that are for our welfare, waiting for the latter day when we shall haue them fully discovered vnto vs. Thus ye see more what we haue to marke in this streine. Now Job addeth immediatly, According as he knoweth my way, so will he trieme me, and I shall go out as gold. Hereby Job betokeneth that God hath a great aduantage ouer him. I cannot know him (saith Job) and he knoweth me: I vnderstand not his works, and he iudgeth of mine: too be short, he trieth me as gold in the furnace, in somuch that there is not so little a peece of froth or infirmitie in me, but he seeth and discerneth it: and therefore it is too no purpose for me to go to law with him. This is the conclusion that he maketh. Now this saying of his is very true, that God knoweth our wayes and trieth and proueth vs as gold in the furnace: but yet notwithstanding haue we any cause to cōplaine that we be not his matches: Shuld the creature checke after such a sort, as too take part against his maker? Though God make vs not haile fellow with himselfe, ought we to say that he doth vs wrong or iniurie? Therefore whensoeuer it commeth to our mind that God knoweth all our wayes, and that he trieth vs, and that he purgeth and sifteth out all the sinfull affections and superfluous thoughts that are in vs: let vs vnderstand that the same must teach vs lowlinesse & fear, and not prouoke vs to make any complaint as Job dothe in this text. And herewithall we see how God intendeth to bridle vs by al meanes for our owne welfare. For whē he trieth vs after that sort, commeth there any profite of it vnto him? No: but he knoweth it to be expedient for vs, according also as when he commeth neere vnto vs, is it for that he is afraid, or for that he seeketh any profyete by vs? No, it is nothing so: but he knoweth that we haue neede to be kept in obedience and awe. For that is the cheefe thing that he requireth of vs, and it is the sea of al vertue that bringeth vs to saluation. Therefore it behooueth vs to be rightly subiect vnto god. For if he hild not his maicstie ouer vs, and shewed vs not what we be, and what our state is, and hilde vs not vnder his feete: what would become of vs cōsidering the pride & malapertnes that are in vs al? God the in not shewing vs the reason of his works, doth it to the end we should learne to obey him. Ageine if we see not why he doth this or that: how shal we cōprehēd his being? we be sure (as I said) that if he trie vs, it is for our welfare. And in good sooth which of vs trieth himselfe? Nay cōtrariwise in sted of lighting a candle to serch out our own wats & sins: we quēch the cresset that god had lighted to our hād. What else is the discretion that he hath giue vs to discern betwene good & euil but as it were a candle which he hath lighted, to the end we might perceiue the naughtinesse that is in ourselues? But we see how men laboure to quēch all the said knowledge, and would faine suppress their owne consciēces, that they might liue like swine, & be no more ashamed nor abashed at the euil which they commit. Men then go about to become brute beasts: and so we see that they indeuer too quenche the lamp or candle that God had lighted in them too drawe them too thys tryall: Seeing it is so: it is good reason that God shoulde searche

and trie vs, bycause we will not do it ourselues as oure duetie were to do, but by our good wills would become like brute beasts and dispatch ourselues of all discretion and reason. Thus ye see that the thing which we haue to marke in this texte, is that forsomuch as God knoweth our wayes and woorks aforehand: it behoueth vs to conclude, that if hee make vs too passe as Gold through the furnace, the same is for our profite and welfare. And although we perceiue not the reason of it, we ought to be contented that our Lord is righteous, and that he will in the end shew vs wherefore he hath tried vs after that manner, in making vs to passe through so many afflictions, as gold passeth through fire. Although then that this be greuous to beare: yet God doth it not without cause. VVe perceiue it not as yet, bycause our wit is too weake. Howbeit our Lord will in time make vs perceiue that he wrought not at all aduenture, but that he knew what was meete for our welfare. This is in effect the thing which we haue to beare away heere. Now when Iob hath saide so, he addeth this protestation. That his foote had walked in Gods path, and that hee had not left his way, nor turned aside from the commaundement of Gods owne mouth, but had set more store by it, than by his owne liuing or manner of dealing. True it is that Iob might well protest that he had walked so vprightly, as that he was not of the number of the despisers of God, nor of the number of looce liuers that were giuen to all naughtinesse. Iob might well say so: for it was true: according also as wee see that Dauid might well say, Lord I haue kept thy commaundements with my whole hart. Lord I haue set more store by thy lawe than by gold and siluer: all my delight hath bin in them: I haue not weltred in my wicked affections: but all my pleasure hath bin in the hearing of thy law. VVhen Dauid speaketh after that manner, is it to boast himselfe before God? No: for in another place he saith, Lord who is able to stand before thee? If thou enter into account with men, no creature can be iustified. Therefore enter not into iudgement with thy seruant O Lord. For who is he O Lord that shall stand vp, if thou marke all our faultes? VVe see then that Dauid doth willingly yeld himselfe guilty, and that whereas he protesteth himselfe too haue followed Gods commaundements: it is all one as if he acknowledged the graciouse gifts that he had receiued at his hand, & did him homage for them saying thus: Lord, thou hast done me exceeding great good, thou hast gouerned me by thy holy spirit, my following of thy commaundements came not of my selfe, but thy guiding of me caused me to giue my selfe therevnto. Dauid by yelding such honoure vnto God, confirmed himselfe more and more in good hope, assuring himselfe that as hee had felt God good and graciouse to him heeretofore, so hee would neuer faile him heereafter. If Iob had proceeded after that maner, his protestation had bin good and holy. But what his meaning heere, is to go to law with God, and to vphold that if God handled him after the ordinarie rule of his law, he should haue no cause to vse suche rigoure towards him. Iob is grossely ouerseene in this behalfe. For if God had listid to haue punished him for the sinnes that he had committed: he might iustly haue done it: and in that he doth it not, it is of his meere free goodnesse. Iob therefore doth not discern a right betweene God & his own person. For he shuld haue saide, Lord it is true that thou chastizest me, and I know and thou mightest do it euē by thy law: and it is true also that I haue indeuered to walke before thee in as great soundnesse as was possible for me to do. Neuerthelesse there hath alwayes bin somewhat amisse, and therefore thou shalt find all my works to be sinfull. Iob might haue spoken so and said: well Lorde, I know well thou bearest with me: and that proceedeth of thy fatherly goodnesse. And although thou chastize me, yet thou makest me too perceiue that thou doest it not for my sinnes, but bycause it pleaseth thee too exercise my patience. Neuerthelater, in the meane while I finde my selfe combred extremely, and therefore I muste conclude, that thou doest it vpon some secret and wonderfull purpose. If Iob had spoken so: all had bin well. But he was caried away by the pangs of his passions. And thereby we are all warned (as I said afore) to mistrust ourselues when we be afflicted. For we be (as ye would say) so dazeled, as we cannot discern what is good. And if this thing befell vnto Iob who is set heere before our eyes, as a mirroure of pacience: what will become of vs? Therefore when wee be afflicted, lette vs pray God so to hold vs in awe, as we may glorify him, & that if any toyes come in our heads too grudge againste him, they may be beatē downe, knowing that we cannot speake one word of ourselues, but the same shall prouoke Gods wrath more and more. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in remembrance. Furthermore in going through with this sentence, let vs learne to know what the true seruing of God is: for Iob sheweth vs heere how to do it. VVherat then must we begin when we intend too giue and dedicate ourselues wholly to the obeying of God? At the keeping of the way which he sheweth vs. Men must not frame themselues new deuotions at their owne pleasure after the manner of the worlde which is too much giuen therevnto. VVhen men be most deuout, & would faine worke wonders, wherat make they their enterance? At the folowing of that which seemeth good to their owne liking. Yea: as who would say that God had no foueraintie ouer vs, or as though the cheefe poynt of hys seruice were not obedience. Then if any man will serue God aright, let him shut al his owne imaginations out of the dores, and not behaue himselfe after his owne liking and wit: but let him submit himselfe to Gods word, and follow that which is set downe heere, namely, I haue set my foote and walked in Gods path, I haue not turned aside, I haue not in any wise stepped out of his ways. Had this rule bin well hild and kept, wee should not haue so great controuersie now adayes with the Papiests aboute the seruing of God aright. For what is it that is called Gods seruice in the papacie? It is the inuentions of theyr owne braines, whereof God neuer spake one worde. VVhat is it that they cal deuotiō? Euery mās own liking. As soone as a man hath a mind to any thing, by and by he beares himself in hād that God is asmuch delighted with it as himselfe is, and there is no man but he vndertaketh some thing or other. Behold the ouerboldnesse that hath always reigned in the world: which is, that mē wil needes be maisters, and make lawes at their owne pleasure, and God must be fayne to accept whatsoeuer they haue forged after that maner. But contrariwise the holy Ghost telleth vs, that we must not lift vp one foote to go forward, but only in the way which God sheweth vs. It behoueth vs to refraine ourselues in that cace: for hee that will needes raunge abrode, and make his frisks and outleapes to stray heere and there: may well breake his leggs and his necke, but he shall neuer do himselfe any good: that is to say, wee shall neuer go foreward but rather euer backward, when we be so desyrous to gad after our owne fancie. Then let vs learne, that the fashion to lyue well and rightly and which God alloweth, is to set oure feete in the way, not which wee ourselues haue made, but which hee hath shewed vs by his word. And not without cause doth Iob adde further, that hee had not res tyred or turned backe. For heereby he sheweth, that men are tempted continually with a tickling lust to start out of the right way: according as in very deede we see that God cannot hold vs vnder his obeyfance, but by force: and euen he that is most desyrous to walke in such singlenes as he wold nother put to nor take away frō Gods word, shall notwithstanding not misse too feeble prickings in himselfe, and to be tickled to step out of the way. And specially if we see any man take such libertie, so as we can say, behold such a man doth such a thing: then wee be moued at it, and the sight of such examples maketh vs too desyrous to tourne out of the way. To be short, wee be easily caried away from obeying God by any manner of meanes, bycause our witts are curiouse and fantastical, and also bycause wee see things euery where that draw vs vnto euill. And therefore let vs take heede that we may be able to protest truly with Iob, that wee haue not swarued from the way that God hath shewed vs. Now, that wee may so do, it behoueth vs to herken well to the things that God telleth vs in his law. For men would still beare themselves in hand that God alloweth of their doings, and that they be still in a good way, if it were not for the declaration that Iob addeth: which is, That he gaue himselfe wholly to beare the commaundement of Gods owne lippes. VVheretore speaketh hee of the commaundement of Gods lippes? It should seeme that that is more than needeth. No, it is to shew that mans life shall alwayes be vnruely and disordered, if it be not framed by the law of God, and all his thoughtes and deedes so directed by it, as he presume not to swarue any whit at all from it, be it neuer so little. And this serueth to shew vs the vse of Gods worde, and the profite that wee reape thereof. The vse then of Gods word, is to hold vs in the right way, bycause that if we should looke for new inspirations from heauen. Satan being transformed as hee is, might put many illusions in our heads: but God hath cut off the occasion of his guilefulnesse, by giuing vs the holy scripture: and therevnto will he haue vs to hold ourselves. Therefore let vs beware that we vse the benefyte which God offereth vs. Now therewithall is matched a profitablenesse: for is there any thing more to be desyred, than for a man to be sure that he shall not misse? If we walke in doubtfulnessse as the poore Papists do, and as al they do which are led by their owne imagination: I say if we be in doubt whither God will accept our doings or no: what a thing were it? But when we be throughly assured that the way which he sheweth vs is infallible, so as we may well walke in it, and the more we go forward in it, the neerer we come to him and to the poynt of our saluation: such certentie is an inestimable treasure. So then let vs not bereeue our selues of the grace that God offereth vs as we see the world do, which is so malicious and froward, that it had much leuer to giue itselfe too it owne fantastical deuises, that is to follow the vnfallible truth which cannot lye vnto vs. Lo what wee haue too marke in this text, where Iob speaketh of the commaundement of Gods lippes, to shew vs that God in ordeyning his word which is preached by the mouthes of mē, intended to haue vs to rest therevpon, to the ende wee should not seeke vaine gazings heere and there. Now he addeth, that he did set more store by Gods word than by his owne liuing or maner of dealing. The Hebrue word which he vseth heere, signifyeth properly an Ordināce or Decree. And truly about a three verses after, where he will saye that God hath decreed of him, or had an eye to him: he vseth the same worde that is set downe heere. Yee see then that the proper signification of the word is Decree, Determination, Ordinance, or common maner of doing. And againe sometimes by a similitude it is taken for a mans ordinarie liuing or prouision, bycause it is a parcell of the law that a man should Iay for his liuing. For he must not eate so much as to burst himself in one day, but he must take his portion to his nurrishment and sustenance, and content himselfe with it. Thus yee see that this worde is also taken for euery mans ordinarie liuing or prouision. And eyther of both ways may stand very well. VVhat is it then that Iob meant heere? He ment that Gods word was a treasure of more estimation vnto him, than all the goodes of the world. VVhat thing is deerer vnto men than their nurrishment? For as wee loue our liues, so do we also indeuer to provide necessaries for the same. If we want bread, what a thing is it to vs: How are we dismayd at it? Forasmuch then as men haue great care to mayntayne their liuing: Iob in preferring Gods word before his sustenance of meate and drinke, sheweth thereby that he made not so great account of this present life, as of earnestnesse in obeying God, and that hee had muche leuer to be taught by his word, thā to be fed with the best meate in the world. Heereof we may gather a good admonition. For we see how men are desyrous to liue, and not only desyrous, but also mad of it, so as there is nother measure nor stay in them. And yet in the meane while they wote not to what end they liue, nor why they desire life. For they haue no regard of God. So much the more therefore doth it stand vs in hand to marke what is sayd here: that is to wit, that our desyring to liue in this world, must be alwayes to serue our God, and to dedicate ourselves to his glory, and to be confirmed more and more in the hope of the heauenly life whervnto he calleth vs. That is the poynt whervnto we must applie all our wits and indeuers. And if we do so, it will follow immediatly, that we shall preferre Gods doctrine (which is the spirituall foode of our soules) before all the foodes that we can wish for our bodies. For what is it to be fed with bread & water, yea or with wyne, & all other the delicatest meates and deinties that can be deuised? VVhat is that to the purpose if our soules be starued in the meane while? Oxē Asses and horses shuld be in better & more excellēt state thā we. So thē let vs learne to preferre gods word (wherewith our soules are nurrished) before all the things that concerne this tēporal & sightfull life: and let our preferring of it bee not only to say, I am learned, but also to giue ourselves wholly to the seruing of god, as Iob speaketh of it here. Now let vs come to that which I haue declared concerning the word when it is taken to signifye the common maner of doing. If we take it in that sense, truly the meaning wil not be chāged at al in effect. Howbeit ther wil be one other point very profitable and worthy to be borne away. For by that meanes Iob declareth, that he was not wise after the manner of the wise men of this world, who wil alwayes needes follow their fleshly reason, but that he had quite giuen ouer all selfeliking, to the end he might submit himselfe vnto God. And that is a very needefull thing: according as I haue touched alreadye, that we be but vagabunds and stragglers, if we hold not the way that God hath shewed vs. And how may that be done? Let vs cut off, I say let vs cut off our owne customs, Ordinances, and maners of liuing: let euery whit of it fall to the ground and be done quite and cleane away. For so long as men delight in their owne inuentions, so long as they bee wedded to theyr owne customs, and so long as they sticke wilfully too theyr owne trades of lyuing: it is impoossible for them to giue them selues too GOD. It is all one as if a manne woulde put a Frenche hoode vpon the head of a calfe or a cowe, whyche is not theyr nature or kynde, and therefore they cannot away with it. But yet more wood are we when it commeth too the poynt that wee should obey God, than the brute beasts are to the things afore said. Wherefore that we may be fashioned to obey Gods law, wee must learne firste and formost to rid ourselues of all the gay inuentions that come in oure head, [as when we thinke with ourselues] why should not this be good: VVe haue bin wont to do it, and eue-ry man doth so, and it hath continued thus at all tymes. VVe must no more alledge any of these things. And why? For if God once speake the word, it behoueth vs to yeeld vnto it. And so we see it is not without cause that Iob hath said, that he sought Gods worde, and the doctrine conteyned in the same, & that he esteemed it more than all other things. And as touching the word lay vp: it cannot be discourfed to day, and therefore we will let it alone till to morrow.

And in the meane while let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of oure faults, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may learne to humble ourselues, not only in acknowledging the mighty power that he hath aboue vs, but also to glorify him in his righteoufnesse, and to know our selues always to be wretched sinners: and specially that when we know the faults that are in vs, we may continually mourne for them, assuring ourselues that God knoweth many mo by vs thā we ourselues cā perceiue: and that forasmuch as we be full of vanitie and enclyned to deceit and leafings, let vs desire him to refourme vs in such wise, as our whole seeking may be to profyte in his schole, and as wee may harken diligently too the sound doctrine that is spoken to vs in his name: not with our bodily eares onely, but in suche sorte as it may take good roote in our harts, that we may desire nothing else but to be filled with it, and to haue it for our ordinarie foode. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nations. &c.

The .xc. Sermon, which is the third vpon the .xxiiij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the twelfth verse, and then vpon the text that enseweth.

13. He is still at one poynt, and vwho can turne him from it? looke vwhat his hart desireth hee doth it.
14. He vwill perfourme of me vwhatsoeuer he hath decreed, and many such things are in him.
15. This is the cause that I am afraid of him, and vwhen I thinke of him I stand in feare of him.
16. God hath softned my hart, and the Almighty hath troubled me.
17. For I am not cut off by the darknesse, but he hath hidden the darknesse of my face.

I saw yesterday, that if we will obey God rightly, we must giue ouer al our owne customes and māner of dealing, and not alledge one thing or other too make it go for good: but seeing oure Lord hath spoken it, we must hold vs simply to his word which he hath giuen vs. Now remayneth to marke the word that is set downe in that place: namely that we must lay vp Gods doctrine as a treasure in oure harts. For vnlesse it be laid vp after that manner, it will neuer take liuely roote: according as we shall see many, that will bee moued when they heare God spoken of, and be somewhat well disposed: howbeit, that disposition is not thoroughly planted in them: and therefore we see that the faith whiche appeered in them for a time, vanisheth away. Then let vs marke well, that wee haue neuer profited well in Gods schoole, till his word be so deeply rooted in our harts (that is to say, till wee haue receiued it with such a mind,) as it is not a slightful motion to allow or like well of the thing that is told vs, but a hartie affection settled vpon it in good earnest. And that is the cause why it is oftentimes tolde vs that the seruice of God is inward and spirituall. For although we had satisfied the whole world, and all men thought vs to be vtterly faultlesse: yet might God iustly refuse all thys goodly outward shew wherein men sooth vs, if the hart go not afore it. So then let vs beare this saying in mind, that it behoueth vs to lay vp Gods word. And how? Not to bury it: for if we belecue with our hart vnto righteoufnesse, we must also confesse it with our mouth that we may be safe. Then must Gods word shew it selfe: for if we do not so, men may thinke that it is not in vs. But yet for all that, the good works whiche the faithfull do, must first proceede out of the saide hartie affection, and not of any slightfull and inconstant motion. Furthermore the word lay vp, will be wel ynough vnderstoode, if we take the similitude of a treasure, and applie it also as our Lord Iesus Christ doth when hee saithe, that if a man bee well stored of thinges, hee may fetch the foorth whatsoeuer he hath neede of, both for his owne household, and also for other mens vse. For if a man bee so niggardlie, that when hee hath his chests full of money, and his garneres and cellers thoroughly stored, he wil both starue himselfe and not releue any other body: will men say that such a one knoweth too what purpose it serueth to be rich? No: but he is a starke beast. Therefore let vs vnderstand, that our hoording must be to the end we may vse it discreetly, according as the case shall require. And when we haue the treasure of the doctrine of saluation laid vp in our harts, we must not only profite ourselues by it, but also edify our neighbours. Yea and let vs beare in mind howe Saint Paule saith, that the mysterie of faith must bee kepte in a good conscience. Thus ye see in effect how we haue to note vpon the said text, that if we will be learned in Gods word, wee must not only conceiue some opinion of it in our brayne, but we must lay it vp diligently in our harts, as an inestimable treasure. Now let vs come to that which Iob addeth. He saith that if god be minded to do a thing, no mā shall turne him from it. This is stil a continuing of the matter that he had in hande, namely that God vsed an absolute power against him, so as there was no going to law with him to obtaine his right. But I haue told you that this is ouermuch. For although Iob knew that God punished hym not for his sinnes: yet ought hee to haue bin fully resolued, that God is righteoule and vnpartiall in all his dooings. But he surmizeth a lawlesse power that hath nother rule nor measure with it, wherein he doth God wrong. Neuerthelesse the sentence is true, if it bee applied as it ought to be: namely that God is always at one poynt or in one mind, that is to say, that he is cōstāt & vnvariable, and cānot be turned one way nor other: according as we see that euē Balaā the lier was inforced to acknowledge that god is not like mē, who change their minds and are variable and inconstant. Hath he said any thing (saith he Ec. iij. Balaam)

Balaam which he performeth not? So this doctrine of it selfe is good, and the holy scripture is full of that matter: but now must we applie it to our instruction. It serueth to two purposes: the one is, that when God hath spoken a thing, and promiseth to be mercifull and fauorable to vs, and to succoure vs in all our needs: we must stedfastly beleue it and rest vpon it, without any doubting whether he wil performe his promise or no. VVhy? for his truth is infallible. Likewise on the contrary part, if he threaten vs, wee must tremble, assuring oureselues that it is not for vs to dallie with such a master. Thus ye see to what end al the things tend that are spoken in the holy scripture, concerning Gods constancie and stedfastnesse in executing his determinations. VVe knowe that God vttereth his mind vnto vs when he auoucheth himselfe to be pitifull, and that he receiue vs to mercy. Seeing then that our Lord doth so call vs vnto him, it is not too beguile vs and too foade vs with some vaine hope. And therefore inasmuch as we haue such assurance of his good will, let vs boldly stay and rest therevpon. And why? For hee chaungeth not, though all the worlde should make sute to him, yet should it not cause him to alter his mind. And by that meanes we may glory against all that the deuill can deuise or practise: yea and although we see the whole world bent against Gods promises, yet shall we neuertheless be always at rest, according also as wee see how the holy Ghost armeth the faithfull with such trust, and teacheth them to desye all their enemies. Goto (saith he) lay your heads together, and do the worst you can: yet shal the thing that God hath promised, hold out to the end. Againe he saith, he will be neere at hand to vs, and that when the deuill and men haue practiced their vttermost against vs, he will beate downe all their defences. Then seeing it is so, we may despise al that our enemies can practise or deuise. And why? For in the end they cannot withstand God, nor let him to perforce the thing that he hath spoken. Thus ye see in what wise we ought to put this doctrine in vre, concerning the stedfastnesse that is in God. Also let vs beare in mind what hath bin said concerning his threatnings: so that if he rebuke our vices, and be so good to vs as too warne vs of them, let vs not stand vnremendable in our misdoings, but let euery of vs humble himselfe, and looke well about him, and with all carefulnesse indeuer too preuente the curse which God hath told vs of. For to that end dothe he make vs to feele his wrath. I say it is to the ende hee would not be constrained to execute his wrath agaynst vs. Lo what the true vse is of this doctrine, that God is always in one mind, and that no man can turne him fro it. For the same cause also it is said, that God hath spoken once, and that the Prophet herd these two things, namely that there are power and iudgement in God: as if he should say, Lorde thou needest not too repete thy wordes: for when thou hast once spoken the worde it ought to suffice vs, and it is as much as if we had a hundred thousand witnesses, and that thou haddest neuer ceased repeting and reherfing the things that we had once heard afore: we nede not to haue our eares beaten at so much. VVhy so? For Gods truth is so certain that if there were no more but one sillable of it, it wer al one as if we had a great volume of it. And yet notwithstanding we see howe our Lord calleth vs by ratifying hys promises, and is not contented to haue spoken once and away, but putteth vs oftē in remembrance of the things that we haue once heard, and will haue vs taughte hys goodnesse all our life long. Seeing then that he vseth such ouerabundantnesse, it behoueth vs to acknowledge his infinite goodnesse in applying himselfe after that manner to our rudenesse: but yet must we not take such a boldnesse as to call in question the thing that he hath spoken [but once] and to dispute whither a thing bee true or no when God hath witnessed it vnto vs. For we must rather marke how it is said vnto vs in the Psalme, that Gods sayings are as siluer seuen times fined in the furnace, wherein there is nother drosse nor superfluitie. They be not like the words of mortall men, who are dubble, and wil eyther coloure the words that they haue spoken, or vn say them againe, or find some furtle shifte to turne them another way. There is no such thing at al in God. VVhy so? For his words are as siluer throughly fined, wherein there is no superfluitie. This (say I) is the seale, that all the faithfull ought to set vnto all the things which they heare at Gods mouth. So soone the as God hath spoken any thing, let vs (according to that whiche hath bin touched already) set this seale vnto it, that there is nothing but truth and certeintie in it. For there is nothing but vntruth in mans mind, and yet God doth vs the honour to make vs his witnesses: according as saint Iohn speaketh of it, that whosoever beleueth in Iesus Christ, hath set too his his seale that God is soothfast. So then seeing that God doth vs the honoure, too make vs his witnesses although there be nothing but vanitie in vs: so much the more ought we to be inflamed too receiue obediently all things whiche wee heare of him, and to warrant oureselues that they be true. It foloweth immediatly, That he doth what soeuer his hart desireth. Here is one sentence more which is very true if it be rightly vnderstoode. True it is (as wee haue seene) that Iob did amisse in imagining that God vsed a lawlesse power, and in that he could not imagin other wise: but that god was minded to vtter his strength with such violence, as shuld be quite void of all reason. Surely (as I haue erst declared) Iob purposed no such blasphemie in himselfe: but heere the cace concerneth his former pangs which wer ouerheadie. But now let vs consider what profite redoundeth to vs of this doctrine, that God doth whatsoever he liketh. It behoueth vs firste and formost too know what the things are that God desireth or liketh. VVe know that he cannot away with any vnrighteousnesse, and therefore his desire or liking must needes bee righteouse and full of equitie. Seeing it is so, let vs learne to glorify him in al respects. And first of all when we see things out of order in this world and all seemeth to go otherwise than it oughte too do: let vs marke how it is said vnto vs, that God holdeth the reynes of the bridle, and that nothing is done which hee hath not foredetermined in his purpose. Oftentimes we may thinke the things to be very straunge which are done, for our eyes are too weakesighted too comprehend the infinite power of God. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs conclude, that for so much as God is righteouse, it becometh vs to allow of all his doings, although they fall not out too oure liking. And although it seeme too vs that God oughte too worke otherwise, yet let vs subdue oure owne reason, and hold it in such bondage, as wee may alwayes confesse, that God dothe not any thing which is not wroughte with iustice and vprightnesse. Also let vs heere withall marke particularly, that seeing God hath called vs, he doth also dispose our welfare and saluation. For I speake not now of all men in general: but of the cofort which the faithful may gather, whē God hath once shewed himselfe to them, & calleth them purpofely to be his childrē, & vttereth his hart vnto them as I haue saide afore. The faithfull then must not hang in doubt, or imagine that their saluation is in a hammering. VVhy so? For it is laide vp as a gage in the

in the hand of God: and who can plucke it away from him?

Therefore lette the faithfull hardily brag of their saluation. And why? For God is almightie, according as it is said in the tenth of saint Iohn: The father who hath giuen you vnto me is stronger than al. To what purpose doth Christ speake for? It is to shew that our saluatiō dependeth not vpon ourselues, nor vpon any creature, nor is let looce to all hazards: but that God keepeth it as it were in his bosome, and that forso much as no man can ouercome him, we be sure that we shall neuer perishe. And why? Bycause God hath the ordering of all things, and loueth our welfare in suche wise as hee will surely procure it. And thereof we haue a good warrant by the Gospell: and (which more is) we haue a sure pledge of it in our Lord Iesus Christ, who is giuen to vs, to the end that we being in him, shuld be partakers both of his life and of all his goodes. So then if this doctrine bee put in vre as it ought to be, we see it is not only true and holy, but also exceeding profitable to vs. Now he addeth by and by after, God will bring to passe whatsoeuer hee hath determined of me, and ther are many like things in him. Here Iob vseth the word that was expounded yesterday. I said that the word signifyeth two things: that is to witte, laws, statutes, ordinances, decrees, determinations, destinies, fashions or manners of dealing, or doing, order, trade, custome, guize, woot or ordinarie, and also a mans prouision, liuing, sustenance, foode, or nourishment. As now Iob saith, that god will go through with his ordinance or determination. His saying then is, he will go through with mine ordinarie, or else, he will go through with my determination. Now although the signification of the wordes be dubble: yet notwithstanding, the circumstance of the place sheweth vs what the sense of them is: namely that Iob meeneth that God will bring to passe the thing that he hath purposed of him. VVhereby he doth vs to vnderstand, that we be not gouerned here by fortune or haphazard. And why? for God hath determined what shal befall vs. VVhē he did put vs into the world, it was not to let vs looce at rouers, and to let vs walke at all auenture: but he determined what should become both of our life and of our death. Therefore let vs vnderstand, that we walke in such wise vnder the guiding of our God, that (as our Lorde Iesus Christ saith) there cannot one heare fall from oure head, but by his good will. For of his prouidence extend euen to the sparrows, and to the wormes of the earth: what doth it vnto vs whom he esteemeth much more, as whome hee hath created and shaped after his owne image and likenesse? Therefore it is an article which we ought to marke well, that euery of vs hath his destinie: that is to say, that at suche time as God sendeth vs into this world, he hath already ordeyned what hee will haue done with vs, and guideth vs in such wise, that our life is no more in our hand, than is our death: insomuch that it is to no purpose for vs to vndertake one thing or other, bycause that in sted of going forward we shall go backe except God guide vs. Thus ye see how the faithful may comforte themselves with Gods prouidence. True it is that Iob did misapplie this saying: for in his first pangs or fits (as a man may terme them) he hath spoken heere as a man in despaire. Behold (saith he) I know I am vtterly forlorne. And why? For God hath determined of me what he thinketh good, and the same shal be accomplished, and it shall not boote me to strue against it. But surely, we must not begin at that ende: but before wee speake of Gods ordinance, let vs first consider his righteousnesse, that we may yeeld him his due glory. Then let vs not imagin the said lawlesse power in God, wher-

of I haue spoken heere tofore: for that were too make him like a Tyrant, and that were a cursed blasphemie. Let vs assure ourselues that God in disposing and ordering all things, vseth a soueraigne rule whereby all other iustice and righteousnesse must bee squared out. Neuerthelesse we must not do as these vaygloriouse folke do, which argue againste Gods prouidence and beginninglesse election. For they see not the reason why God doth all things, they imagin it to be tyrannical. And what a blasphemousnesse is that? Are not such men worse thā diuels? They be most ignorant, and yet notwithstanding they be most buzie in ferching Gods secrets. True it is that they do perchance beare the countenance of greate clerks: but in very deede they bee starke beasts, and yet they will needes haue God to shew them a reason of all his doings: or else they will neuer graunt him that hee gouerneth all things heere bylow, nor that he hath chozen whome he listeth to eternall life before the making of the world. So then let vs keepe ourselues from suche outrage: and in acknowledging that al Gods dooings are rightful and good, let vs marke that his works shall oftentimes passe our vnderstanding, and yet that we must not therefore incounter his will. If God once do any thing: let vs conclude that it is good. Yea (say they) but we see not the reason thereof. Surely whofoeuer would make Gods will subiect to our reason, what doth he but rob him of his glory? For Gods will is the rule of all reason, and the fountaine of all righteousnesse. Therefore let vs hold ourselues contented with it, and be so mylde as to say, that God willet not any thing which is not rightfull and indifferent. Furthermore when wee once knowe generally the said iustice and righteousnesse: let vs know also that god is so gracious vnto vs, as to ioyne and knit his iustice to oure saluation, like as hee hath matched his mightinesse with it also. VVhen we say that God is almighty: it is not only to honoure him, but also to rest vpon him, that we may be inuincible againste all temptations. For in asmuche as Gods mightie power is infinite, he can well mainteine and preferre vs. In like case is it with his righteousnesse. Seeing then that there is as it were an inseparable knot betwene Gods iustice and our saluation: let vs begin at that poynt, to the ende that when we say that God bringeth to passe whatsoeuer he listeth, and that he will perfourme whatsoeuer he hath determined of vs: we may also assure ourselues that there is not any thing amisse in it, but that all things are ruled by wonderfull iustice and wisdom. Furthermore if we will haue a breefe and familiar exposition of this saying: let vs marke that God hath foredetermined what he will haue done, both in respect of the euerlasting saluation of our soules, and also in respect of thys present life. As concerning the first, God chose vs for his children before the creation of the world. And wher-vnto had he an eye in choozing of vs, but only too hys owne infinite mercie? For wee bee of Adams corrupted lump. VVherefore did he preferre vs before the rest of his creatures (as saith Sainte Paule) by sholing vs out to make vs more excellent than our fellowes? VVee deserued too bee cast away and damned: and God hath voutsafed to draw vs out of destruction.

Ye see then that we ought to glorify God for that determination, forso muche as it pleased hym too choose vs and too call vs too saluation, and to make vs heires of his kingdome. And thys determination hath bin vttered too vs in oure Lorde Iesus Chryste: and if we be members of our Lord Iesus Christ, wee be sure of our adoptiō. The neede we not to seeke the registers for it aloft in heauen, but let vs content ourselues with the assurance that he hath giuen vs of it. For if a man that hath but the copie of an autentike register, do content himselfe with it: ought not we when God hath declared his purpose concerning our saluation, oughte not we (I say) to rest vpon it? Ye see then in what wise it behoueth vs to settle ourselues, forasmuch as we be sure that oure saluation is vnalterable, bycause God hath made his decree of it which cannot be changed. And as concerning his determination for this present life, let vs vnderstande that God guideth all our steppes, and nothing happeneth to vs by casualitie: but hee foresetteth all things, so as we can nother goe, nor come, nor do any thing else otherwise than he hath ordeined. Therefore let vs assure ourselues, that seeing wee bee so in Gods protection, we shall be well at ease: and seeing that hee watcheth ouer vs and hath a care of vs, let vs not mistrust that the diuell can wind about vs, nor all our enemies beside. For God will prouide for vs, and can well skill too keepe vs from all the attemptes that shall be made against vs. And this oughte not only to comforte vs, but also to giue vs courage too goe through with our duetie, and to walke euery man in his calling, not mistrusting but that God will disappointe all the practizes and attemptes that shall be made against vs, and breake all the snares that men shall haue laide too catch vs in. Is it not a goodnesse that ought to rauish vs and amaze vs, when we see that God hath such a care of vs, and hath determined all things about which shall be done heere beneath: VVe be heere as froggs and Grassehoppers, as the Prophet Esay saith of vs: and to be short, we should be like mice in the straw (as the Prouerb saith) if God had not set an order aforehand what shoulde become of vs. Now when we see this: we may well saye, I know that God is my sauoure and father, for he hath my saluation in his hand, and will not suffer me to perish: and I ought to assure my selfe of it, seeing he hath promised it me. By and by Iob addeth, that there are many like things in him: as if hee should say, against whome do I bend my selfe: For though all the world shoulde set it selfe against him, they should win nothing by it: and as for me, I am a poore woorme, and therefore it behoueth me to shrinke away. Surely he doth well in so saying, if so be that he yelded God the honoure and prayse of righteoufnesse, yea euen in respecte of the afflictions that he indured. But hee is so combered in hys mind, that he acknowledgeth not God to be righteouse and full of equitie as he ought to do. VVhat is tooe done then? On our part, when we haue acknowledged ourselues to be euery one vnder the hand and guiding of God: let vs beleue also that the whole world is so in likewise: for if the deuill were not subiect to God, what a thing were it? VVe see with what rage he commeth against vs: and we see also how furious the wicked sort are: insomuch as it may seeme that they should swallow vs vp: and they are as great and hideouse stormes that come to ouerwhelme vs. Let vs marke therefore that God not only keepeth his children vnder his protection to mainteine them: but also that hee so gouerneth the whole world, that the deuill (do what he can) is not able to bring his practizes about, but that Gods prouidence is always betweene him and home. Thus ye see howe we ought to put this doctrine in vre. Now finally Iob sayth, that he is afraid of God, and that the more he thinketh vpon him, the more he standeth in doubt of him. For he hath softned my hart (saith he) and the almightie hath amazed me. And the reason is, bycause he hath not cut me off through darknesse, but hath bidden darknesse out of my presence. There are that set downe this latter part of the text thus: that he hath not bidden: but it is cleane contrarie. This in effect is that which Iob ment to say. First he affirmeth that he is afraid of God: and afterward addeth the reason, namely bycause God made him to feele his terrible maiesty. In what wise? Verely (saith he) bycause I know I haue to do with him, and he is mine aduersarie partie. I indure not mine afflictions as one that knoweth not from whence they come: but I know it to be the hand of God that persecuteth me. That is the cause that I am so afraid

10 And this text is greatly for our profite, if we can applye it as we ought to do. First and formost it is not without cause, that Iob saith that he is afraid of Gods presence, for that he maketh him to feele his maiestie. For it is good reason, that as ofte as wee thinke vpon God, wee should be touched and stricken in feare to stand in awe of his maiestie. Yea and although God shew himselfe louing towards vs, and allure vs to him, and after a maner cocker vs as little babes: yet must we not come vnto him after such a sort, but that we must always do it with feare and lowlinesse. Then let vs marke, that he which hath a right knowledge of God, will be willing to come too him, yea and come to him indeede, reioycing in that hee knoweth him to be his father: and yet notwithstanding he will always behaue himselfe lawfully and obediently towards him to honoure him. And that is the cause why it is said in the fifth Psalme, Lord I will enter into thy Temple vpon the multitude of thy mercies, and there worship in feare. This is it in effect which we haue to note heere concerning the fearing of Gods maiestie.

20 Herewithall let vs know, that our feare must not be such as Iob speakes of: that is to witte, wee must not bee so afraid of God, as to shunne his mightie power as a terrible thing to vs, or to go about to hide our selues from him: but when we haue conceiued the said feare of him, we must also receiue comforte, assuring ourselues that Gods minde is not tooe scare vs from him, but to draw vs too him. And wee had neede tooe bee so beaten downe, considering the presumptuousnesse that is in oure nature: for there is suche a pride in vs, as wee will neuer yeeld God his due honoure, till oure fleshe bee vterly subdued and tamed. And how must that be done? Euen by plaine force. For of our owne good will wee woulde neuer be humble and meeke. God therefore is fayne tooe vse violence in that behalfe, and tooe mortify all that is of our fleshe, that we may be as it were broken and broozed to stoupe vnto him. Thys done, he setteth vs vp againe, and is contented tooe shew himselfe to bee our father, to the end we should honoure hym. Then is it not ment that we shoulde be stricken with suche a fearefulnesse, as wee shoulde not knowe where tooe become: but that after wee haue honoured God with reuerent awe, wee shoulde also preace vntoo hym vpon the trust of his manifolde goodnesse. Yet notwithstanding, that which Iob speaketh heere is very notable: that is tooe witte, that his conceiuing of suche fearefulnesse, was bycause God had softned his harte, and amazed him by persecuting him.

For heereby Iob dothe vs tooe vnderstande, that although he had always feared God: yet notwithstanding forasmuch as he was assaulted with such temptations: hee conceyued such a terroure as hee wist not in a manner what God was. Nowe this importeth two poyntes. The one is, that of oure owne nature wee bee deafe and dull, so as wee knowe not what it is to feare God, (as hath bin sayde already) till hee driue vs tooe it by force. Ye see then that men become stoute lyke murderers, vntill G O D haue well tamed them. And heereby wee see that it is more than necessarye for vs too bee afflicted. For otherwise we would play the looce Coltes, and we would not knowe what it is to obey God, or too yeeld him any subiection at all. Therefore he is sayne to make vs afrayd by the afflictions that hee sendeth vs. Marke that for one poynt. The other is, that the saythfull are erewhiles so astonished at Gods iustice, as they be ouerraught by it, yea and so ouertaken, as they be vtterly dismayde for a little while, as Iob was: howebee in the ende God relieueth them. And this is well woorthie too bee noted: For the Diuell vsfeth two extremities that are in vs. The one is our carelesnesse, insomuch that if God draw vs not to him by some violent maner: we fall asleepe in our sinnes. If the Diuill may winne that at our handes, he is well payed: but if God wakeneth vs, then doth the diuell labour to driue vs to dispayre. But it behoueth vs to preuent such policies. Therefore let vs learne, that if Iob were stricken with so great feare, the like may well betyde vs, or much more, except our Lorde do mortifie vs. Herewithall it behoueth vs to mark after what maner men are brought to the sayde feare and terrour. Experience sheweth, that the same falleth not out alwayes. And for prooffe thereof, we shall see manie naughtipackes that cease not too gnashe their teeth agaynst God, euen when hee smyteth vpon them with manie blowes. There doth God execute his vengeance vpon his enemies: and yet notwithstanding, doo they amende for all that? Haue they their hartes any whit softned by it? No: they become more spitefull and wicked than they were afore, insomuch as therevpon they fall to kicking and spurning agaynst god, like restie iades. Seeing then that afflictions cannot alwayes tame and subdue men, but that they take the bitte in their teeth too runne a heade agaynst that way whiche God woulde haue them to go: let vs learne thereby that it is not without cause that Iob sayth here, that he was afrayde bicause God had not cut him off in darkenesse. He setteth it downe heere, Before the darkenesse, or in the presence of darkenesse: yea and worde for worde it is, Before the face of darknesse. And men haue misexpounded it in this wise: That God had not cut mee off before this miserie happened to me. Iob meeneth not so: but rather thus: God hath not cut me off as it were in couert: the afflictions that I indure are not vnknowne, as men oftentimes (when they haue any greefe or trouble) knowe not: whence it commeth. And afterward he addeth: He hath bidden the darknesse of my presence. But heere some bodie hath corrupted the text, by setting it downe, Hee hath not bidden, whereas contrariwise it is sayd, hee hath hidden the darkenesse, &c. that is to say, he constrayneth me to come before him. And like an offender that is led by violence before a iudge, woulde faine scape if hee wist howe to shift himself away, or if he were in some corner alone, he woulde cut his owne throte, and become hys owne hangman in dispatching himself, and yet notwithstanding must spite of his hart appeare before the iudge, and heare his sentence of condemnation: Euen so dooth

Iob shewe that hee himselfe was delt with: that is to saye it is not in hucker mucker (sayth he) that I am afflicted: I cannot say, see the mischaunce: for God sheweth himselfe to be mine aduersarie, and maketh me to feele that it is he to whom I must yeelde mine account, and he hath shewed me his hande. And this is a verie notable poynt. For we see oftentimes that men are smally touched with the feare of god, when he sheweth himself by afflictions. I report me hereof to Pharao, and the Egyptians. For did God euer vse sharper scourges than those were? And yet notwithstanding, it is to be seene, that they hardened themselves agaynst them. And why? Truly they knew at all times that it was the hande of God: but that knowledge did soone vanishe away, and they were so dazeled in themselves, or rather the diuel had so bewitched them, as they thought they had none other enemies but Moyses and Aaron. But God shewed them full well, that when he shetteth men vp, they must needs feele his hand, yea and they must be sayne (spyte of their teeth) too knowe that he is their iudge, & that he is strong ynough to tame the, yea & to ouerthrow them, & breake the al to peeces. And therefore let vs pray God, that if he smite vs with his hande, hee suffer vs not to fall too sturdinesse agaynst him, according also as Moyses speaketh: but that we may open our eyes, to see that it is he which chastiseth vs, and that we may not be so blockish and stubborne, as not too knowe his hande. For whereas it is sayde by the Prophet, that they looked not to the hande that smote them: it is to shew vs, that that stubborne people was not woon by Gods scourges. Nowe let vs beware that the same happen not vnto vs: but let vs pray God, that when he hath made vs too feele his mightie hande, too humble vs withall: he suffer vs not to bee vnamendable, but graunt vs the grace not too bee so swallowed vp of heauinesse, as that we shoulde bee scared away from him too shunne him, but rather so drawe vs vntoo him, that vpon trust that as it is in his power too bring too the graue, so also hee can plucke vs thence againe, wee maye say wyth the Prophete, The Lorde will quicken vs the thirde daye, and though wee bee deade for a tyme, yet wee shall bee made alyue agayne by hys goodnesse. Therefore, lette vs alwayes repayre vntoo hym that hath wounded vs, assuring oure selues that hee is the soueraigne Surgyon, who will helpe vs for oure Lorde Iesus Christes sake.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too make vs so too feele them, as wee may alwayes retorne right vnto him: yea euen with suche affection, as all our minde may bee applyed therevntoo, and that we beeing assured that he will be fauourable to vs, may call vpon him, desiring him that when hee hath forgien vs our sinnes past, hee will so guide vs all our life after, as all oure whole labour may bee too serue too his glorie. And so let vs all say, Almighty God oure heauenly father, &c.

The .xcj. Sermon, which is the first vpon the .xxiiij. Chapter.

- HOvve are not the tymes hidden of the almightie? And [hovve is it that] such as knowve him, see not his dayes?
2. Some remoue the lande markes, some rob, and some fleece the flockes, and some feede them: selues vvith them.
  3. Other some take the Ass of the fatherlesse, they take the vviddoyves Oxe to gage.
  4. They turne the poore out of the vvay, so as they hyde themselves, and the meeke are pestered together vpon earth.

- They go forth in the morning like wilde Asses of the desert for their pray : the VVildernesse giueth him bread, for himselfe and for his children.
6. They gather their haruest in the feeldes, they gather the vintage from the Vynes, euen the vvicked.
  7. They spoyle the naked man, so as he vvalketh vvithout garment in the colde.
  8. They are vvewith the shoures of the night in the mountaynes, and imbrace a stone for their bedde.
  9. They fleece the fatherlesse, and take a guage of the poore.

The matter that is handled heere, hath bene layd forth heretofore after another maner. Howebeit there is nothing but wee may fare the better by it, if we consider well why God propoundeth this lesson so often to vs. The matter is, that God executeth not his iudgements too the vewe of the eie, so as it might be seene, that he hath a care of the good to mainteyne them, and that he is an enemie to the wicked to punish them as they haue deserued. VVe see not this : for things are out of order in the worlde. True it is that Iob hath hidde long talke of it afore. But we know it is such and so great a stumbling blocke, as we be troubled with it continually, yea euen the perfectest of vs. If the mischeefe indure, and God remedie it not : euerie of vs is greeued, and wee fall too disputing, howe it shoulde be possible that God shoulde be so patient, and as it were dissemble so much, and seeme to bee asleepe when he letteth all things alone after that sort. Therefore we had need to be stablished in the lesson that is conteyned here, and to be often put in minde of it : to the end that when wee see things turmoyled in the worlde, wee may alwayes haue such light of fayth, as may serue vs to see Gods iudgements, although they bee hidden from vs as nowe. And so the verie poynt that Iob intendeth too shewe heere, is that God hideth his iudgements for a time, and neither executeth his vengeance vpon the wicked, nor deliuereth the godly at the first brunt, but suffereth them to endure many wrongs. For the prooffe hereof he sayth. Howe are not the times bidden of the Almighty, and such as know him, see not his dayes? VVe haue seene heretofore, how Eliphaz bare vs in hande, that God did iudge the worlde in such wise, as euerie man might perceyue, that he thinketh vpon those that serue him, and hath his eie vpon them, and reacheth them his hande continually : and that on the other side the wicked are punished at his hande. But it is cleane contrarie, sayeth Iob. And for prooffe hereof, it is seene, that all is full of robbie, might ouercommeth right, and they that haue taken paynes, eate not the labor of their handes, but their goodes are plucked from them by force. Seeing then that the good are so troubled and vexed, and the bad so hardened, and yet scape vnpunished, and God ouerslips them, as though he passed not for these worldly matters : what shoulde a man say, but that he dissembleth & wil not shew himselfe as a iudge, till he perceyue the time to serue for it? But if we would aske the reason why, we shoulde bee confounded. Therefore we must conclude, that Gods iudgements are secret and wonderfull, and passe all mans capacitie, so as our wits shall fayle vs in that behalfe, and therefore we must reuerce the secrets of god that are vnknowe to vs, acknowledging him to be righteous, though we find his doings to be straunge. Manie haue troubled themselues greatly aboute the first part of this sentence, where it is sayde, Howe are not the times hidden of God? For it seemeth that Iob blasphemeth, in going about too exclude God from the government of the worlde? And it is sayde that by the tymes, are ment the things that are subiect to change and alteration : as if Iob had ment to say, that God governeth well the worlde in generall, but medleth not at all with the particular ordering and guiding of things in seueraltie. But this is farre off from the naturall meening. And we neede not to seeke elswhere for exposition or gloze, than in the text it selfe. For there it is sayde, Howe are not the times bidden? VVhat meeneth Iob by that? He sheweth it himselfe in saying, Howe is it that they which knowe God perceyue not his dayes? VVe knowe that those are termed the dayes of God, wherein hee vitereth and sheweth himselfe? For when God punisheth not the wicked, ne deliuereth the good, nor heareth their requestes at the first : wee bee as it were in the darke, and God seemeth too bee hidden, and withdrawne out of the worlde, and to separate himselfe from it to let all go to hauocke. Too bee short, except God make vs too feeble his providence, and prooue it vnto vs openly, that he governeth both aboue and beneath : we bee as it were in the night, and the tyme becommeth darke : for there is no light but in the countenance of God, when hee sheweth himselfe the father of all good men, in preseruing them by his grace, and on the other side punisheth the wicked, as they be woorthie. This is it (I say) which inlightenneth vs : this is the verie day of the Lorde. And so speaketh all the holy Scripture : as when it sayeth too the wicked, Doo you reioyce at the day of the Lorde? It shall bee turned vnto you into darkenesse, and not into light, it shall bee full of feare and terror. VVhy so? VVhen God appeareth, the wicked muste needes bee afrayde, bycause his presence is ynough too ouerwhelme them. For what causeth the wicked to bee so stubborne, and too mocke at all threatenings, and to go forwarde with their wicked affections : but bycause it seemeth too them, that they bee scaped from Gods hand? But when God sheweth himselfe too them, they must needes bee abashed spyte of their teeth. But nowe let vs returne to the text. It is sayde, that Gods dayes are not seene of them that knowe him, that is too say, of the good men that trust in God, wayting for his helpe, and for the saluation that hee hath promised them, so as they cannot at the first brunt perceyue that he will helpe them : they seeke him, but yet for all that, they dwell still in suspence, as though their calling vpon him had not booted them at all. Thus then ye see that the godly cannot see Gods presence : that is too say, they cannot perceyue out of hande by experience, that God is neere them in such sort as he himselfe declareth, saying that hee is alwayes readie too heare suche as call vpon him in truth. Nowe wee haue the true meening of this sentence : that is too witte, that Gods hyding of the tymes, is not for that hee executeth not his iudgements euerie minute of an houre : but bycause he delayeth and prolongeth them, so as in the meane while wee perceyue not his dayes. For nowe adayes it maye seeme, that God hath no care of vs, and that hee hath separated and withdrawne himselfe from vs, bycause his providence is not knowne to vs. True it is that God seeth and marketh keth all things dayly, and hath not his eyes blindfolded. But yet it seemeth so too oure vnderstanding, according as the Scripture is wont too applie it selfe to the rudenesse and infirmitie of men. God therefore hath his tyme: and then will he shewe that hee seeth things. Not that hee perceyueth not all presently: but bycause that wee on our side, are not able to discern that he hath care of men as nowe, and that he hath his eyes open to note and marke the euill that is committed, too redresse the same. VVee see not this, as in respect of our perceyur-

ance. There is some certaine time hidden from men, howbeit well knowne vntoo God: that is too say, God delayeth his iudgements, and executeth them not at the first dashe. Thus muche concerning the sense of the letter.

Now let vs aduise our selues to gather such instruction as is giuen vs by this sentence. I haue sayde alreadie, that it is a verie sore temptation too the faythfull, when things are confuzed in the world, so as it may seeme that God medleth no more with them, but that fortune ruleth and gouerneth all things. And this hath beene the cause of all these diuelish Prouerbes. That all things are tossed by casuall fortune, That things are blindly guded, That God playeth with men as with a tennisball, That there is neyther reason, nor measure in his doings, but rather that all things are gouerned by a certayne secrete necessitie, and That God vouchsafeth not too thinke vpon vs. Beholde the blasphemies that haue rained at all tymes. And why? For as (I haue sayde 30 alreadie) mannes witte is dazeled when hee goeth about too iudge of things that are out of order, and which passe oure iudgement and reason. VVhat is too bee done then? Let vs bee armed agaynst such stumbling blocks: and when God sheweth not himselfe as a iudge, but seemeth rather too bee shutte vp in heauen, and to take his pastime there, and too bee vnwilling too deale with our affayres heere: yet let vs holde this for a certaintie, that hee ceaseth not to do his office, howbeit after a secret fashio vnknown vnto vs. And further, although his iudgements bee woonderfull: yet let not vs ceasse too ho-40 nour them with all humilitie, acknowledging him to bee righteous, and wayting his leysure patiently, till hee shewe vs the cause why he maketh such delay. And if the same seeme straunge too vs, lette vs bethinke vs of that whiche hath bin handled heeretoofoore: that is, that oure mindes are so frowarde and wilfull, that wee turne Gods woorkes quite vpside downe, and can neuer take any profite by them. If God hilde suche an order, that as soone as a man hath offended, hee shoulde bee punished according to his offence, and that the good shoulde liue here in peace and rest: what hope shoulde there bee of the euerlasting life? For it woulde neuer bee brought too passe, that wee should be plucked from bylowe.

Then if God gaue vs a peaseable and perfect state, wherein there were nothing too bee misliked: there woulde be no fayth at all, wee woulde no more hope for the endlesse life, wee woulde imagine that there were no resurrection. Thus yee see that if men might perceyue Gods iudgements according too theyr owne desire: they woulde fall asleepe heere bylowe, and bee fast tyed too this worlde. But it is muche better that things shoulde bee out of order: to the ende too wake vs. For if wee might liue at ease, wee woulde fall asleepe, and wee shoulde haue neyther vnderstanding nor any thing else. But when things go amisse, wee bee compelled to thinke vpon God, and too lift vp oure wittes a highe, and to consider that there is a iudgement prepared, which is not shewed as yet: and that is a meane whereby oure Lorde leadeth vs too a longing for the latter day, and for the resurrection that hee hath promised vs. Yet notwithstanding men ceasse not too intangle themselves with many false and wicked imaginations. For (as I haue sayd alreadie,) bycause things fall not out as wee woulde haue them, wee bee tempted too surmize that God thinketh not vpon vs, ne regardeth vs any more, that it is but time lost to serue him, that it is all one too lyue well or yll, and that good men gaine nothing by walking in feare vnder him. Lo, howe men rushe out intoo all vngodlinesse, bycause our Lord ruleth not his iudgements as their appetite might brooke them, and according to their reason and fansie. VVherfore let vs learne, not onely too distrust all our owne fleshy wisdome, but also to know that the same is anemie too Gods wisdome, and that wee must not giue libertie too that which wee deuise of our selues, but must minde well the doctrine that is conteyned heere, which is, that Gods iudgements are hidden from men, and surmount all tht wee can conceyue, and that our owne brayne is too small a measure to conteyne an infinite thing. For that also is the cause why the holy Scripture termeth Gods iudgements an vnsearchable deepe that cannot bee sounded. Therefore it behoueth vs too call this too minde, that it may holde vs in awe: so as wee may bee discrete and sober, too the ende that wee aduaunce not oure selues too muche, but wayte Gods leysure, till he vtter vntoo vs the thing that is yet hidden.

Beholde the marke whereat wee must shoote, if wee minde too gather good and profitable instruction of this sentence. But nowe let vs marke also, that if iniquitie raigne, and there bee no redresse of it: the same must not seeme straunge too vs: for it hath beene so in all tymes. It is certaine that if wee compare the state of Iobs tyme, with the state of ours, there was then much more soundnesse than there is now. For we knowe that the worlde growes woorse and woorse, and men harden in all euill, and corruption increaseth more and more. But yet for all this, the same complaintes were made in Iobs tyme, that are made here: namely, that rich me were as Seagulfs too swallowe vp all things: they ate vp the fatherlesse, they robbed the widdowes, there was nothing but crueltie in them: againe, when the poore had taken paynes, yea and pressed oute theyr Oyle in their houses, yet did not men ceasse too spoyle them of their goodes: and when they had gathered their Grapes, yet were they fayne too go away athirst, for the wine was drawne awaye from their handes: yea and the crueltie extended 90
so farre, that the poore folke were stripped out of their clothes, and were fayne too go awaye starke naked, and in steede of beddes and pyllowes, were fayne to lie vpon harde stones, and to sleepe in the raine, and in the deaw of the night, in winde and colde. Nowe if there were suche cruelties in the tyme of Iob: shall wee maruell if there be manie outrages committed, or if the strongest go awaye with things by force, or if there bee no more reason, equitie, and vprightnesse among men, than there is in wylde beastes, nowe adayes when the worlde ouerfloweth in all naughtinesse, and when wee be come too the full toppe of all iniquitie? I saye wee muste not thinke it straunge too see that there was muche more rightuousnesse in those dayes, and yet that there were such extortions intermedled with it.

True it is that these things are harde for vs too comprehend: neuerthelessse they are not written in vaine: but too the ende that wee shoulde receyue instruction by them, & that when iniquities raigne after that sort, euery

Psal. 35.

Of vs should dispose himselfe to pacience, and too beare things quietly, seeing it pleaseth God too exercise vs by them, like as they that liued aforetymes, haue shewed the way to those that should come after. Lette vs learne (I say) to prepare our selues to suche things, yea and too take them paciently. For we must not resemble the wicked by growing hardharted in crueltie: neither must we practise the cursed prouerbe of playing the naughtypacks among naughtypacks. But we must be armed with pacience: which thing cannot be done, vlesse we first conclude in our selues, that seeng God hath permitted much extortion, outrage, naughtinesse, and crueltie to raigne in all ages: wee must not shrinke if the like bee nowadayes, but paciently tarie till God redresse our harmes, assuring our selues that the same shal not be done out of hád. And why? For God dissembleth for a time, & things seeme to be hidden from his sight, and that he will not call ought to account. Therefore it behoueth vs to kepe silence in the meane while: for if we grudge, it is an accusing of God, as though he gouerned not the worlde righteously. And what else were that, than too vsurpe a superioritie ouer him, which is too cursed a blasphemie. Nowe let vs come to another point which we haue to mark: which is too consider particularly the iniquities that Iob marketh heere. But there are some things which seeme excusable at the first sight, as when he sayth, that the richmen take the pledges of the fatherlesse, that they take away their Asses by force, and that they take the Oxen of the poore widdowes. Verie well: as it hath bene sayde heeretoofoore, it is a lawfull matter too take a gage or a pledge, and it is permitted so to doo in all common weales. Yea, but let vs marke, that when God gaue his people leaue to take gages for lending their money, it was with condition that he poore shoulde not bee greued out of measure, and that they shoulde not be robbed of their goodes by it, as by taking a poore mans bed in such sort as he should bee faine to lie in the strawe, as I haue declared alreadie. Beholde heere a crueltie that is not punished at mens hands, but yet shall it not fayle to come to account before God, and to bee registred vp till the residue that haue had no pitie on their neighbours, shall knowe also that iustice shall be executed vpon them without any mercie. Yea and though the poore folk desire no végeance at Gods hand: yet will not he fayle to do it, according as he affirmeth by Moyses, that the sides of him that is a colde shall crie, though the partie hold his peace, and beare with all things. Then certainly God beholdeth the poore man with pity, too the condemnation of him that hath bene so cruell. And so it is not for naught, that among the other cruelties which were committed in Iobs tyme, hee rehearseth expressely, that the riche men tooke gages of the fatherlesse and widdowes, yea euen such gages as were necessarie for their sustenance. As for example, a fatherlesse childe hath an Ass to labour withall: nowe if this be taken from him, it is as much as if a man shoulde snatche the bread out of his mouth. Againe, a widdow hath a cow that yeeldes hir milke to buie bread withall: if this be taken from hir, shee is robbed and left naked. Though this be counted no robbrie afore men, nor is punishable among them: yet must it come to reckning before God: and moreouer, although we alledge neuer so many excuses, yet are we convicted, and we our selues shall bee our owne iudges. Howe then doth God execute his office in comparison? VVhen wee see a poore fatherlesse childe readie to beg his bread, and another man spoyling him of his goodes, or if wee see a poore widow oppressed, we must be greued and moued to say, what a crueltie is this? VVee that are but mortall creatures and wretched earthly woormes, do perceyue the euil and condemne it: and I praye you will God bee blinde? will hee haue his eyes shet? So then although men labour too hide themselues in many startingholes: yet shall they alwayes haue suche an insight in their hartes, as they muste needes discern betweene good and euill, and euen in their owne iudgements vnderstande, that they must be faine to come before the heaueuly iudge, who seeth much more clearly than wee doo. But by the waye wee muste marke also howe it is sayde heere, that the Boundes, Meeres, or Buttelles were remoued, which is a verie great disorder. For boundes, meeres, and buttelles, serue to seuer landes and heritages, like as money (which is as it were the comō sine) serueth to traffike among men. If there were no money to occupie one with another, what a thing were it? True it is that before there was any money coyned, men might well haue some trade of occupying together by exchange: but there is no such plaine dealing nowadayes, neither coulde it be put in vre in so vntowarde a time as men see nowe. The money then that is coyned, and goeth abroad from hande to hande, is as a suretie or warrant (as men terme them) that men may occupie one with another. Besides this, there are also boundes, meeres, and buttelles, which serue for the feeldes, and for landes. If these bee not certaine and continuall, there will bee no more good neighbourhod among vs, but our life shall be more disordred than the life of brutishe or wilde beastes. And yet notwithstanding we see that long ago there hath bene such craftinesse, and maliciousnesse of chaunging of boundes, and of falsifying the thing which ought to be (as it were) holy among men. Therefore according too that which I haue sayde alreadie, if boundes, meeres, and buttelles, be not kept inuiolable, surely all goes to spoile and hauocke, and there will bee nothing in the worlde, but catch who catch may. VVee see that this hath bene aforetymes, too the ende that wee might bee the better strengthened agaynst suche stumbling blockes. Yet notwithstanding the time cannot iustifie such as doo amisse. And it behoueth vs to marke that poynt. For there are many that thinke to sheelde themselues, by alledging that things haue bene woonted to bee so, and that they haue bene of long continuance. But I praye you, doo not wee knowe nowadayes, that such as piucke vp buttelles, are worse than Theeues? VVee may well be of that iudgement. For although we had not Gods lawe, nor the Scripture: yet is it written in our hartes to mislyke vterly of such falsehood. And if a man alledge, it hath bene vsed afore, it hath bene practised more than this three thousande yeares: is that sufficient to iustifie such as deface boundes at this day, so as they maye saye they haue bene in possession of it a long time? No. And therefore let vs learne, not to harden our selues at the examples which we see. If men beginne to doo euill, and too greue God, and others followe them, so as it shoulde seeme they might doo what they list, and that custome were become a lawe: let vs not fall asleepe vpon it. For god who is the rule of al right, alreth not for al that, loke what he hath once ordeyned, must continue for euer: all mens workes must be layd to that squire, and be squared by it: and a man can no sooner swarue aside from that, but he shall bee condemned. VVherefore let vs marke well, that when mens faultes and misdoings are growne into custome, we must not say, I may follow this, because it is a woonted thing among men. No, no: But let vs alwayes haue an eye vnto God, who (as I sayde) hath stablished a rule that shall not be chaunged. And although men turne too and fro, and things seeme vterly oute of order: yet shall Gods rightuousnesse continue euermore inuiolable inuolable and in his full force. And therefore let vs learne to gather our selues home paciently, and to walke in the feare of God, and too haue an eye too the sayde vprightnesse which he commaundeth vs. It is sayde afterwarde, that the poore were shette vp, and that they were made to turne out of the way, and that the wicked had their scope, and that in steede of hyding themselues, they roysted in the streetes, and hildie the pauement as their owne possession. This is seene more nowadayes than euer it was. But yet notwithstanding we bee warned, that when wee see there is no iustice, so as the verie parties that haue the charge to repress lewde dealings, and sit in Gods seate, and holde the swoorde and mace of iustice in their hand, do not their dutie: wee must not bee ouermuch offended at it. True it is that we ought first of all to be right forie, that the seate whiche ought too be consecrated to Gods seruice, is so defiled by men: and secondly, too knowe also that oure God dooth punishe vs iustly in not suffering iustice too beare sway as it ought to doo: for it is a token that we bee vnwoorthie too be gouerned by him. Therefore it becommeth vs to sigh when we see offences committed, that the Lordes of iustice and the Magistrates set not too their hands [too redresse them] nor haue such courage and stoutnesse as they ought too haue. Let vs learne (I say) that God punisheth vs by that meanes: and forasmuche as Gods name is blasphemmed thereby, let it greeue vs, and let vs be forie for it. Howebeit therewithall we must conclude in the ende, that sith God causeth not things to be set in perfection presently, wee muste needes looke that hee shall shewe himselfe a iudge in the latter day. Also wee must arme oure selues agaynst suche stumbling blockes, when wee see the wicked take suche libertie, as to beate one, and bounce another, and to doo many wrongs and outrages, and yet there is no remedie agaynst them, but wee bee newe too beginne againe, and good men are fayne too keepe their mouthes shette, and when they go out of their houses, folke mocke at them, so as they bee fayne too keepe themselues as close prisoners. VVhen we see all this: well, let vs pray God too vouchsafe too haue pitie on vs, and to vtter his powcr if we see men to be too colde. Howebeit if hee delay, and things fall not out as wee woulde haue them: let vs honour hys secreete iudgements. Yee see then that the cause why this is written, is for that the righteous shall bee shette vp, and shall not dare shewe their heades abroade, but muste bee fayne too hyde themselues, and bee hilde in as prisoners. Therewithall let vs marke what becommeth of the wicked, howe that when men winke at their lewdnesse, and punishe them not in conuenient tyme, they gather such a boldenesse, as they dare shewe themselues in the open streete, and there make their tryumphes. VVoulde God wee sawe not examples hereof nowe adayes. But what? Scarcely shall an honest man go abroade in the streetes, but hee shall bee flowted and scoft at, and vexed and troubled: and if he bee assayled, he dares scarcely maintaine his owne good quarell: and in the meane while what is done to the gallowclappers that ought to haue beene hanged halfe a dozen yeares afore? O, they must go perking vp with their neb, yea and that so stoutly, as they offer shame not onely to euerie priuate person, but also too the whole state of iustice. For when any good man hath a cause to go eyther alone or with companie, one Ruffian or other shall come face him with a shamelesse countenance, and hee muste bee suffered and indured to spite both God and man openly. So then we haue to marke, that when the wicked are not punished at the first as they ought to be, they become so stately, as they ouermayster the poore and simple sort, and rushe out intoo all vngraciousnesse, becomming so bolde, that the good men are fayne too hide themselues as it were in prison, and dare not speake a worde. VVhen wee see this (I say) let vs tarie paciently till God redresse it. Neuerthelesse this ought too warne suche as are in publicke authoritie, too do their duetie carefully, and too woorke with such stoutnesse, as they may not bee guiltie of so extreeme disorder and confusion as are spoken of heere: or else these dealings muste returne vpon their heades. For they shall not onely beare a peece of the burthen, but also they must bee vterly ouerwhelmed by it. Thus yee see in effect what wee haue too marke. And by and by it is sayde, That the wicked ryse betimes too go to their businesse, namely too go too stealing and robbing, (sayeth hee) lyke wilde Asses, whiche are light and verie nimble beasts. Here he doth vs to wit, that the feet of the malicious and cankerdhearted sort, are swift in running too shed blood, and to doo all maner of mischeefe. Diligence is one of the greatest vertues that God giueth vntoo men. Neuerthelesse it behoueth men too knowe why and too what ende they bee created, that they may applie themselues therevntoo, and bestowe all theyr cunning and abilitie to the same. VVe knowe what is sayde in the Psalme concerning Gods order, that the rising of the Sunne is more than if hee sounded a Trumpet. For it shyneth vntoo vs too the ende that euerie man shoulde go too his worke, and to his businesse, thereby to shewe vs, that hee hath not made vs to bee ydle and vnprofitable, but too applie oure selues too somewhat wherein God and our neighbour may be serued. Yee see then that the Sunne is as a rayser of vs vp vnto God, that we may be diligent to doo our dutie. But men are oftentimes too diligent, they bee verie buzie, and they will ryse earely ynough: and what to doo? To quaffe and to fill the paunche, and too runne intoo all maner of disorder, as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay, that the day is not long ynough for them too make an ende of their riotting. Finally when they be so wearie that they can no more, they play the brute beastes throughout. For they sleepe the daye and wathe the night, so as the order of nature is turned vterly vpside downe by them. Another sort ryse earely: and too what purpose? Too woorke some treacherie or lewdnesse to their neighbors, to deceyue one, and to intangle another. Another sort go to their whorehuntings, and another sort too theyr wicked buying and selling. Thus yee see wherein most men bestowe their diligence. And this is shewed vs expressly, too the ende we might knowe wherevntoo wee shoulde applie it. Therefore as soone as the Sunne riseth, let vs learne too thanke God for lightning vs after that sort, so as we may bestirre our handes, that is too say, imploy our selues about what thing soeuer hee calleth vs too, and wherein so euer hee will haue vs to serue him. Againe, let the onely marke that we shoote at, be alwayes too knowe wherevntoo he calleth vs, and what be the things that he alloweth: and let vs bee verie ware, that wee abuse not the light of the Sunne, and the diligentnesse that God hath giuen vs by applying it too the hurt of our neighbours, or by dooing any man wrong or displeasure. Naye, rather sith wee see Theeues, VVhoremongers, and Drunkardes so forewarde in euill, let vs learne to finde fault with our owne slouth in goodnesse. As howe? Such a one is the stirringst man in the worlde. And what too doo? To go doo a murther. But if a man bee giuen too drunkennesse or too gluttonie: hee layes himselfe in his graue before hee bee dead. For wee see howe these drunkardes are as stinking

Esay. 5. c. ii.

king carions [more than] halfe rotten about the ground. And good cause why: for it is the wages that they receyue for their double diligence in glutting themselues, and in abusing the good creatures of God. Another sort go to their whorehuntings, and other som to their theewing and robbing. Nowe although these kinde of men thinke too aduantage themselues: yet is their diligence but too their destruction. For when they haue toyled themselues throughly, they shall do nothing else but gather a stacke of wood, and in the end the fire of Gods wrath shall be put too it, to consume it quite and cleane. Therefore when we see the despyzers of God, and the wicked sort so diligent in dooing euill: I pray you is it not a great shame for vs, if wee bee lazie as though our armes were broken? Shall not euen they bee witnesses agaynst vs for beeing so vuprofitable? Thus ye see that the thing which wee haue too marke in this sentence, is that it warneth vs to be diligent: howbeit, so as we take heede too applie the same diligence where God will haue vs to bestowe it. And for the doing thereof, let vs haue an eie too his good will, which is that wee shoulde communicate one with another to helpe our neighbors, and euerie man consider what abilitie and meane hee hath wherewith too succour suche as haue neede of him. Lo what our diligence ought too bee. Furthermore, let vs walke as children of the light: and sith that God doth nowe inlighten vs both day and night, let vs call vpon him, and sighe vntoo him in the night. And a daye tymes when hee sendeth vs his Sunnelight, so as wee see what wee haue too doo, and what our duetie is:

let vs applie oure selues faythfully therevntoo: and at leastwise let vs bee as forwarde as those that doo so giue themselues too euill, least they become witnesses of our slouthfulnesse. And although we see not God punish them out of hande: yet let vs fully perswade oure selues, that there is an horrible vengeance prepared for them, which sheweth not it selfe as yet. But let vs not therefore ceasse too looke a farre of: for it behoueth our fayth to mounte about all things that are seene as now, and too beholde things that are hidden. Thus ye see howe we may profite oure selues, euen by the misorders that are seene in this worlde, vntill our Lorde bring all things againe to their state and perfection, whiche shall not be till the last day.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise, as if hee punish vs for a tyme by the wicked, wee may yet perceyue that he spareth vs and beareth with vs in that wee bee not vtterly ouerthrowne by them: and that although we haue deserued to be so delt with, yet we may not ceasse to haue recourse vnto him, seeing that he calleth vs so gently and friendly: and that we may endeuer to amende the vices that are in our fleshe, and be more and more sorie for them, so as we may wholly frame our selues too his good will, and call our selues fully home vnto him: and that thereby we may proue our selues to be his children, and reuerence him as our father with so much the greater affection. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations, &c.

The .xcij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the .xxiiij. Chapter.

10. They make the naked man to go vvithout clothing, & take the gleanings from the hungrie.
11. They that presse out the Oyle vvithin their vvalles, and tread the vvineperle, suffer thirst.
12. Me crie out of the citie, the soule of the vvoided sheweth it self, & god putteth no stop at al.
13. They are among those that hate all light, not knowving the vvayes thereof, neyther continue they in the path of it.
14. The murtherer ryzeth early, he murthereth the poore and needie, and in the night he is like a theefe.
15. The eye of the adulterer longeth for the euening, saying, no eye shall see mee, and hee hideth his face.
16. He entereth into the houses by night, vvich he had marked in the day, and he agreeth not vvith the light.
17. The light of the morning is as the shadowv of death to him: if any man knowve them, they are in the terrour of the shadowv of death.
18. They belight vpon the vvaters, their portion is cursed vpon earth, and they see not the frute of the vineyardes.

Here Job goeth forward in shewing the state that is seene in the worlde, without redresse or providing for it by God. And this serueth too proue, that Gods iudgements are not alwayes visible, nor apparant at the first brunt: and that men ought too holde themselues quiet, till oure Lorde stretch out his hande, bicause he knoweth the fit time to do it, and it is not for vs to appoynt it. Now then Job alledgeth that the worlde is so full of Rakehelles, that the poore go naked, and such as haue gleaned haue not a bit of bread to eat, but men snatch away euen that litle from them which they had gleaned of the rich mens leauings. VVhereby he signifieth, that such as haue wherewith, do abuse their credite and riches too consume the poore vtterly. And that is too outrageous a thing: and yet for all that, God prouideth not for it, notwithstanding that he be the iudge of the worlde. This might trouble vs at the first sight, according as we see that many surmize God to be asleepe, when he worketh not after their lyking. But it behoueth vs to be fully perswaded of that, and to haue foreseene it long afore: to the ende we bee not troubled and offended at it when it is come to passe. For it hath euer beene so: and yet God hath not ceassed to bee the iudge of the worlde. Howbeit the times seeme to bee hidden, bicause we see not his day out of hande. True it is that he knoweth all things: and yet for all that, he hideth himselfe, that is to say, hee sheweth not himselfe willing to haue care to succour such as are afflicted: for he tryeth their pacience for a time. After Job hath sayd so, he addeth, that such as haue taken paynes, yea and haue have gotten wherewith [to releue themselues,] cannot inioy their owne goodes. The man (sayth he) that bath pressed out the Oyle within his walles, them that bath tro- den out the wine, shall not ceasse to be athirst. True it is, that oftentimes this happeneth through Gods iust punishment, according also as we see howe it is threatned in the lawe, Thou shalt plant trees, and not eate of theyr frute: Thou shalt till the earth and sowe corne, and not reape the haruett: Thou shalt dresse the vines, and not drinke of the wine. VVhen our Lorde speaketh after this maner, it is not bicause he meeneth too leaue things out of order in the worlde, but contrariwise hee threatneth to punish those that haue not vsed his benefites well. But yet for all this, wee on our side cannot alwayes see with our eyes, why God dissemblesh the matter. VVhen some pill and poll, and other some are spoyled of their substance: wee cannot see the reason of it. For God also intendeth to humble vs, that wee might honour him, and confesse him to be righteous. And verely we be as it were so dazeled, as we cannot discern what he intendeth. And so ye see wher at Iob amed: as if he shoulde say, VVee see those die for hunger and thirst, whiche haue laboured sore: and in the meane while, other men rob them of their goodes. It were easie for God too redresse it, but he doth not. Therefore wee must conclude, that God woorketh not after such maner as is knowne vnto vs, and is within the compasse of our vnderstanding: but hath a woonderfull purpose, whiche passeth all mans reache, so as wee be as it were blinded at it. And wee must not go about too measure all Gods dooings by our reason: for then shouide we enter into a bottomlesse deepe. But wee muste pray him to graunt vs the grace, too content our selues with that which hee sheweth vs, and we must haue the sobernesse and mode-stie, to walke in ignorance, till hee discover things fully to vs. For it behoueth vs too keepe our selues within our owne tedder: for if we play the looce Colkes, there will bee neyther way nor path for vs. Thus then Iobs intent is, to shewe vs that Gods iudgements are not ruled by mans discretion, but are secret and hidden from vs. For that cause he addeth, that men crie from out of the Citie, and that the soule of the wounded (namely of them that are dying) do lament, and that God putteth no stoppe, or that God doth not any vreasonable thing: for this later part may be taken two wayes. Truly some expounde it, That God receyeth not their prayer. And the two Hebrew woordes (namely that which signifieth stop, let, hinderance or impeachment, and that whiche signifieth prayer) haue some likenesse, neuer the later it cannot be taken here for prayer: for then shoulde it haue bene Tshephila, whereas nowe it is Tshephla. Surely I confesse, that if the poynts woulde suffer it, that exposition would be most conuenient and agreeable, bicause hee speaketh heere of crying. Then it is sayde that men crie. And wherefore?

 Bycause they bee wrongfully vexed, and yet God hath no regarde of their complaintes. Howebeit this translation also, that God putteth no stoppe, is verie fitte, notwithstanding that mooste men take it in another sense, namely that God dooth not any vreasonable thing. And surely the sayde woorde is commonly through all the holy Scripture put in that signification: that is too witte, for a thing that is not well ruled, or which hath no foundation, or whiche hath no truth in it selfe, or rather which is vn honest and to be condemned. True it is then that this signification is most common in the Scripture.
 But an eye muste bee had too the circumstance of the sentence. Iob meeneth not to proue here, that all Gods doings are grounded vpon reason and vprightnesse, how-be it that hee doo verely acknowledge them too bee so: but the discourse that hee maketh, tendeth too another diuerse ende, which is, that wee bee amazed when wee beholde the state of the worlde. VVhy? If it were in vs, there is none of vs all but he would dispose things cleane otherwise. Therefore in this ordinance and gouerne-ment which wee see, wee haue too remember that God behaueth not himselfe after our fancie, ne executeth his iudgements in suche wise as a man might beholde them, and say, See here, howe it is God that woorketh. No: but rather oftentimes hee will go as it were in couert.

 That (say I) was Iobs meening. And so, this sentence must bee vnderstoode, that men crie from out of the Citie, and that the soules of suche as are vexed and oppressed doo mourn, & yet that God stoppeth not the doing of those things: that is too say, hee letteth things runne still out of order.
 Yea for a time: but although hee winke, yet is hee not asleepe (as hath bene sayde afore:) and therefore it behoueth vs too suspende oure iudgements, and not too make it a general rule, that God punisheth men as soone as they haue done amisse, so as his iustice is apparant and visible too vs. VVee see here the contrarie, in that Iob sayeth expreffely, that men crie from out of the Citie: as if he should say, I will not speake of vnknowne faults, (for there may be many deceytes and wrongs wrought in hudder mudder) but of the iniuries that are notorious, which are knowne ouer all the Citie, euerie streete rings of them, euery man speakes of them. And they that are so misused make such outcries, as many me may be witnesses of the wrongs that are done them. Beholde, the very necessitie of them is so extreme, as it appeereth plainly, that it is high time to helpe them now or neuer, for they be readie to runne out of their wittes: and yet of all the while, God maketh no countenance that he is minded to helpe them: it should seeme that their crying is in vaine, and that it is but lost time for men too resort vnto God.
 VVhen men see this, what shall they say? but that God woorketh not after our maner, and that all our wittes must needes be dazeled at it? Therefore let vs learne to honor the wisdom which we cannot comprehend, and to say, Lord, it is true that our flesh & our nature pronoke vs to grudge agaynst thee, but yet must not we rule thee after our appetite. VVherfore we will wayt patiently til thine houre come, and then wilt thou worke as thou knowest to be profitable and expedient. This lesson is well worthie to be noted. For we see how hastie we be. And besides that, if a man do but touch vs with his finger, we be so wayward, as there is no calling vpon God with vs. If he help vs not out of hand, as sone as we haue but cast forth some sigh, we think he doth vs great wrong. Seeing then that there is such hartburning in vs, and that our passions are so excessiue: we haue so much more neede to marke well this lesson, where it is sayd, That men crie from out of the Citie, yea euen they that are alreadie at the poynt of death, and yet God dispatcheth them not from theyr sighing after that sort, but suffereth men too torment them still. If this seeme straunge to vs, first we must vnderstande howe oure Lorde hath threatned, that suche as haue not pitied their neighbours, shall crie and not be heard theselues. For he sayth, the poore haue desired you to shew the mercy, but when they came to find any fauor at your had, you became cruel to the, your ears were deaf to all their requests: & therefore the time will come that you shal cry, & no man shall heare you. VVhen we heare such threatnings of god, it behoueth vs to loke whether those that crie & lament, haue not vsed crueltie towards other men: & if it be so, there is no reson why god should not punish the, so as they might sob & sigh, & yet not be succoured

succoured. So then whereas it is sayde heere, that the cries went vp to heauen, and that the parties which cried were put to extreeme paine: let vs consider a little whether they were worthie to be so handled, and therewithall let vs acknowledge that God is a iust iudge. Furthermore if it cannot bee sayde that Gods suffering of vs to bee so oppressed, is to punishe vs: (As it may come too passe, that such as are so greued and oppressed, haue alwayes bene gentle and louing, and not done any such wrong or iniurie too their neighbours, as maye bee 10 worthie of such punishment, that is to say, that is knowne of) then let vs reuerence the woonderfull secretes of God, sith it is not his will that hee shoulde knowe the reason why hee dooth so. Beholde (I say) howe wee ought too praetize this sentence. Therefore if wee bee afflicted, and cri vntoo God, and yet can perceyue no willingnesse in him too helpe vs: let vs not thinke that he hath forgotten vs, nother let vs be out of hart. Why? For his prouidence passeth oure vnderstanding. And therefore we must learne to holde our selues quiet euen 20 when wee see the graue afore vs, and haue cried and besought God to haue pitie vpon vs. Yea and then also if he seeme to be shet vp in heauen, so as we perceyue not his hande to giue vs any ease: let vs not ceasse to sue to him continually, and we shall not be disappoynted of our hope. Yet notwithstanding, it behoueth vs too mount aboue all mans vnderstanding. And this is it also why S. Paule sayth, that according to the example of Abraham, wee ought to hope about hope. VVee haue the like too marke in this text. For so long as men will be selfwise, it is impossible for them to trust in God, or to rest vpon his goodnesse, op vpon the saluation that is promised them. And why? For God to exercise our fayth, will make vs to bee beseged of a hundred deathes, so as we shall bee as good as swallowed vp into the gulfe. VVhat is to bee done then? Let vs learne, not to iudge of our saluation, which we looke for at Gods hande, after our owne mother wit & reason, for that is to smal a measure. But let vs praetize this lesson of S. Paules, of hoping agaynst hope. 30 Do we not see a whit? God seeth for vs. Is there no mean for vs to escape? God will finde a meane. Is death (to our seeming) readie to catch vs? God is able to remedie it. Although we knowe not after what maner: yet is it not for vs to scan of it. But let vs do God so much honor, as [to beleue] that hee will saue vs beyonde all that man can conceyue, yea euen in such wise as we shall be compelled to be rauished with woonderment. For behold also how it is sayd of the welfare of the Church, that when the faythful bethinke them in what sort God hath deliuered them, they shal take it as a dreame, insomuch as the thing cannot be comprehended by mans reason, bicause it is not according to the order of nature. Beholde (I say) how we ought to kepe our selues quiet, that we may rest vpon Gods goodnesse, and feede our selues with the hope of the promises that hee hath giuen vs. Yea and when wee 40 cri vnto him, and he maketh no likelihode of hearing vs, let vs not ceasse to cotinue our sute still, & to hope beyonde all hope, that is to wit, beyond all that we can see or discern. Thus much concerning this text. Nowe it followeth, that such as do euill, shunne the light, and hyde themselves, as a theefe that alwayes seeketh for darknesse and night, and when the day commeth, he thinketh it to be the shadow of death. The aduouterer and whore-hunter watcheth till the euening shette in, that hee may shrink into his brothelhouse. Lo how men hate the light in doing euill. And too what purpose doth Iob speake it here? To shew vs that God iudgeth not the worlde after such maner as Eliphaz speaketh of. For (as we haue said)

Eliphazs mening was, that things are ruled in such wise here bylow, as men may perceyue that God guideth and gouerneth all things. True it is that wee may well perceyue it, howbeit not by our mother wit. Our faith must be faine too reigne in that behalfe, and wee must looke further than to the present and visibill things. Then what sayth Iob heere? Beholde (sayth hee) howe men condemne themselues when they sinne, and yet they be not condemned by God to the sight of the worlde: that is to say, God executeth not his vengeance vpon them at the first dash, but letteth them alone in quiet. Men therefore are compelled to accuse themselues, and as it were to make their owne indytement: they condemne themselues, and God spareth them. And what is ment by that, but that God reserueth a greater iudgement to himselfe, and that in the meane while he suffereth things too bee partly out of order, to the intent wee shoulde drawe too him aloft, and vnderstand that this is the time wherein we must be exercised with many battels & temptations, this is the time of trouble, and there is no other thing to lift vs vp withall, but the reposing of our trust in Gods word, so as we walke not after our owne fancie, nor rest vpon the things that can bee seene as nowe: for that were the next way to make vs swarue aside from all right and reason. This is it in effect whereat Iob ameth. Therefore let vs marke well how it is sayd, that such as seeke the darknesse of the night to work naughtinesse in, are sory when they see the day appeare, and it is to them as the shadowe of death. True it is that somtimes men become so shamelesse, as they sticke not to do euill at high noone dayes, and (as it is sayd in the Prophet) they resemble harlottes which vncouer their legges, and haue neyther shame nor discretion to discern good or euill. They are no more sorie, as sayth S. Paule: and (as Salomon speaketh) when they be once come to the bottome, (whiche is to dispize God and all honestie) they become brute beastes, and discern no more betweene good and euill: but yet dooth God leaue them some tracks, whereby they be forced to condemne their owne sinnes spite of their teeth. If we had neither Scripture, nor lawe, nor pollicie, nor anie thing else: let vs but onely looke vpon that which is sayd heere, namely that when men purpose vpon any euill, they will finde some meanes to hide themselues: and we cannot but conclude that euill is euill, and that the same is to be condemned. VVhat maketh a man to shunne the sight of the worlde, when hee woulde take his pleasure in whooredome, in robberie, in drunkennesse, in wantonnesse, and in such other like things? He coulde finde in his hart to glorie in his wickednesse, and to make a vertue of it: and yet neuertheless hee hydeth himselfe. VVhat is it that constreyneth him to do so? If it be sayd, that there is but some one man that doth so, and no man else will consent with him in his euill: beholde, the whole worlde is full of vngratioufnesse. It is to be seene that verie oft men make compacts together, and such as be giuen to some vice, desire nothing so much as to haue other men doo as they themselues do: and yet notwithstanding as well the one as the other, hyde themselues, when they go about their naughtinesse, and they woulde fayne that their lewdnesse might neuer bee knowne. Hereby then the wicked do shewe, that there is a certaine law euen in nature, which cannot be abolished, yea and a discerning betweene good & euill. And forasmuch as we see this: we must of force conclude, that God is the iudge. For who is hee that hath printed such feeling in mennes harts, as to be ashamed & sorie for their sinnes? It comes not of their owne good will: and yet they shun the light of the Sun, whereas they ought rather to shun the light of Gods

Gods iudgement. VVe see how men besotte themselves wilfully, and would faine rock their consciences asleepe, that they might haue no more feeling to think vpon god. But when they haue all done, they must (spite of their teeth) enter into themselves, and bee hild fast with this brydle, to say in their consciences, I haue sinned, and wot not how to excuse my fault. Then sith we see it, must we not conclude that God iudgeth the worlde? For that commeth of him: men should neuer haue any consideration of themselves to be wounded for their sinnes, and to bee sorie for them, except God constrayned them by force. Nowe if God inforce mens consciences after that sort, and feare them with a searing yron, making them to haue as it were a burning fire within them: thinke wee that he must not one day call men before him, and take a reckening of all things, and lay open his registers, (as it is sayd in Daniell) and discouer the things that as now lie buried in darknesse, as S. Paule sayth to the Corinthians? So then, if there were no more but the shame that the wicked haue: that same alone were a sufficient and infallible proof of Gods iudgement: insomuch that we must be faine to come to that which S. Iohn sayth, namely that God is greater than our own consciences. VVhen S. Iohn hath sayd that if euery man enter intoo his owne conscience, he needeth none other witness nor aduersarie to accuse him, for he himselfe shall finde his owne misdeed, and be sufficiently conuincid of it there: My freendes, (sayth he) if we perceyue our owne sinnes, yea euen whether we will or no: what shall God do? Thinke we that he is blinde, when wee our selues are so cleeresighted? Hath not he much more power, than our consciences can haue? So then if a man condemne himselfe for one sin: he must conclude that he is damnable before God for an hundred. If he find himselfe astonished, and afrayde at his euill doing: howe shall hee bee able too beare out Gods horrible vengeance, which is prepared for vs if we continue wilfully in our sinnes? Behold heere a lesson which of all other is most necessarie, and least put in vre. For (as I haue sayd alreadie) if men had but one sparke of reason in them, though there were no more but this remorse & shame that they haue of their sinnes: yet should they be conuictid, that they coule not scape the hand of God. And surely as oft as we see a man wilfully giuen to doo euil, or feele our owne sinnes: it is all one as if God summoned vs to his iudgement, and constreyned vs to think vpon it. And this is not done once a yeare: but we haue infinit examinations euerie day, insomuch that we haue no soner offeded in any thing, but by & by the said remorse, by and by the sayd sting pricketh vs: which is as much as if God should send a pursuant to vs to say, ye must appeare before the Lord, he is your iudge. VVe see a number of such as haue done amisse, which labor too couer their sinnes, and are verie cunning in it. And why is that, but bycause they know that sinne is damnable? Beholde, God warneth vs, and yet who is he that regardeth it? Do not men wilfully harden their hartes agaynst Gods warnings? And may it not well be sayde, that Satan hath bewitched vs? Yes: but there is yet more. For beside such warnings, God sheweth vs by his worde what our faults are, and maketh vs too feele them, and draweth vs too himselfe. And yet for all this, wee ceasse not too welter still in our owne filth, and too growe as it were senselesse. Heereby therefore it appeareth, that this lesson is verie yll put in vre: But yet is it not written in vaine: and (as I haue sayde) it is well worthie to be marked, as in respect of it self. That is to say, forasmuch as men labor to excuse and iustifie themselves in their euill doings, and yet cannot bring it to passe: it standeth euery one of vs in hande

to awake, and to consider that we shall gaine nothing by our colouring of things, for that can serue no further too to eschue the reproch of the worlde. If a man haue spent the night secretly in whoredome, if he haue gone a swearing, if he haue beguiled his neighbor, or if he haue flit the doores to him to practize some treason: truly men cannot condemne him, till his lewdnesse bee knowne abroad: but can hee eschue the presence of God? Furthermore, let vs marke well howe the Apostle telleth vs, that the worde of God is asa two edged sword, and entreteth through the bones and the marce, so as there is nothing hidden from it, but God examineth vs in oure thoughtes, and in our affections, when he appoynteth his worde to be preached vnto vs. Also let vs adde the lesson which S. Paule giueth vs: which is, that sith we haue the Gospell to enlighten vs, we be no more the children of darknesse, but of light. Such as haue not Gods worde, thinke they haue made a fayre hande, if their sinne bee once buried, and come no more too their remembrance. But what? God doth so enlighten vs by his doctrine that we haue daylight in the night, according as it is sayd that the Sunne shall no more shine vpon the Church by day, nor the Moone by night, but the Lorde shall bee the continuall light of it. Truly, the order of nature continueth alwayes in his state: but yet therewithall, let a man lay himself in his bed, or shet himselfe in his chamber, or hide himselfe so close as no man maye knowe what he sayth or what hee doth: and yet the doctrine of the Gospell doth alwayes shine vpon him, hee cannot quenche the knowledge that God hath giuen him. And out of doubt, although the scornfull and heathenish sort labour to doo it: (as wee see howe there bee made beastes in these dayes which seeke nothing but too abolishe all religion: ) yet will God haue the sayde Lampe [of his worde] to burne alwayes before them, that they may perceyue their owne damnation by it. Then seeing that God hath giuen vs the doctrine of his Gospell, the brightnesse whereof we cannot dimme: let vs bethinke our selues and vnderstande, that when theeues, whoremaysters, and other euill dooers seeke couert: they teach vs howe wee ought too walke; seeing that God is with vs, and wee present with him, and that hee sheweth himselfe as it were with open face, eyther as oure father or as our iudge. VVherefore let vs learne to dedicate our whole lyfe vnto him: and whereas we see that suche as would couer their euill dooing shunne the light as the shadowe of death, and are glad when night commeth: let vs vse the light that is giuen vs, too keepe vs from straying out of our way, and from swaruing aside, specially seeing that oure Lorde calleth vs, and reacheth oute his hande to drawe vs too him. Thus yee see howe wee ought too profite our selues by the grace that God giueth vs, in making vs too knowe our sinnes and wretchednesse, by meanes of his Gospell. Furthermore, let vs marke, that like as the wicked doo hate the light of the day, and coule finde in their heart that the Sunne were plucked out of the Skie, to the ende that they might alwayes haue freedom to do euil: so do they much more shunne the light of the Gospell. And heere yee see also the cause why the same doctrine of the Gospell is so yll receyued of the worlde as our Lorde Iesus Christ sayth. It is a woonder how that men shoulde be so stubburne agaynst God, specially seeing he sendeth his owne sonne to be our redeemer, and offereth vs forgienesse of our sinnes, desyring vs with as great gentlenesse and frendlinesse as can bee. Howe can it bee (will manie saye) that men shoulde bee so stubborne, as too forsake the goodnesse of God? Is it not an outrageous churlishnesse?

lishnesse? Yes certainly is it. But beholde, the reason why the worlde hateth the Gospell, is bycause that (as our fauour Christ sayeth) whosoever dooth euill hateth the light. Nowe the cace standeth so, that most men giue themselves too all euill: yea and euen they that are conuicted of their wilfulnesse, ceasse not to harden themselves, but woulde sayne shet their eyes to spight God with all their hart. Then seeing it is so, is it any woonder that men be loth to taste of the Gospell, or to byte of it, but rather play the madde bedlems? Ought it to be thought straunge? No: For wee see that Theeues, Murderers, VVhoremongers, and all other euill doers, coulde wel finde in their hartes too haue the Sunne darkened, and that it should no more shine in the worlde. But (as I haue sayde) the brightnesse of the Gospell is yet farre greater. For that serueth not to guide our eies onely, and to shew vs the way outwardely: but it entreth euen intoo our secrete thoughts, and must examin that which is hidden in the verie bottoome of our hartes. So then, yee see why the wicked are loth to come to this doctrine, or to frame themselves by any meanes vnto it. But yet must we on our side deale cleane contrarywise, as I haue sayde already. And therefore as touching the order of nature, when God maketh his day sunne to shine, let vs vnderstande that it is to the ende that euerie man should giue himself to goodnesse, and do his dutie. Marke that for one poynt. Againe, when wee shall haue walked according to our calling and state, euerie man seruing God and his neighbour all the daye long: let vs assure our selues that wee must not abuse the darkenesse of the night too libertie of doing euill. And why? For the Lampe of Gods worde neuer goeth out, as I haue declared already. Therefore, both day and night let vs be the children of light, and let vs awake and bee inlightned, as Saint Paule sayth. I say let vs not fal asleepe by soothing our selues in our sinnes, neyther let vs thinke our selues too bee innocent before God. But rather let euerie one of vs quicken vp himselfe, and not be drowned in our owne conceytes, so as wee shoulde bee past shame of dooing euill: but let vs bee sober, not onely in eating and drinking, but also in all our desires and lustes, and let vs so bridle them, as we may cutte off all the superfluous concupiscences that draw vs vnto euill. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to marke in this sentence. Now herevnto Iob addeth for an ende, that the wicked are light footed vpon the water, and glyde awaye: and yet for all that, that they go too the graue. Lyke as the earth drieth in (sayth he) and the beate of the Sunne sucketh vp the snowe, and all the moysture that is in it: So doth the graue swallow vp the wicked. It seemeth that Iob sheweth heere, that God punisheth all the euill deedes that are done in the worlde: and that therein hee agreed with Eliphaz. But his meening is farre otherwise. For his intent is to shewe in effect, that the wicked perishe in suche wise, as a man cannot perceyue Goddes hande apparantly vpon them, to say, beholde, God punisheth such a man bycause he hath liued amisse. But contrariwise, that the wicked soke away like water, and leaue no remembrance of themselves behind them. They go to the graue, yea, and so do good men too. So then we see howe Iob concludeth heere, that God doth not so execute his iustice in punishing the sinnes of men, as it may alwayes be scene. And herewithall let vs call to mind howe it hath beene sayd afore, that Iob blasphemeth not God, to make himself beleue that there no is prouidence, that all things are ruled by fortune, and that God in the meane while sitteth asleepe in heauen. No: but his intent is too shewe, that Gods iudgements are not alwayes visible. It behoueth vs too beare well in minde this saying, and too set it alwayes before our eyes: for it is a verie profitable doctrine, as I haue shewed heere too fore: but yet hath it need too bee repeated new againe. It is that the good are greatly troden vnder foote. For after long pynning, they die before their time, and yet in their owne opinion they haue liued too long. And why? For their lyfe was nothing else but a continuall consumption. VVe see this with our eyes. But in the meane while what becommeth of the wicked that haue despyzed God, and bene full of outrage, crueltie, and naughtinesse? Assone as their good dayes are past, they die, yea euen as water that soketh away. For a man shall not perceyue that God vttereth any certaine marke of his vengeance vpon them, but their death is gentle and easie. VVhen a man sees this, what can hee say? It is a great stumbling blocke for suche as iudge after their naturall reason, too see that oure Lorde dooth not alwayes punish the wicked, but letteth them go in their common trayne, and afterwarde when they die, there is no more scene in them, than is common and generall in all men. Yet must we not therefore surmize that they be scaped, or that they shall abyde vnpunished: but wee must haue an eye too the iudgement which wee looke for according to the promises of the holy Scripture, assuring our selues, that our Lorde calleth vs thither when hee executeth not his iustice too the full, but onely in part, too giue vs some inckling of it, which may serue too shewe vs, that things are not yet brought to theyr right order: to the ende wee shoulde hope for the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, and so muche the more hartely long for him as our Redeemer.

Thus then ye see what is to bee done. VVhen we see Tyrantes beare sway, innocent blood shedde, whoredome, and other loocenesse reigne, wrongs, outrages, and violences committed, poore folke troden downe, and mennes feete set vpon their throates, and all things shuffled together in suche a hotchpotche, as we wote not what to say: let vs confesse, saying: VVell Lorde, if all things were ordered as wee woulde wishe, wee shoulde no more hope for the coming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, nor for the Resurrection that is promised vs, nor for his heauenly kingdome: we shoulde bee already as in a Paradyse. But nowe that wee bee tossed as in a raging sea, and are in the middes of stormes and whirlewyndes: it serueth well too teache vs to long for the rest that is prepared for vs in heauen, and which thou hast promised vs, too the ende wee may haue our sight alwayes fastened vpon the comming of oure Lorde Iesus Christ, thy Sonne, who shall gather vs all too himselfe, according as thou haste committed vs too his charge, protection, and guiding. Furthermore, when wee see the wicked nowadays hyde themselves in dooing euill: let vs assure our selues, that yet for all that, wee cannot hyde our selues from the presence of our God: and that although they shurne the Sunnelight, yet cannot we shun the sight of him that searcheth all hartes. VVhat is to be done then? Forasmuch as we gaine nothing by seeking of lurkingholes, to shun the presence of our god, so as we would not by our good will come in his sight: & whereas the wicked eschue him, and mocke at all the threatnings that are made to them of his iustice: let vs seeke nothing more thā to come before our god. And seeing he is so gracious to vs, as to make vs our own euiges: let vs not tarie to be cōdēned at his hand: but to the end we may be quit, let vs yeld our selues guiltie of our own accord. Ye see thē that the way to put this sentēce in vre, is to lerne to cōdēne our selues whē we come to shew our selues before God, and to come to him vpon trust of his promise, which is to receyue

1. The. 5. a. 5

receyue al such to mercie as are sory for their sinnes, and seeke nothing else but the grace that is offered vs dayly, in the persone of our Lorde Iesus Christ.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to touche vs to the quicke with such repentance, as wee may perceyue the euill that is in vs, too seeke the remedie thereof by sticking too his rightuousnesse and too conuert vs in such wise to himselfe, that in steade of feeding oure selues in oure owne vices and lewde lustes, wee may seeke too frame our selues wholly too his holy lawe and commaundements: that we knowing what neede wee haue too bee healed of our spirituall diseases, may seeke the medicine where it is to bee founde, that is to witte, in our Lorde Iesus Christ: that beeyng renued by his holy spirite, wee may holde on our way right foorth too the place that hee calleth vs vntoo, euen till hee haue fully clothed vs with his owne rightuousnesse, after wee haue continued in the waye of saluation, which hee sheweth vs nowe by his worde. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people. &c.

The .xciiij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the .xxiiij. Chapter.

19. As the earth dryeth vp, and as the heate drinketh vp the snovve vvaters: so the sinner too the graue.
20. The louing man shall forget him, the vvoormes shall take svveetnesse of him: hee shall no more bee remembered, the vvicked shall be broken as a tree.
21. Hee misintreateth the barrein vvoman that beareth no children, and dooth no good too the vvidovv.
22. Hee dravveth the strong vnto him, so as he distrusteth his ovvne life.
23. Men giue him all for assurance and rest, and his eyes vvatch the vvayes of them.
24. V When they be exalted for a litle, they are caught avvay (or die) they be made poore, they be barred vp like too vvers, they bee cut off as the top of eares of corne.
25. V Who is hee that vvill make mee a lyer if hee bee not so, and vvho is hee that vvill disproue my vvordes?

That we may fare the better by this doctrine, wee must call too minde how it hath bene declared heretofore, that the cause why these things are repeated vnto vs, is that we should not be greeued & troubled to much when wee see things diuersly disordred in the world. For if wee would haue a perfect state here, where were our hope? Therefore it behoueth vs to beare paciently the disorders whereby it pleaseth God to exercize vs, and to humble vs: and therewithall seeke the true remedie, such things are so troubled among men, and that such as ought to put to their hande to the amendment of them, forswow their duetie. Then let vs learne to resort vnto God, and to trust in him: and let vs not doubt, but that in the end he will pitie vs, although we bee fayne too suffer many wrongs and reproches for a time. And like as Iob had shewed heretofore the outrages and extortions that were done: so also did hee say that God was not seene to punishe those that had so tormented the poore. And hee addeth a similitude that may bee vnderstande two wayes, by reason that the sentence is verie short and broken off. The similitude is this: The earth soketh in, and the beate drinketh vp the waters of snovve, to the graue be sinneth: for so it standeth worde for worde. And men take it as though it were sayde, that the graue swalloweth vp all wicked men, as the drie earth drinketh vp the snovve water, and as the snovve melteth away at the heat of the Sunne. Heereby Iob ment not to say, that God punisheth men apparantly according too their deserts: but that they die as other men, & that there is no suche execution done vpon their persons, whereby men may perceyue Gods iustice, but rather that they go the common trace, and God permitteth them to die of their naturall death. Therefore when we see not God punish the wicked, and those that haue done so many mischeefes and cruelties: he seemeth to be as it were asleepe in heauen, and the weakke and ignorant are offended at it, as though he had no regard of the world, or as though he were not dispozed to gouerne vs, nor too maiintaine the good, and to suppress those that are so vnruely. But (as I haue shewed alreedy) Iobs intent is to shew vs, that in such caces it behoueth vs to reuerence Gods secrete iudgements, assuring our selues that although we cōceiue not the reason of his workes, yet we must not therefore blaspHEME him, nor be swallowed vp with sorow, but quietly wayte till God shew himselfe in conuenient time. It is not for vs to set him a day, it behoueth vs to tarie his leysure, assuring our selues that he executeth not his iudgements [in all poyntes] in this life, to the intent that wee shoulde learne to reach out our fayth and hope further than this worlde. But the sense will agree verie well also, when this similitude is applied to another ende, as thus. Like as the earth soketh in, and the beate drinketh vp the snovv water: so the vvicked men sinne euen to their graue. As if Iob had sayde. They be so nuzzled in dooing euill, that their whole nature is gyuen too it, according also as it is commonly sayde, that when men are throughly nuzzled eyther in good or euil, the custome that they haue taken vp, maketh it to become as it were naturall vnto them. For it beareth such a sway with them, as they follow it without any paine. Iob then ment to declare heere, that such as he speaketh of, sinne not at a start, or by fittes: as it is to bee seene that some man ouershooteth himselfe by reason of some sodein occasion that prouoketh him, and although he haue liued honestly before tymes and without blame, yet is hee caryed at that time as it were with a tempest. Thus wee see then that some men commit some euill or outrage, but they continue not in it. Iob declareth that he speaketh not here of such as haue done amisse at a sodaine pang or brayd, as overcome by some forcible temptation; but of such as are hardned in their naughtinesse, and haue made it as it were a peece of their nature. Therefore like as the nature of the Sunne is to melt snovv and afterward the drie earth sucketh it in: euen so the wicked continue their euill dooing euen too the graue, that is to say, vnto their death. Sith we see such examples, yea and are warned by this sentence, to thinke vpon the thing that is too too ordinarie in the worlde: let vs learne to resort vnto God, and praye him too giue vs the grace too bowe vnder his hand, and too bee so giuen to serue and honour him, as the same may bee as it were naturall too vs. True it is, that the good shall alwayes haue some stryuing in themselves, for they neuer walke so vprightly, but there is some incomberance and gainstryuing, according as there is a continuall battayle betweene the minde and the fleshe. Neuerthelessse, the vertue that God hath put into vs must so farrefoorth preuayle, as too make vs loue the good with a free hart, and to cleaue throughly therevntoo. Then must wee pray vnto God too strengthen vs therein: and on the other side wee muste beseeche him also, not too suffer the Deuill too get suche possession in vs, as too trayne vs hither and thither, and too harden vs so sore in euill dooing, as it might become as it were oure nature. Furthermore, when we see men so stubburne in wickednesse, let vs not thinke it straunge: for it hath euer beene so, as wee see here by example. Nowe in the ende Job sayth, that the quiet man will forget suche folke, that the woormes shall take sweetenesse of them, and that they shall no more bee remembered. Heereby he sheweth well, that the wicked shall not reigne for euer, but must haue an ende. Neuerthelessse, God letteth them alone in peace vntill their death, and their state seemeth to be no worse than other mens, that haue liued in all equitie and vprightnesse, without doing wrong to any of their neighbours. Then if a man compare these pollers and theeues that haue eaten vpon other mens goodes, and delt merueylous cruelly, I say if a man compare them with such as haue liued in simplicitie: he shall finde their states alike, and that things are so shuffled together, as it cannot be sayde, but that they are out of order in this worlde: yea truely if wee looke no further, that is to witte, if wee consider not that God reserueth the punishing of the wicked till the life too come, to the intent wee should not nettle heere bylowe, but alwayes haue an eye too the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, who must redresse all things that are nowe out of order. And nowe when we beholde the shortnesse of our life, and see such as were giuen to the spoyling of poore folk, go to their graue, and become wormes meat, as it is sayde heere: let vs vnderstande, that we be verie miserable, if wee labour not for the immortalitie that is promised vs. And heere Job setteth vs downe as it were a liuely picture and Image of mans life and death, to the ende wee might knowe what we bee, if we haue no better hope than can be seene with the eye. To what purpose then is it too haue liued holily, and to haue endeuered to serue God, and to please him, and to haue lyued among our neighbours without deceyuing or hurting of any man? For yet notwithstanding, we must bee gathered into the graue with the wicked, all must bee shuffled together there, and there must we rot. Lo what men are, when they bee considered but in their owne kinde. But what a wretchednesse were it, if we had not a better hope? So then considering the alterations that are in the world, let vs be warned and prouoked to lift vp our heades, and to looke for the heauenly life that is promised vs. And although we be as wretched carions, subiect to rottennesse: yet let vs liue in hope that our Lorde will send vs the partie by whom hee hath once redeemed vs, who wil not suffer the deare and inestimable price that he hath giuen for our saluation, to perish or to be disappointed. Lo wherein we ought to reioyce, and also wherein our glorie consisteth. Job proceedeth to declare how the wicked are fully bent and giuen ouer vnto euill, without any awe or feare of God, yea and without any shame too the worldward. He setteth down but one kinde only: namely, that they beguile and oppresse the barreine women that haue borne no children, and do no good to the widowes. But doubtlesse vnder this one kinde, Job ment to comprehend all poore folke, that are not able to reuenge themselves, nor haue any maintenance or ayde at mans hand. His saying then is, that the wicked fall in hande with such kinde of folke, bicause they seeme to be a fit praye readie prepared for them. And he speaketh expressly of barreine women. For if a woman haue children, although she be a widow, yet if hir children do their dutie, she hath some succour, and she hath (as they say) a staffe for hir olde age to leane vnto. But if a woman be husbandlesse, and childlesse too, then is she viterly succourlesse. These therefore are the prayes that wicked men hunt after, bicause they thinke there is no bodie to withstande them, and that they may do what they list, without regarde of God, who nameth himselfe the defender of the widowes. In likewise deale they with fatherlesse children and straungers, as hath bin sayd heretofore. But as now Job contenteth himself with the giuing of one example, as if hee shoulde say, that such men as are not withhild by the feare of God, think themselves to haue libertie to do euill, when they see there is no man that can let them. Therefore when they haue raked other mens goods to them, and none hath withstood them: then bestirre they themselves so much the more, and take leaue to do what they list. VVhy so? For they haue no regard of God. And secondly he addeth, that they draw the strong after them. That is to say, when they haue long time exercised the sayde trade of eating vpon, and of mistreating the poore, and such as haue no meanes to defend themselves: they gather a greater boldnesse, & afterward set vpon the rich also, whereby they make themselves so feared and doubted of all men, that men are faine to raunsome themselves out of their handes, as if they were among Outlawes, insomuch that euery man is afraid of his life, yea and is faine to compound with them, and yet speed neuer the better whē they haue done. And why? For after they are once become traytors & vnfaithfull, they become also like wilde beastes. After they haue deuoured and ficed the poore, so as men may see there is no more humanitie in them: yet must men be faine to giue thē some ransome, and be neuer the more in suretie when they haue done. For they lie in wayt for the life of such as haue giuen them, and they thinke that when a man hath presented them with any bribe, they ought too receyue it euer after as a rent. Now then we see in effect howe Jobs meening is, that after the wicked haue mistreated the poore that cannot helpe themselves, nor haue any rescue at mans hande: therevpon they become more hardie, and play the wood beastes, so as they spare no man, but set vpon the riche and strong, and vpon such as are in credite and authoritie, whereby their extortion groweth so extreeme, as there is nothing with thē but robbing with beastly outrage, so as (to be short) there is neither manhood nor shame left in them. And this is tolde vs to the ende that we should not be troubled when we see such examples, (as hath bene sayde afore:) but rather that being forewarned against such stumbling blocks, wee might vnderstande that our Lorde suffereth things to be so intangled, too the ende we shoulde go on to the inheritance wherevnto he calleth vs, and not nettle ourselues heere, as though we had a sure resting place heere, but rather learne too bee as Pilgrymes and wayfarers in this worlde, that forasmuche as there is no settling for vs in this lyfe, (according as Sainct Paule sayth sayth that the state of the Christians is too bee remooued too and fro) wee may haue skill to profite our selues by these things. For except God doo as it were plucke vs out of this worlde by maine force: we will neuer giue our selues too seeke the heauenly lyfe. And this is the cause why hee suffereth so many alterations and remoouings of things too and fro, so as all things go too confusion, and there is so great disorder, as wee bee amazed at it, and the heares of our heade stande vpright. All this must serue too drawe vs out of the worlde, too the intent we bee not too much wedded too it. Thus then ye see wherevnto wee ought too applie all these things. Againe, whereas they that haue no defence, indure many wrongs: let them bee sure that God leaueth them destitute of worldly helpe, too the ende they shoulde looke the more vntoo him. For wee must not impute it to misfortune, when no man succoreth vs at our need. Then let vs assure our selues, that God hath bereft vs of all mans helpe, to the intent we shoulde be humbled in our selues, looke vp vntoo him, seeke him, and flee onely vntoo him for refuge. Lo howe wee haue to practise this doctrine. And furthermore let vs vnderstand therewithall, that our Lorde mindeth to exercise our charitie, when the wicked sort worke any wrong or outrage too such as haue no succour among men. I say it is too the ende, that euery of vs should endeuer himselfe, to helpe such folke according too his abilitie. For beholde, the thing wherein God tryeth whether we feare him or no, is by trying whether we haue any charitie in vs. If wee see any of our owne freendes or kinsfolke, in necessitie and trouble, verie nature moueth vs to helpe them. But when we see a poore man abused, that hath no man too beare him vp: if wee indeuer not too ayde and succour him in his neede, the same shall vndoubtedly be inrolled before God: for it is a token that wee had not one drop of Christianitie in vs. And why? For (as I haue declared already) our Lorde recommendeth vnto vs suche as are destitute of mans helpe, and suffereth them to be afflicted openly before oure eyes, too the intent that wee shoulde streyne our selues to succour them. And if wee doo it not, wo bee to vs, bicause there will be no excuse for vs. For when any are so oppressed, wee must thinke that the same commeth not by mischance: but rather that God sendeth them too vs. Therefore whensoever God maketh vs witnesses of any wrong that is done too a poore man, if we steppe not before him, and helpe to sheelde him as much as in vs lieth: surely God noteth and marketh our dooing. For hee watcheth in that behalfe, bycause (as I haue sayde) hee myndeth too take a tryall of our louingnesse. But nowe let vs come too the seconde poynt that is declared here by Iob. It is sayde, that the wicked (of whom hee speaketh) drawe the strong ones after them, as a rage of water rooteth vp trees, and beareth downe houses. So then, such as haue of long time beene hardened in euill doing, are like great stormes and tempestes that rende vp all things, yea euen the trees and houses. This appeareth to the eye: and would God wee had not so muche experience of it. For suche as are sharpe set, and woulde faine be catching, dare not at the first dashe set vpon the stronger sort, and vpon suche as haue talons, and pawes too reuenge themselves withall: but they beginne with the little ones. But giue them once scope to doo euill: and then haue at the strongest. Howebeit, this happeneth not without the woonderfull ordinance of God. For it is a iust wages to the rich men, and to such as are in authoritie and credite, to bee so vexed by the wicked. VVherfore? For if a man rush out into lewdnesse, so as he striketh one, strippeth another, and commit any other outrage: well, they that are at ease, and haue wherewith too maintaine themselves, do but laugh at it. True it is that they mislike such men: but for all their misliking of them, doo they seeke anie meanes to redresse it? No. And why? Bicause the matter seemeth not to touch themselves. O (say they) if he playde so with me, I woulde make him feele that I haue teeth. Lo howe they talke which haue credite and welth, and are so well fenced as they cannot be touched themselves. But in the meane while the poore are extremely misused. VVhen these Roysters that are suffered to do what they list, see they scape vnpunished: they fall too buckling with the greater Cobbes. And who giuerh them leaue? Suppose we that God doth not order euerywhit of it? For if there were any manhood in vs, woulde it not pitie and rue our hartes to see poore folke so troden vnder foote, and make vs resist it too the vttermoste of our power? But wee do nothing at all. VVhen a poore man is outragiously molested, we make none account of repressing the mischeef, but rather let it looce, giuing the wicked more occasion of such misbehaviour. Mult not God therefore touch vs within a while after, and both suffer and appoynt the mischeefe to returne vpon oure owne heades? Lo heere a sentence that is well woorthie to bee noted. For therein as in a myrrour the holy Ghost sheweth vs, that wickednesse increaseth more and more, and groweth to full heigth, when men giue it scope, and indeuer not to redresse it in conuenient time. And this lesson is directed specially to riche men, and to such as are in authoritie. True it is that we see no suche examples heere, as are to bee scene in Courtes of great Princes. For there, if there be three or foure Minions in great credite, they will make the whole realme to quake, infomuch that euen they which haue twentie or thirtie thousande poundes rent, muste bee faine too passe their pawes, and couche before them like Lyamhoundes, and giue them a good peece of their substance too purchase their fauour, and to raunsome themselves withall. VVe see no such examples here. Howebeit, quantitie for quantitie, a man may throughout all places see that whiche is declared heere. And good reason it is that Gods prouidence should extende through all the world, both vpon great and small. So then it is apparant, that suche as haue libertie to pill and poll, and to doo many other annoyances too the little ones, must also in the ende make the great ones as frayde. And as touching those that haue the meane and abilitie too ayde and maintayne poore men: God meeneth to doo them too vnderstand, that if they set not themselves agaynst those that doo them wrong & iniurie, they themselves also must loke to be pinched, that is to say, they themselves shall at length answer it in their owne persons, and other men shall fleece them, and picke oute their eyes as they are woorthie, and so shall God be glorified in sending such punishment vpon them. True it is, that the disorder increaseth dayly more and more. Neuerthelesse the faythfull may therein beholde Gods secrete iudgements, yea euen beyonde the reach of mans reason, bicause God inlightneth them by his worde. And here ye see how we ought to acknowledge, that we our selues are the cause of all the disorder in the worlde. VVe can skill to complaine when things go not after our appetite: wee can crie out alas, and wo is me, yea and wee will bee readie too blame God himselfe, but in the meane while wee consider not, that the fault proceedeth of our selues, and that we our selues ought to beare the blame of such euill. For if euery man would put to his hand to the suppressing of vices & misdealings, and euery man labour to stop the doing of any euill:

euill: Surely God woulde bleſſe ſuch meenings, and we ſhou'd haue delightfull order among vs, and cauſe to reioyce. But what? In ſteade of ſeeking to remedie things amiſſe, all men bring wood too the kindling of the fyre, or rather become fyrebrondes themſelues. Beholde the maner of our dealing. So then ought wee too thinke it ſtraunge, if things bee ſo intermedled, as there is neyther brinke nor brimme, but all is ſhuffled together lyke a hotchpotch? For (as I haue ſayde) when the fire is once kindled, wee neuer leaue throwing of woodde into it. VWherefore let the riche, and ſuche as are in authoritie haue regarde of the poore, and when they ſee any outrages and wrong done, or the poore oppreſſed: let them reach them their hande, and indeuer too ſuccour them. Now if this pertaine to riche men, and to ſuche as are able to helpe the poore: howe much more pertheyneth it too thoſe that haue the ſworde of iuſtice in their hand? If theſe be negligent, they be well worthie that all the euill which they winked at, ſhoule light vpon their owne heades, and that God ſhoule ſet them as vpon a ſcafolde for men to beholde his juſt vengeance in their perſons. And therefore ſo muche the more ought they too marke what is ſayde heere. And thus ye ſee to what end we ought to referre the doſtrine that is conteyned in this verſe. Therewithall we ought to marke well the wordes that Iob ſaith. For it is not without cauſe that he ſaith, that men ſhall be faine to buie out, and to raunſome out themſelues from the handes of the wicked when they haue their ſcope: and that when they ſhall haue giuen them ſuch boldneſſe alreadie, as to eate vp ſome, and too pill and poll other ſome: their crouching to them, & their greazing of them in the hands, ſhall boote them nothing at all. For they be mad dogges, whom nothing can content. Therefore all that euer a man doth to them is but a ſharpening of their appetite, and ſuch bribes do but harden them, and harden them the more. For they take it as a due rent, and when a man hath giuen them one preſent, they would haue him hold on ſtill, and neuer leaue, ſuch is their vnſaciableneſſe. It followeth, that the poore folke diſtruſt their owne life. Yea and I ſay, that euen thoſe that were rich & in credit before, muſt be faine to tremble. As how? I ſee (ſhall they ſay) that theſe wicked men haue the worlde at will, and it will not bee long ere they will ſeech me ſuch a broath, as I wote not how I ſhall be able to ſhift it from me: and therefore I muſt be faine to ſawne vpon them afore hande, and they muſt gaine ſomewhat by me, or at leaſtwiſe I muſt not prouoke them too diſpleaſure. See how they that were erewhile out of daunger, are faine to quake, and diſtruſt their owne life for giuing bridle to the wicked, ſo as they wot not where they be, till they haue pacified the wicked, and yet they finde no meanes how to do it. Therefore they muſt be fayne to liue in continuall perplexitie and anguiſh. Herein we haue a fayre looking glaſſe, to ſhew vs what it is, not too remedie euill doings in due time and place, and to ſuffer ſhrewde weedes to growe ſo long till they get the vpper hande. For a man cannot pluck them vp when he would, bycauſe he tooke them not in due ſeaſon. VWe ſee what an inconuenience inſueth: yea and euen God maketh the hartes of thoſe to faint, that might eaſily haue remedied the miſcheef at the firſt, inſomuch that they fare as if their armes were broken, and they haue neither corage nor ſtoutneſſe in them, but become as weak as water. And why? As I ſaid, it is a juſt puniſhment for the negligence that they vſed in forſlowing their duetic too repreſſe the miſcheefe at the firſt riſing. For when men ſee poore folk harried and miſuſed by crueltye and outrage, and yet redreſſe it not: the miſcheef muſt needes growe ſo ſtrong, that ſuch as now faine would, and heretofore ſo could haue diſeated it, cannot afterwarde preuaile, bicauſe our Lorde graunteth them not that honour nor that grace. Now then let vs bethinke vs, I ſay, let vs bethinke vs well of it. And further, let vs conſider what a wretchedneſſe it is, when men reſt not themſelues vpon God, nor haue regarde to diſcharge their cares vnto him, whereby they might leane vnto his protection. And why? For the thing that Iob deſcribeth to vs here, (namely that men put not their truſt in God) is an ordinarie matter in the worlde. If we ſee the wicked haue their full ſcope, what do we? O, we muſt deuſe how to creepe into fauor with them: and in the meane while we conſider not that it is a feeding of the euill: that is to wit, that we make them much bolder than they would be. It is all one as if there were a mad man, that deſyred nothing but to kill men, & one ſhoule put a ſworde in his hand, and another bring him ſtore of ſtones, and ſome other giue him wherewith too poyſon folkes beſide. As much do they that ſawne vpon wicked men, when they ſee them in credite. One commes and preſents them with a bribe to ſet iuſtice to ſale: and another commes to wind himſelf into their acquaintance by ſome fine deuice: and all this is but an inflaming of them more and more, and a ſharpening of their rage to make it the eagerer. For whereas ſome miſdoubt hild them back before: now they conclude that all which they liſt is lawfull, and that they neede no more to be afraid, bicauſe all the worlde ſtandes in awe of them. O (ſay they) ſuche a man is come to my lure at length, and the reſidue ſhall be faine to come vnder mine arme to: I will make them play me an apiſh trick. See howe the wicked become the bolder: when men come to ſawne vpon them after that faſhion: and yet too the worldewarde men deale alwayes after that ſort. For when we haue not a reſpect vntoo God, wee muſt needes bee euermore in feare and perplexitie, and ſay, I had neede too beware of ſuch a man, for I ſee I muſt bee fayne too paſſe through his handes, and howe ſhall I doo then? If I come to him with reaſon and plaine proofes, it is in vaine, for he hath his eares too full of them alreadie. Therefore I muſt go another way to worke, which is, to fill his wooluiſh throte with ſome preſent, I muſt carie him ſomewhat. Or elſe if I ſee him full of vaine glorie, and deſirous to be aduanced how ſoeuer it be, ſo as hee ſtandeth vpon his reputation, and gazeth at his owne Peacockes feathers: I winne the gole, if I can ſkill too couche lowe like a Spaniell: I ſee none other remedie, I muſt go that way too worke. See (I ſay) the ordinarie manner. But what is too be done on the contrarie part? VWhen wee ſee the wicked ſo full of couetouſneſſe and vaine glorie, and ſo like wilde beaſtes in deſtroying all things, let vs ſaye vntoo God, yet dooſt thou Lorde holde the reynes of mennes brydle, thou canſt reſtreine them. For if God worke not ſo ſoone as wee would haue him: let vs vnderſtande, that it is his minde too buffet vs for a time. But yet let vs aſſure oure ſelues, that hee watcheth for oure welfare, and will not ſuffer vs to be vtterly caſt vp too the pleaſure of ſuch as ouerſhoote themſelues after that ſort. For oure Lorde hath vs in hyſ hande, hee is neere at hande with vs, and althoughe wee perceyue it not immediately, yet dooth hee garde vs, mainteyne vs, and is our warrant. So then we may boldly deſpyſe the wicked and all their ſtoutneſſe, for ſomuch that wee knowe that God watcheth for oure welfare, and will preferue vs from their handes, pawes, and throtes. Lo wherunto it behoueth vs to come, when in reſpect of men we know none other ſhift but to yeeld our ſelues too the euill, and to conſent vnto it. It behoueth vs to behold the protection of

God,

God, which as nowe is hidden from vs, in respect of our perceyuing, howbeit that we haue so good and certaine recorde of it in the holy scripture, as we ought not too doubt of it. Howsoeuer the worlde go, let vs keepe our selues from purchasing so by vnlawfull meanes. For in so doing we bewray our owne distrust and vnbeleefe. And besides that, we bee guiltie also of the euill, so farreforth as is in vs, bicause wee feede it. Therefore when a man falles too flattering of the wicked, and helpeth too set them in a further lustinesse, and redeemeth himselfe out of their handes by raunsome: what dooth he? First (as I sayde) hee bewrayeth that he hath no trust in God. For if we could rest vpon Gods promises, surely we would neuer seeke crooked wayes, but wee would alwayes bethinke vs, whether God permitted that thing or no. Hath hee forbidden mee it, would wee say? Then must I not wade any further in it. And so it is certaine that all suche as labour to winne wicked mens fauour, by briberie and such lyke dealings: are verie infidelies, and bewray themselves well ynough to be so, and muste in the ende bee payde home for not honouring God as they ought to doo, and for allying themselves with the wicked, by nourishing them in their naughtinesse. For it is all one as if they had conspired with them too breake and ouerthrowe all order: and surely they haue done as muche as lay in them, to doo it. Therefore (as I haue sayde already) let vs learne to looke vnto God, and too trust in him: and then shall we no more bee subiect too the wretchednesse whereof Iob maketh mention heere, which is, not to knowe what our life is. For such as defende the wicked after that fashio, and rest not vpon Gods prouidence, must alwayes tremble and neuer bee sure of any safetie or rest. Yea and it behoueth vs too marke well howe Iob addeth, that when we be desirous to purchace wicked mens fauour by presentes, or any other vnconuenient meane, they lie so much the more in wayte for vs. Is it not seene that they bee saythlesse folke? And sith there is no feare of God in them, I pray you howe can they bee saythfull vnto men? Naye rather howe is it possible that God shoulde not suffer them too vse treason and all mischeuousnesse, seeing there is no man but hee is warned of them before hande? Then if a man cast himselfe so intoo their nettes willfully, there is no excuse for him. All this is apparant to the eye: men see that the wicked make their conspiracies togither, and yet notwithstanding, that none of them trusteth other. And howe is that possible? For if two wicked men enter intoo league: a man would thinke they bee ioyned togither like two fingers of one hande, so that looke what the one willeth, the same willeth the other. But for all that, is that a prooffe that eche of them trusteth other? No: It is certaine that eyther of them could find in his heart that the other were hanged, so as hee himselfe had no harme by it. At leastwise hee could finde in his heart, that hee were a hundred foote within the grounde: and in the ende all those that fauoured them become their enemies. VVe see hereby that God gouerneth euen in the middes of all disorder. Then if we be abashed at the confuzion and mangling of things: let vs lift vp our eyes aloft, and we shall see that God gouerneth all things. For surely hee suffereth not the wicked to trust one another, but inforceth them to stande alwayes in feare. Yea and euen they that vphilde them in their naughtinesse by footing of them, and were full of hypocritie, to the intent too fawne vpon them and please them: I say euen they also shall alwayes quake for feare. Contrariwise, if we can put our trust in God: surely although wee suffer many extortions at wicked menns handes, and our Lorde permit them to vex and trouble vs: yet shall wee bee put too no more than is expedient for vs to indure, and oure God will haue consideration too bring all things to a happie and profitabie ende. This (say I) is the remedie wherevnto wee must bee prouoked too resort, when wee see things oute of order in the worlde. Nowe when Iob hath spoken so, hee addeth, that they bee lifted vp for a little while, and afterwarde fall downe, they bee cut off as the toppe of an eare of corne, and they beset vp with others. He sheweth breecfly that which hee had sayde already: whiche is, that if wee looke no further than too the present life, wee shall see an orderlesse masse, so as wee shall not discern one thing from another. For the wicked haue a large scope for a time: yee shall see them vpon the toppe of the wheele (as they say) and by and by they come tumbling down. But good men may also bee well aduanced, and yet in the ende fayle of theyr footing. VVhat for that? wee see that by experience, according as Iob concludeth, saying: If it bee not so, who will make mee a lyer? Then considering suche experience, let vs learne too retyre vntoo God.

For if wee looke but vpon the present things, doubtlesse wee shall not onely bee as a wauering Reede, but as a strawe, and as emptie chaffe that is cast and tossed to and fro with the winds, so as there shall bee no steadfastnesse in vs. Therefore wee must haue the discretion too looke vpon the things that are disordered in this worlde, howebeit in such wise, as Gods prouidence bee alwayes printed in our mindes. True it is that wee cannot reach vntoo it by our owne witte: but yet must wee looke towards it with the eye of sayth, so as Gods worde may be as a looking glasse, and the holy scripture serue as a light to looke further than the worlde. And although Gods iudgements bee hidden from vs as now: let vs not therefore cease to say, that the Lorde is rightuous, and to humble our selues vnder him, and alwayes to haue such an eie to his promises, as wee fayle not to call vpon him in the middes of our distresse, assuring our selues that hee will succour vs, and make vs feele his goodnesse, so as we may reioyce in the middes of al the temptations of this worlde.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to blot out the remembrance of them, and too bring vs backe to himselfe in such wise, as wee may no more bee tangled in these earthly things, but cleaue wholly too his rightuousnesse, that while wee liue in this worlde, wee may but passe forward as straungers, till we become too his rest, which shall continue with vs after wee haue passed through the troubles and temptations of thys mortall life. And so let vs all say, Almightye God heauenly father, &c.

The .xciiij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the .xxv. Chapter.

Then Bildad the Suite answered and sayde:

2. Soueraintie and terrour is vvith him that maketh peace in his high places.
3. Is there any number of his armies? and vpon vvhome dooth not his light shine?

Ff. iij.

4. VVhat

4. VVhat rightuoufnesse shall be attributed vnto man, if he be compared vvith God? to him that is nothing? and how may he be cleane that is borne of a vvoman?
5. Beholde he vvill not giue light vnto the Moone: the Starres are not cleane in his sight.
6. And howe much lesse man of vvinde, vvho is but rottennesse, [or] the sonne of man vvhich is but a vvorme?

Orasmuch as we bee so greatly giuen too stande in our owne conceyte, the gronde of which follie is, that wee thinke not vpon God, nor what his Maiestie is: we haue heere a verie good and profitable counsell, that as oft as wee bee tempted too take any glorie too our selues, wee muste cast our eie vpon God, and consider throughly who hee is, what his power and might are, what his rightuoufnesse is, and what all his glorie is: and then will all our brauerie bee soone layde a water. For in steede of beeing puffed vp with pride, and sotted with ouerweening, the onely regarde of God is ynough too quayle vs in such sort, as wee shall bee ashamed in our selues. Yee see then for what cause the holy Ghost dooth nowe in the persone of Bildad giue vs this warning, that God ought of right too haue the cheefe soueraintie, and wee too bee afrayde when we do but thinke vpon him, considering the order that hee hath set in heauen, and in all the worlde: and that wee ought to knowe our selues too bee so farre off from hauing any thing that may bee of vaue before him, as that the Starres whiche shine bright vntoo vs, are darke vntoo him. Seeing the case standeth so, what remaineth for men too doo? For notwithstanding all their brauerie, they bee but woormes and rottennesse. And if they woulde glorifie themselves aboute the Starres, what were it? VVere not their follie ouer great? So then wee see that the end wherevntoo the things tende that are conteyned heere, is that forsomuche as men cannot humble themselves so long as they looke downward: heere God is set before their eyes with his Maiestie, too the ende they shoulde knowe there is no cause for them too set any store by themselves. For whosoeuer exalteth himselfe before God, must needes bee brought lowe. And Bildad too make vs perceyue howe greatly wee ought too feare and reuerence God, alledgeth heere, that hee maketh peace in his high places, that is too say, disposeth the order of heauen in suche wise, as men see there is a peasable and well ruled government. This may bee referred too the Angelles, according as wee say in our prayer, Thy will bee done in earth as it is in heauen. VVhich doth vs too witte, that God is yll obeyed here beneath, by reason of the rebelliousnesse which is in men, bicause we be fully fraughted with many wicked lustes, which cannot submit themselves to his rightuoufnesse. And so we desire, that as the Angelles are wholly conformable to Gods will and seeke nothing but to please him in all respects: so it may please him to reforme vs, and to make his reign and dominion peasable heere beneath, by correcting the vnruely affections that are in vs. Therefore a man might referre this sentence to the said parcell of the prayer that is spoken of the Angels. Howbeit there is no doubt, but Bildad looked further: that is to wit, to all the whole governance that we perceyue in the order of heauen. So then although the Sunne be as it were an infinite bodie to our sight, and moue so swiftly as it might seme that he should confound all things: yet could not any man rule a clocke in like compasse, that is to say, he could not make it to kepe his course so iust. No it is not possible. VVe see the like in the Moone, and in all the Starres. For although the number of them be infinit: yet is there no disorder, but all things are as well disposed as can be. VVherefore not without cause doth Bildad alledge here, that God maketh peace in his high places: And it is not onely in his heauenly creatures, that we see his reigning: but also he disposeth the whole order of the worlde in such wise from above, that although things be disordered and moueable here, and that there be many chaunges and troubles: yet notwithstanding God sayleth not too lead them all too such ende as he hath ordeined and appoynted in himself. True it is that if we looke downward, we cannot see this government so peasable as it is set forth here. But if we loke vp to Gods prouidence, it is certain, that euen in the middes of al the turmoyles and alterations of the world, we shal perceyue that god gouerneth al as seemeth good to himselfe. Now we see what is imported in this saying, that God maketh peace in his high places: that is to say, hee brideleth his creatures in such wise, that for al the chaungings which men see yet sayleth he not too gouerne still, and all things fall out as he will haue them, according as he guideth them by his ordinance. Seeing the case standeth so, let vs conclude, that it is good reason that all power, soueraintie, and feare, should be yelded vnto him: that is to say, that we shoulde honour, feare, and worship him, as the partie that hath dominion ouer vs, and with al reuerence acknowledge him to be the mayster and souerain Lord of heauen and earth. At the first blush this talk might seeme superfluous. But when we haue well considered what hath bene touched before: we shall wel see it is not without cause that Bildad reporteth heere the government & dominion that god hath ouer all the world. For that saying runneth roundly out of our mouth, and we can talke of God wel ynough. But in the mean while we cōceyue not his Maiestie, we make as it were an ydoll of that. True it is that we will not be acknowne of it, no, we would euen abhorre to do it: but yet do we not yelde God the power that is due to him, and which we ought too conceiue in him. For we talke of his maiestie, and his name runs roundly in our mouth, as in way of contempt, and oftentimes wee talke of him in way of scorne, and mockage. It is too be seene that men are out of measure heathenish, and that wheras al knees ought to bow, and al creatures too tremble when mention is made of the name of God: we be so bolde as to yeeld no reuerence nor lowliness at all. To be short, men acknowledge not the Maiestie of God, neither conceiue they his power to humble and submit themselves vnto him, as they ought too doo. Therefore whē there is any speaking of God, he had need to be qualified vnto vs: that is to say, to be vttered in such wise as we may conceyue him. And that is the cause why the holy Scripture doth so oftentimes adde tytles to him, and is not contented with his single name, but termeth him the Almighty, the Alwise, the Alrighteous, the only immortal in himselfe, the maker of all things, and the gouernor of all things. To what purpose is this sayde, but too waken men, which are ouerflugguish, and honour not God as he is worthie? To be short, looke how often the scripture giueth God any names of honor, it is an vpbrayding of vs with our vnthankfulnesse and dulnesse, in that wee yeeld him not his due, but as much as we can) do rob him of his power and glory, or at leastwise take him not to be as he is, to honor him, & to hūble ourselues before him, and to exalt and magnify him as he deserueth. And therefore when it is said that God maketh peace in his high places, and gouerneth the world in suche wise, as men see that all things must stoupe vnto him, and that notwithstanding the rebelliousnesse and stubbornnesse which is in men, yet he ceaseth not to perourme the execution of his ordinaunce: Let vs learne not to sit any longer asleepe, nor to dallie with God as we haue bin wont to do: but to treble before his maiestie. And aboue al things let vs remember the cōclusion that is made heere, namely that hee hath the soueraine dominion and awe ouer vs: that is to say, that wee must not only bee subiect to him, but also tremble with all feare, and so stande in awe of him, as wee bee not so foolehardie (or rather mad) as too striue against him, or to dispute against his doings, or to murmur as though there were any fault to be found in his works. Thus then ye see how all mens mouthes are stopped heere, to the end that being bereft of their foolish presumption, they may learne to tremble at the presence of God, and to know how it is he to whome they must yield all obedience. And that is the cause why Beldad addeth, Is there any number of his armies? and vpon whom doth not his light shine? VVhen it is saide that his armies are without number: it is to shew that men are woofe than mad when they match themselues after that sorte against God and bid him battell. True it is, that they will not do it expressly. But yet is it impossible to murmur against God, and to repine at his iudgements, or too bee displeas'd with any thing that hee dothe, but wee must make warre against him. And why? For wherein consisteth the soueraintie and dominion which he hath ouer vs: In our acknowledging, not only of his power: but also of his infinite goodnesse, wisdom, righteousnesse, mercie, and iustice. VVhen wee haue that once: then do we glorify him. VVell then, if men thinke Gods doings vnreasonable, if they blame him of crueltie, if they chafe against him through impacience, or if they be offended at any thing that he doth: out of all doubt they go about to bereeue him of his diuine glory, and that cannot bee done without making of war against him. And so whensoever wee glorify not God in his infinite righteousnesse, goodnesse, power, and wisdom: it is as much as if we made some defiance to him, to rise vp against him. But what is it that mortall man taketh in hand? It is said heere, that Gods hosts are without number. Behold, all the Angels of heauen are warned to defend the honoure of him that formed and created them. Likewise al his creatures are fully disposed to auenge his maiestie, which is so assayed by vs that are but woormes and rottennesse. Therefore let vs marke well to what purpose mention is made heere of Gods hosts or armies. It is to the ende we shuld know, that as oft as men presume to murmur against god, and to blaspheme his iustice: they must haue as many deadly enemies as there bee Angels in Heauen, the number of whome we know to be infinite. Also it behoueth them to know, that all creatures are armed to runne vpon them. For to what end hath God created al things, but that his glory shoulde shine forth in them? Eu: if men submit themselues to God willingly, and yield him the honoure that belongeth vnto him: that which is spoken heere of his armies, or hosts, shall not serue too fray them, but rather to glad them. And surely when the scripture telleth vs that God hath the many thousandes of Angels about him, redy too do his commaundementes: what intendeth it else but too make vs vnderstand, that when God hath receiued vs to his fauoure, he is strong ynough to keepe vs safe, notwithstanding that we be assayed on all sides: Therefore when men vter all the force that they haue, praizing this and that to destroy vs, yea and when the diuell himselfe riseth vp against vs: wee must not be afraid. VVhy so? Bycause God hath his heavenly armies to defend vs, according as it is said that the Angels incamp themselues round about vs: and that hee hath appointed his Angels to guide vs, so as the faithfull perion shall not stumble. VVe see then that the infinite number of Angels serueth to comfort vs, to the end we might be sure that God will succoure vs at our neede, and that he hath wherewith to do it. But like as the faithfull that leane vnto God, and submit themselues to him with all humilitie, are preferred by the multitude of the Angels: euen so, all they that striue against him, all they that are proude, and all they that are sturdy, must be enforced to feare him, and too vnderstand that when they set themselues after that fashion against God, they haue too do with many enemies beside: in somuch that all the power that is in the Angels shall fall vpon them to ouerwhelme them, and all creatures shall serue to mainteine the glory of him by whose power they haue their being. And therefore let vs remember well this sentence where it is saide, that the armies of God are withoute number: and therevpon let vs assure ourselues, that it is to no purpose for men to conspire against vs: for when they shall haue assembled all their forces together, yet shall they not bee too strong for vs, but God shall alwayes get the vpper hand of them. VVherefore let vs not deceiue ourselues when we see ourselues well accompanied, and a great number of people gathered about vs. And why? For wee may all be confounded in one moment by the hand and power of God. Again, although he alone be ynough, either to saue vs or to destroy vs: yet moreover hee hath his armies redy furnished after an incomprehensible manner, which shall set vpon vs whensoever hee thinketh good. Therefore let vs stand in feare, and let vs learne (as I said) not to be proude when wee see the world hold on our side, and a great power to maynteine vs. For all that geere shall stand vs in no sted, considering the great power of God that is declared heere. And heereby a man may see, how sore the vnbeleefe of men is blinded. For it is put to our choiçe whither wee will haue the Angels of heauen, to watch about vs, and to gard vs, and too bee seruants of our welfare: or whether wee will haue them against vs, and to be our deadly enemies. Behold, God vseth such goodnesse and grāce towards vs, that hee appointeth his Angels too do vs seruice, as the scripture auoucheth: he will haue vs garded by them, and therewith all he affirmeth them to be powers, as who should say, he stretcheth out his hand ouer vs to the end hee might mainteine vs. Of whome then is it long that we be not guided by the Angels, and that they gard vs not from al harme? It is euen long of ourselues who cannot take the benefyte that is offered vs. VVe needed no more but to receiue it: and what do we? VVe are so farre off from receiuing the good turne that God offereth vs, that in derogation of his maiestie, we fall to prouoking of his Angels to arme themselues too oure ruine and confusion. Needes then must we be bereft of our right mind, and as it were bewitched of the denill, when we had leuer too haue the Angels to be our enemies, than the ministers of our welfare: for they be redy to help vs and to guide vs; so we be members of our Lord Iesus Christ, and yelde obedience vnto him as our head. And so, as oft as there is any speaking of God, let vs learne not too conceiue any dead thing of him, but to thinke in such wise of his glory, as it is set forth to vs heere: And forasmuch as we be very dol Let vs beare in mind that God hath his armies, and an infinite number of Angels redy too execute hys commandements, and that (ouer and besides that) al creatures obey him as good reason is they should. VVhereas it is consequently said that the light of God shyneth vpon al men: it is expounded that God doth so shedde foorth his benefytes vpon all, as men may perceiue some sparks of his goodnesse and wisdom throughought all thinges: howbeit that specially it is restreyned vnto men: for that is the point wherin the light of God appereth, according as it is said in the first chapter of saint Iohn, that God not only gaue his creatures their Being, at the firste beginning, but also quickened them too maintaine them in their state, euen by the power of his word: and as touching men, together with their life, he gaue them also a light. Ye see then that all creatures haue life in our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the euerlasting word of God: but we haue a more noble and exquisite life than haue eyther the beafts, or the trees, or the frutes of the earth. VVhy so? For we haue vnderstanding and reason. So then, the light of God shyneth vpon men. And seeing we bee so greatly beholden and bound vnto him: are wee not so much the more blameworthy, if we deface that light? Yes surely are we. For we must com backe to that which Saint Paule saith in the Acts, that if we went but groping like blind folke, yet should Gods glory bee perceiued. VVhy? He dwelleth in vs, wee nedde not too seeke farre for him, it is in him that we haue our life, mouing power and being. Thus yee see that the exposition of this sentence hath bin taken to be, that God hath so bound vs vnto him by making vs partakers of his light, as wee bee toto vnthankfull if we go about to deface his glory and yeld him not his due. And wherefore? For a man cannot so much as stirre himselfe, but he feeleth that God dwelleth in him. Of him we hold our life, and it is he whome we may thanke for making vs reasonable creatures rather than beafts. For why are wee of more value than Oxen and Asses, but bycause it hath pleased God too preferre vs before them? So then, the saide brightnesse wherewith God inlightnerh vs, is an occasion to vs too exalt his glory, and to submit ourselues vnder his hand. Thus you see one exposition that mē make of this text, which cōteineth a good doctrine. But whē al is throughly cōsidered, Bildads meaning is not, simply to shew that God hath spred out his light vpon vs, to the end to gyue vs vnderstanding and reason: but to shew that we cannot eschue his presence, but must be faine to walke as it wer before him, and that he seeth all thinges, and hath (as ye would say) his eye vpon vs. Ye see then that Gods spreading out of his light vpon vs, is as much to say, as that we cannot hide ourselues from his presence. And this is according to the matter that he hath talked of al this while. For like as he saith that God hath his Angels as howge hosts redy to do him seruice. so now he addeth, that do what we can, we cannot eschew Gods presence. True it is that wee leape about like Grasshoppers, and hope to play the horses that are broken looce: but yet in the end wee must be faine to yeld vnto God. And why? For his brightnesse doth so shine vpon vs, that we cannot eschue him as if we had to do with a mortall man. Therefore whensoever we be tempted to such oversight as to imagin that we may eschue Gods hand, let vs learne to conclude thus: Yea, and whither shall wee go? For wee know that his power is spred ouer all, bycause his sighte is endless. If wee were gone into the bottome of the earth, yet should not he cease to see vs and to marke our doings. Then let vs be no more so foolish as to lift vp ourselues against God, assuring ourselues that it is to no purpose for vs to tosse and turmoyle and to make many enterprises and conspiracies: for they shall not auayle vs, but he will still behold vs and marke vs. And this is as common a lesson as any in the holy scripture: but wee beare it ill away, or at leastwise we do ill put it in vre. For prooffe whereof, if wee remembered that God beholderh vs, and that he marketh all that euer we do or say: I pray you would we not walke in another manner of feare and warinesse than we do now? But tush: we feare none but men, we be safe ynough if wee haue no witnesses heere beneath. Thus yee see that the cause why men giue head to all their wicked lusts, is for that Gods spiritē beareth no sway with them, and for that they passe not too conuerue cursed thinges, and to purpose vpon them in theyr harts, prouided alwayes that nobody can accuse them. So are there very few that let Gods shining vpon them, before their eyes. For if they bare that shining in remembrance, surely it would be ynough to suppress all theyr wicked affections, and too ridde them of all the fancies wherwith they be passed vp. And truly if we be ashamed of men: how much more ought he to moue vs that is the iudge of all men? For if men iudge vs, it is not of theyr owne authoritie, nor in their owne name: they do but only perfourme the iudgement of God, to whome alone all iudgement pertaineth. But behold, God seeth vs, and yet for all that, we yeld him no reuerence: wee passe not of the prouoking of his wrath against vs. And howe may that be borne? So then, if we remember well this lesson, that God sheadeth out his light vpon all men: surely it will be a good bridle to make vs walke in all purenesse of conscience, not only for amending the faultes that wee commit outwardly towards men: but also for amending of all the euill and hipocrisie that is hidden within vs. Thus yee see in effect what wee haue too marke in thys streine. And after that Bildad hath said so, hee addeth: VVhat righteousnesse then shall be attributed to man in comparison of Gods word for word it is, with God. And how can be that is borne of woman cleere himselfe? This is as an authenticall summoning of vs, to shew vs that we be starke foolles to set store by ourselues, and to beare ourselues in hand that we haue any righteousnesse or vertue, or any thing else in vs that is worthy of praise. The theefe that is abrode in the woods stands not in awe of iustice, nor of any thing else. True it is that he alwayes carieth a fearefulness about him: according as it hath bin seene heerebefore that God ingraueh such a feeling of mens sinnes in their harts, as they must needes be their owne iudges and condēne themselues. But yet for all that, the theeves runne royo stil, so as they passe not to cut as many poore wayfarers throtes as they meeete with, if they can catch them at auantage. Yet notwithstanding, afterward, whē they be laid vp, and see their payment at hande: then all their hardnesse is laid awater, the rage is quite gone that made them so beastly before. Euen so is it with vs. For so long as we know not that we must yeld an account afore God, ne conceiue his infinite power and the soueraintie that hee hath in himselfe: there is suche ouerweening in vs, as we sticke not to magnify ourselues aboue the cloudes. And if a mā speake to vs of righteousnesse, we will easily find it in ourselues, for our vices are vertues to vs. Lo how men are befotted with such a loftinesse as they cannot know themselues, till God summon them before him, and draw them to it as it were by force. For if they knew themselues: there would bee no more self estimation with them. That is the cause why Bildad sayth expressly, can a mortall man iustify himselfe before God? This saying is of great weight: as if he had said, Goto, so long as men are among themselues, they they may haue good opinion of their owne vertues, and euery of them may saye, I am an honest man: yea and when they shall come too the putting of themselues in balance, they will esteeme much more of themselues thā of other men, saying, This man hath such a fault in hym, and that man hath such a vice. VVe can maruellously well skill to controll other men, and to abate them: but in the meane time we will not be aknowen of our owne infirmities, we couer them as much as in vs lieth. And if there be neuer so little a drop of verrue in vs, or at leastwise if there seeme to be any: (for all is but smoke as we shal say anon) we would haue God to set such store and estimation by vs, that he should vnclouth himselfe to cloth vs. Ye see then what the pride of men is, so long as they looke no further than among themselues. But when we come before God and know what we be, and enter into the examination of our owne life: then for feare of hys maiestie: which suffereth vs not to wrap vp ourselues in hipocrisie and vntruth: we forget all these foolish bragg, wherewith we were abused for a time. And so according to that which is declared here, whensoever we be tempted with pride, and imagin ourselues to haue any vertue in vs woorthy of estimatiō: let vs learne to cite ourselues before God, and let vs not tarrie till he draw vs too it, but let euery man do his duetie towards himselfe. For ye see how our Lord sheweth vs the manner of proceeding which we ought to hold vs to. Then if a man do at any time beare himselfe in hand, that he hath I wote not what to vaunt himselfe of: to correct that follie and state-30 lineesse, let him but only consider with himselfe, what he is: And to know what we be, let vs go vnto God. For a man neuer knoweth himselfe, so long as he looketh but vpon himselfe, or doth but compare himselfe with hys neighbours. But we do then learne to know ourselues, when we lift vp our eyes a high, and make accounte too come before the iudgement seate of him that knoweth al things, and is not like mortall men that content themselues with pety trifles, before whome we cannot make our cockleshells go for payment, as in deede all the things that are of much estimation heere, are nothing woorth 40 there. Therefore when we perceiue that all these thinges vanish away before God: then we learne to submit ourselues vnto God, and to bee no more so puffed vp with pride. And for that cause it is saide, How can man (namely that he is borne of woman) iustify himselfe in respect of God? Howbeit forasmuch as there is nothing harder than too bring men to reason, and to rid them of the saide vayne selfetrust wherewith they are abused: heere Bildad ad-50 deth, that hee will not shine vntoo the Moone, and that the starres are not pure before God: and therefore what is man who is but a worme, or the sonne of man who is but rottenesse? True it is that this saying may bee expounded diuers wayes: that is to witte, that God will not shine so farre as to the Moone: or else that he will not streine histent so farre, that is to say, that hee will not voutsafe too come neere it: and that the starres are not pure, that is to say, al creatures (in which neuertheless we see great noblenes) must be as it were estraunged from God, and there is a great space betwixt him and them. And this is sayd expreffely, bycause the creatures aboue are excellenter thā the creatures heere beneath. But how soeuer it bee, Gods is so farre off both from the Moone and from the starres, as there is an endlesse distance betwixt them. And how then shall we come neere him? This exposition is fit ynough: and in good sooth, whether a man conster it Shining or streyning of his tent, it commeth all to one end. To he short, Bildads meening is, That if our Lord listed to call his creatures before him, he shuld find no bright-nesse in the Moone, and the starres should be darkned. Neuertheless, they bee the thinges that enlighten the world: and yet notwithstanding they must all needes be vtterly drowned when the maiestie of God commeth in place. Now lette men stand in their owne conceite and boast themselues. VVhere bee the wings to carrie vs so high as we may take the Moone in our teeth (as they say) or as we may stye aboute the starres? VVhen wee thinke too haue any thing in ourselues, as soone as wee come before God, all is swallowed vp and brought too nothing by reason of his incomprehensible glorie.

Nowe then wee see in what case men are when they will glorifie themselues. Needes (say I) must Satan haue bewitched them: for it is all one as if they would stye aboue the starres. And are they able to doo that? If a man would: caste himselfe but foure paces downewarde, it were ynough to breake all his sinewes, yea and his necke too. But as ofte as wee haue any thing too boast of, wee make suche leapes as were ynough too breake the neckes of menne, yea and of Angels too, as ye would saye. Then muste wee not needes be woorse than madde, as I sayde afore? Lo what Bildads meening is.

Furthermore, where as some expounde it concerning the Eclipses of the Moone: that can by no means agree. For the sense is more simple: namelye, that the noblest creatures, whiche seeme too haue euen some godhead, are nothing at all when they bee compared with God. All of them must be abased, and God alone continue in his state: so as it behoueth vs to knowe, that there is no-30 ther righteousnesse, power, nor wisdom, but in him only, and that all the reste is but vanitie. Yea, but for all that, experience sheweth that the Sunne is not darkned, nor the Starres neyther. Yes surely too our sight. Again, it behoueth vs too marke, that the brightnesse whyche they haue, is borrowed of another: they are as it were little sparkes, wherin God sheweth his glorie. And so there is neyther Sunne, Moone, nor Starres that can glorye in aught of their owne.

Besydes thys, if God shoulde sette hymselfe against them: their lyght with the lyght of all the reste, muste needes bee darkened. For if the Sunne take away from vs the light of the Starres: I praye you what wold Gods infinite bryghtnesse doo? Nowe haue wee Bildads meenyng: Euen in the Moone (sayeth hee) there shall bee no bryghtnesse, neyther shall the Starres bee pure in Gods presence. As if hee hadde sayde, True it is, that wee see lyghte sheade thorough the whole worlde, oure eyes receiue it, and wee are glad of it. But yet so farre off is the same from being any thing before 50 God: that if we come, euen too the body of the Moone, and too all the Starres of the skie: all the lighte of them (saieth hee) shall bee darkned and vanish away in comparison of Gods glory. And now lette vs come vntoo men. VVhat are they? VVhat are they able too doo? VVhat is their power? VVhereof can they boast? They bee but woormes and rottenesse: and yet will they needes iustify them selues. Now remayneth too put this lesson in vre, and to applye it to our vse.

Heere it is shewed vs, that when wee come before God, wee can bring nothing that is woorthy of prayse. Men then are vttered heere too bee voyde of all goodnesse, and that they haue not so muche as one drop of righteousnesse, whereby too purchase themselues estimation, but must bee fayne too yelde them selues giltye, acknowledging that ther is nothing else in them but wretchednes and miserie. Now if men were wel acquainted with this doctrine, we should not now adays haue so many iarres and braules as wee haue with the Papistes.

For

For they on their side esteeme highly mans own free wil, as though men had some power to dispose themselues to Godward. True it is that they can welynough cōfesse that we be weake, and that wee be not able too do any thing withoute Gods help, and withoute the direction of the grace of his holy spirit. But what? Therewithall, they attribute a certaine preparation to men, and afterward that they be workfellowes with God in furthering his grace, working in common with him as his companions. And when they haue laid that foundation, they fall to attributing of this and that to men, so as there is none other talke among them, but of magnifying men for their vertues and merites. For although they graunt alwayes that wee haue neede of Gods mercie, yet do they blow the bladder full of wind to stuffe it out withall: that is to say, they imbrew it with their diuelish dogtricks, to beare mē in hand that they merit, and that God accepteth them after as they be woorthy of his grace, and hath alwayes respect to their vertues. Lo how men are puffed vp with wind through the diuelish fancies that reigne in poperie. And furthermore (say they) if we do amisse, we haue works of supererogation or ouerplus, wherwith to make amends vnto God for our sinnes. And although we haue offended him, and know that he will not forgiue vs our sinnes, yet can we bring him some recompence and satisfaction, and that is a meane to make him at one with vs. But if the things that are shewed vs heere by Bildad, and which we haue seene heretofore were well knowē: all those disputations would be laid downe. But what? It is an easy matter for the Papists to rudge so at randon of mens righteousnesse, merites, satisfactions, and free will. And why? For they looke not vnto God, but are false asleepe in that vaine imagination which they haue conceiued of the iustifying of men by their owne good deedes. And therefore it behoueth vs to marke well thys verse. Then for a conclusion let vs note, that if wee can cite our owne consciences before God: it wil humble vs in such sort, as there wil be no more seeking to presume: but we shall acknowledge ourselues to be but woormes and rottenesse, and that there is nothing in vs but filthynesse and stinch. VVhat is to be done then? As oft as men speake to vs of the meane of our saluation, lette vs learne to consider where it is that we ought to repose all our trust: which is, that our God receiuing vs of his owne meere goodnesse, do by his holy spirite purge and clenze vs from all our spots, and wash vs in the blood of oure Lord Iesus Christ, the which he hath shed too clenze vs withall, thereby to make vs so pure and cleane as we may be able to stand before his face.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him that whereas he hath shewed himselfe vnto vs heeretofore, it may please him too increace our knowledge further and further, and to make vs so too profyete in it day by day, that in drawing towards him we may be touched with such reuerence, as we may desire nothing but to be subiect vnto him, and to do him seruice, and specially that sith it hath pleased him to call vs to his seruice, we may determine to imploy ourselues wholly therein, not presuming vpon our owne vertues, nor vpon any thyng that can be in vs, but acknowledging that he of his owne meere grace hath chozen vs too bee of his Church and people, and that in receiuing that benefyte we may draw of the fountaine whiche hee hath giuen vs, that is too witte of our Lord Iesus Christ, and acknowledge that it belongeth too him too gyue vs the full perfection of the thinges whiche wee still hope for. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules. &c.

2. Ti. 2. 15.

Declared in the beginning of thys booke, that the propertie whiche is required in a good teacher, was wanting in those that came to comforte Iob: which propertie is, too deuide Gods word rightly, and to applie it to the right vse with suche skilfulnesse, as he that is weake may be strengthened, he that is sorowfull may be comforted, he that is cold may be warmed, and he that is gone altray may be brought home againe. Now verely (as it hath bin said) Iobs frends handled a doctrine, that in generalitie is good and holy: howbeit they failed in misapplying the same to the person of Iob. Then let vs marke well, that it is not ynough for vs too speake of God in common, vlesse euery of vs can referre our sayings to a good vse. This will be the better vnderstoode by laying foorth the text poynt by poynt. Iob demaundeth heere of Bildad, what any man hath fared the better by al his woords. And first he saith, whom hast thou succoured? hast thou succoured the feeble? hast thou helped the arme that had no strength? As if hee should saye, good doctrine ought not to be cast foorth into the ayre but to bring fit instruction to the partie that it is spoken to. As how? VVhen wee see a man that is vtterly ouerthrowen, and so dismayed as he hath neede of comfort: if we should be rough with him, or if we should storme at him, I pray you were it not the next way too cast him into despaire? Contrariwise when we see a man hardned in his sinnes, or a despiser of God, yea suche a one as holdeth scorne of all good warnings, or if wee should speak him faire, and handle him with gentle words, were it not better for vs to hold our peace, than too set Gods word to be a scorning stocke too suche a man? Yes: for it were more neede too strike him hard as if a man shoulde smite with a hammer vpon a stith, seeing the partie is become so sturdy. Iob then sheweth heere, that Bildads talking talking of Gods providence hath bin to no purpose. As if he shuld say, marke in what plight I am, and seing that thou tellest thy tale to me, it were meete that thou shuldest haue an eye to that which might be for my profyt: and therefore thou oughtest too deale discretely, and not to cast foorth thy words at all auenture. Now wee vnderstand better what Iob meant to say. But by thys streine it behoueth vs too marke, howe available Gods word is, when we can skill to applie it to our profyte. It is sayd here, that it ought ro strengthē such as are weake, and to releue such as are feeble and vtterly cast downe. And this said vse is well noted by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrues, wher he alledgeth the text of Esay that a man oughte to stay the trembling knees, and too strengthen the weake armes: for the Prophete Esay appointeth that office to such as haue the charge to preach Gods word. Go your wayes (saith hee) and hold vp the poore weakelings, and strengthē the quaking knees and the leggs that canot go. And how? VVe know that those whom God hath appointed teachers in his Church, haue nothing but the word whiche is put into their mouth. No surely, but yet that worde hath such a power, as it is able to redresse the feebleness that is in men: In somuch that if we quaked in such wise as we could not stand vpon our feete: yet when our Lord speaketh to vs, he gyueth vs such a lustiness as wee be after a manner made new again: & whereas we could not stirre one toe afore, now we walke abroad: and whereas our armes were erst as good as broken, now we are able to put them too the doing of any thing. Thus ye see how we ought to serue our turne with Gods word. For if we be not strengthened by it when we be weake, nor take it for a remedie of our feebleness: it is certaine that we knowe not the value of Gods worde, but it is vtterly vnprofitable too vs through our owne fault. So then he that hath the charge and office to teach, ought to haue good respect what his hearers are to whome he speaketh. For if hee see them negligēt and cold, it behoueth him to quicken them vp: and if they be out of hart, he must cheere them. According as in very deede we see many so sore shakē, as they distrust themselues, and though a mā speake to them of Gods providence, to the end they might leane vnto it: yet they ceasse not too starkle: in somuche that if they heare but the falling of a leafe, they start and are afraid: so that vnlesse a man strengthen them day by day, hee shall neuer be able to hold them vp from falling downe or from staggering. Therefore he that is ordeyned to be a teacher in Gods Church, ought to haue such consideration and skill, that if his hearers bee faintharted and slow, he must exhort and incourage them, by telling thē that God neuer fayleth those that are his, to the end that they may call vpon him, and when they haue called vpon him, inioy his help, and walk on boldly. Furthermore like as we that must teach others, ought to shoote at the said marke: so also behoueth it euery man to do the like in his owne behalfe, according as the Apostle saith. For he applieth the foresaid text too euery priuate person, saying: My frēds, the prophet Esay telleth vs, that al they whome God hath chozen to preach his word, ought to giue corage & strēgth to such as are weake, & make thē to go a good pace. Now looke to yourselues: whē any of you seeth himself weake, or cold, or plucked backe with distrust & ouerfearefulness, frō the seruing of God & his neighbor: let him streine himselfe, let him gather strēgth, and let him come and seeke corage in the word of God. Flatter not yourselues in your sins. VVhen ye feele your selues weake, do not only say, I am weake, but when ye know what ye be, seeke the remedie of it in Gods word.

Go reade, & giue eare to the promises that are cōteyned there. Mark how God telleth you, that he will mainteyn those that are his, & that if they faint, his spirit is strong ynough to recouer thē: wayt for such succoure at his hād & with your waiting walke on still in the same trust. Now thē we see how we may profyt ourselues by Iobs vpbraiding of Bildad, that al the talke which he had vttered in the aire, had bin but an vnprofitable sōūd. And why? For (saith he) it was not to strēgthē the weake, nor to saue & preferue the arme that was as good as broken. And so let vs mark wel, that we haue greatly profyted in gods word whē we cā be nimble & weldisposed to do good, & haue no brokē armes, nor trēbling knees, but a lusty cheerefulness to apply ourselues to the seruice of God and oure neighbor. Lo how we may become good scholers of the holy Ghost. But so lōg as we be faint & cold, and cannot go one step without stūbling or reeling: let vs mark that we haue smally profyted in the heauēly schole, and that the same cōmeth of our own fault. For it is certaine that gods word hath the nature & propertie so to strēgthē vs, as we shal no more be feeble, except the fault be in ourselues. So thē let such as haue the charge of teaching, tend always to that mark: and let euery of vs haue the discretiō to cōsider on his owne behalfe, that whē we reade the holy scripture we come to a sermō. Now thē if I be weak and haue neede to gather strength: it behoueth me to be heedful, that I may receiue the remedie which gods word giueth me. To be short, according to the diseases that euery mā knoweth in himself, let him learne to do whatsoever God hath ordeined, and let him imbrace his promises for the remedie therof. After that Iob hath said so, he addeth: To whome hast thou giuen counsell? To such a one as had want of wisdom? It is expressly said of gods law, that it serueth to instruct the ignorant and little ones: which propertie is extēded to the whole scripture, which is nothing else but an expositiō of the law. The purpose therefore wherevnto our Lord will haue his whole word too serue, is that forasmuch as we be blind and ignorant wretches, we should bee taught faithfully, so as we might not stray, but know what path we ought to take. And that is not for two or three men: for who is hee that can boast that he is skilfull and wise ynough to gouerne himselfe? True it is that men will be foolish ynough to presume so farre vpon their own naturall wit: but God laugheth such ouerweening to scorne, and sheweth plainly how ther is nothing but vanity in all their gay brauerie. For he ouertaketh the wise in their owne wiliness, shewing that they beguile themselues, whē they intend to walke after their owne imaginatiō. Then let vs assure ourselues, that al of vs both great and small, are as poore blind buzzards, and there is nothing in man but ignorance, vntill wee haue profyted in Gods schole. And therewithall lette vs know that God is our guide, and that in his word is all perfection of wisdom, and that the title of teaching the ignorant is not giuen to it in vaine. Lo heere the cause why Iob vpbraided Bildad, that he had not giuen counsell to him that was destitute of wisdom. As if he should saye, he blemished the doctrine for want of knowing howe to applie it wisely as he ought to haue done. VVherfore to the end that such reproch light not vpon vs, let vs learne too vse Gods worde after suche a sorte, as it may serue vs too good instruction, that by receyuing suche doctrine, wee may ceasse too bee any more as wretched beastes that go astray. Also lette hym too whome God hath committed the office of teaching others, consider well, that whatsoever come of it, mē must be governed by the hand and mouth of God. True it is, that vntill suche time as God hath conuincid them of their

their ignorance, they glory in themselves: and therefore he istaine to pull downe such pride, according also as Saint Paule speaketh when hee saith that the Gospell ought to serue to pull downe all loftinesse that aduanceth it selfe against our Lord Iesus Christ: and according to his saying in the first Chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, that it behoueth vs to become fooles, if we will become wise in Gods schoole. Truly this seemeth straunge to vs: but it is our Apcee, and it is a lesson wherein we must continue all the time of our life. And so the ministers of Gods word, must tell men that there is nother discretion nor wisdom in them, to the ende they may no more trust in their owne strength and reason, nor be so selfeweening as to say, I know wel ynough howe I oughte to liue. No: but let them esteeme themselves as fooles, that is to say, let them acknowledge that there is nothing in themselves but vanitie. For if there were but one drop of wisdom in vs, God would not trouble vs at all, but let vs alone in our state. But now he intendeth to pull downe our pride, to our owne profite, that we may be humbled and become little and lowly, to exalt him alone and to submit ourselues wholly to that which he shall say. VVe see then that the Ministers of Gods word can neuer edify the people, except they begin at that point of shewing men that they be vtterly destitute of all wisdom. And it behoueth every one of vs to receiue the same admonishment in ourselues, acknowledging ourselues to be vtterly destitute and void of all wisdom, and assuring ourselues that we shall find all wisdom in Gods word. VVherefore let vs not be afraid that we shall not be sufficiently taught in all perfection if we suffer God to declare his will vnto vs, and desire the same at his hand, being redy to receiue whatsoever he shall say vnto vs. Then if we haue the wit to suffer ourselues to be gouerned by Gods mouth, wee haue the perfection of all wisdom, wherein there is no fault to be found. And why? For the holy Ghost lied not in saying, that the proper and very naturall office of good doctrine is, to teach men wisdom and reason that want it. Now in the ende Iob rebuketh Bildad for speaking at roursers. For in saying, thou hast said as it is: he meeneth that Bildads words were not ruled and directed to the doing of that which he had to deale withall. And it is a saying well woorthy to be noted. For such as flitter in the aire after that sort in their talke, know not what the right deuiding of Gods worde is, but go about the bush, only turning about the pot, according as wee see many that discourse in generalities, and wote not howe to applie the doctrine profitably as they ought to do. To what purpose wer it if I should stand here a whole halfe day together, and expoūd vnto you the one halfe of a booke, soaring in the ayre and intreating of many things disorderly, without regard of your profite and edifying? Eucry of you would go home to his house, as wise as he came out to Church: and it were but a defacing of gods word, so as it should stand vs in no stead at all. VVhat is too bee done then? Let vs remember well what is saide heere: namely, that we must referre our doings to some certaine end: and that when we take a matter in hand, we must speake to the purpose, as they that are skilfull to set things in their right order, so as there may bee no confusion. As how? According to that which I haue said, if wee mind to comforte such as are sad and sorrowful, and find themselves distressed in their conscience, or haue any great trouble: it behoueth vs to seek meanes to comfort them, by setting Gods mercie before them, and too know their disease that we may applie the fit remedies vnto it. If we mind to abate the pride and rebelliousnesse that is in men, it behoueth vs to shew them what Gods vengeance is, and too make them feele (spite of their teeth) that it is no sporting matter: for it is able to drown all things with a blast, and is as a lightening to consume all too nothing. If a man will exhorte those too pacience which are tormented, and cannot patiently suffer the afflictions that God sendeth them, or which are in wanhope and despaire: it behoueth him to seeke the reasons that are fit for it. For to what purpose were it to speake much out of order? It is all one as if a man came too a Physitian, and desired a medicin for some disease: and the Physitian shoulde go discourse and debate of his art in generall termes, and so the poore sicke man should yield vp his Ghost in the meane while, whereas he might easily haue bin cured if hee had bin helped out of hande. And to what purpose then hath all his talke serued? If a man come too a Mason too put some building into hys hand, and the Mason fall to discourse of building Castels, and tell him of the rearing of buildings in the aire, disputing how it may be brought to passe, and in the meane while regard not the present work: what a toy were it? If a man should come to a Lawyer to aske counsell vpon some case, and the Lawyer should fall to disputing vpon the Lawes in generall, and not applie the thinges too hys present case: it were to no purpose. So then let vs marke, that when we deale with Gods word, it behoueth vs too set some certaine marke before vs, that we wander not heere and there, but deuide it aright, as they that knowe to what end they speake, that our talke be not rousing & gadding too and fro. For else we may speake many good words, but none of them shall serue to any purpose. That is the thing which Iob meant to shew heere, in rebuking Bildads vnaduisednesse, for not hauing the discretion to applie his good doctrine to the right vse of it. And now he vttereth a saying that weyeth yet more. To whom (saith he) tellest thou thy tale? And whose spirit is it that is come out of thee? In saying to whome is it that thou tellest this tale: he sheweth vs that we ought to haue a regard of the persons to whome we direct our doctrine, as I haue declared already. I am not heere for my selfe alone: surely al of vs ought to profyte in common. And when I go vp into the pulpit, it is not only too teach other men, and too withdraw my selfe away from the rest. For I my selfe must be a scholer, and the word that proceedeth out of my mouth, must serue me as well as you, or else it is ill with me. But in the meane while if I contente my selfe with estimation, and haue no respect of you to make the doctrine that I bring, too serue youre capacite: what a fondnesse were it? So then it behoueth vs too haue the skill to applie the doctrine to such as God putteth vs in trust with. For when hee putteth vs in office too bee his messengers: he bindeth vs to his people, and so linketh vs to his Church, as it behoueth vs to haue our eyes alway fastned vpon the same. VVherefore if wee should cast forth our words into the aire, and shut our eyes, without hauing consideratiō of those to whome we speake: it were too fore an abusing of Gods word. Then let vs mark well, that such as haue the charge of teaching, must consider what doctrine may be good and profitable whē they speake to the whole congregation, that they may deale it forth faithfully and with good discretion, so as it may be to the common profite of all. If we haue not this consideration, we shall make such a minglemangle and such a hotchpotch of Gods word, as there shall be nother tast nor fauoure in it any more. And why? For the cheefe poynt is to know, what it is that he demaundeth whiche commeth to be taught. I meane not that he should demaund according to his fleshy lust: but that hee should demand demaund the thing that is fit for him, and may do hym good. Now let vs come to lay foorth that which Iob setteth downe heere. VVhose spirit is it that commeth out of thee? True it is that this sentence hath bin expounded, as though it had bin saide, Of what spirit speakest thou? Is it of God, or of men? And that interpretation is not to be vtterly misliked. For surely when any man taketh vpon him to beare abroade the doctrine of saluation: it behoueth him too take good heede that hee vaunt not himselfe of his naturall wit, assuring himselfe that that is not a matter for men to purchase estimation by: but that he ought to be governed by the spirit of God, and too haue the vertue whereof Saint Paule speaketh, too the end he may know that it is God which hath sent hym. That thing therefore is very requisite. But if a mā marke well the proceffe of the text: Iob folowing that which he had touched afore, intēdeth rather to shew, that Bildads words were not wel disposed, bycause they did not quicken his soule, which is the principall poynt that we haue to marke in Gods word. I said afore, that Gods worde serueth to teache the ignoraunt and too strengthen the weake: and that is bycause it incourageth suche as are faint, cold, and slothfull, wakeneth such as are asleepe in their sinnes, spurneth suche foreward as lag behind, and raizeth such as are falne downe: and yet ther is one thing more, namely that it quickeneth such as are dead. And this is it that Iob meant to shew whē he said, Of whome is the spirit that is gone out of thee? that is to say, in the power of thy words. Therefore let vs marke, that the worde of God is then well handled, when it giueth vs courage to go forward, and strēgheneth our feeblenes, making vs nimble whereas our legges were broken, and making vs stout and lusty, whereas we were destitute of all valiantnesse afore: but yet must it also giue vs lyfe when we be as good as dead. And this is verified specially of the Gospell. For behold how our lord Iesus Christ speaketh in the fifth of Saint Iohn. The time is come (saith hee) that the voice of the sunne of man shall be heard, not only of the liuing, but also of the dead. And who be those dead? Surely no man can be exempted. For whereat beginneth God to make his doctrine auaylable in vs: Euē at the drawing of vs out of the spirituall death wherein we were all hild. For till such time as God enlightneth vs by his word, we be blind, till he open oure eares we be deafe: till he giue vs faith, wee haue nother soule nor hart. True it is that we may well seeme to haue some outward shew of life: the vnbeleeuers do eate and drinke as well as the faithfull: againe, they can go about their businesse, yea and oftentimes there seeme too be great vertues in them. But all that is nothing, bycause that in asmuch as they be straungers from God, all that is in them is but deathe and vtter confusion, God then must be faine to draw vs out of death vnto himselfe, as the point whereat hee must begin too make his worde auaylable in vs. And in good sooth, let vs see what strēgh there is in men till God haue strengthened them by hys word. They trust in themselues, that is to say, they leane vnto a reede, that shall make them breake their necke. Yea and it is all one as if a man would gore himselfe vpon a pike. For in asmuch as it hath a sharp point, and is armed with yron, if a man leane vpon it, ye see it pricketh him through. And such is the trust that we haue in oure owne strength, that it must needs be our deathe. Therefore let vs marke well that there is not one drop of life in vs, till God draw vs out of death, yea euen by the power of his word. And therein wee see how wretched the state of the vnbeleeuers is. True it is that they be so sorded in their outrages, as they perceiue not their owne harmes. But yet will the holy scripture always shew itselfe true, in auouching vs to be dead & vtterly forlorne, and that there is nothing but cursednesse in vs, so long as we be straungers from God: And yet for all that, we see how thanklesse the world is. How many are there to be found, that will suffer themselues to be rayzed and quickened: God offereth vs this benefyte when hee willeth his word to be preached and published to all men. Thus ye see then that life is offered vs, and we forsake it: that is to say, the great multitude shrinketh away from it, and thrusteth away the benefyte which they might inioy by it. See ye not a shamefull thanklesse? Must not men needs be out of their right wits? Yet notwithstanding we see there are fewe which submit themselues to the Gospell, and giue eare to it. VVe see they raile againste it, and mocke at it, and slaunder it, and lift vp themselues against God with such rage, as there is lesse to be gotten at their hands than of wild beasts. Then sith we see the number of them to be so small which receiue the doctrine of saluation, and that the greatest parte withdrawe themselues from it, (some as I said) making none account of it, some mocking at it, and some outrageously setting themselues against it, so as they shew full well that there is nothing in them but wickednesse against God: therby it is seene how mightily Satan hath bewitched them. But howsoeuer the world go, we ought to marke well thys sentence, where it is said, that the spirit ought too passe out of vs: that is to say, that whereas we were dead afore: alsoone as wee heare the worde of God, the same must giue vs such a liuelinesse, as our spirite may shew itselfe, which had not onely bin in a sfound, but also vtterly quenched before. True it is that the word of God cannot do this thing in that it is vttered by the mouth of a mortall man: for it must first be quickened itselfe, that it may quicken vs. How is that? VVhen I speake, it is not in me to touch folks harts, nor to make the doctrine that I preach, to enter so into euery man, as they may be moued to come vnto God. How then? Our Lord had neede to make his word auailable by the working of his holy spirit, and too quicken it before it enter into vs, that it may take roote there, and be vnto vs incorruptible feede of life. Ye see then that God must be faine to worke by his secret power, ere his doctrine can auaille that is preached to vs by men. That is true: But whereof commeth this fault? Euen of ourselues. For God must be faine too boare our eares, or else we will neuer heare him: and hee must be faine to soften our harts, and to make them fleshy: for of themselues they be as hard as flint, and full of rebellion. Yet notwithstanding the word of God ought to containe in it the said power and propertie of mortifying our soules. And let vs not marnell at it. For to what end hath God ordeined his word and appointed it to be preached: his intente is to bring vs too himselfe, and too come neere vnto vs, and not only so, but also too dwell with vs. For hee is the welspring of life, and there is nothing in vs but death.

Seeing then that hee maketh vs partakers of hymselfe and of his graces, by his worde, and seeing that hee myndeth too dwell in vs, yea and too liue in vs, too the ende that wee may lyue in hym: doo ye not see the sayd rising agayne too life whereof I speake afore? And therefore let vs vnderstād at a word, that as lōg as we be strāgers frō god, how goodly shewes so euer we make, we be toto wretched, ther is nothing but cursednes in vs & our wretched soules are dead, although there appeere some liuelines in thē to our imaginatiō. VVhat is to be done thē? Euē to be quickened by Gods gathering of vs to himself, which thing he doth by the mean of his word.

Seeing

Seing that this treasure is such and so inestimable: let vs set muche store by it, and let vs value it as it deserueth, and let not vs by our vnthankfulnesse stay God from making vs to feele the power and workfulnesse whiche he offereth vnto vs. Thus then ye see in effect what wee haue to marke in that saying of Iobs. Now hee addeth consequently, That hee may say many things of Gods prouidence: but it behoueth him to consider to what end he referreth them. For if his words wauer so in the aire, it were better for him to hold his peace. So then it beho-ueth men to bethinke them well, to what end they dispute of Gods word, that the parties may bee edified by their doctrine. Iob therefore sheweth heere, that Bildad came not to the pith of the matter, but only wandered aloofe in words. VVherefore? He ought (saith Iob) too haue come to the point, as shall be declared heereafter.
But in the meane while he sheweth, that he is not ignorant of the same vertue whereof Bildad speaketh when he saith, that God gouerneth al things, and that the great power and maiestie which are in him ought to be terrible to vs, and that we ought to come and submit oureselues to him with all reuerence to do him seruice. True it is that this doctrine is of it selfe very profytable, and we may not despise it when it is preached in general: but yet notwithstanding it is needefull to looke well to the handling of it when it is to be applyed particularly, assuring ourselues that it is to no purpose to tell a long tale of things that belong not to the matter which is in had, but men ought too come too the very pointe as they say.

Thus then the thing wherein Iob found fault with Bil-dad, was that in his disputing of Gods prouidence, he had no respect whereto his words might serue. And that is the cause why Iob saith now, I am not ignoraunt that god hath created the world, that he gouerneth al things, that he holdeth all things in his hand, and that his maie-stie ought to be honoured. All these things I know. But for the better vnderstanding of the matter, Let vs marke that there are some persons to whome it behoueth vs to shew Gods mightie power, too bring them to a feare of his maiestie, that they may stand in such awe of him as they ought to do. VVhy so? For wee see many sauadge folke, which haue much ado to conceiue that there is a God in heauen that gouerneth all things: they be little better than brute beatts. Verely if a man speake to them of God, they make a trifle of it, and say, yea marrie there is a God. But yet they neuer wist what his glory is, nother had they euer any feeling of the wonderfull power that is in him. Also it behoueth vs to shew them that Gods seruice is spirituall, and that we must come too it soundly and roundly, and be cleane purged from all hypocritie. As for to know what Gods will is, tush, they neuer enquired after it, for they haue bin letted too much by worldly things. Ye see then that most men are heathenish, and so snarled in the delights of the present life: as they thinke not at al vpon God. Such manner of men had neede to haue the former matters told the at length, to make them feele what Gods maiestie is. No doubt but all of vs haue neede of it, euery one according to his measure. But I say, that these matters must be laid forth at length, to such as haue neede to be called to the knowing of God, that they may be forced to tremble vnder the maiestie of him whome they had scoffed at afore.
This is one point which we haue to marke. Also ther are other men that had neede to be brought to this consideration, I meane euen of those that haue a right feare of God. Euen they (say I) must be taught and put in mind what gods maiestie is, to the end they may always quake vnder it, and be meekened as becommeth them. But yet is not that all that they haue to do: they must not generally rest heere. And why? For when they haue learned that: they haue but laid their foundation: they must afterward build vpon it: yea and that in suche wise, as the building may be skilfully applyed to the ground worke, that is made already vnder the earth. Then if a man speake to such as haue the feare of God in them, and a-bace and humble themselues vnder Gods mighty hand: he must not rest vpon those general matters, but particularly consider what is for each mans behoofe, that hee may build well vpon the foundation that is laid already.

This is it that Iob meant to declare heere. Now lette vs com to the words which he vseth. He saith, that the dead things are formed vnder the waters, and in the places nere about. As if he had said, Goro, thou hast talked to me of Gods mightinesse, and told me that his armies are without number, and that all creatures are in his hand. All this I confesse: yea I looke yet further. For I looke euen into the bottomlesse deepes, euen into the nauill of the earth: I see how God bringeth soorth things that were not before, and quickeneth the things that were dead.
VVhence commeth the life of all creatures? It is as a thing that is hidden in the deepest gulfes. If it bee demaunded by what meanes we be serued in our state: or out of what place God hath sought the life that he gyueth vnto men: it is as much as if he would go fetche it out of the bottomlesse deepes. How commeth it to passe that the earth bringeth soorth frutes? How commeth it to passe that the corne which beareth such a blade, doth afterward yeld the graine? Now these are secrets of God which are hidden. From these things Iob commeth vp aloft and saith: I know well that God hath spred out the heauen, yea euen in a wast place where there was no setling. This is as much as if some body would hang the aire with Tapistrie: and that were impossibile with men: but therein God meante too shewe his wonderfull power.

True it is that Iob doth set downe the north coast precisely, & yet he speake of the whole heaue. And that is bycause the skie turneth about vpon the pole that is there. For like as in the wheelles of a chariot, there is an extree that runneth through the midds of them, and the wheelles turne round about the extree by reason of the holes that are in the naues of them: euen so is it in the skies. It is manifestly seene: that is to saye, they that are well acquainted with the course of the firmament, doo see that the skie turneth so about: For on the North side there is a Starre apparant to our eye, which is as it were the extree that runneth through the naue of the wheele about the which the skies are seene to turne. There is another pole hidden vnder vs, whiche wee cannot per-ceiue, and that is called the Antartik. And why? Bycause the skie turneth about that also, as though one extree were put through both the wheelles, as hath bin said afore. VVhen I speake of this course of the Heauen, I meene not the dayly course of the sunne that we see: for the sunne hath a peculiar mouing by it selfe: but thys is an vniuersall mouing for the whole cope of Heauen.
And the said two starres are as it were fastned too those places, so as they do not remone nor stirre. Thus yee see why Iob sayth, That God hath spred out the Heauen vpon the Northside. And why speaketh he so of it? By-cause it is suche a miracle, as ought to amaze vs. True it is that men haue some experience of it, whiche causeth them to speake of it. But yet doth this so weldis-posed order shew, that there is suche a wisdom in God, as we must of force confesse that the same sunne: ounteth all rea-

all reason of man, and that wee ought to do nothing else but honour our Gods greatnesse, which is so vttered in the creation of the world. And that is the cause why he sayeth, that he hath founded the earth vpon nothing. For wherevpon doeth the earth rest vpon the ayre. Like as we see the ayre about vs, so is it likewise on the other side of the earth, so as the earth doeth as it were hang in the midds of it. True it is that the philosophers make much disputing why the earth continueth so, seeing it is in the very bottom of the world, and they say it is a maruell that it sinketh not, considering that nothing vpholdeth it. Neuerthelesse they are able to yeeld none other reason than is seene in the order of nature, which is so woonderfull a thing, as men are forced to be abashed at it, and to mount about themselues too glorifie God, acknowledging that there is an infinite wisdom in him. So then we see wherevnto Iobs words tend: namely too shewe that hee was not so beastly, as too denye Gods maiestie, but that he acknowledged his glorie. Howbeit his meening is to say, that the whole cace standeth not in treating of it generally: but in applying of it too ryght vse, according as wee will speake more fully of it too morrowe, if God giue vs leaue.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may come with all humilitie to seeke help in his mere mercie, and not wander to and fro, but be so cast downe in ourselues, as wee may seeke altogether to bee releued by the grace of our Lord Iesus Christ, & dayly profit in him more and more, till we bee fully restored by him: assuring our selues that as he hath already begonne the good that is in vs, so will he also continue the same, and correct all the faults and imperfections of our flesh, euen till he haue brought vs to the perfection wherevnto he calleth vs after he hath rid vs cleane from all the letts which hinder vs and drawe vs backe from comming vnto him: That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, &c.

The .xcvi. Sermon, which is the second vpon the .xxvi. Chapter.

8. He bindeth the waters vpon the Cloud, and the Cloud sinketh not vnder them.
9. He holdeth backe the face of his throne, and spreadeth a Cloud vpon it.
10. He hath set bounds about the waters, vntill that lyght and darknesse be consumed.
11. He maketh the pillars of heauen to shake, and maketh it afraid at his threatening.
12. He clyueth the Sea by his powver, and appeaseth the pryde of it by his vnderstanding.
13. He hath garnished the heauens by his spirit, and vvith his hand hath he formed the slipperie serpent.
14. These are [but] the ourlets of his vvayes: and hovv little heare vve of them? and vvho is he that can vnderstand the terriblesse of his powver?

Yesterday I began too shewe after what fort wee ought to profit ourselues by that which is conteyned in the woorks of God: which is to consider them reuerently and too yeeld him the honour that he deserueth. For if wee think neuer so much vpon the miracles that God doeth, and yet in the meane whyle honour him not: what shall wee bee the better for it? Then let vs lerne, that as oft as Gods woorks are set afore vs, it is to the end that we should knowe his maiestie, and yeeld him his woorthie prayse. Iob hath told vs that the earth is founded and settled vntoo this day by a woonderfull meanes. VVe go vpon it dayly, and yet there are verie fewe of vs that thinke vpon that which hath ben spoken, that we myght fare the better by it. Again when it is sayd vnto vs, that God byndeth the waters in the Clouds, and yet the Clouds sink not: behold, it is a miracle that wee see dayly with our eyes, and yet no man thinketh vpon it but verie slenderly, so as it slippeth away from him, and the sayd power of God is not honored at our hands. For this cause, Iob mynding to protest, that he was none of the number of them, that passed brutishly through the world without knowing their maker, sayeth: I knowe that God byndeth vp the waters in the Clouds. But forasmuch as this is a woonted thing to vs, we make no greate reckoning of it, howbeit that in the meane whyle God ceaseth not too shewe vs a maruelouse power in so dooing. Is it not a miracle that the waters should hang after that sort in the ayre, and abyde fast there? VVe see that the waters doo flowe, yea and that the ayre is so fyne and thin, as it giueth place continually to them, and the waters are of their owne nature heauier than the ayre. And therfore the waters ought of reason to fall downe. Neuerthelesse we see they are hild there as it were in Tubbes, according as it is sayd in the Psalmes. For the Prophet meening to expresse the miracle which is misknowne of men, vseth that similitude. Now then we see what this verse importeth where it is sayd, that God byndeth vp the waters in the cloudes, yea euen without sinking of the cloudes. This is to shewe vs, that as oft as the cloudes gather in the ayre, and wee see the waters inclozed in them, and yet the earth is not drowned by them: that commeth to passe bycause God stretcheth out his hand. And therby let vs knowe, that he sheweth himself too vs, and would make vs to perceyue what power he hath, namely an infinite power, and meeneth to wake vs, bycause that when the wether is sayre and cleere, we regard it not, nother perceyue his glorie that sheweth it self after that maner. And therfore he myndeth too teache vs after another new fashyon, by shetting vp the waters in that wyse, and by lodging them in the ayre, so as they hang there, and are hild as it were in a bottle, tub, or barreil. By the sight hereof God vpbraideth vs with our vnthankfulnesse and calleth vs home to him, shewing vs that in all caces he hath a woonderfull power. But wee see, and see not. If any man aske how the thing that Iob speaketh of is possible. VVe bee conuincid by verie reason, and it is a thing that appeereth euidently, that God is aboute the order of nature: and yet for all that, there is none of vs all that is touched at it, nother do we acknowledge him but by compulsion. Heerein therfore it is to be seene, that men (as much as in them is) do darken Gods glorie, and thrust it vnder foote. And so much the more ought we to be warned to marke the thing that is told vs heere, when we see the alterations that are in heauen and earth. God could well make the ayre alwayes close, or alwayes fayre, that there should neuer bee clowde. But it is his will too haue chaunges. For if things continued at one stay, we would fall asleepe, and wee would imagin that fortune governed. But now in such varietie, we bee constrained whither we will or no, to think that Gods had woorketh, and that he is not ydle in heauen, and that he hath not onely created the world once, & afterward let it alone there, but also that he disposeth all things, and guideth his creatures after such a sort, as he will haue vs to knowe that he is neere at hand to vs. Lo then wherupon we ought to muse when we see the skye troubled, and clowds thickened in the ayre, and rayne and alteracions of seasons: namely that by that meane our Lord sheweth himself to vs, and draweth vs vnto him bycause we consider it not ynough of ourselues. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And it is sayd, that he withholdeth the face [or sight] of his throne, and putteth a clowd before it when it pleaseth him. The Hebrew word that Iob vseth, signifieth sometimes to set vp, and somtymes also to ioyne or close together, as whē a man maketh Barres of yron for a building, to ioyne the timberwork and the stones together, shetting them one within another, that they may hold fast with the mortar. It is sayd then that God maketh such a barre at the foresyde of his Throne. for heauen is termed his seate. Not that he is inclosed in it (for wee knowe that he filleth all things, and that his beeing is so infinite, that it is spred through the earth as well as through heauen: ) but to teache vs to looke vppward whē we intend to thinke vpon God. For such is our infirmitie and rudenesse, that in stead of exalting God, we dayly abace him. So then, as oft as there is any speaking of him, it behoueth vs to lift vp our mynds to woorship him with al reuerence, and we must not thinke vpon earthly things to surmyse aught of him after our owne deuycce and fantasie. Lo why Gods throne is in heauen, according as the scripture sayeth. It is not (say I) for that he is shet vp there: but to shewe vs the hygnessse of his maiestie, too the end wee should not surmyze of him after our owne fashyon, and after our owne rude, grosse, and beetleheaded wit, as men terme it. To be short, it behoueth vs to mount about all creatures, if wee intend to thinke vpon God ryghtly. But now let vs come to the sentence where it is sayd, that God hath made a barre in his Throne.

And truly if wee marke well the order that is in heauen, it is a thing that ought to rauish our wittes. All the Philosophers haue ben very inquisitiue and curiouse in serching what the heauen should be, and of what nature it is. But all is but coniectures, so as the best conclusion that wee can make, is too acknowledge that God hath made there such a principall peece of woork, as it behoueth vs all to woonder at it, confessing our selues vnable too comprehend so hygh, so profound, and so secret a thing. And so it is not without cause, that Iob intending to magnifie the maiestie of God, speaketh heere of the sayd Barre which hee hath made in the foreside of his Throne. Afterward he addeth now again, that God spreadeth out a clowde vpon it when he listeth. VVhen we see the sayd alteration, it is not to the end wee should knowe, that God hath stablished an order in things, and that whē

he had once created the world, he ment to bee ydle euer after: but that he dayly guydeth and gouerneth all things that he hath once created, holding his hand continually bothe vpon heauen and earth and vpon al things else, and shewing himself to be our father, and making vs to feele it. So then let vs not bee so blynd in looking vppon the skyes, as not to perceyue the liuely image of Gods maiestie, and of the wonderfull power that he sheweth there. For it were better for vs that our eyes were picked out, than to haue the fruition and sight of these goodly woorks of God, except we procede to turne them to our behoof, by mounting vp to the authour of them. The brute beasts shall beare no blame for their hauing of the lyght: and that is bycause they haue no reason to knowe the woorkmayster. But on our part, it is certaine, that there shall neede none other thing to condemne vs before God, and to take all excuse from vs, but that besides our eyes, he hath also giuen vs some reason and vnderstanding, too comprehend the woonderfull things that he sheweth vs bothe aboue and beneath. Ye see then wherof we haue neede to be warned. And for the same purpose is it, that the holie Ghost setteth before vs this varietie which is in heauen, wherof we will speake yet more hereafter. To be short, the cheef point of our life is, that being partakers of all the things which God hath created to our vse, we should lerne to magnifie him that hath giuen vs such grace, and not possesse his creatures without dooing him homage for them. Lo in effect what is shewed vs heere. Iob addeth immediatly, that he hath set boundes to the waters, euen vntil hyght and darknesse come too an end. Behold yet another woork of God well woorthie to bee remembered, namely, that the waters bylowe are bounded, and that God holdeth them fast, so as they cannot passe their bounds: and that the same indureth and shall continually indure vnto the worldes end. He had spoken afore of the waters aloue, that is, of the waters that God draweth vp in the clouds, and are hild in the ayre till he make them poure downe in rayne: and now it is certaine that if God did not bound the sea and the other waters, all the earth should be couered with them. If a man aske the Philosophers and such as serche the whole order of nature: they will confesse that if the Elements had their full scope through out according vnto their nature, the earth should bee hidden vnder the water: and in good sooth, experience shewes it to be so. For why is the earth in the middle of the world, but bycause it is firme and substantiall by reason of his weyght? For the waters are lyghter, and therewithall they shedde, so as they are not so firme. Consequently the ayre is aboue the waters: and the fyre is also aboue the ayre. VVee see then that the Elements are distinguished according too their properties. Seing that the ayre inuironeth the whole earth (as wee see:) the waters also ought too goe round betweene them bothe, that is to say, betweene the earth and the ayre. For that is their propre place and situation. And like as the fyre ouerspreadeth all: so also would the waters not leaue one foote of dry ground: the very mountaynes, yea euen the hyghest of them should be couered vnder thē. But now we see lowe & lowe places abyde drie, and yet the Sea mounteth about thē. And so a man may perceiue the reason that I shewed before. For whē we consider what a thing the sea is, specially whē it riseth aloft: it is a wonder that the earth is not ouerwhelmed by it. VVee see heere a notable miracle: yea, if men did not shet their eyes through their owne vnthankfulnessse. The very heathen men (as reason driueth them therunto) acknowledge, that whereas it pleased God to haue some place voyd, the same was too plant mankind in it in it : and that he had a respect vnto men when he ordeyned a part of the earth to abyde drye : the very infidelles speake this. And why? For the truche is so strong, as they are inforced too confesse it. But in the meane whyle, who is he that glorifieth God? How doo wee acknowledge the good that he hath doone vs? wee be dumb for any praysing of him: and (which woofe is) wee defyle the earth which he hath giuen vs too dwell vpon. He hath made the waters to withdrawe themselves, and he hath as it were fettered them vp in cheynes : and although he giue vs roome heere to dwell vpon : yet (as I sayd) we defyle the earth with our filthinesse and finnes. Verely, all the acknowledgement that God receyuet at our hands, is that no man openeth his mouth to glorifie him. And so it is not without cause that these things are told vs, considering how our witts are so duil as wee think not vpon them. Specially wee must marke that which shall bee sayd new againe according also as it is spoken of cheefly by the Prophet Ieremie : which is, that the Sea is so violent a thing, as there seemeth to bee no meanes to hold it in : and yet for all that, it is barred within listes. The sea seemeth to threaten to drowne the earth, and it seemeth that the earth should bee swallowed vp at the rushing forth of euery waue.

Considering then that wee see so greate a violence in the sea, which is so terrible a thing as it maketh the heares to stand vp vpon our head: mult wee not needes behold there the mightie and inuincible hand of God, and confesse that his power which is spoken of heere, is more than manifest? So much the more then ought we to be touched to the quicke with it. But what? when God maketh the Sea to remoue after that sorte : we haue not the wit too knowe Gods infinite goodnesse towards vs, and his like power, to yeeld him thanks for it, and to confesse our selues beholding to him diuerse wayes for our lyfe : not only for creating vs and putting vs intoo the world, and for nurrisshing vs heere : but specially for that the earth is not drowned vnder the waters, and that there is some drye ground left for vs to dwell vpon. Behold (I say for what purpose heere is speciall mention made of the sea, and of Gods withholding of it, so as the waters are after a sorte shet vp in it, which thing no cheynes nor cordes could bring to passe. All the wyld beasts of the world myght easlyer be tamed than the Sea: and yet God ruleth it, yea and ouerruleth it after a wonderfull and incomprehensible maner. And it behoueth vs too marke the saying that Iob addeth heere : which is, that the same shall continue till lyght and darknesse come to an end, and bee medled toogether. This is to do vs to vnderstand, that God doeth not this miracle for one day or for a short tyme, but alwayes, so as the same hath and shall continue for euer. For although the often surges rush forward and backward. Yet notwithstanding, God doeth alwayes restreine the Sea from winning any further than it pleaseth him too threaten men withall, to the end they should lerne too humble themselves and too walke in greater warinesse. Thus yee see how Iob ment too augment the commendacion of the power that is declared heere too bee in God, when it is sayd, That the waters are bounded and bordered till the world come to an end, and till lyght and darknesse be mingled together: that is to say, till the order of nature ceasse: for that is it that is imported in this maner of speeche. If any manne alledge that not onely the Sea, but also the ryuers do some tymes get the vpper hande and so passe their boundes, as they teare vp all things before them, so that bothe howses and vineyards are ouerwhelmed, and exceeding greate and excefsiue breaches are made by violence of the Sea: The answer therevnto is, that yet notwithstanding, God ceaseth not too perferue the worlde in generall, and his suffring of the Sea too passe his bounds in that wyse, is to make vs to thinke vpon his power which is shewed vs here. For if we were well aduysed, (yea or if there were but a little reason in vs,) it is certain that we would daylye honor God for our lyfe, in that he preferueth vs euen in the graue. How are wee here vpon earth. Surely euen as in a graue. For beholde, the sea and the waters are ouer vs. And of whome is it long that they swallowe vs not vp, but of God who holdeth his hand betwixt them and vs? But wee bee so farre off from marking this, that wee become like swyne, filling our bellyes and pampering our selues with Gods benefites, and not thinking one whit vpon the things which he sheweth vs to the eye : that is to witte, that we cannot lyue one minute of an houre, but by miracle : For it is he that brydleth the sea in such wyse.

God therefore to stirre vs vp too knowe his power, doeth well suffer the sea too passe his bounds. At the reporte hereof, wee thinke (or ought too thinke, (if wee bee not too blickish) what letteth that the lyke happeneth not too the whole world, but bycause God maynteyneth the order of nature which hee hath set for our safetye? So then all would become one guife and lake were it not that Gods hand ruleth it from aboute. Lo how wee ought too profit our selues by the souereintie which God hath ouer the sea and the waters: too the end wee may knowe what fatherly care hee hath of our lyfe : and feeling how muche we are bound vntoo him indeuer too serue and honor him, and too walke in his obedience with all warinesse. Furthermore if any manne reply, that these are common things and needlesse to be preached of as nowe, bycause euen yong children doo knowe them: it is so much the woofe. For if wee neede not too haue gone to schoole, nor to haue learned anye deepe cunninge for the knowing of a thing that is so common and ordinary with all men, and yet thewe in effect, that wee beare it not at all in remembrance : are wee not so much the more vnexcusable.

Thus then wee see, that the cause why our Lord telleth vs such things as euery man seeth and beholdeth, is bycause it is as much too say, as that wee doo wickedly abuse the sight that hee hath giuen vs, forasmuch as wee profyte not by the beholding of his creatures, too magnifie him in the power that he sheweth there. Therefore although it bee no greate matter (too our seeming) too knowe that the sea and the waters are so restreyned, that the earth perisheth not : yet notwithstanding it is greate wisdome too conceyue well thereby that God therein declareth him selfe too bee our father and protector, giuing vs such experience of his goodnesse and power, as it becommeth vs not too be asleepe at it. When wee haue these things well printed in our myndes, wee haue profyted well, not onely for a day or twoo, but also for all the tyme of our lyfe. For as the Scripture sayeth, it is perfect wisdome too marke well Gods woorks, and too refer them too their ryght end.

Now it followeth immediatly, that the pillers of beauen shake, and that he maketh them afraid at his voice. After that Iob hath spoken of the order that is dayly seene in the world, he addeth immediatly, that me see such mouings in the thunders and tēpests, and that God maketh the heauē and ayre so to shake, as it seemeth that all should sinke :

which thing is done after an other diuers maner, to make vs perceyue his mighty power and strength, at leastwise if we had wit and reason to consider it. Surely heuen is not vpheld with any pillers, but it is a similitude that Iob vseth heere, bycause, greate palaces and houg buildings which cannot stay vp themselues, are borne vp vpon pillers: like is if a man should builde a greate temple, it had neede to haue pillers to beare vp so greate a weyght. Euen so is it with the heauens, which seeme to be as a building that requireth to haue pillers, and yet it hath none: 10 but the power of God suffiseth this building wherevnto men cannot attayn. And in good sooth what power haue men to build, but by following that, which God hath shewed them: and yet is the same but a small spark of the infinite power and wisdom that are in him. Men then cannot make a hall of an hundreth foote in length and bredth, without pillers: but beholde the heauen is of infinite space in comparyson, and yet we see it is borne vp by the only power of God. Therefore where as Iob speaketh of pillers: his meaning is, that if it please God too 20 send any tempest or thunder, the ayre roreth with it, and it is after a sort as if the foundations and pillers of heauen were shaken, to the end we might knowe, that God is hygh aboue all, and dwelleth there too gouerne all things. Not that he is shet vp there (as I sayd) but to the intent that therby wee might take warning to lift vp our harts and mynds, and to think vpon him to honour him with all reuerence and humilitie, and not imagin any fleshly and earthly thing of him. VVe see then that Iobs meaning is, that like as God on the one side, sheweth 30 vs his power by holding the Sea as it were in Cheynes, and by limiting it within bounds which it cannot ouerpasse, so on the other part, when it pleaseth God to make the thunder to rattle, and to moue any tempest in the ayre, then it seemeth that all should go to wrecke, and that nothing should be able to stand any longer. Thus ye see another particular wherin God maketh vs to perceyue his mightie power. And truly the heathen men had good skill to confesse the same, not through any fineness of wit, but only by common experience, saying that 40 when men heare the thunder and tempests, they must (maugre their harts) bee fayne to feele some inckling of the Godhead. Lo how the heathen men haue spoken. Yea and euen the despizers of God, filthie and beastly folk, which seeke nothing but to mocke al religion, blearing out the tounge at God and at all that can be sayd concerning his gouernement in the order of nature: euen they (I say) are abasshed at the hearing of the thunderclappes, as experience sheweth vs. VVhy so: Bycause our Lord giueth a token of his excellent power. And that is 50 the reason why Iob, (besides his discourse of the cotinual order of nature,) addeth now further the tempests, thunders and lyghtenings, to shewe that although men despize God wilfully, and be so hardharted as they wil not perceyue what God sheweth them: yet when God maketh the pillers of heauen to quake, flooting forth such thunderclappes as it seemeth that all shall go to wrecke: men are then inforced to conceyue some feeling of the Godhead, and that there is some soueraine power aboue, which ouerruleth all. For things passe not at aduenture, 60 and therefore there must needs bee some will and wisdom that gouerneth them. Lo to what purpose this sentence is alledged to vs. And therby we be warned, first how brutish our nature is. Is it not a pitie, nay rayther an ougly thing, that whereas wee bee reasonable creatures, yea and seeme to haue such wisdom as wee should bee able to comprehend all things, and thervnto God giueth vs so greate signes of his maiestie bothe aboue and beneath, manifesting himself vnto vs, and being alwayes at hand with vs, yea and vttering himself after so familiar a maner vnto vs, as wee can with no more, yet notwithstanding, we ouerpasse it, so as the thing entereth not into vs, no not although we be warned of it neuer so much? See yee not a greate and outrageouse frowardnesse? So then let vs vnderstand, that wee be so vntoward of nature, as all our seeking is to deface Gods glorie, and when the same is manifested vnto vs, we shet our eyes against it, and wil not perceyue it. VVherfore let vs assure our selues, that as oft as God lighteneth or thundereth from heauen, it is a playne vpbrayding of vs, as if he should say: ye cursed creatures, I haue planted you in the world, I haue giuen you the earth to dwell vpon, and I haue furnished you with all good things there: and yet notwithstanding whereas I haue ben liberall towards you to shewe my self a louing and mercifull father: you knowe mee not, you haue quenched all that beneficialnesse through a certain spitefulnesse and wilfulltubbornnesse of your owne, and all your seeking is to darken the lyght that is before your eyes. Seing the case standeth so, I must bee fayne too come too you after a terrible maner, and too summon you to make you to feele (spyte of your teethe) that yee cannot eschew the incomprehensible maiestie that is in mee. Thus ye see that the thing which we haue to marke when thunders rise in the ayre, and when there is any other tempest: is that it is as much as if God should cast vs in the teethe with our frowardnesse and vnthankfulnesse, in that wee take no profit by the common and continuall order that is seene in heauen and earth, as in veye deede wee cannot open our eyes, but God sheweth himself to vs in all things. And heere ye see also to what intent these things are reherfed vnto vs, and that whereas the scripture hath spoken to vs of the generall order which is in the world, and which is seene ordinarily of all men: it setteth downe also the extraordinary, according as heere is mention made of the thunders. And by and by after it is sayd, that he clyueth the Sea by his myghtie power, and appeaseth the pryde of it by his vnderstanding. Heere Iob repeteth that which he had sayd afore. True it is that it is another spyce of Gods power, when he sayeth that he clyueth the sea. For when the waues heaue vp themselues, it seemeth that the sea should rush vpon vs and swallowe vp all. But when a man is in the middes of it, hee seeth a dreadfuller sight. For the waues seeme to be as mountaines, and the space berwixt them to be as a gulf, and yet there is no bottom to bee seene. That is it that Iob ment in saying, that God clyueth the sea, and afterward appeareth the pryde of it. And that suddayne change serueth too shewe Gods myghtie power the better. For if a man be in the midds of the Sea, in a greate tempest, and see so houg and hygh mountaynes of water: he thinketh not that the sea may bee calmed, not onely within the space of twoo or three houres, but also not within a whole yeare after. It seemeth an impossibilitie, that so greate and contrarie a change, should insue so shortly. And yet for all that, a man shall see that after the Sea hath ben so turmoyled, it becōmeth calme and quiet within a while. Seing then that things do change so suddainly, cannot men see the wonderfull power of God? This is it that Iob met to vtter here. And therevpon we may gather, that his intent was to expresse more cleerly and to aduaūce more highly the thing that he had sayd afore. For generally he had sayd, that God had bounded the Sea: and now he sayeth that he clyueth it by his mightie power. Thervpon he sayeth further, that God hath garnished the heauen by his spirit, and shapēd the serpētie Serpent. VVhen he speaketh heere 80 of the

of the Serpent, he meeneth not any of the Serpents that are on earth: for to what purpose should he haue matched them with the heauen? But he speaketh of the number of Starres which are commonly called the Serpent, bycause those Starres stand in a writhen rowe, after the maner of a Serpent that wrytheth his tayle. By reason of that wrything, that figure or shape hath ben termed by the name of a Snake: and that is, to the end that men might the better discern Gods woorkes asunder, one from another. True it is, that folk haue intermedled fables, yea euen wicked fables. For the diuell hath alwayes had this knacke with him, too turne men aside from the creation of the world, where they haue a singular auouchment of Gods maiestie. Neuerthelſſe the verye first vsing of the terme Serpent or Snake, was but only to teache men to looke the better vpon the order of the Starres. Again when as Iob sayeth heere, that God garnished the heauens by his spirit, vnder one kind he comprehendeth the whole. And what are those Ornaments? what are those beautifyings? They are (sayeth he) the Starres which giue fashyon too the heauen: for without them it were a waste thing, and our sight should be confounded. But forasmuch as we haue the Sunne by day, and the Starres by night: therby we know the better, that God thought it not ynough too haue made the welkin only in respect that it was necessarie for vs to haue ayre wherby to breathe, and also brightnesse to giue vs light from aboute: but also ment morcouer to adde ornaments therunto. Therefore his setting of the Starres in the skye, and his decking of it with such beautie, is to the end that we should be the more prouoked to magnifie him in his goodnesse, wisdome, and mightie power, and finally that wee should glorifie him by all meanes.

So wee see now, that Iobs setting of Gods woorkes before vs, was to witnesse, that he on his part had not liued in the world as the heathenish and skornfull sort do, which yeeld God no reuerence ne acknowledge his power and might to honour the same: but that he had printed it euery whit in his hart and mynd. Herewithall also we be warned, not to shet our eyes when God sheweth himself after that fashyon vnto vs, least the same vnthankfulnesse be cast in our teethe, namely that we be woorse than brute beastes for our inioying of Gods inestimable benefits without yielding him any honour or seruice for them. And now for a conclusion Iob sayeth, that the outleetes of his wayes are there: and yet what peece of them doo wee conceyue? Or who is he that can comprehend his dreadfull power? Lo heere a conclusion that is woorthie to be well marked, according to the greate weyght thereof. For it is to no purpose for vs to behold Gods woorkes, except we conclude determinatly, that they passe all our vnderstanding and reache, and that they be so greate and hygh things, as we must of necessitie be dazeled at them. For when a man applyeth his whole studye too knowe God bothe in heauen and earth, and would fayne glorifie him in all his woorkes: if he thinke it possible to know all, surely he dishonoreth God. Can we do God a greater dishonour, than to go about to incloze his myghtie power within the capacitie of our wit? It is more than if a man would take vpon him too shet vp bothe sea and land in his owne fist, or to hold them betweene a cupple of his fingers: surely it is a greater madnesse. For the

heauen, and the earth, are not so greate things as the Iustice, power wisdome, and goodnesse of God: they bee but little marks of them. So then although men bee neuer so diligent in searching Gods woorkes: yet if they think themselues so sharpwitted as to atteyne to them, or so selfwise as to say, I knowe as much as is to be knowne, and I see now perfectly how good and wise God is: behold there is shamefull wrong offered him. VVherfore let vs marke well, that the chief point which wee ought to beare in mynd in considering Gods woorkes, is to be-think vs of our owne weaknesse, and to knowe that our owne wit is to feeble to mount so hygh, so as wee must bee fayne too confesse with Dauid, woonderfull are thy woorkes o Lord, and who can reckon them vp vnto thee? True it is that Dauid reckoneth them well, instructing others to thinke well vpon it. Howbee it, after he hath sayd what he can: he addeth in the end, Lord who is it that can attein to them? Euen so is it sayd now in this streyne. Behold the Owtleets (sayeth Iob): these (sayeth he) are but the suburbs. For if we will enter intoo the hart of Gods woorkes, wee shall neuer atteyne too it. VVe bee to slowe and to lumpish to mount vp so hygh. VVe bee not so lythe as to retch out ourselues so farre and wyde: nother haue wee such a liuely nuffe in vs, but that all our wits must bee fayne to be ouerwhelmed. So then, when we haue applyed all our indeuer throughly to knowe Gods woorkes how excellent they bee: if wee atteyne not to the perfection of that knowledge, let vs remember our selues, that wee haue found but only the Owtleets, and that it is impossible for vs to come to the depth of them. For our capacitie wil not serue vs therto. VVe bee to grosse and weake, and there is but a small peece of that in vs which is in him: insomuch that if the Angels of heauen came and preached vnto vs, yet could they shewe vs but a small part of Gods woorkes. And what shall mortall creatures then do heere bylowe? Sith it is so: let vs lerne too magnifie God in such wyse, as nothing may lette vs too yeeld him his due prayse. For although wee should all the tyme of our lyfe, imploy our whole witte too the glorifying and magnifying of him: yet were it impossible too discharge ourselues of the hundredth part of the dutie that we owe vnto him.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, that with hartie repentance and desire of forgiuenesse, wee may beseeche him to amend our misdooings, and to ridde vs more and more of our vyces, too the end that whyle wee liue in this world, wee may inioy the greate good that he doeth vs, in applying the same to ryght vse, namely to the seruing and honoring of him in such wyse, as wee may not haue our eyes shet when he sheweth his maiestie after so euident a fashyon. And forasmuch as wee bee as it were dazeled in our owne vnderstanding: let vs beseeche him too inlyghten vs by his holie spirit, and too waken vs from the drouzinesse wherein wee bee, that wee may not seeke any thing else, than too spend our selues in his seruice, and to incorage others thereto by our example, so as he may bee exalted and magnified of all men with one common consent, as he deserueth. And for performance thereof, let vs pray him to rayse vp true and faithfull ministers of his woord &c.

I Ob tooke vp his parable againe, and sayd.

1. God liueth, vvhich hath takē away my ryght, the almightie vvhich hath set my soule in bitternes.
3. So long as my breath shall continue, and the spirit of God is in my nozethrills.
4. My lippes shall speake no vvhickednesse, and my tounge shall vtter no deceytc.

Here we haue still the same matter that hath ben treated of heretofore. For Iob vpholdeth, that he was not afflicted for the faults which he had committed, but that there was some secret reason, and that if he list to debate and pleade the matter, he could iustifie his case, not against God, but against such as would beare him downe that hee was a wicked man, and conclude that the afflictions which he indured, were bycause of the greatnesse of his sinnes. Iob then vpholdeth, that the cause which moued God to punish him, was not that he was wickedder than other men: but for some secret and vnkowne reason to men, and therefore that it behoueth them to mount hygher, than to the ordinarie iustice of God that is shewed in his lawe. Now we see what the groundwoork of this chapter is. And therefore it is sayd, that Iob tooke vphis parable new againe. And to the intent that the thing which he sayeth may be of the more authoritie, he beginneth with a protestation that importeth an othe. God (sayeth he) liueth, vvhich hath taken away my ryght, euen the Almighty hath set my soule in anguish: and yet for all that, I will neuer swarue. And whereas I haue maynteyned my self too bee ryghtuouse: that was not through any pryde, nor for any hypocrisie, nor of any sturdinesse, nor for that I knew not that God myght afflict mee after that sort: but bycause I am not such a one as you make mee to be, nother will I euer graunt that Gods punishing of mee is for my desertes, at leastwyse if I be compared with other men. For you pretend a false and wicked thing: which is, that God handleth men in this world and in this present lyfe according to their woorthinesse and deseruings. But it is not so: for God doeth oftentymes deferre the punishments which he intendeth to lay vpon men, so as they be not perceiued till after their death. And on the contrarie part, diuers tymes he pretendeth signes of greate rigour against those whom he loueth, & which haue serued him faythfully. Therefore we must not make too much haste of Gods iudgements, nor think them to be executed at the first brunt: for then should God be vniust. VVe see things disordered at this present: and what a thing were it if we looked and hoped not for a redresse hereafter in tyme too come? God were worse than blind. For we haue skil ynough to say, that things go not as they ought to do. Then doeth it folowe that eyther God knoweth not what he doeth, or else that we must hope that he will one day iudge the world. And where as we hang in suspence, and our minds are hild in doubt, by reason that things are so confuzed: therein it is Gods will to exercise vs, and to shewe vs that as now is the time of our warre fare. Therefore like as in a battell a man knowes not who hath wōne or lost so lōg as blowes are given on bothe sides, and men are yet afrayd, but it is the victorie that sheweth who getteth the vpper hand, euen so must all things needs bee confuzed in such hurlyburlye of the world, insomuch that to mannes iudgement it canot be perceiued nor hoped that God will set things in their ryght state againe. No verely: and yet must wee wayt that he will do it neuerthelessse, howbeit nother to day nor tomorowe. Now doeth Iob hold an opinion here which seemeth straunge: which is, that God hath taken and plucked his ryght from him. For he seemeth heere to pleade with God in defence of his owne rightuoufnesse: and secondly to accuse God of crueltie and outrage. Thus see yow two things which might bee verye straunge, if Iobs intent were not knowne. But let vs marke, that when he sayeth that God hath bereft him of his ryght, he meeneth not that God vseth a tyrannicall maner of dealing with him, nother meeneth he that himself is so rightuouse that God had not cause to punish him yet more rigorously: but rather he hath an eye too the ordinarie rightuoufnesse that is written of in the lawe, and too the purpose of such as had condemned him. For (as I haue sayd) Iobs freendes went no further than thus: namely, God punisheth such as haue doone amisse, and is the father and Saniour of good mē: Therefore it foloweth that Iob is a wicked man, and a despizer of God, and that all his life is out of order. And why? For men see he is punished with extremitie. If ye marke all the aduersities that happen commonly in this world, they bee not so greates as this is: and therefore it must needes be concluded, that God hath found this man to bee an outrageous sinner aboute all the rest. Lo what conclusion Iobs freendes made. But they delt yet worse: for they rested vpon the curses that are in Gods lawe, imagining that all of them must be accomplished in this present life, and that there is no more reward for the good and for the seruers of God after death, and that it is not to be thought that the wicked shall be punished any where else than here. This is an ouerthwart expounding of Gods lawe. For although our Lord threaten that he will punish offenders: he meeneth not to restreine himself to any certaine time. True it is that this is ordinarily seene in this present lyfe, howbeit not continually: wee must not make a generall rule of it without exception: for that were a bringing of God to much vnder coram. So then we see, that Iob had the better end of the staffe against his freendes: and therefore let vs beare in mynd how it hath ben told afore, that it standeth vs in hand to haue greate discretion in iudging of the afflictions that God sendeth, as well vpon ourselues as vpon our neyghbours. For if we should confter Gods loue towards vs, according too his present handling of vs: it were ynough to make vs despaire at euery blowe. True it is, that if he punish vs, wee be alwayes well worthie of it: but howsoever the world go, if we should imagine that God hateth vs bycause he hadleth vs roughly: alas, what a thing were it: VVe could not call vpō him, we could not haue any cōfort to assuage our sorow: & so ye see we should be vtterly vndone. VVherfore it behoueth vs to be so wise as to know that Gods afflicting of men is not alwayes for their sinnes, but bycause he is minded to exercise their paciēce, to tame their fleshy lustes, to bring the wholly vnder his awe, & to teach the, that in this present life they must no more but journey through this world, as if he told the that their rest & heritage is not here. And if we deale otherwise, it will be ynough to cast as many of vs in despaire as do suffer aduersitie. like as it was not lōg of Iobs freendes that they vtterly ouerwhelmed him not by standing vpon this point, that God punished him for some greates sinnes. For Iob at the hearing of such words, might haue bē caught with such a feare, as he should not haue knowne what to do else, thā to haue takē himself for a dāned & cursed mā. And so ye see how we also should do.

Were there no more but this pryde in condemning of innocents, what a thing were it? So then let vs remember well how it is sayd in the Psalme, that blisfed is that man which iudgeth discreetly of him that is in aduersitie: so that if we see Gods chastizements, we may profit our selues by them, not looking only vpon such as suffer hardnesse, but also vpon our selues. Moreover let vs not alwayes measure mennes sinnes by their afflictions: for oftentymes the good are handled roughlyer than the bad. Therefore it behoueth vs to examin mennes liues 10 thoroughly before we fall to concluding too say, Such a man is punished of God for some greate sin that is in him. But we do know who be wicked? do we see that God punisheth them? Let vs stand in awe, knowing that God setteth them before vs as a looking glasse and as a lyuely image to shewe vs what shall befall vs, and what we haue to feare, if we returne not vnto him. But if a man haue liued well, and wee perceyue not why he is punished: let vs hold ourselues short, and tary Gods 20 leysure till he shewe vs his iudgement, and let vs not be ouerhastie in the meane while. For whosocuer holdeth not himself still, it is certayn that he mayperuert Gods iudgements at euery turne by misjudging them, and consequently he shall vsurp the authoritie that belongeth to God alone. And so let vs come again to that which Iob sayeth now: which is, God hath bereft mee of my iudgement. VVhat is the meening of these wordes? As I haue sayd afore, Iob meeneth not that God vseth a tyrannicall fashion in dooing so. Marke that for one point. And again, he meeneth not that he hath so good right on his side, as 30 that he shall be able to get the vpper hand, and to cleere himself not to haue doone amisse, when the matter shall come to debating. But he declareth only, that the affliction which he endureth, is as a thicke and dark clowd, which bereeueth him of the knowledge of the vprightnesse that was in him: and therefore that his aduerlities are not the punishments wherewith God manaceth the transgressors of his lawe. And for the well vnderstanding hereof it behoueth vs too call to remembrance howe it hath ben declared alreadye, that the threatenings which 40 are conteyned in the lawe, (as that God will punish men bothe in their persones, and in their goods, and in their household, and in their cattell,) are not cotinual: that is to say, although God punish with diseases, with warres, with death, with famin, with drought and with other such like things: and although he punish the offenders, and despyzers of his woord: yet doeth it not happen so alwayes after one rate. VVhy? For oftentymes afflictions are common bothe to good and bad. And why then doeth God threaten after that sort? It is to shewe that he 50 hath a iudgement to come. As now he giueth but some signes and tokens of it, for if he should performe all his iudgements perfectly heere beneath, what would become of it? There would be no more hope. To what purpose should the coming of our Lord Iesus Christ serue? Or what would become of the confession of our sayth, where we say, I beleue the Resurrection of the flesh, and the life euerlasting? Now we knowe that our present lyfe is transitorie and corruptible: and not only that, but also that it is subiect to manye miseries. Then 60 haue we not the felicitie that God promifeth vs: but that is hidden from vs. And therefore it behoueth that the wicked also be punished but in part as now, and that God giue them respite, and reserue the damnation which they haue deserued, vnto the last day wherein Iesus Christ shall iudge the world fully. And then shall this saying of Esay bee fulfilled, that all knees shall bow before the maiestie of God. The same thing is doone now, how-

beeit but partly. Then is it sufficient that as now he giueth vs but some inckling that he is iudge of the world. But let vs returne too Iobs wordes. How doeth God bereue men of their right? It is by punishing them in such wyse, as they may seeme to be vterly reiected, and by bending himself against them as his mortall enemies. Forthen (too outward appeerance) it cannot bee sayd but that men are wicked and accursed. And why? For wee must hold this for a maximee and generall rule, that God is good. And so it must needes bee sayd, that such as are his enemies, are euill. Now then, if wee see a man afflicted with such extremitie, as it may seeme that God is vterly inflamed against him, and his wrath is precysely bent against him: according to our naturall reason wee can conceyue none other, but that such a one is the enemy of God. Iob therefore meeneth that his ryght was bereft him, bycause God had set his soule in anguish as he himself addeth: The almyghtie (sayeth he) hath set my soule in anguish. For so long as wee perceyue not the cause why God hath punished him so, so long his ryght is as it were buryed, insomuch that he may seeme to the world to bee a wicked and detestable persone. But let vs marke well, that he speaketh heere after the common opinion, and meeneth not that God hath not ryghtfull reason so too doo, specially in his owne secret purpose, but that it behoueth vs too mount vp hygher, and too styte above all the thicke and dark clouds that darken the lyght, or else wee shall neuer knowe Iobs ryghtuoufnesse. So wee see there is a double ryghtuoufnesse in God: the one which is manifest vnto vs bycause it is conteyned in the lawe, and also hath some agreement with the reason that God hath giuen vs: and the other which passeth all our vnderstanding. Therefore we comprehend not this but by fayth, and wee must rather honour it as a thing hidden from vs, wayting for the coming of the latter day, wherein wee shall see the things face to face, which are now dark and hidden from vs. The ordinarie rightuoufnesse of God which is conteyned in his lawe is his voutfasing to succour vs at our neede, and his shewing that he hath a care of our welfare when we feare him and serue him. For if wee walk in his obedience, accounting him for our father: then doeth he also shewe, that he auoweth vs to bee his. All the benefits that the saythfull receyue at Gods hand in this world for walking in his feare, are as it were ratifyings of the sayd ordinarie rightuoufnesse that is conteyned in the lawe. True it is that wee can neuer deserue that God should pitie vs. For whatsoever wee doo, yea euen when wee bee governed by his holie spirit, it is certain that our woorks are still 60 foyled, and that God may of good ryght reiect them. As for of our selues, wee are not able to thinke one good thought: But although God gouerne vs, and although he woork in vs: yet is there alwayes some faultinesse in vs, and we mingle our owne infirmitie in such sort with the grace of his holie spirit, as al that euer proceedeth from vs is defiled. Then can wee not deserue aught at Gods hand.

Howbeeit forasmuch as hauing once called vs, he spareth vs, and forgiveth vs the vices that are mingled with the good desire that wee haue too serue him: he doeth still reward the saythfull that haue indeuered to followe him and his will, I say he rewardeth them in this world, and sheweth that he did not shet his eyes at the good zele that they had to submit theselues to him, but alloweth it & liketh wel of it. Ye see the how God manifesteth his ordinarie rightuoufnes by fauoring those that are his & haue fully submitted theselves vnto him, at least wise so farreforth as the weaknesse of their flesh will beare. For when I say fully, I meene not perfectly in all points, but vnfeynedly, according also as the holie scripture speaketh. But contrarywise when God punisheth whoremongers, theeuers, and drunkards: euen that also is his ordinarie rightuousnesse. If wee see a wicked man that shall haue fleeced his neyghbours, and playd the cruell beaste in eating vp and deuouring other mennes goods, and God bloweth vpon his substance, so as nothing remaineth to him: the same is a true shewe of Gods Iustice, 10 and an assured warrant that euill gotten goods waste away: and it maketh vs too acknowledge that God is a iudge. Again when murthers be punished likewise, we consider how it is written, that the cruell man shall not liue out half his dayes. and so is it also with other misdooers. VVe see how skorners skoffe at God, and repine at him, and aduance them selues against him with excessiue rage: and God ouerthroweth them. Sith then that wee see the wicked so punished already in this world: ought we not to thinke that it is God which sheweth himself to be the iudge in so dooing? Ought not the heare to stand vp vpon our head when wee perceyue him too stretch out his arme so mightly to execute his Iustice? Thus ye see Gods ordinarie Iustice, that is to wit, the Iustice which we perceyue [to be executed] according as it is conteyned in his lawe. But herewithall wee see also that good men are afflicted, that God impouerisheth such as haue indeuered too walk soundly, and that the man which is not giuen to any wickednesse, doeth neuertheless linger in peyne all his life long, so as he hath much 30 a do to go vpon his leggs. And how comes that to passe? what is the cause of it? VVe cannot tell, nother are we able to determine. And why? For God reserueth the reason to himself. This therefore is no point of his ordinarie Iustice, nother must it be measured all after one rate.

Again, we see the wicked in prosperitie, and that not only for a day or twoo (as hath ben sayde afore): but for all the the time of their life. Yea and euen when they die, it is as it were with laughter, and they go away as it were in a slepe. For they bee taken out of the world in the turning of a hand, without any long pynning or suffering of much peyne. And what meeneth that? Truly we must not blame God with vnrightuousnesse, wee must not sharpen our toung against him. But it behoueth vs to knowe that he hath a hygher kind of Iustice or rightuousnesse than our wit can reache vnto, and wee can neuer atteyne vnto it, but the reason must still bee hidden from vs. Neuertheless we must not ceasse too honour his secret iudgements, and to submit our selues vnto 50 him, in wayting till he discloze the thing vnto vs, which he reserueth as yet to him self in his owne secret determination. Lo how God hydeth mennes right from them. So then according to that which wee haue sayd, if a man be punished after that sort, what will bee sayd, but that he is a wicked person? And yet for all that, he is not so. True it is that all men are sinners, and God might iustly destroy vs and damne vs when he listeth: but he will not doo it. For he reknowledgeth his owne for rightuouse, and layeth not their finnes to their charge. 60 True it is also that to bee acquit, it behoueth them too condemne themselves before God: and yet will he acquit them howsoeuer the world go. Notwithstanding, he chastizeth them in the meane while. Too what purpose? Is it to destroy and vndoo them? No: but he hydeth their right, that is to say, he sheweth not openly that he accounteth them as his children, nor that he hath forgiven their offences: and yet hath he doone it, notwithstanding that our wit be not able to comprehend it. Furthermore let vs mark also, that Iob hath a further eye to the vntoward misweening and false opinion that men conceiue in being ouerhaultie when they tarrie not patiently till God shewe them wherfore he afflicteth those that are his. For if we were so discreete and modest as not to giue sentence of condénacion vpon such as are afflicted, we shuld not find Gods proceedings straunge, nother should we say that God withholdeth the right. But as soone as wee see a poore man greatly afflicted: by and by euery one of vs rush at him and condemne him. Such perplexities therefore are a cause that a mannes right is buried. For to our seeming God ought at the first dash to maynteyne the case of such a one as is rightmynded before him. Neuertheless he doeth it not, but maketh countenance otherwyse. So he reserueth the iudgement to him selfe in suffering men to iudge amisse of vs, and to speake amisse of vs, and as it were to abhorre vs, and in letting vs alone in that plight as good as ouerwhelmed. And 20 marke the cause why it is sayd that he will make the ryghtuousnesse of his seruants too shyne fourth as the breake of the day. The giuing of this promis is not as much to say as it shall alwayes bee performed to eyght: for it behoueth vs oftentimes to abyde shame and reproche. Yea and Sainct Paule himself sheweth it, I say euen he that had liued in angelicall perfectnesse, sheweth that he was subiect therevnto, and not only that he was cast vp too many slauderouse reproches, touching his owne pryuate life: but also that he was misreported as touching his office: infomuch that wheras he had handled the doctrine faytfully and purely, yet notwithstanding men were so vnthankfull, as they ceased not to report euill of him. VVell (sayeth he) I appeale to the day of our Lord which is to come. He sheweth that oftentimes in this world there shal be the troubles that are mentioned heere, so as a man shall not bee able too discern betweene whyte and blacke, but the best seruers of God shall bee slaudered and wronged. And why is that? Bycause that when men see them afflicted, they alwayes 40 conster it in euill part, according to mannes inclinacion which is giuen to misdeeming. Then let vs mark well, that God doeth then berecue men of iudgement, when he appeereth not at the first brunt, eyther to defend vs or to shewe that he holdeth vs for rightuouse: and when he taketh not our case in hand, but suffereth vs too bee condemned by men: and finally when he increaseth our afflictions more and more, and therevpon men harden themselves against vs, that is too say, becommen so peruerse, as to iudge all things contrarie to the ground of them, and to garher so much the more boldenesse too them saying: O, I may well say it, for may not men see still how he is haulted? Thus ye see the good men are ourfore oppressed, and God shrinketh aside, and maketh no countenance of accounting them for rightuous, but rather seemeth to warre against them, and to intend to condemne the aboute all others. Now then we see that Iob blasphemed not God in saying that he had bereft him of his right. And we see after what sort it behoueth vs to make our profit of this excellent doctrine. Then let vs vnderstand, that God may oftentimes berecue vs of our right, and yet wee shall not haue wherof to accuse him, or to complayne of him, nother shall we amend our case by pleading against him. For he hath his secret rightuousnesse which it behoueth vs to honour, till he make vs to know it. His mind is to exercise vs at yet in lowliness: and when he woorketh after so straunge a fashyon towards vs, as we cannot vnderstand it: he doeth it too keepe vs in awe, and too make vs too glorifie him in saying, saying, True it is Lorde that I am here as a poore blinde soule in the darke, and I see not a whit in this behalf: but yet art thou rightuouse. Although thy iudgements bee a bottölesse pit in this cace, so as I cannot enter into them: yea and although I be as good as buried in death, yet will I confesse thee to be righteous ô Lorde. VVhen we go so to worke, thê haue we profited by the afflictions that God sendeth vs, whereof the reasons are not apparant vnto vs. Furthermore let vs practise that which Job sayeth here: which is, that if God bereeue vs of our iudgement, wee muste not therefore forebeare to holde him alwayes for our God, and to humble our selues vnder his maieltie, according as it is sayde, the Lord liueth who hath bereft mee of my iudgement, euen the Almighty who hath set my soule in anguish. Here Job playeth not the restie horse. For although he haue dubble anguish: yet knoweth he well that God hath all dominion and superioritie ouer him. For he would not say God liueth, except it were to honour him, as if he should say, Lord I am thy filie creature, and thou hast ail power ouer mee. I sayde he was in double affliction, which thing we ought to marke well. For wee haue seene how he was persecuted both in his goods and in his persone, so that he indured as much as was possible for a mortall wight to indure. And yet had he another affliction, which is, that he was tormented by such as came to moue him to despayre. For it passed all other miseries, to haue it sayd to him, God hateth thee, thou see'st well ynough that thou haste no more accessè to him, it is in vayne for thee to looke for any ease at his hande: for he is against thee, and he giueth thee a sure token of it in afflicting thee after this manner. VVhat shouldst thou do but condemne thy whole life afore passed? if thou wilt haue any mercie at Gods hande, thou muste change altogether, and acknowledge that hitherto thou haste bene starke naught, a mocker of God, and a man full of hypocrisie and lewdnesse. Thus then ye see the two afflictions that Job indured, and yet notwithstanding honored God still. For he sweareth by his name: howbeit not as men do now adayes which blaspheme God in swearing. For doubtlesse what else are the othes that are sworne now adayes for the most parte, but reproches vnto God in despizing his name? Like as if a man sweare at aduerture, he sheweth well that he regardeth not the name of God, which ought to be holy in our sight, that when soeuer we heare any speaking of it, wee ought to caste downe our heads, and acknowledge the infinite glory that is in him. But contrarywise the name of God runneth roundly in our mouthes in way of mockage. And therefore looke how many light othes a man maketh, so many are the reproches and iniuries wherewith he disgraceth the name of God. Againe there are also forswearings, which are yet more heynous: in so much that after a man hath inured himself to sweare foolishly, he goeth forward with it to falsifie the truth & to turne it into a lie, and the name of God shall run in such wise with it, as it shall be a pleasure for mē to thinke vpō it. But Job in his swearing had an eye to the principall poynt: which is, that when wee sweare by the name of God, we must acknowledge him to be our iudge, yeelding him his due authoritie, by setting our selues before his throne to be cōdemned by him if we haue done amisse. VVe see then how Job acknowledgeth his afflictions to come of Gods hande, and dealeth not stubbornly. He kicketh not agaynst his mayster like a restie Iade, but humbleth himselfe and sayeth, God liueth how soeuer the world goeth. True it is that I see my selfe to bee a forlorne man, and I indure so much, as it is impossible for mee to be so patient as I ought to be. Yet will I not be so desperate as to play the mad bedlem, and to say, I know not what God is, I would he would let me alone, and that he had no more power ouer me: but contrarywise I know him to be my iudge, and to haue all authoritie: I will not imbrace the mightie power which he hath ouer me, but I will holde me alwayes vnder his hād, acknowledging my afflictions to be of his sending. And therefore not without cause haue I sayd, that we haue here an excellent doctrine. For we be taught, first to acquaynt our selues with chastizement and correctiō at Gods hād. VVherefore when we happen to be tempted to despayre, and feele such a fearfulnesse in our selues as wee thinke our selues to be already in hell: let vs acknowledge our owne frayltie, & leane vnto this, namely that God hideth our iudgemēt, and bereeueth vs in such wise of our right, as we seeme to our selues to be forlorne, and paste ail recouerie. VVell then, God hideth away our right. And what is to be done? wee must cast downe our heads, and tarie till God lift vs vp by the chin, and redresse our state, and set vs vp againe, and maynteyne our cace: so that if wee bee oppressed and turmoyled by men, if folke bleare out their runges at vs and make a iellingstocke of vs: yet must not we loze our courage. And why? For we see the example that is set downe to vs here. Behold then how the faithfull ought to come to this practise to profite themselves by it. And although they cannot conceyue the reason of the things that God doth to them: yet neuertheless they must alwayes become so lowly, as to say: Lord deale thou with vs as it shall please thee, and therewithall giue vs power to prayse thee alwayes in thy workes, and to say, the Lord liueth although that we be confounded. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this streyne: and now it will bee easie for vs to knowe the things that are contained in it. And sith we haue comprized the whole summe, wee neede no more but to ioyne and cloze the sentences that follow, vnto it. For Job sayeth, that so long as he liueth there shall not passe any deceyte nor wicked woord out of his mouth. Hereby he sheweth, that he speaketh as in the presence of God. And that is a thing well woorthie to be noted. I haue tolde you oftentimes in expounding this booke, how there is an ouercommon vice among mē which marreth them: which is, that they be so wedded to the world, as they neuer come in the presence of God to examine themselves there. As how? If menne blame vs fallily: we rest so much vpon them, as wee enter not into our selues to examine our selues before God. But what is to be done? The cleane contrarie: if we will answer men well, let vs first accuse our selues, and let vs be fully resolved vpon it in our cōscience before God, without hauing an eye to one man or other. For the cause why we be hypocrites in all our doings, and take so much payne to couer & colour our faults, is for that we would fayne keepe still the good reputation and credite that we haue among men. But contrarywise Job sheweth, that he setteth himselfe as it were in the presence of God, and that although he speake before men: yet is he not forepossessed with so foolish ambition, as to pretende to be vterly blamelesse. No: but he iudgeth himselfe before God, and according as he findeth in his cōscience, so layeth he forth the matter openly. So then let vs marke, that it is as euill a thing as can be deuized, to rest so vpon men, and not to begin at this poynt, that is to say, when we iudge not our selues as in the presence of God, ne haue our eyes shet to the worldward, in respect of any opinion that men can conceyue of vs, or of any other thing that can belayde vpon vs. Therefore without hauing respect of any such thing, it behoueth vs to consider our selues in such cace as wee are in before God: and then shall we be rightly meekened, & not speake faynedly nor disguise things, knowing well that we can gayne nothing by so doing. Marke that for one poynt. And further let vs marke well this maner of speach which Iob vseth. So long (sayeth he) as there shall bee any winde or breath in mee, and so long as the spirite of God is in my nozetbrilles. For he speaketh not of his life as though he hilde it without the grace of God. True it is, that we may say, it is a thing common ynough, and no man will denie but we be beholden to God for our breth and for all the liuelinesse that wee haue: but yet for all that, howe many are there that acknowledge it in good earnest? menne liue here after so brutish a fashion, as it might be sayde that they take themselues to be susteyned of themselues and of their owne power. To be shorte, there are very fewe that know rightly, what S. Paule meaneth by saying, that we haue our life, mouing, and being in God: there are very fewe I say, which know that. And therefore let vs marke well how Iob sheweth vs here, that he was not caried away as many men are, who are so dazeled with their passions, as they haue no more skill at all, nother know what they say. True it is that vndiscrete woordes escaped him, (as wee haue seene, and shall see hereafter:) but yet neuerthelesse, he alwayes hilde himselfe vpon the good fundation, and although the buylding were not sureable to the same, yet I say he hild himselfe in the feare and awe of God. And further lette vs marke well this circumstance, that Iob speaketh not at his owne leysure and ease. Yee see he is in such afflictions, as God seemeth to be fully determined to destroy him vtterly: & yet he honoreth him still for his life, acknowledging him to be the partie of whom he hath his lyfe. 30 And I pray you, what excuse shall wee haue if we be not fully resolued thereof, sith that God giueth vs releace too make vs mindefull of his grace, or if wee do not acknowledge and confesse that our life and all that euer dependeth therevpon, procedde of his grace and power? Shall wee not be the more vnexcusable? As oft then as wee thinke vpon our life, let vs remember that it behoueth vs to make the same confessiō that Iob maketh here: namely that there is nother blaste nor breath in me of mine owne power, but it is God that hath giuen me euerywhit of it. True it is that when Iob speaketh here of Gods spirite, we must not imagine as the phantastical sort do, who thinke that the very substance of Gods spirite is in them: for there is not a more abhominabler heresie than that is. And it behoueth vs alwayes to marke fuche maner of speeches in the holy Scripture, to the ende we fall not into such heresie as to say, that Gods spirite is in vs as touching his very substance. For what a thing were that? It should insue that Gods spirite were subiect to ignorance, to change, and to mutabilitie, yea and that he were defiled and stayned with our sinnes and vices. And yet neuerthelesse (as I haue sayde) it is a poynt that hath sore troubled the Christen church: like as the vnhappy Heretike that was punished here, had a conceyt to say that mens foules were parttakers of the substance of the Godhead. But that is a thing so horrible and against nature, as a man must needes be vtterly growne out of kinde, ere he can come to it. So then let vs marke, that the speaking of Gods spirite here, importeth not that the substance of him is in vs: but it is ment of his breathing, that is to say, of that which he inspyreth into vs by his power according as wee see howe the Sunne abideth in the skie, and yet the brightnesse of his beames doth in such wise come to vs, as wee inioy his light and heate. But is that as much to say therefore, that we holde the Sunne here beneath? And in good sothe, when as we see, that the Sunne by his power which he sheadeth downe hither, cheereth the earth in such wise, as it beareth frute and yeeldeth sustenance to the nurrishment of men: what shall the incōprehensible power do which is in God himselfe and in his spirit? Cannot the same spredde out it selfe euen vnto vs, and yet notwithstanding, wee not haue any of his substance? So then let vs marke well, that the very substance of Gods spirite is not in vs: but his power is shedde forth in such wise, as we liue by it, and are confirmed by meanes thereof, knowing that it behoueth vs to holde our life of God, according as it is he onely of whom wee holde all things, by the grace of his holy Spirite. VVherefore lette vs consider, that if we ought to acknowledge Gods grace in the things that concerne this present life: much more ought wee to seeke in him the things that belong to the endlesse lyfe, as the thing wherevnto he calleth vs, shewing vs that wee muste alwayes labour thitherwarde, till he haue deliuered vs from all the bandes and lettes of this present life.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to bring vs so too his lure, that when wee knowe our sinnes, wee may alwayes giue him glorie and prayse, not doubting but that if he scourge vs, the same is for our welfare and soulehealth. And yet notwithstanding lette vs learne to submitte our selues so farre vnto him, as wee may suffer our selues to be brought to nothing in our selues, that we may be strengthened by his hand, yea and that so strongly and mightely, as we may be able to withstande all temptations through the power and meane of our Lorde Iesus Christe, so that both in life and death he may alwayes finde vs obedient children, according as he sheweth himselfe a mercifull father towards vs. That it may please him to giue this grace not only to vs, but &c.

The xcviij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxviij. Chapter.

5. God forbid that I should iustifie you: I vwill neuer giue ouer mine innocencie till I die.
6. I vwill keepe my rightuousnesse, and not forsake it: and my heart shall not vpbrayd me vvith my dayes.
7. Curfed be he that gayne sayeth mee, and vvicked be he that ryzeth vp against mee.
8. For vvhat is the hope of the hypocrite, vvhen he hath heaped vp, and that God plucketh away his soule?

After that Iob hath declared his minde concerning that which hee had sayde, and shewed that he had not blasphemed God, but onely ment that the afflictions which befell him came not by reason of his sinnes, but for some extraordinarie purpose of God which was hidden from menne: he protesteth that he will stande stedfastly in the same minde. And it behoueth vs to marke well this dealing: which is, not to settle our selues determinately vpon any thing, whereof wee bee not well assured aforehand. For that is the poynt wherein the wilfull sort do differ from the good and allowable constant sorte. If an vndiscrete person and such a one as weyeth not things by good reason and aduifement, conceyue a toy in his head: he can neuer bee remoued from it. But yet shall not such a one be named constant therefore: nother deserueth he to be commended. For there is not a worfe poynt, than to maynteyne things without knowing what they bee. It is commonly sayd, that a fooles bolt is soone shotte. But as for him that not onely is haitie in iudging, but also wilfull in maynteyning: he muste needes bee an vnrecoucrable foole. I therefore let vs marke well Iobs proceeding here. For first of all he declared his intent, and shewed himselfe not to be imbrewed with any false opinion, nor to haue any error in all that he sayde, but that he had spoken the pure truth. After the declaring of that, nowe he addeth this protestation, that he will neuer be remoued from his purpose which he knoweth to be rightfull and iuste. So then, whensoever we come to the iudging of any thing, let vs looke neerely to it and sift it throughly. And if we haue not skill ynough to do it, (as it behoueth vs alwayes to acknowledge our owne rawnesse and infirmitie:) lette vs pray God too giue vs the spirite of skilfulnesse and discretion. But when a thing is well knowne to vs, so as we be fully resolued of it: lette vs not wauer any more. For it is a great shame that wilfull persones should sticke so faste to their sonde imaginations, as they cannot bee drawne from them: and that wee should be so soone remoued from the truth when wee know it. There neede none other witness nor iudges too condemne our rashnesse and vnconstancie: than the very wilfull sorte that haue bene so wedded to their owne witte. And why? For if they, after they haue once allowed a thing, doo sticke stoutly to it, and cannot by any meanes be wonne from it: I pray you what is to be done by those to whom God hath giuen the knowledge of his truth? Ought they not at leastwise to imbrace it, and too sticke stedfastly to it, yea and to stande fully resolued vpon it, howe much soeuer men labour to drawe them from it? Lo here the two poyntes that wee haue to marke in this streyne. The one is that wee should not bee haitie too maynteyne the thing that wee haue no skill of, and whereof wee be not well assured: but that wee should first looke through it, and bee discrete to iudge well and rightly. Is it so? that is to say, do we know the matter perfectly? Are wee sure of the truth? Then lette vs take courage to sticke to it, what soeuer come of it, and let vs not be shaken from it. And this declareth to vs the true nature of fayth. For wee beleue not vpon a fickle opinion: at leastwise if we be well grounded in Gods truth. As for such as say, I beleue: and in the meane whyle haue no certaintie of Gods truth, but onely some imagination: it is certaine that they be as it were bewitched by Satan, at leastwise if they be wedded to it, as men say.

Beholde the Turkes, they be sufficiently hardened in their errors: but ought that fastnesse or rather that steellinesse of theirs too bee counted a fayth? No. And why? For there is no certaintie in it. Then behoueth it vs too vnderstande of whom wee holde our doctrine, that is to witte, that wee holde it of God: and wee must be fully perswaded, that it is he which hath called vs to his schole. VVell then, haue wee the sayde certaintie? VVee muste immediatly matche it with a purpose too perseuer in it, that wee bee not as many are, whiche bowe with euery blaste, and forgette what they haue learned afore, as soone as they heare any newe thing I wote not what: whereby they shewe that they neuer did so much as once taste of Gods truth. VVhat is too bee done then? As I haue sayde, the thing that wee knowe to be good muste neuer escape vs, nother muste wee by any meanes bee turned from it: but wee muste so print it in our hearts, as wee may stande in it to the ende. Thus yee see alreadie what wee haue to remember in this texte. And furthermore whereas Iob sayeth heere, God forbidde that euer I should iustifie you: lette vs marke also, that it is no small fault before God, too make countenance of consenting too suche as maynteyne an euill cace and go against the truth. For although a man do it not with his heart, but bee otherwyse minded in himselfe: yet is God blasphemed therein, for wee knowe howe great store he setteth by his truth. So then, if there be any that maynteyne an euill cace, or set themselves against the truth too deface it, or go aboute any wicked practyze: if wee doo but onely make countenance too cleaue vnto them, or to their partakers: it is certayne that wee bee guiltie of the same wickednesse before God. And so muche the better ought wee too minde this lesson, for as muche as now adayes wee see that molte menne make no bones to agree with the wicked, or at leastwyle to beare them good countenance, although they millike of their euill doings. And although they would fayne that they were amended: yet notwithstanding, for auoyding of displeasure, and to shifte off such batteiles as are seene, they make a countenance to bow and yeelde vnto them. As oft as they see the wicked afloate and haue their full scope: they bee fayne too vale their bonnettes too them. And although they vpholde not their euill with full mouthe: yet are they so farre off from speaking against it, as a man would thinke they were adherents and consenters to it. VVee see this so ordinarie in the worlde nowe adayes, as it is very rufull. There is no man that steppes vp to maynteyne good quareiles: but rather it is a common excuse too say, I wil not meddle ouerhastely, I see I shall but bring my selfe in the briers, euery man will bee in my toppe, I will not make it mine owne cace. No? And are wee not woorthie to bee shaken of at Godshand if wee bee loth too maynteyne his truth? But is it not a wilfull renouncing of God, and a separating of our selues from him of sette purpose, when wee giue any token that wee iustifie the wicked, and like of their euill cace? And what thinke wee to doo, or where to become? So then, it is not without cause that Iob speaketh heere with suche vehemencie as to say, God forbidde, and that he abhorreth the iustifying of vnrighteousnesse as a thing that is exceeding haynous. And why? For it is as muche as too ouerturne the whole order that God hath sette. And heere yee see also why the Prophete Esay pronounceth so terrible a curse agaynst suche as call good euill, and euill good: for hee sayeth it is a turning of the light into darkenesse. That then is another poynt which wee haue too marke in this streyne. God forbidde (sayeth Iob) that euer I should iustifie you. And he confirmeth his matter yet better by adding anon after, that cursed mought his aduersarie bee. True it is, that betweene those two verses there is a third: neuertheless it will be good too matche these two sentencs together. Cursed (sayeth he) mought myne aduersarie bee, and wisdged vs be that ryseth vp agaynst mee.

Firste he sheweth himselfe to bee full sure of his hold: for he spiteth ali such as shall intend to strue against him, and desieth them as if he were at warre with them. True it is that a harebraynde person will peradventure vse the like stoutnesse, and aduaunce himselfe agaynst the whole worlde without shrinking awbit. But I haue tolde you afore, that Iob buylded not without laying of a sure and steadie foundation, but was fully resolued in Gods truth. So then, whereas hee nowe desieth all suche as would fight agaynst him: hee sheweth that in such cases there is no playing on both hands, nor no being of neuters to rowe betweene two streames: but we must be eyther on the one side or on the other, without fleeting too and fro, and marche on in true soundnesse, saying is this Gods case? Then must all of vs bee aduocates in it and maynteyne it. Haue we conceyued any wicked quarell? Is there any token that the matter is against the truth? Let vs labour to thrust it downe, and let it not be suffered. For if we dissemble, we cannot denie but we be traytours to God. So then wee see the zeale that ought to be in vs, not onely to confesse the truth when we know it, and to shew that we holde it for good: but also to withstand all errours, and all false and wicked opinions. For it becometh vs to be inflamed with such a stoutnesse, as is shewed vs heere in the person of Iob. Then let vs marke well, that when the doctrine of saluation and the things that belong to Gods seruice and religion do come in question: we muste not onely admitte that which we know to be good and true, yea euen with a teachable and obediēt munde: but also we muste shunne all false opinions that are contrarie to the truth and not lyable vnto it. I say wee muste resist them fierily, and declare that al such as gainesay vs, and agree not with vs are wicked and cursed, that is to say, to be hilde at our hand as enemies of rightuousnesse and truthe, because they refuse to ioyne with vs in the obeying of our God, and are become rebelles, and reiect the truthe. Seing then that they separate themselues in that wise from God, and so breake the true band of all vniū: it behoueth vs to haue open warre with them, & in no wise to agree with them. For as for them that are desirous to please the wicked, and would fayne holde in with them, and therefore (as the Prouerbe sayeth) do holde with the hare, and hurte with the hound: they shewe themselues to beare two faces in one hood, and to play two partes in the enterlude without chaunging of their apparell. But God can abide no such counterfaying. And therefore let vs remember well what is sayde here: namely that the matter standeth not onely in saying, I am contented that suche a thing shall passe, and I will not striue against the truth: but if we wil shewe our selues to like well of Gods truth, wee muste maynteyne it out of hand, and all such as set themselues against vs, must be our enemies, & we must detest them, assuring our selues that there is no more agreement betweene truth and vntruth, than betweene fire and water. Marke then what wee haue yet to note. Iob addeth further, That his heart shall not vpbryde him with his dayes, or that he will not step aside, or that he will not go backe. Astouching the Hebrew woorde, it may be taken to offer reproche: and it may also be taken to wexe yong againe: and therevpon it cometh to be taken to recoyle, or to retorne backe. And this signification agreeth very well, when he sayeth, My heart shall not retye backe, as though it waxed yong againe. And how? Of my dayes: that is to say, of all the time of my lyfe that I haue passed. To bee short, Iob ment to betoken, that he would neuer swarue: but like as he had continued vnto that day to serue God, yea euen in all soundnesse: so he would not thenceforth steppe aside nor runne backe and become another man, but would be alwayes founde the same that he had bene knowne to be. And this is according to that which I haue declared already: namely that for asmuch as God hath bene so gracious to vs, as to enlighten vs in suche wise as we discern betweene good and euill, and know what we ought to followe: it behoueth vs to take heede that wee be not fleeting, nor like wauering reedes, but that wee hold our owne stedfastly. So then, let vs looke well to our selues, and when soeuer God shall haue set vs in a good way, let vs not turne sayle backe againe, but let vs go forward still. Yea and looke howe much the more that any man hath gone forward, let him know that God hath bound him to be so much the more stedfast, and that it is the more to his shame and the heynoufer vnthankfulness in him, if he turne his backe and forsake his good way. Verely as soone as God sheweth vs his will, it behoueth vs to bee taken in loue with it, and to indeuer to profite more and more, and neuer to step aside. Therefore euen at the first day, wee ought to be inflamed to follow Gods truth, as soone as it is shewed vs. But when God hath bene so gracious to a man, as to leade him forth, not for a moneth onely, but for a yeare, three, or ten, so as he hath liued a long while in the knowledge of God and of his owne saluation: if he afterwarde become a rebel and a renegate, and holde not out to the last steppe: is it not a farre greater fault, than if a man that hath not yet taken a good and sufficient deepe roote, shoulde turne away and ouerthoote himselfe through some lightnesse? For if a man haue talted what is good, and anon after do turne away from it: verely he shall not be excused before God: but yet wil men haue pitie vpon him for that he is so turned away before he haue receyued full instruction. But when a man hath folowed the right way a long time, and hath seemed to be of the constanter sort, and yet is withdrawne frō it: what excuse can there bee for him? Thus ye see what Iob ment to expresse in this streyne, by shewing, that seing God had giuen him the grace to walke aright, and he had of long time knowne what is good: his heart should not now turne backe againe. Then let euery of vs learne by his example, to consider well the free fauour that God sheweth vs when he vouchsafeth to draw vs to the pure sayth of his Gospell. For it behoueth vs to thinke, that he hath bound vs more vnto him in so doing, than if all the solemnest couenants in the worlde were passed betwixt vs. Wherefore let vs settle our selues to hold out to the ende when we haue begonne well, and let vs follow the way that God hath set vs in, assuring our selues that it is he that hath reached out his hand vnto vs. And further lette euery of vs reckon well the time, how long it is ago since we knew Gods truth. How? It is a yeere, thre, ten, or twentie since God disclozcd himselfe vnto mee: and how haue I profited since that time? Although I haue not gone so farre forward as were requisite: yet for asmuch as my God hath taken me into his house, and not suffered me to runne quite away, but hath granted me the grace to holde out hitherto: what a thing were it if I should nowe renounce him and giue him ouer? were not that an ouerdamnable vnthankfulness? Lo howe euery man ought to call himselfe to account, that he may confirme himselfe in the stedfastnesse that Iob sheweth vs here in his owne persone. And that is the poynt which wee haue to marke. To be short, wee see in this streyne, that it is not lawfull for Christians in any wise to dissemble, by making countenance that they beleue a thing which notwithstanding they condemne in reason, and whereof they are assured that it is euill. Nother must we vse startingholes. For what colour so euer wee pretend, wee shall alwayes be condemned in our hypocrite. And why? For God loueth truth, and setteth so great store by it, that he wil haue vs to sticke to it, what soeuer come of it. For euen in cōmon matters, although a thing seeme to import no preiudice, harme nor wrong: yet if a man say that he beleeueth it to be so, and in the meane while findeth it cleane contrarie in his heart: he is not to be excused. But when soeuer the doctrine of our saluation, and of the seruing & honoring of God (which are the lightest things that can bee) do come in question:

wee muste not take leaue nor libertie to swaue in that behalfe. For euen in worldly matters it behoueth vs to acknowledge our selues faultie, if we make countenance of consenting vnto that which we mislike. But if we vse such shiftes when Gods truth is impugned by facing it with false & wicked things: besides that we betray God, wee do also indeuer (as much as in vs lieth,) to robbe him of the thing which he hath so knit vnto himselfe, as it can not be separated from him, except he renounce himself: that is to say, of his truth. And so let vs marke well what is shewed vs here by the example of Iob: namely, that when our Lord hath bene so gracious to vs, as to giue vs fayth in our hearts: it behoueth vs to haue our mouth open to make confesion of that which wee beleuee and are sure of, and to preach the same in due time and place. And if wee see that men set themselues agaynst the doctrine which wee know to bee true: let vs resist them to the vttermost of our power, and maynteyne Gods quarrell, except we intende to be false to him. And although this doctrine deserue to bee set out more at length: yet notwithstanding, that which I haue comprized alreadie in small roume, is sufficient. Now let euery man bethinke him how he may fare the better by it: for all the whole matter consisteth in the practizing of it. Let vs come now to that which Iob addeth. What is the hope of the hypocrite (sayeth he) seeing that for all his beaping vp [of goodes] God plucketh away his Soule? Here Iob protesteth, that he is not of opinion, that God punisheth not mens sinnes in this worlde, or that he is asleepe and openeth not his eyes, but letteth things slippe in such wise here bylowe, as all things vniuersally are turmoyled. All things (sayeth he) must come to account in the end, howbeit that men perceyue not Gods iudgements by eyesight at the first dashe. This is in effect the matter that Iob declareth here. It behoueth vs alwayes too beare in minde, what wee haue scene afore: which is, that the parties which stroue against Iob, vphilde that men are handled here according to their deserts, and that God doth euermore shew himself good, louing, and mercifull towards suche as seeke him and loue him: and contrarywise that he foorthwith vtrereth his rigour and vengeance against all such as despyze him, specially which bende themselues against him, and stray out of the good way. But wee see the contrarie: namely that the good are afflicted, and seeme to haue God their enemy, bicause he dealeth exceeding roughly with them, when in the meane while wee see the wicked liue in their delightes and pleasures, triumphing as though God hilde them nicely in his lap. What meeneth that? It is to the ende that by that meane wee should perceyue, that God doth not execute his iustice fully here, but reserueth as well the reward of good men, as the punishment of wicked men, vnto the last day, and out of this life. Iob therefore as now declareth, that although he sayde afore, that God punisheth not the wicked, but afflicteth the godly & seemeth to vse excessiue crueltie against such as haue not deserued it, and contrarywise to flatter the vngodly: yet notwithstanding he intendeth not to robbe God of his office, that he shoulde not alwayes be iudge of the worlde, and watche too gouerne the state of the earth. And how is that? There muste no certaine day be set to him, nother must he be summoned to do his duetie by an houre. But it behoueth vs to tarie his leyzure patiently, and he will make vs too see examples of his iustice one way or other. This is the summe that Iob ment to declare here. And although wee haue scene this doctrine heretofore: yet must it not irke vs to haue it oftentimes repeated, considering that it is one of the chiefe poynts that we ought to sticke vnto: namely that euen in the middes of the troubles of this world, wee ought neuerthelesse to assure our selues, that God suffereth not things to runne to hauocke, nor holdeth with the wicked: although he spare them and forbear to punish them for a time, yet are they in neuer the better taking for that, but are alwayes vnhappie, and there is a secrete vengeance prepared for them, so as it were farre better for them, that God should punish them at the firste pushe, than so deferre their punishment which appeareth not presently. Wherefore let vs learne (which is a thing as needefull as may bee) to be thoroughly perswaded, that although the godly be afflicted, yet cease they not to be happie, in asmuch as they haue recourse to God, and bow downe their neckes too the bearing of the yoke that is layde vpon them, and are sure that though God trie their obediētnesse, yet he ceaseth not to loue them. When we be once perswaded of this: wee haue profited greatly for the whole time of our lyfe. And in good sothe, let vs looke vpon the infirmitie that is in vs. For as soone as we haue any temptacion, we be abashed and dismayd, as there is no comforting of vs. If wee see the wicked prosper, and that God beareth with them more than wee would he should: there is nothing with vs but grating of our teeth, and it seemeth to vs that there is no more hope for vs, but that wee be vtterly decayed in calling vpon God and in seruing him. Againe if our state be not such as our fleshe would wishe it: our courage quayleth, yea and we fall to fretting and chafing against God: and finally we be so combered, as wee cannot assure our selues, that it is for our behoofe to resorte vnto God in the middes of all our miseries, nor assuage our sorowes in that we know that he will alwayes be our fauour and father. Wherefore lette vs fight against our infirmitie, that we may be fully resoluēd thereof. Also on the contrarie, when we see the prosperitie of the wicked, let vs not faynt for it, but let vs alwayes plucke vp a good heart, assuring our selues, that God doth but fat them, as an Oxe or a Hog. For when a man intendeth to kill an oxe, he will fat him: and he will bestowe more cost vpon him when he prepareth him to be drawne to the slaughterhouse, than when he purposeth to labour him in the plough. The like will he do with a hogge. Our Lord then handlieth wicked men in this worlde as Oxen or Swine: he fattereth and pampereth them till they burst againe. But it is to their destruction: and for asmuch as they abuse his goodnesse and paciēce, they do but heape vp the store of wrath whereof S. Paule speaketh by desiring all the benefites which they receyue at Gods hand, during the time that he is so bountifull to them. Then seeing that this doctrine is so profitable vnto vs, and that on the other side it is very harde to bee comprehended: lette vs not thinke straunge of the often repeting of it. For wee haue neede to record this lesson oft, bicause we vnderstand it not at the first sight. Yea and wee haue profited very well, if of all our life long we haue but begonne well to conceyue it: and we forget it againe by and by, though it be dayly reherfed vnto vs. But now lette vs come to Iobs woordes. What is the hope of the Hypocrite when he shall haue heaped vp, and God shall take away his Soule? By these woordes Iob signifieth, that wee must not inclose mans happinesse within his present lyfe. How then may we say that men are happie or vnhappie? we must not haue our eyes fastened vpon this world (for that is a very narrow boundes:) but we must go to death: for that is the poynt where our Lord sheweth vs, that it is to no purpose for vs to haue liued here in ease, to haue hoorded vp much goods, to haue bene in honour and credit, to haue crammed our selues with quietnesse, and (to be shorte) to haue had all our wishes here. God (I say) sheweth in death that, al this

geere was but as a flightfull and vanishing shadow. And therefore if we will iudge rightly of mens states, whether they be happie or vnhappy: lette vs not looke onely to their liuing here, or how they be dealt withal for a twentieth, thirtie, or fiftie yeeres: but lette vs consider that when men passe hence, God calleth them to him, according as it is sayd in the ninetith Psalme, that God causeth them to make but one turne as though they ranne in a ring, and then come home to me yee sonnes of menne sayeth he. Marke what we haue to conceyue in the first place, to the end we be not ouertaken with a false opinion, as all they bee which thinke no further than vpon this present lyfe. For they are rauished incontinently as soone as they see one that is riche, and they say, he hath so much goods, he hath so much of fayre lands, there is nothing but triumphing with him, he is well housed, he hath monie in his purse: againe, such a one is of great credite, well freended, greatly alyed, and another is counted very wise, so as euery man stoupeeth to him. Lo how our eyes shall be dazeled, or rather feeled vp, so as we shall discerne no more, when wee thinke no further but vpon this worlde. And therefore let vs beare in minde what is sayd here, namely that God sheweth by death, that it is to no purpose to haue liued at ease in this world, and that the state of men is not to be esteemed thereby: for that were too fonde a iudgement. And Job sayeth expressly, that although a wicked man haue heaped vp neuer so much, that is too say, put the case that in this life a man had all that euer were possible to be wished: yet must we not thinke him to be in the better case therefore. And why? For what shall become of him (sayeth Job) when God shall plucke away his soule? The woorde plucke sheweth that the death of the wicked is alwayes forcible. Yea truly: although they be as good as rotten in this worlde, so as God suffer them to liue till very age consume them, and they do but droupe half a score yeeres before they die, and although they die exceeding old and full of yeeres: yet are they plucked away. What is the reason? Firste bicause they cannot yeeld themselues to Gods will: and secodly bicause they neuer knew to what ende they were put into this world, that is to wit, to the ende that they should be called away againe vnto God: and much lesse are they sure of the heauenly life and euerlasting heritage that is prepared for vs. Thus do all wicked men want three things: whiche are, that they haue not the skil to obey God, and to suffer themselues to be gouerned by him: they know not the end of their creation, that is to wit, that they were put into this world vpon condition that they should but onely passe through it: and finally they wote not what the heauenly life is, nor that it is the place where wee must haue our rest. And for as much as the wicked haue not comprehended these three things: it is no maruell though they be plucked out of the worlde, and that God is sayne to hale them hence by force, so as they go not to him with a willing minde. Contrarywise, the faythfull being contented to haue liued in his knowledge, departe out of the world willingly, to receyue full fruition of the things that are promised here, and which we hope for. The wicked therefore are plucked away. And yet if we wcy the matter well, it is a thing against nature to be plucked away so. And although the sayde sturdinesse that I spake of, be in all vnbeleeuers: yet notwithstanding, God hath diuerse times inforced the very Paynims to vtter such woordes, as declare vs to bee vnexcusable, if wee shunne death in that wise, and be to much wedded to this present life: And like as a iudge will inforce an offender to confesse what he will haue him, by holding him vpon the racke: Euen so (as I sayd afore) God hath as it were by force wrested a confesion out of the Paynims, to shewe that all suche as die not willingly and with a quiet heart, are as monsters that turne nature quite vpside downe. There is a Heathenman that neuer heard one woorde of good doctrine, who when he was tolde of the death of his sonne, answered, I know that I begate him mortall. Lo here a confesion made by a Heathen man, which is ynough to condemne the whole worlde. It is asmuch as if he had sayde, sith that God hath set vs here: it behoueth vs to wayte after what sorte it pleaseth him to dispoze of vs: so as if he list to take vs hence, we ought to acknowledge that our lyfe must bee subiect to his will. Another Heathen man sayeth, Beholde, I am in this worlde, as if I were sette too be a watchman in a castle, or as if it were sayd to a souldier, come hither, go thither: so hath God set vs here in this worlde with condition to call vs hence when he listeth. The Heathen men that haue spoken after that sorte, are too sufficient witnesses to condemne all such as will replie to set any colour vpon their lewde affections in that case, and to excuse them. And furthermore (as I haue sayde already) lette vs marke that those Heathenmen spake not so, but by constraynt of God: which thing was done, to the ende that wee should haue our condemnation written and pronounced by them, if wee agree not too his will. But now what is to be done? If wee will dispoze our selues to die willingly, and go to rest our selues in God: lette vs learne to knowe the vices that hinder vs, and the remedies to redresse them. Then firste of all lette vs learne to submit our selues vnto God, and let vs not bee so frowarde and madde, as to wishe to exempt our selues from the subiection of him that created and shaped vs.

Beholde, the firste thing wherevnto it behoueth the faithfull sort to apply the selues, is to acknowledge to what end wee be created and shaped. Beholde, God hath all foueraine dominion ouer vs: therefore it behoueth vs to submit our selues vnto him, and to dedicate our selues so wholly too his seruice, as wee may bee alwayes his, bothe in life and death. When a man can so submit himselfe to God with all reuerence and lowlinesse, and so renounce himself as to say, it is meete that thy Creator should haue the vpper hande of thee, and bee thy mayster: that is a good beginning. Truly this lesson might hold vs tacked three dayes, yea and three moneths too. But it is ynough for vs if wee knowe the effect of that which I haue touched, that euery man may thinke vpon it at leysure. Yee see then that the firste lesson which it standeth vs in hande too muze vpon if wee minde to liue and die quietly, and not to bee plucked out of the worlde by force and violence: is to submit our selues to Gods good will. And the seconde is, that wee knowe to what ende and intent wee bee put into this worlde: for without that, are wee not as brute beastes? An Oxe knoweth not wherefore God created him, nother do all other beastes also. But man cannot bee excused. For he hath wit and reason, and God calleth him further than the worlde, to the intent he should knowe that this lyfe is but a wayfaring. The brute beastes knowe not what death is till menne haue brought them to it, and cut their throtes, or till they die of some mischaunce. Then doo not they discerne betweene lyfe and death: but men haue the vnderstanding thereof: yea and our Lorde doth dayly set mirrours of our frayltie before our eyes. Nowe if wee thinke not vpon them, I pray you are wee not tootoo brutch? Nay, which woorse is, the brute beastes muste condemne vs. For although an Oxe know not wherefore he is created: yet doth he still followe some order of nature. Why holdeth he downe his hornes and boweth his necke to beare the yoke, but bycause our Lorde hath giuen him his lesson without will and without vnderstanding, so as the poore beast hath an inclination too do that which is his ductie? And is it not a shamefull thing, that men in the meane while are more stubborne than Oxen, Horses, or Asses? So then lette vs learne wherefore God hath set vs in this worlde, and to what purpose we liue here: that is to wit, to the ende wee should knowe that wee bee set here but as in a iourney, and that wee be lodged and sus-teyned here on earth at Gods colte, and that therefore wee must hang wholly vpon his grace, feeling him to be our Satiour and father, according as he sheweth himselfe towards vs by his doings, when wee bee giuen to serue him. Thus then yee see the second poynt that wee haue to beare in minde, if wee purpose to die willingly, and not to bee plucked hence by violent force of Gods hande. There is a third, which is the chiefest of all: and that is the heavenly life. For death is alwayes terrible to vs of it selfe: and we cannot but be afrayde when a man doth but speake to vs of it, and wee be stryken with some astonishment if wee do but thinke of it. And therefore Sainct Paule sayeth, that we desire not death, and that it is impossible for a man to bee brought to desire to die: we shunne it as much as is possible. And why? For God hath imprinted a feeling in vs, that death is a curse and as it were a disseating of nature, and a chaunging of Gods order from that which it was before man sinned. So then, wee cannot but shunne death, euen bycause it is contrarie to our fleshe, and the terror thereof disinayeth vs by reason of the knowledge that God hath giuen vs.

 And therefore Sainct Paule in the forealledged chapter sayeth, that wee desire death, not in respect of it selfe, but bycause we know that as yet we are but as it were in trasitorie dwelling places. VVhat is our bodie? It is so cor-ruptible a thing, that the leaues of a tree are not so soone rotten as wee bee. But wee knowe that there is a house prepared for vs, and that when we be restored to the hea-uenly glorie, wee shall be lodged, not as in a little shedde vnder leaues that are soone rotten, but in an euerlasting house that is full of glorie. Seing then that wee knowe that God calleth vs to so happie a life, and giueth vs assurance of it in our Lorde Iesus Christe: wee neede not to shunne death, sith that thereby wee enter into the full possession of our saluation.

To be shorte, wee come not to death as the vnbeleuers do. The vnbeleuers say, I knowe not whither I go. If they haue any opiniõ of the immortalitie of their soules: eyther they mulde needes be dismayed at it, when they know that God shall be their iudge: or else they shall be fotted in such wise, as they shall thinke there is no better lyfe than this. But for our part, it behoueth vs to knowe, that God hath created vs after his owne image and like-nesse, to the intent to gather vs vp to himselfe, and that we should be sure that he will do it, if wee referre our selues wholly vnto him, following the example that our Lorde Iesus Christe sheweth vs. Father (sayeth he) vnto thee do I commend my spirite. Then lette vs learne to say freely vnto God, Lorde I yeelde my soule into thy handes. Thus yee see howe wee shall be safe when wee know that God is the keeper of our Soules. Thus yee see how we shall go gladly and with a good will vnto death, bicause our Soules are in Gods keeping, til he knit them to their bodies againe in his coming at the last day.

 VVhen wee be at this poynt, then to confirme the sayde prayer withall, thou mayst adde, Thou hast redeemed me o Lord God of truth. Lo howe Dauid speaketh: and Ie-sus Christ hath vsed the same, to shewe that it is a request which ought to bee common to all members of the Church. So then, to the ende that we doubt not of Gods receyuing of our soules into his keeping, when we betake them to him vnfeynedly: let vs know that he is the God of truth, in so much that he will not suffer vs to perishe what foeuer befall vs, so we haue the heart and minde to put our selues into his handes.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our finnes, praying him to haue pitie vpon vs wretched creatures: and bicause wee be so loth to folowe that, which he sheweth vs, that it may please him to stablish vs in such a zeale by his holy Spirite, as wee may neuer swarue, nor be turned from the right way wherein he shall haue once set vs. And for as-much as so long as we liue in this worlde, we be inclined, yea and giuen vp to many vices and imperfections: let vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to resist them in suche wise, as he may bee glorified by our confessing of his name, whither it bee in lyfe or death: and that in the meane whyle wee may bee knitte to him by fayth and hope, so as wee may perseute therein to the ende, and vntill he haue gathered vs into the euerlasting heritage which is purchafed for vs by our Lorde Iesus Christe.
 That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the Earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darkenesse, to the right way of saluation, for the doying whereof, it may please him to rayse &c.

WE sawe yesterday, that if wee will iudge of the state of men, we must not rest vpon this present life, but we must go further: for if we looke no further than to the life of man: we shall see that it is but as a shadowe, and alldough it were graunted that he had all his own hearts desire, so as God would giue him whatfoeuer he wold wish: what were al that but a smoke that passeth away out of had? Therefore it behoueth vs to come to the hope that Iob speaketh of here, that wee may haue skill to discern whether a mäs life be happie or vnhappie. And he bringeth vs purposely vnto death declaring that sith the vnbeleuers or despisers of God are plucked out of this world by violence : it behoueth vs to cōclude, that they be all vnhappy, and that the pleasures, riches, honour, and such other like things which they haue, are but deceytfull vanitie, and we must not busie our heades about them. Therefore when a man liueth after such a fort in this world, as he knoweth himself to be in Gods hand, so as he reisteth and repofeth himself vpon his goodnesse, and therewithall is readie to remoue hence as oft and whensoever God shall call him, assuring himself that his euerlasting abiding place is not here but in heauen : then is he in the case that he may be deemed a happie man. But as for him that regardeth not God, ne trusteth in his goodnesse, ne knoweth himselfe to be in his keeping, but woulde fayne dwell euer in this worlde, and cannot bee gotten hence but by force and constraint : although such a man haue all that he can wish for a time : yet is he but a wretched creature. And for the better cōfirmation of this matter, Iob addeth as now, That God will not heare the wicked when they pray, no not euen in the middes of their distresses. This deserueth to be well marked. Iob sheweth wherein the chiefe weale that wee can haue or wishe to haue consisteth, namely in hauing recourse vnto God, and that he be mercifull to vs to succour vs at our neede. Let vs put the case that a mā had al things else that could be imagined, and yet wanted this : surely all the rest were nothing woorth, but shoulde bee turned into his bane. VVhat if a man laugh, what if he liue in ioy and pleasure, what if he haue goodes ynough and to much, what if all men honour him, and (to be short) what if he seeme to be a Petigod here bylowe as in a Paradise? yet if he haue not this priuiledge of resorting vnto God, with full beleeffe that his resorting to him shall not be in vayne, but that his requestes shall be graunted : all that euer he can haue besides, shall bee but a curse to him, and an increace of his decay. Then lette vs marke well, that it is not for nought that Iob bringeth vs here to the principall poynt of our whole life, as in respect of the weale that wee can wish : which is that God shoulde be at hand with vs, and that we should resort vnto him : that he should heare vs, and that wee should obteyne our requestes and be ayded at his hande according to our neede, and as he knoweth to be conuenient for our welfare. And this is not done here onely : but if we looke vpon the whole doctrine of the holy Scripture, we shall see that men are alwayes vnhappy if God looke not vpon them, and bee readie to heare them. True it is that wee conceyue not so much : by reason of our great dulnesse : but surely if wee had but one sparke of good vnderstanding, there is none of vs but he should perceyue, that this doctrine is totoo true. So then let vs open our eyes, and learne to inioy this happinesse, and know wherevpon the same is chiefly grounded, so as we may vnderstand, that if we haue not God so favorable vnto vs, as wee may resort vnto him with assured trust and certaintie that he will be readie to help vs at our neede : we be totoo wretched. And furthermore if we be in so good case, as that we can haue recourse vnto God : there is nother affliction nor miserie, that can hinder vs from being happie. For beholde, the remedie that ought to suffice for all our miseries, is that God promiseth to strengthen vs vp when we be as good as beaten downe, to deliuer vs in time cōuenient yea and to turne all our miseries to our welfare and saluation, so as they shall become as many furtherances to helpe vs forewarde to the euerlasting lyfe, and he will make vs perceyue that he sent vs nor any thing, which was not conuenient and behoouefull for vs: Such promises serue to asswage our sorowes : and moreover, every one of vs may glorie in them, according also as S.Paule speaketh in the fifth to the Romanes. For vnder the peace that he maketh mention of there, is comprehended that which Iob speaketh here. VVe ca haue no peace with God except we be sure of his loue, so as the gate be open for vs to haue access vnto him. VVhen we haue that once (sayeth S. Paule:) we be sure and fully persuaded that wee be the children of God, so as wee may glory of the euerlasting heritage which he hath promised vs. This in effect is al that Iob ment here by saying, will God heare the prayers of a wicked man? yea though he call vpon him in his trouble? But here it may be demaunded, howe it happeneth that God refuseth a man that calleth vpon him, seing he hath promised that he will alwayes be inclined to succour vs, yea and that he will not tarie till he be intreated, but will preuent our sute : or at leastwise we be sure that as soone as we open our mouth, God will be readie to succour vs, as he sayeth by his Prophet Esay. Howbeit in the other sentence that I touched afore, it is sayd, I will heare them before they crie: But here we see a threate which is cleane contrarie, which is that although the wicked haue their recourse vnto God, & desire him to haue pitie vpon the: yet will he not heare them. The solution is very easie, if we wey wel what is sayd in the Psalme: namely that God is neere vnto all such as call vpon him in truth. There the Prophet sheweth, that many seeke God, howbeit faynedly. By reason whereof we be conuincd, that there is none other meane to rid vs of our miseries, but only that God should take vs to his mercie and be pitiful to vs. The very vnbeleeuers do cal vpō God without regard of him, notwithstanding that they haue mocked at the religion, and at all things that are spoken to vs in the Scripture concerning Gods prouidēce, and the mercie and grace which we must looke for at his hand. Therefore if they be pinched with aduersitie, they crie out, alas my God. And what is it that driueth them therevnto? Euen their mother wit. So the hypocrites and despyzers of God may well haue some forme of praying. Not only to pray from the teeth outward while their minde is otherwise occupied : but oftentimes (as men may perceyue) euen with some hartie affection (for they be forced to it:) but yet is it not in truth. For they haue not the knowledge to say, my God calleth me and allureth me to him, and I shal not be disappointed in cōming to him. Seing it is his pleasure to reckon me in the number of his children: I will go to him, not vpon a foolish rashnesse and presumption, but with obedience to the voyce of my God, trusting to his promise. The hypocrites cannot speake that language : and therefore they haue no truth in them. For it stādeth them in hand to haue sayth, and sayth dependeth vpon Gods promises, which the vngodly neuer tasted of. Againe, we ought to haue a feeling of our miseries, so that whē a mā approacheth vnto God, he must be abashed in himself, he must be sorie for his sinnes, he must hate himselfe, and he must acknowledge himselfe to be exceeding wretched. But the wicked and hypocrites haue none of all this. Although then that they haue their mouths open to call vpō God : yet dou they but vnhalow his holy name, bicause there is no right meening in them. And therefore they fulfill that which the Prophet Esay sayeth in his nine and twentieth chapter : which is, that they preace vnto God with their mouth and their tung, but their hart is alwayes a great way off. So then let vs marke well, that when our Lorde sayeth and auoucheth, that he will heare all such as call vpon him : he meeneth that their prayer must proceede of fayth, and men must haue bethought them well of his promises aforehand, thereby to take boldnesse to come vnto him : and yet that therewithall they must acknowledge themselves to be as they bee, that is to witte, forlorne, forlorne, damned, and destitute of all goodnesse: and this must we be throughly perswaded of, to the end that wee may resort too the fountaine of his goodnesse and grace. Now can wee not thinke it straunge though God put backe the hypocrites and wicked me whē they come vnto him. For they come not with a willing minde, nor with a pure affection, but they would faine shun God if it were possible. Howbeit for asmuche as they cannot shift themselves from him: they come too him by compulsion. But what a comming is that: Therefore whē we pray vnto God, let vs learne to offer him freeharted sacrifices, and let vs come to him with a willing mind: assuring ourselues that without him we be destitute of all that we haue neede of, and of all that pertaineth to oure welfare. Furthermore, let vs not doubt of his fauoure and mercie towards vs, seeing he hath promised vs them: but let vs always beleue that he is euer redy to receyue vs, and will not be deafe to our desires when we come to craue them at his hand. Lo how we shal be herd at gods hand. And Iob setteth downe purposely, When trouble commeth vpon the hypocrite: by cause that then we knowe and feele how auaylable our prayers are, and what frute they yeld vs. True it is that God sheweth his goodnesse towards vs euery minute of an houre: and although we perceiue it not by and by, yet doth he preferue vs from the miseries that hang ouer our head, & putteth his hād betwixt vs and them. So then, we cannot but be acquainted with gods grace in the time of prosperity, and know that wee bee maintained by the same: but yet haue we not so certaine and euident experience of his fauoure and help, in prosperitie, as in aduersitie. For whēsoever miserie pincheth vs, and death threatneth vs, we haue the wit to discernē that we were forlorne and foredone, if God shuld not step before vs to reskue vs. And in good sooth how should we be troubled, if we had not that consideration: Ye see then an euident demonstration, that God hathe had pitie vpon vs. And so, affliction is the thing wherein God sheweth himselfe cheefly to be our sauiour. And heere ye see why it is said in the Psalme, Thou shalt call vpon me in the day of thy trouble, and I will heare thee and thou shalt glorify me. But is it therefore to be said that we must not seeke vnto God, but when we be in necessitie and at the last cast: No: for we should be too retchlesse if we shuld tarrie til such constreint came. Then behoueth it vs to call vpon God at all times, as shall be shewed anone. But yet doth our Lord prouoke vs by scourging vs, and in so doing hee correcteth oure slouthfulnesse, and quickeneth vs vp to com vnto him. It is expressly said, that that is the time wherein wee must call vpon him, and that that is the very due and conueniente season, according as it is said in the two and thirtieth Psalme, that the righteous shall seeke God in due time: that is to say, when their aduersitie presseth them. Not that we haue not occasion to do so continually: but by cause wee haue more occasion then, than at any other time. And heereby we be warned, that whensoever wee be pinched to the vttermost, so as we can abide no more: we must not faint, but rather take courage to come vnto God, knowing that he allureth vs, not only by worde of mouth, but also by his doings: and that hee not onely reacheth vs his hande and willet vs too take it: but also doth as it were draw vs by force, by reason of the greatesluggishnesse that is in vs. Lo what we haue to marke in this streine.

Now heerewithall let vs vnderstand, what is the frute of our faith. It is, that in all our aduersities wee be righte happie, and that all the curses which God sendeth vpon me for their sinnes are turned to our welfare by meanes of faith, when we pray vnto God, and haue our recourse vnto him. And why: For in the middes of our troubles hee sheweth himselfe our Sauioure, and maketh vs too feele that hee is neere at hand with vs. After that Iob hath said so: he addeth, that the vngodly will not delight in the Almighty, nor seeke alwayes vnto him. VVhē he saith that the wicked man will not seeke alwayes vnto God: it is a confirmation of that which hath bin touched already: that is to wit, that wee must not only pray when we can none otherwise do. but also that we must do it ordinarily, as in very deed we cannot passe one minute of an houre without Gods help. And surely the fauoure that we looke for at his hand, consisteth not only in deliuering from death when we be as good as at the pits brim: but also in preserving vs and in turning away euill from vs. For we see that in this life we be continually beseeged with a hundred deaths, and the miseries whereto we be subiect, are without number. God therefore must be faine to gard vs, and to be our wail and bulwarke, according also as he saith by his Prophet Esay, that hee is our fortresse and shield, and so is he also named oftentimes in the Psalms. Ye see then how wee ought to call vpon God, not only when hee toucheth vs, and smiteth as it were with hard strokes vpon vs: but euen when we be at our ease and rest, and perceiue no daunger toward: euen then (say I) behoueth it vs neuertheless too consider, to how many miseries our life is subiect: that being perswaded that wee cannot escape them excepte God preferue vs, we may runne vnto him and say, Alas Lord, keepe vs thou vnder thy protection, and by thy providence make vs able too passe through so many deaths which hem vs in round about. And this must bee done bothe euening and morning. Moreouer we knowe: (without going any further) what temptations affayle vs dayly. And therefore when we pray vnto God, it must not only be that hee should preferue vs from the dangers wherein we are concerning this present life: but the cheefe poynt is, that hee should reach out his hand too deliuer vs from Satans temptations, and not suffer vs to fall into euill, according as there are deadly downefalles whereinto we may tumble euery minute of an houre, if we be not hild vp by his power. So then let vs marke what neede: the faithful haue too bee so defended and shielded by Gods hand. For when Satan cannot ouercome vs on the one side, he vnclinneth vs anew both before and behind, and he assaulteth vs well at one side as on the other, and as well aboue as beneath. He hathe so many fyris and burning darts, that he would wound vs to the death, were it not that God doth defend and preferue vs. So the it is not ynough for vs to pray only once a day, or when the neede it selfe constreyneth vs: but it standeth vs in hand to do it continually, and to make an ordinarie exercise of it. And thus ye see why it is sayde, that the wicked prayeth not at all times vnto God. But there is yet one poynt more which wee ought to marke well. For Iobs intent is to do vs to witte, that whereas the wicked man dothe nowe and then make countenance too pray, yet doth hee not continue in that mind, he proceedeth not constantly and after one continuall rate. And heere ye see wherein the prayers of the hypocrites differ from the prayers of Gods children. For an hypocrite, without examining of his owne hart, will wel ynough do the same thing that Gods children do: to outward sighte hee will pray vnto God, yea and hee will acknowledge that hee hathe neede to do so. But if the least temptation in the world light vpon him, hee fretteth with himselfe and meddeth no more with calling vpon God, but grunteth againste hym, and someth vp such rage, as hee knoweth well that hee nother depended vpon God before, nor trusted in him, nor sought him with a right-meaning mind, and that al was but counterfetnesse. Thus ye see how the hypocrisie of the faithlesse is discovered, when our Lord handleth them not after their owne liking, but holdeth them shut vp in some distresse. For the they fret and fume against him. But contrariwise if god scourge the faithfull man that hath prayed to him in his prosperitie and in the time of his rest: he ceaseth not to hold out still, in beseeching him too play the surgion in healing of the wounds that he hath made. To be shorte, Gods children continue in prayer, and haue the sayde perseuerance or holding out, in somuch that although God afflict them, and seeme to turne his backe to the, and to be deafe to their requests: yet neuertheless they hold on still, and neuer giue ouer cleane. Contrariwise, if God graunt not the faithfull their request as soone as they pray vnto him, if he pleasure them not by and by, if hee perforce not their desires without delay: they thinke they haue lost their time. And so we see that the fashion of praying aright, is first, not to tarrie till extremitie compell vs: but rather to be doing a forehande as neede is that we should, praying God to preuent vs with his graciouse goodnes. Take that for one point. Ageine, if we be in trouble and distresse: let vs not cease to pray, as well as if we were in prosperitie. For although God seeme not as then to fauoure vs, but rather to be an aduersarie and an enemie vnto vs, by the estimation of our fleshly vnderstanding: yet behoueth it vs to exercise our faith in calling vpon him: and whereas it may seeme too vs that we haue not auayled awhit by praying, but rather that God is deafe to our requests: yet notwithstanding let vs hold on still, and not leaue off. But when we haue sighed and sobbed to day, if we feele no assuagement by it, let vs retourne to the same remedie again tomorrow. In good faith, ye see that although a sick person perceiue not that his Phisition hath done him good at the first: yet will he not cease to beleue his counsell still. And is it meete that we should put more trust in mortall men, than in our God: So then, let vs wey wel this saying that is set downe heere for praying continually vnto God: and let vs thinke, that it is to no purpose for vs to go too god at starts, to desire him to haue mercy vpon vs: but that we must doo it diligently, and euery man stirre vp and taske himselfe to it both euening and morning, saying: VVhat? wretched creature, sleepest thou heere? Knowest thou not what neede thou hast that thy God shuld ayde thee? And againe, if we be afflicted, and suffer aduersitie: let vs not cease to call vpon God, nother let our hearts faile vs, assuring ourselues that our afflictions shall turne to our welfare and soulehelth. But let vs hold on, all the days of our life, yea & let our holding on be such as we may be importunate, according as our Lord Iesus Christ sheweth vs in the parable, where he exhorteth vs to pray without ceasing, although God shew not by effect at the first, that he heareth vs. But there is yet further, that the wicked man will not set his delighte in God, which is a notable saying, and conteyneth a good lesson. For heere Job putteth a difference betwixte the pleasure or ioy that Gods children and the faithfull sorte haue: and the pleasure which the faithlesse take. Hereby we vnderstande, that all skorners of God, all maliciouse persons, and all looce liuers, (although they seeme to be the happiest folke in the whole worlde) are vnhappy, and there is nothing but wretchednesse in them. On the contrarie part, although the children of God be taken to be forlorne, wretched, and as it wer damned creatures: yet are they right happy because they set their delight in God. Thus see we a sentence right worthy to be well marked, and to be called oftentimes too remembrance. There is none of vs but hee desireth to haue ioy: and yet in the meane while we know not what the true ioy is, nor wherein we ought to take it, nor wherevnto we ought to referre it. And that is the cause why the ioy of this worlde is cursed by the mouthe of Gods owne sonne, who saith: wo be to you that laugh. And why? VVill God haue vs to be always sad? Is God greeued and offended that we should make any mirth? To what purpose serue the texts where it is said that God would faine haue men to be merrie, and giueth them wherewith to be merrie? For he not only voutsafeth too giue them nurishment and sustenance: but also giueth them abundance wherewith to be merrie. How commes it to passe then, that our Lord Iesus Christ curseth the laughter of the world? It is because men besotte themselues in their mirth. And what is their ioy? It is a cleane forgetting of themselues, and a turning away from God, according as we see that most men cannot bee merrie, vnlesse they thrust God a good way off, and runne riot, and gyue themselues to such superfluitie, as there remaineth no more wit nor reason in them. For somuch then as men do so passe their bounds, needes must their mirth be cursed. To bring examples heereof is neede as now: would God the thing were not so much knowne and practised as it is. But what? There is not that man of vs all, that findeth not the same vice in himselfe. For if there bee any talking of God, we would fayne that it were quickly at an end. I say [it were il with vs] if our Lord made vs not to feele the sweetenesse that we find in him. For he that hath once tasted of that, can neuer haue his fil of talking of God, but will preferue the minding and musing vpon God, before all the pleasures in the world. But as for those that are giuen to vanities, they stand vpon thornes till they bee gone, when there is any speaking of God. And why? For that is a melancholike matter too them. And truly wee see, that both in feasting and in talking, and in suche other like thinges, it is but a trouble too the whole companie to haue mention made of God. Therefore let vs not thinke it straunge, that God pronounceth this horrible curse against the mirth of the world, seing it is so froward that it runneth quite out of square from the righte way, and keepeth not itselfe within any boundes, nor can be merrie but in all wantonnesse and disorder. So then let vs come backe to that which is said in the Law. Thou shalt be merrie in the presence of thy God. This lesson of being merrie in the presence of God, is of great importance. And it cannot bee done, without acknowledging, that al the good thinges which we haue, do come of him, and that he giueth vs them, too the intent that wee should take him for our father, and yeld him thanks, acknowledging him too bee the fountaine of all goodnesse, and that wee oughte too sticke vntoo him. To be short, they that reioice in the presence of God, sticke not too creatures, nor to any of all these corruptible thinges, but doo knowe that it behoueth them too impute all thinges too Gods fatherly goodnesse, and too receiue the benefytes which he bestoweth vpon them, as a confirmation of hys loue and fauoure. Thus ye see what it is too bee merrie or too reioyce in the presence of God. Contrariwise howe fare the vnbeleeuers? As I haue shewed already, They cannot so muche as laughe or bee merrie, but they muste as it were separate themselues from God, and turne their backe vpon him, yea and quite and cleane forget him. But suche manner of mirth is cursed. And so wee see nowe what Iobs meening is.

For he iudgeth of mens happineſſe as he ought to do, he reſteth not vpon the things that are ſeene: for it hath ſo falſe out, that the very heathen men could ſkill to ſay of this imaginatiue happineſſe, that it is like a fayre picture. Looke me vpon an Antike of timber, it is well guilded ouer, and it glittreth maruellouſly: but within it ſhall bee eaten with moles or other wormes: euen ſo is it with all the braue laddes of the world, which laugh at God, to ſport the ſelues withall. For they may well haue both credite, and riches, and pleaſure: and they may be thought to haue the happieſt life of the world: but in the meane while they be worne eaten within, and their wicked conſcience playeth the hangman, and ceaſeth not too torment them, ſo as they wote not where they be. And for ſomuch as they cannot call vpon God, they muſt needes be without hope of mercie, and without certaintie too ſtay vpon, and alway in feare, bycauſe they knowe not how long they ſhall abide in that plight. To bee ſhorter, they muſt needes be as blocks and brute beaſts. But on the contrarie part, ye ſhall ſee the faithfull ones merrie euen in aduerſitie. For when we haue caſt our eye vpon God, and behild his fatherly countenance towards vs: this only ſaying will comfort vs, wherein he aſſureth vs that he will not lay more trouble vpon vs, than we ſhall be able to beare, but will giue vs a good end of all oure aduerſities, and that when wee ſhall haue indured them patiently, wee ſhall feele that they haue profited vs too our ſaluation, bycauſe it was expedient and profitable for vs to be chaſtized at the hand of our father, too the end hee mighte draw vs away from the vanities of this world. Now we ſee that which I glaunched at afore: that is to witte, that although the faythleſſe haue all things that men are wont to wiſh: yet is it but vanitie and leazing: and contrariwiſe that although the faithfull be oppreſſed with many aduerſities, yet they ceaſe not to bee right happie, bycauſe they call vpon God, and are able to reioyce in him, for ſomuch as they know themſelues to be in his fauoure, and that hee chaſtizeth them after ſuch a ſort, as he turneth all things to their welfare. And heerewithall let vs beare in mind, in what manner men ought to be merrie, as hath bin ſaid afore. True it is that our Lord giueth vs cauſe and occaſion of mirth, in that we haue bread to eate, and wine to drinke, and other be-neſyts neceſſarie for this life. For there are diuers ſortes of the liberalyrie that God beſtoweth vpon vs: as when he giueth a man iſſue, when he ſendeth him goodes, and when he maketh him to proſper in ſuch other like things: behold, it is alwayes a matter to be glad of. But after what ſort muſt wee be glad? Euen as in the preſence of our God, as I haue alledged afore. Would we then bee merrie in ſuch wiſe as God ſhould bliſſe our mirth, and like well of it, and that it might be as it were in his ſight? Let vs haue an eye vnto God, and acknowledge ourſelues to be beholding to him for all our goodes, and honoure him for them. Furthermore let vs haue ſuch a longing after him, as we may learne, not too beate oure braynes about theſe preſent things, nor to ſet our hartes vpon them: but to aſſure ourſelues that this world paſſeth away, and that wee ourſelues muſt paſſe away too, yea and that right ſwiftly, and therefore not to tye ourſelues to them, but to go ſtill foreward vnto God as too the very end of our race. Now Iob addeth immediatly, That he will teach them what is in the hand of God, and what is with the Almighty. Yea and he addeth, that his freends were very vnwittie, ſith that they had ſeene all thoſe things, and yet neuertheleſſe did ſpeake ſo aukly, according as we haue ſeene before. But Iob hath already put a ſufficient difference betwixt Gods children and the vnbeleeuers, ſhewing that wee ought not to deeme any manſlife vnhappy for the outward ſhew that appeereth for a day or twayne, or for a little time: but that we muſt enter innermore, and ſearch what is in the harte, yea & we muſt come to the hope that is in them at their death, and looke whether while they may liue heere, they bee ioyned vnto God, and call vpon him and flee to him for refuge, and yeeld themſelues wholly to him, and reioice in his goodneſſe: and whether that at their death they be able to committe themſelues to his keeping, and to betake their ſoules to him, beleeuing that they be ſafe when they be in his hand. For theſe are they that are happy. Contrariwiſe, ſuch as are eſteemed to be honorable, ſuch as are in authoritie, ſuch as liue in delight and pleaſure: ſuch are alwayes vnhappy, bycauſe they ſeparate themſelues from God, who is the wellſpring of all welfare: and when they come to death, they truſt not in him, but are as it were haled away by force, whereas they oughte too put themſelues quietly into his hands. Iob then hath ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed all theſe things already, but yet his intent is to confirme his matter better. And therefore he vſeth this preface, that he will ſhew what is in the hand of God, and what is with the Almighty: and hee continueth ſtill the ſame matter which hee delt with before: which is, that if we intend to iudge rightly, we muſt not reſt heere by low: but we muſt paſſe beyond the world by faith, and looke vpon Gods iudgements after another faſhion. For behold, the thing wherein Iobs counterparties were deceiued, is that they iudged after the preſente ſtate, and would needes reſt vpon theſe inferioure things. Iob therefore ſheweth, that it behoueth vs to go too the hand of God, yea and to marke that his iudgements are ſecret: as if hee ſhould ſay, ſuche as reſt only vpon this world, and caſt no further but how things are diſpoſed preſently: ſhall alwayes haue an vntoward and miſordered iudgement. And why? For our Lord calleth vs to him, and telleth vs that although hee execute his iudgements in part, and diſcloſe them to vs after ſuch a ſort, as we may perceiue ſome incling of them: yet doth he reſerue many things in his owne hand ſtill: like as a prince will not diſcloſe all his minde at once, but will publiſh ſo muche by proclamations, as he knoweth to be expediēt for the gouerning of his people. Alſo a man in his owne priuate houſe will ſay ſo much as ſhall be for the good ordering of his houſhold, and keepe the reſt to himſelfe which is not neceſſarie to be declared. Now if mortall men take ſuch libertie: what ſhal God do? Is it meete that our Lord ſhoulde ſhew vs all his iuſtice and wiſedome heere, and make all his ordinances knowne and apparant to vs, and keepe nothing to himſelfe? VVhither were that to goe? Now then we ſee what Iobs meaning is. Hee rebuketh the froward pride of men. For that they will needes in-cloſe Gods mightie power, rightfulneſſe, and wiſedome within the ſtate of this preſent world, ſo as it might bee diſcerned. But on the contrarie part, no no (ſaith Iob) it is the hand of God that we muſt looke vnto, to know what is in him. And how ſhall we know it? By faith, & not by our motherwit: for we ſhall neuer reach ſo high by that. But by faith we may eſpie, that God reſerueth many things, yea & that he reſerueth the in ſuch wiſe as it behoueth vs to be paciēt when we ſee all things troubled and turmoiled, & to tarry til god make vs to behold the things that are cōcealed from vs as yet. Thus we ſee that the doctrine which we haue to gather of this ſtreine, is in effect that we muſt ſo profit ourſelues by all gods works while we be in this world, as we may be able to apply them to our uſe. As for example, when wee ſee God ſhew himſelfe mercifull in one caſe and rigorous in another:

let vs learne to trust in his goodnesse, and to walke in his feare: howbeit with such regard of his apparant woorks, as we may in the meane while assure ourselues, that hee referueth things to himselfe which are not seene yet. As how? As now good men are afflicted: and although they haue their recourse vnto him, yet hee seemeth not minded to help them. It is seene that the plainmeening forte and such as haue liued without doing any man wrong, are troubled with extremitie, and as it were laid open to the spoile, and God maketh no countenance of deliue- 10 ring them: and that c ntrariwise the wicked sort do triumph and harden themselues in their naughtinesse, bearing themselues in hande, that they may misuse God without feare: and God winketh at all these things. Ne- uerthelesse let vs not be greeued and offended when we see things in such disorder, and that God redresseth the not at the first push. And why? For it behoueth vs to call to mind how it is said heere, that God hath many things in his hand, which he referueth to himselfe. Why dorch he so? Though we know not the cause, yet must we hū- 20 ble ourselues. For all our wisdome consisteth in submitting ourselues too the good pleasure of oure God. Howbeit for asmuch as hee intendeth to exercise oure faith by it, and that we should learne pacience by experience: let vs not refuze to submit all our whole vnder- standing therevnto. Agayne, seeing that God sheweth vs his woorks in part: let vs not be so blind as not too see that which is apparant. For wee neede not too make any far search to get some tast of things: if we list too looke vpon them, there is ynough to teach vs. So then, let vs 30

not shut our eyes wilfully, nother let vs plonder away in vanitie as they do of whome Iob speaketh heere. VVñe God wakeneth vs, let vs be sure that his mind is, that we should so know his woorks, as we might yeld him his due honoure, and not rest vpon present things, but fall too concluding that there is a iudgement which it behoueth vs to hope for, and that there all things shall be brought into their right course. And therefore let vs not vanish away in vanitie, that is too say, let vs not bee turned nor drawn away by worldly things: but let vs recouer oure- selues to the hope that God setteth afore vs, which is, that Iesus Christ will come to gather vs to himselfe, and that wee shall then see howe our trusting in him and in God his father is not in vaine.

But now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to humble vs in such wise, as we may haue our recourse vnto him only, and that for asmuch as it pleaseth him to handle vs so gently, and to make vs feele his goodnesse so many ways, to the end we might be moued to come vnto him: he will not suffer vs to gad after our owne de- lights and lusts, but that when he hath once broughte vs into the right way, we may neuer be turned out of it, so as we may alwayes go forward more and more, till wee be come to the heavenly heritage wherevnto he calleth vs. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heavenly father we acknowledge and confesse according too the truth, that wee bee not woorthye too lyfte vp our eyes too Heauen, to present our selues before thee, nor too pre- sume so farre as that our prayers should be. &c.

The C. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the. xxvij. Chapter.

13. Behold vvhath is the portion of the vvicked vvith God, and the heritage that the extortioners receiue of the Almighty.
14. If his children be multiplied, they shall be put to the svword, and his offspring shall not be sa-tified vvith bread.
15. Their remnant shall be buried in destruction, and their vvidovves shall not vveepe.
16. Though they heape vp siluer as dust, and gold as clay.
17. The righteous shal cloth himselfe vvith it, and the innocent shal deuide his siluer.
18. He shall build his house as a moth, and as a vvatchman maketh his lodge.
19. VVhen therich man slepeth, he shal not gather aught: he shal open his eyes and nothing shal appeere.

IT should seeme at the first blush, that Iob speaketh another language heere than he had done afore, and 50 that he says and vn-says, and agreth with his counterparties: neuerthelesse we haue seene already that his meaning is not so. How the shal we take the things that he speaketh heere? For yce see, that the cause why he hath striued with those that came to comfort him, is that God doth not alwayes punish me in such wise in this world, as that it may bee throughly discerned and seene by eyesight: and now he holdeth the selfesame opinion that the others haue hild. But lette vs 60 marke, that Iob in this place speaketh not after his owne meaning, but putteth the case that it were as the other haue said at leastwise in part. And surely we shall see in the nexte Chapter, how he ouerthroweth these things, and sheweth breefly that Gods iudgementes are hidden from vs (as he had said heeretofore) and that wee cannot comprehend them: for hee will compare gold and siluer with wisdome. For although that gold and siluer likewise be a metall full of droffe, and can hardly be discerned of what value it is of before it be fynd: and although it be hard also to find the veines of it, bycause they bee hidden in the earth: yet are the mines both of gold and siluer found out. But as for wisdome, she dwelleth further of from men, they cannot find hir by digging deepe downward, nor climb so high vppward as to come to hir, vnlesse God giue hir: heereby Iob meeneth, that it is a very harde pointe of wisdome, for vs to comprehend Gods iudgementes, and that wee mulde not make a grounded rule of them, as though wee had the perfect and full knowledge of them here in thys worlde.

So then wee see in effecte, that Iob is not contrarye too hym selfe, ne condescendeth too the talke and doctrine of those that haue hitherto resisted hym: but rather declareth, that that which they haue spoken is partly true, howbeit not atogither, bycause Gods iudgements are not executed ordinarily in this present lyfe, although we haue now and then some signes of them, and that is all. Now we see what Iobs intent is: and it remaineth that wee make oure profite of this doctrine.

¶ We have two things to marke in this sentēce. The one is, that the contents hereof, are a declaration of the punishments that God executeth vpon the wicked, that is to witte, when he listeth to punish them in this transitorie life. And for the other, we haue to marke, that when God thinketh it good, he deferreth those punishments, and referueth them in such wise, as they be not seene at all in this present life: and yet that we must not be out of quiet for it, as though God were asleepe and executed not his office. For hee knoweth wherefore he delayeth. The reason is vnknown too vs, but yet it pleaseth him too doo so, and his will is the rule of all equitie and righte.

Thus ye see the two points wherunto it behoueth vs to bring backe all that is cōteined here. Now as touching the first point, let vs marke (as I haue said already) that it is not without cause that God hath threatned to punish the wicked and the transgressors of his lawe, after such a fashion as they shall euen haue their portion and heritage with him. Heereby wee vnderstand, that if men scape vnpunished heere bylow, and no man taketh vengeance of their misdeedes, and of the outrages and extortions that they haue committed: God who is aboue will not misse them. Therefore at length they shall come to their account, and that shall be as their portion or heritage. For although they bee not punished at the firste day, yet will God worke in the end. According too that which I haue declared already, I say, we must not make it a generall rule, but yet shall it fall out so oftentimes. Then let vs learne to haue an eye vnto God in all oure life, and let vs not thinke ourselues discharged whē we be escaped the hands of men, nother let vs flatter ourselues therevpon, as though we had made a faire hand: but let vs haue an eye to this heritage which God telleth vs that he hath preparēd for such as haue liued amisse. Like as the sonne and heire of a man shall not possesse his fathers goodes and lands at the first day, but shall bee owner and master of them in time: so on the contrarie part God pnnisheth not the wicked fort incontinently when they haue offended: but yet is their possession kept for them in the end, and shall be reserued certaine-ly for them, as an heritage whereof they cannot be defeated. Marke that for one point. And now it is said, That if their children be multiplied, they shall go to the sword, and their offspring shall be ouerthrowen, so as it shall be buried in destruction without any remedy. By these sayings we vnderstand, that God not only punisheth the wicked & the despisers of his maiestie in their owne persons: but also extendeth the same vengeance euen vntoo their children. Truly we will thinke this straunge to our owne vnderstanding. But it hath bin declared already heretofore, that God may punish the children of the wicked, without doing them wrong. And why? For we are all curled in Adam, and bring nothing but damnation with vs out of our moothers womb. Now then if God leaue vs in oure owne state, all of vs both great and small are already appointed to destruction. If God should rend vp the whole world and plunge it into the bottomlesse pit: might he be accused of crueltie? No: For his gentle handling of vs commeth of his owne meere goodnesse, and not of any desert of oures. Then if he withdraw hys grace from the offspring of the wicked, and to punish the fathers, do wrap their children in the like destruction, so that for somuch as the father hath run further & further into wickednes, his childrē must be faine to fill vp the iniquitie of their auncester, and to haue his punishment cast into their bosome, as the scripture saith: let vs not think it straunge, for God knoweth wherefore hee dothe it.

Jer. 32. c. 18.

Truly if we should stand reasoning after our own imagination, wee woulde thinke there were some reason that he should not do so. But it is a diuelish malapertnes too measure Gods works by our owne reason and vnderstanding. And herewithal let vs beare in mind also what hath bin declared: that isto witte, that all mankinde is foredoone and damned in it selfe, and that God may deale rigorously with them without blame. For our saluation commeth not of ourselues, and when God assur-eth vs of it, he doth it not for our desert or woorthynesse, but of his owne meere mercie as I haue shewed afore.

And so wee see that God ought too bee glorified in the rigoure that he executeth vpon the wicked, when he punisheth them in the person of their children. And it serueth to cast the greater terroure vpon all the despisers of God, when they be threatned that they shall be punished euen in their offspring: like as on the contrarie part, when our Lord saith that he will be graciously and pitifull, to shewe mercie in a thousand generations too such as loue him and obey him: he meeneth thereby to assure vs the better of the infinite loue which he beareth vs. For when wee know that God thinks it not ynough to loue vs and to take vs for his children, but voutsaforth also to call our children for our sakes and fauoure: is it not a substantiall prooffe of his singular goodnesse? Haue we not so much the more cause to reioyce in our God, seeing that he not only receiueth vs to himselfe, but also maketh our Children partakers of the same grace? Furthermore for asmuch as men are dull vpon the spurre, and bow not easly when God threatneth them: it causeth him to say, that when he hath punished them in their owne persons, the same rigoure must be faine too extend euen vnto their posteritie, yea and that euen after their deceasse he wil not cesse to shew how sore he hated and abhorred them, by punishing their offspring. Sith it is said so, needes ought the wicked to be terribly afraide, yea though they were harder than stone. How nowe [may they say] How greate will Gods vengeance bee vpon vs, seeing that euen our children shall be wrapped in it, and that the fragments thereof shall sie to our prosperitie euen after our deathe: If oure issue must perish through our fault: how great and terrible shal our owne destruction be?

Exo. 34. c. 7
Ier. 32. c. 18.

Thus thē ye see why our Lord doth expreffely threaten the wicked, to punish them euen in their children. It is to the ende that wee shoulde bee touched neerer the quicke with feare, seeing that regne are so dull and hardharted of their owne nature. But let vs come now to that which was touched in the beginning: that is too witte that Gods iustice may be seene, howbeit not alwayes. ¶ Wee see then that the children of the wicked do soone melt away: and if they haue goodes, those wanze away too: and when they seeme to haue wherewith too feede, yea and too fat themselues throughly: men are abashed to see how sodainly it wasteth away, and no man can tell how, but that it is seene to be so. So then if wee looke wisely vpon Gods iudgements, we may well see by experience, that it is not for nought that the scripture sayth, that God will punish the wicked in their offspring. Looke vpon a man that shall haue indured great vnquietnesse and paynes all his life long too gather goodes: In deede hee heapeth vp a greate hoorde, and it shall seeme that his riches shall neuer faile in his successours: and yet all is consumed to lesse than nothing. To whosome or to what cause may suche changee bee imputed? Let vs conclude that God putteth too his hande. ¶ Wherefore let vs not bee blinded when oure Lorde

worketh after that fashion: but let vs learne to take warning by examples, that we be not caried away with couetousnesse, ne imagin that mans welfare consisteth in much gathering: but rather let vs make account only of Gods blissing as of the thing that nurrisheth vs, and wil continue to nurrish our children also. If God reach out his hand to feede vs, it is ynough for vs: let vs pray hym to continue it still: and that in such wise as we may perceiue him to be a louing father, and assure ourselues that he will not faile our children after our decease. But forasmuch as the wicked do take so greate paine to enrich themselues: the riches that they heape vp, shall be an occasion to cast their children into deeper destruction than their fathers. And when they thinke themselues to haue done maruellously well in gathering much: they do but twine the halters that shall draw their children to destruction. For had they made them to learne but some simple handicraft that they might haue walked conscionably: the same would haue bin a good heritage to them. But when they leaue them possessions: they become so blind with them, that they giue themselues to all naughtinesse, and so their riches must needes be an occasion to make them abhorred both of God and mā. For God cannot beare their pride. And men also are prouoked against them, bycause that vpon trust of their riches, they take vpon them to do euery man wrong and anoyance. God therefore is forced to bend himselfe against them. Againe, if they bee accustomed too deyntie fare and dronkenesse, they cannot get out of it: and that is a cause to make them giue themselues ouer to all euill in the end. Now looke as the wickednesse increaseth and augmenteth: so also must Gods vengeance growe whoter and riper. Then let vs marke well, that when wee see such chaunges, and that the goodes which are wickedly gotten by the fathers, are scattered and wasted away in the handes of their children, thereby God sheweth vs, that his denouncing of suche threats is not in vayne. Marke that for one point. But yet therewithall lette vs marke also (as I began to say already) that that is not continuall. For diuers times God taketh away the goodes of the godly and of their children, so as they bee quite stripped. And why doth he so? Euē for some reason that is secret to himselfe, and vnknown to vs. Neuerthelessse we know that the same is for their welfare. For by that meane he intendeth to inure them too pacience, or too take away the occasion of falling asleepe heere bylow, or else (to be short) hee mindeth as it were too minister some purgation to them or to let them blud, bycause he seeth well that the abundāce which they possesse, wold be as a noysome superfluitie to them. VVhen a surgion letteth a man blud: it seemeth too bee to his hurt, and in very deede it is the selfesame way wherby a theefe murdereth a man: but yet the letting of him blud by the Phisition, is for the curing of his disease and for a good cause. Euen so it happeneth oftentimes, that God be-reueth the righteouse men of the goodes and substance whiche hee hath giuen them: or else that hee impouersisheth their children: and his so doing is not to the ende that wee should take it for any punishment: but cleane contrariwise, it is (as I haue said) a purgation that hee v-seth towards his children: and thereby also hee draweth them backe frō being intangled in these worldly goods, least the same might be an occasion to bring them and all their offspring too destruction. Ye see that the execution of Gods iudgements whereof wee haue spoken heere tofore is not continuall: and therefore wee cannot make a generall rule of it without exception.

But let vs come backe too that which wee haue spoken of so often already: and which shall bee declared in the next Chapter following: whiche is, that Gods iudgements are not always visible so as we might point them out to say, God dealeth always after this manner. So then, whensoever God punisheth any man, be it in hys owne person, or in his offspring: let vs looke well vppon such examples, that we may profite ourselues by them. And if hee winke at others, and punish them not at the firste: let vs tarrie patiently till the day of the Lorde appeere. For so long as we be in this world, wee bee as it were in the nighte, by reason that thinges are so darke. But at the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ, all bookes and registers shall bee laide open, and nothing shall bee hidden any more: and therefore let vs tarrie patiently for that day. Furthermore if God scourge vs, yea euen in such wise as wee may suppose that hee hateth vs, and persecuteth vs as a mortall enimie: yet let vs not therefore cease to humble ourselues vnder him, and too acknowledge the same to be a meane whereby he woulde draw vs vnto him: but let vs suffer him too handle vs as he thinketh good, determining with ourselues, not too be wedded too much to our owne fanisie. For what a thing were it if euery mans life were in his owne hand, so as he might say, I will haue this thing to be thus, and that thing to be so: VVhere wer our obedience? Ageyne let vs consider what wisdome there is in vs too couet the thing that is good for vs. Nay rather, cleane contrariwise, we be tempted to wish the thing that serueth to our vtter vndoing.

Thus then ye see what cause we haue to bridle ourselues, and to put ourselues wholly to the good pleasure of our good God. Now it followeth, that when the wicked man shall haue heaped vp gold as dust, (as of treasure, apparrell, household stufte and such other things, and also of Lande: ) the righteouse shall cloth himselfe with it. This may come too passe many a time and often, and when it happeneth, we must not be blind so as we shuld not discern the hand of God to fare the better by it. It is said that a man may well turmoyle himselfe, hee may rise early and go late to bed, & yet shal be neuer the further forward for it, but rather the more backward, except God blisse him: and contrariwise that he gyueth his faithfull ones whatsoeuer is meete for them, euen while they lye asleepe. Lo heere a threate, Lo heere a promise. VVee see it is not for nought that he said so. For he will make the faithfull to prosper: and sometimes he will adauance them in such wise, as that their goodes shall growe betweene theyr handes. Ageine wee see there are a number whiche neuer leaue gathering all their lyfe long, and yet for all that, God ouerthroweth them vppon the sodaine, in somuche that when they haue taken greate peynes, all slippeth away. VVee see it too bee so: but doo wee see it alwayes? No. Then let vs learne too looke vppon Gods temporall iudgements in suche sorte, as wee constreyne him not to do at all tymes alyke. For there is greate difference betwixte the thynges that concerne thys presente life, and the secrete iudgementes of God.

After the same manner must wee iudge of his promises. For there are promises that belong but too the presente lyfe: and wee see not those promises perfourmed alwayes after one rate, but after as GOD knoweth them too bee expediente for vs. As touching the Spirituall promises, that belong too the welfare of our soules, they bee certayne, and it behoueth vs too conclude, that God will neuer disappointe vs of them. So then let vs put a difference betweene the things that concerne this transitorie life, and the things that cōcerne

the heavenly life and the euerlasting kingdome of God. As for this presente life, wee may generally well looke that God should guide vs in it, and hope that as long as he mindeth to keepe vs heere, we shall be nurished by his goodnesse, and continue alwayes vnder his shadow and shælding: but wee cannot particularly determine, that hee will giue vs abundance of goodes, that hee will graunt vs helpe, that hee will deliuer vs from oure enemies, or that he will help vs by this meanes or that. VVe cannot precisely point vpon any thing: but it behoueth vs to haue our eyes seeled vp: for God will haue vs too be heere as in a battell. But when all is done, we cannot fall but vpon our feete as they say. For all the troubles of this worlde shall not let God from leading vs too the saluation which he hath promised vs, and wherevnto he calleth vs. The like is to be said of punishmets. The curse of God is euermore vpon the wicked (that is certayne) and although they be rich, although they triumph, although they be in credite and estimation: yet are they not able to call vpon God, and therefore they haue no rest in their consciences, but are continually disquietted, nother can they allwage their grieffe by the knowledge of gods goodnesse, for they haue no drop of such knowledge as was declared yesterday. So then although God execute not his vengeance vpon the wicked, to the open sight of the world: yet cease they not to be cursed in the middes of their prosperitie: and as for the last punishment [at the day of doome,] they cannot misse of it, they must needs come to it though they carrie neuer so long. Yea and when they haue liued a long time, in such wise as God may seeme to haue bin fauorable to them, to be willing to follow their lure in all things: the same is farre woorse for them, than if they had bin chastized in the world. For they must be faine to pay a deare shot for the goodes that they haue crammed vp in this world, for their soting of themselves in all riottousnesse, for abusing of his gentlenesse and pacience, and for mocking at him and at his doctrine and at all religion. So then the last punishment whiche God denounceth againste the wicked, cannot misse them. But yet in this world it may wely enough fall out that they shall not be punished at the first dash, at leastwise that we can perceiue. Now let vs come to that which Iob saith. The wicked (saith he) shall heape vp money as dust. For God to shew his vengeance the better, suffereth the wicked to enrich themselves after such a sort, as they seeme to be Seagulfes that swallow vp all the goodes of the world. And certesse if a wicked man should neuer prosper: men should not perceiue the punishmente that is spoken of heere, namely that when he is growne rich, and hath gathered much: yet he cannot afterward enioy it. If a man shoulde aske those that take such paine to heape vp riches, what their intent is, O (say they) I cannot tell what may befall me: for I shall grow olde, and I shall haue neede of succour, many ouerthwaris do befall men, I will haue wherewith too help my selfe at my neede: and besides that, I haue children, and I will not leaue them poore.

Lo what their answer is which take so much paynes to enrich themselves. Yea, but in the meane season, whether it be by reason that they restrayne themselves from them (as diuers of them bee so niggardly, as it grieueth them too doo themselves any good, and they dare not helpe themselves with their owne, when they want) or whither it fall out that God snatcheth their goodes out of their hands, (as now and then it happeneth that after he hath suffered them to haue their full scope, he strippeth them quite and cleane of them in one momente, and it is seene that they and their offspring are become poore, and no man can tell how:) wee see they cannot enioy the things that they haue heaped together. And so we see that this threatning is executed vpon many: namely, that the wicked shall heape vp gold and siluer and moueables, and yet in the end good men shall come to be clothed with them. True it is that bycause Gods children walke simply and plainly, they may want many things, and it may seeme that pouertie threatneth too attach them within a day or twayne: but yet God prouideth in suche wise for them, as they alwayes keepe on their way still.

VVe see then that the godly shall sometimes be clothed with the spoile of the wicked: but yet for all that, what a thing were it to make a certaine rule of it, and to bind God to it continually? VVherefore it behoueth vs to beare alwayes in mind, that Gods iudgements are not euer appaunt and visible to be seene with mens eyes. VVhen we see a wicked man rich, we stumble at it, saying what meeneth this? And when wee see the wicked and the despisers of God honoured: it seemeth too vs that God gouerneth not the world, and that thinges are guided by Fortune. Behold how faith is vtterly defaced, when we go about to meature Gods iudgements by the thinges that wee can presently see with our eyes. And therefore let vs learne too suspende oure iudgements. Verely if God plucke the wicked mens goodes out of their hands: let vs vnderstand that he fulfilleth the threat whiche wee heare spoken of in this place. And if he do not: let vs marke that he reserueth the execution of his iustice vntill the last day, and that he will not bring things to perfection as now, bycause he will nurrish oure hope still, and not haue vs wedded to this world, nor seeke our felicitie heere bylow as in a Paradise of pleasure, but too lift vp our eyes aloft, and to passe as lightly through this world as through a iourney, knowing ourselues too be wayfarers and wanderers in this world, and that therefore it behoueth vs too trauell continually too the heavenly and euerlasting heritage. As much is ment by that which followeth, which is, That the wicked man shall build his house as a moth, and that it shall be as watchmans Caban, euen suche a watchmans Caban as watcheth the vineyardes. VVhen the vnbeleeuers and the despisers of God do build, they beare themselves in hand that they shall dwell in them a thousand yeares after their death. For dothe not the statelineffe that is seene in the buildings that are made by the despisers of God, shew that they imagin an immortalitie in this worlde? They beare themselves in hande, that they shall prolong their life by their palaces. VVhen a man hath builded his house to continue for a thousand yeares, hee beleeueth that his house is tied too him, and that he shall by that meanes be renowned. But God scorneth such ouerweening.

For this cause Iob compareth the houses of wicked men, to the houses of mothes. How so? The moth marreth and wasteth all things, to make himselfe a lodging: he eateth cloth, he eateth furre, he eateth all that he findeth, and to be shorte, wheresoeuer a moth lodgeth, it is alwayes too another bodies cost and hinderance, and yet notwithstanding there is nothing but corruption and vermin in his lodging. VVhen a vinekeeper maketh his Caban too watche the vineyardes, it is but for three moonethes: for as soone as the vintage is done, downe goes the Caban: and although no man set hande too it, yet it falleth downe of itselfe. Euen so it is sayde heere, that the wicked men do make them stately houses, and beare themselves in hande that when they haue builded after that manner, they shall dwell in them for euer. But what? VVhat are they themselves? Euen as a moath, that is to say, they haue nothing but corruption, and that must they beaine to carrie with them continually. Seeing it is so: surely their houses will not continue long. True it is that they shall make a great shewe for a time: but in the ende God will beate downe their houses, so as they shall not abide in them any long while.

Thus see yee a notable iudgemēt that God executeth vpon those that wil make such estimation of themselves in this world. And for asmuch as we see examples thereof: we ought to marke them well, and thereby learne, not to nestle ourselues in this world, nor too build by guile, wrong, and extortion. Let our building be according to the goodes that God hath giuen vs. And let not such as are well housed, besotte themselues in their owne lusts to nestle themselues heere. For let mē nestle themselues vpon earth as much as they list, and yet shall it not barre God from plucking them away. Then let vs keepe ourselues well from making our nest heere bylow: according as it will be said in the nine and twentieth Chapter, that Iob made his reckening that his state should neuer change. But men beguile themselues in behighting themselues such euerlastingnesse, and God also laugheth their fond presumption to scorne. And therefore if the godly be lodged after their owne mind, yet let them count themselues as straungers in this world, and let them be always redy to part hence whensoever it shall please God. And if they haue not the commodities that were too bee wished: yet let them go forward still, and learne to know that God aduertizeth them by eyesight, that this is not the place where they must abide, but that it behoueth them to passe further. Thus thē ye see what we haue to remember when we perceiue that our Lord will not haue men to set their minds vpon the things heere bylow. Therefore let vs trauell the right way where hee calleth vs: and then shall wee bee blissed, then shall euery of vs dwell in rest al the time that he hath to liue, bycause we shall not be trembled with the vnquietnesse which the wicked and the despisers of God haue. Thus much cōcerning that point. And furthermore, although that both we ourselues, and also our houses be nothing but corruption: yet haue we this promise to comfort vs, that when wee bee restored fully to the heauenly glory, we shall haue no more neede of these material buildings heere bylow, eya and that our body it selfe shall be another manner of thing than it is now. But yet therewithal let vs learn also, not to build with snatching and catching and other lewd dealings. For that is the cause why oure Lord doth so destroy the great palaces that are builded, and throw them quite downe. According also as we see the Prophets threatē, that they shall be the dwelling places of shreke Oules, of wilde beastes, of birds of pray, yea and of nightcrowes and wilde woodwards. Our Lorde then doth it not but to auenge himselfe of the robberies and extortions that are committed for the building of great palaces, according as it is said in the Prophet Abacucke that when such as haue bereft other men of theyr goodes do build, there is as it were a quire betweene the walles, so as one wall shall crie out I am builded vpon blud, and another, I of murther. Therefore let the faythfull aduise themselues well when they build, that it bee not vpon goodes wrongfully gotten, if they minde too haue ioy of their dwelling. And therewithall how soeuer the world goe, let them not rest there, to make their nest of it: but let them bee redy to remoue, whensoever it shall please God. Now furthermore it is said, That the wicked man shall die, and not be buried honourably, and that he shall open his eyes, and see nothing. This serueth to conclude the matter that hath bin treated of: for Iob meaneth, that it may well come to passe (and so it doth indeede) that the wicked shall stumble, yea euen after hee hath bin aduanced. For the thing whereat he looketh, is that oure Lorde exalteth the wicked, and afterwarde letteth them fall, yea euen a deadly fall. For as touching their death, they are not buried honorably: and agayne, when they looke about them, they find no succoure, but are disappointed of their longing. Here we haue a fayre looking glasse of Gods iudgements, sobeit that wee play not those which held argument against Iob: (that is to witte) that we go not about to inforce God to sette things in their perfect state. For that shall not be done till the last day. Yet in the meane season, it behoueth vs to be warned, to looke vpon Gods hand, as oft as oure Lord ouerthroweth the wicked and beateth thē downe. VVe must not in this pointe seeke any chaunce as the children of this world do, whiche imagine a wheele of Fortune, whereas men are hoysted vp aloft: and afterward let fall againe. For the changes and returnings which we see in the world, are not things that happē by aduenture, but it behoueth vs to father them vpon the hand of God. As howe? Some times hee punisheth them that haue abused his grace, and sometimes hee beareth with them, so as it is not perceiued that he mindeth too punish them: but yet they shall haue so much the more terrible account to make, as I haue touched alrede. Notwithstanding, if we see the wicked fall, it behoueth vs to know, that God did not aduance them without cause, but that the same was to the end that their fall shoulde be the greuouser, euen to breake their necke. Then after they haue bin hoysed vp aloft, God must make them to fall after that fashiō. Furthermore, it is not for nought that their buriall is spoken of heere. For although it bee neyther heere nor there in respect of our saluation: yet are there two things to be considered. The one is, that the wicked do at their deathe desye God and nature, and thinke too prolong their greatenesse and pompousnesse still in spite of nature when our Lorde conueyeth them into rottennesse. Yea euen then do I say the worldly and fleshly men make much more brauerie than in all theyr life afore. For their sumptuouse buriall is to saue theyr memoriall from perishing, that men might speake of it for euer. So thē we see, that the foolish curiositie which the worldlings and vnbeleuers vse in being buried with great pomp, is to continue their pride in despite of God. But God laugheth such presumption to scorne. For he disappointeth their expectation, (in somuch that whereas they purposed to be buried honorably, diuers times he hath giuen them a cleane contrarie buriall. Marke that for one point.

But yet it is also too bee considered, that buriall was brought in by God. It is no inuention of man withoute good grounde: but it is Gods ordinance, too the ende it should be a witnesse vnto vs, of the resurrection and euerlasting life. VVhen men be buried, they are layde vp in the earth as in a store house, vntill they may bee rayfed vp againe at the last day, and so our buriall is vnto vs as a looking glasse of the resurrection. Therefore when the wicked are disappointed of buriall, it is as much as if our Lorde vttered hys curse vpon them after a visible manner, yea euen as well in deathe as in life, according as it is sayde heere. And yet notwithstanding, lette vs marke, that if the wicked bee buried honorably, wee must not bee troubled at it, nor thinke that God hath forgotten hym selfe, or that hee executeth not hys iudgements in conueniente tyme, for wee see what the scripture saith of the rich man: namely that he was buried. And

And what sayeth it of Lazarus? There is no mention made of his burial: insomuch that it is not knowne whether he were eaten with dogges, or whether he were cast abroad into the feeldes. The Scripture speaketh not of it: it speaketh but of the buriall of the rich man. Contrarywise, if Gods children happen sometimes to lie vnburied: is it to be concluded therefore, that they are accursed? No: like as when the wicked are buried, it is not too bee sayd that they are blessed in their death. But it is to shewe vs, that God executeth not his temporall punishments after one egall rate in this worlde, but reserueth the cheef to himselfe till the latter day. As much is to be sayd when wee see good men burned, and put to open shame, and Gods children perishe wth the wicked, yea as touching the bodie, so as they be caried to the gallowes. For although they be the martyrs of Iesus Christ, and that that flander be more honour too them before God, than all the preferments in the worlde: yet notwithstanding, god giueth them not buriall. And howe commeth that to passe? Howe falleth out the threatenng agaynst the wicked, that is spoken of here? It behoueth vs to come back to that which I haue sayde: (namely) that they be suche iudgements as are hidden and incomprehensible as yet, and that it behoueth vs to tarie till our Lorde bring vs to that day, wherein all things shall bee discouered. In the meane season, let vs knowe that the heauen shall serue for a tumber too suche as are so martyred, I meane to the innocents that are put to reproch by the wicked and the persecuters. And that if they had the honourablest buriall in the worlde, it were nothing in comparison of the benefite and priuiledge, that God giueth them. For can a man finde a more honourable tumber than the heauen? But our Lorde maketh that to serue for a tumber for his children, when he bereaueth them of comon & ordinarie buryall. And so if it please God too haue vs buried: let vs knowe that the same is as a record of his goodnesse. And if hee bereue the wicked of their buriall: let vs also beholde his vengeance, both in their life and in their death. Yet notwithstanding, let vs learne to refrayne our selues, and to haue our eyes as it were closed vp in respect of his secrete iudgements, vntill wee be come vnto the last day, where he will shew vs the things perfectly, which are now out of order.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them more and more, that we may bee sorie for them in such wise, as we may desire nothing but to bee gouerned by his holy spirite: and therewithall let vs beseeche him humbly, too vouchsafe too vse his infinite mercie towards vs, in releasing the offences whereby wee bee bounde before his iudgement, and that wee may so passe through the worlde, as wee maye not bee wedded too worldly things, but stablised in fayth and hope, vntill oure Lorde haue called vs into his Kingdome, where wee shall fully see the things of which we knowe but a small portion as nowe: and that in the meane while wee maye bee strengthened agaynst all the stumbling blockes of the worlde, and neuer ceasse too giue glorie to our God, notwithstanding that our fleshy reason comprehendeth not the huge depthes that are in his woorkes. That it maye please him too graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and, &c.

The. Cj. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxvij. Chapter.

and the first vpon the. xxvij. Chapter.

19. VVhen the riche man sleepeth he shall not gather ought: he shall open his eyes and nothing shall bee seene.
20. Troubles shall come vpon him as vvater, and a tempest shall carie him avvay by night.
21. The East vvinde shall beare him avvay, and hee shall bee gone, and it shall hurle out his place like a vvhirlevvinde.
22. He shall rushe in vpon him, and not spare him, hee shall flee from his hande.
23. Men shall clappetheir handes together agaynst him, and hisse at him out of their place.

Silver hath his spring, and Golde hath a place to growve in.

2. Iron is taken out of the earth: and Brasse is molten out of the stone.
3. God hath set an ende vnto darkenesse, and vnto all things that tend vnto ende, the bounds of darkenesse, and the shadowve of death.
4. He ouerflovveth the ryuer agaynst the inhabiter, the vvaters are forgotten of the foote, and vvhen they haue risen aboue a man, they sinke againe.
5. Out of one selfesame earth commeth bread, and vnder it there is a change as it vvere fire.
6. There is a place vvhereof the stones are Saphyres, and the moulde is golde.
7. No birde hath knowvne the vvay of it, neither hath the eye of the kite seene it.
8. The Lions vvhelpes haue not vvalked there, neyther hath the Lion passed by it.
9. He lieth his hande vpon the rocke, and turneth vp the mountaynes by the rootes.

According to yesterdayes talke, it is sayde heere, that the rich man shall open his eyes and finde nothing. VVhereby it is ment that the riche men shall bee safe for a time, and thinke that they shall neuer want any thing. But in the ende al shall bee hidden from them, and there shall be no more hope for them: they shall awake and seeke succour, but not finde it. The summe is, that although riche men sleepe in their wealthe for a time because they thinke they shall neuer want, and haue their eyes blinded with ouerweening: yet notwithstanding God doth afterwarde inforce them too seeke helpe without finding it: and then they perceyue, that their trusting in their riches was in vaine, and so they are confounded. This iudgement of God is dayly seene: and therefore, wee bee warned, that although God giue vs all that wee can wishe, so as wee thinke we shall neuer wante: we must not fall a sleepe in it, knowing that our life is subiect to so many changes, as you woulde wonder to see it. Therefore let vs watch in calling vpon God, let vs watche that we rest not vpon the things that wee haue in oure owne handes, let vs watche too knowe that wee haue neede to bee succored many wayes: and by that meanes let vs learne too returne vntoo God, and to settle and grounde our selues vpon his onely prouidence and goodnesse. This is the warning which we ought to gather of this sentence. But this is not seene alwayes. Therefore (as I sayde) let vs learne, not to make a generall rule of it: and although the riche men ouerflowe in wealth, and haue a greate trayne aboute them, and cuerie man laboureth too doo them seruice: And finally that they want nothing: let vs not thinke that God hath giuen ouer his office, but that hee reserueth too himselfe the iudgement whiche hee executeth vpon some, too the ende wee should not thinke, but that hee is able too accomplishe it in this worlde if it pleased him. Other men take this sentence somewhat otherwise: that is to witte, they referre this saying (hee shall open his eyes or looke aboute) not too the riche men, but to all men. And [so the meaning shoulde bee] that men shall looke aboute them where those folke are become that liued in wealth, and bare so great port in the worlde, and not see them any more, according as it is sayde in the seuen and thirtie Psalme, I sawe hym perking vp as a hie Cedar in Mount Lybanus, and hee touched the clowdes with his heade. But anon after I came backe by hym, and founde his place no more. Ye see then howe God maketh the wicked to vanishe away in suche wise, that the remembrance of them is wyped oute of the worlde: and this sense will agree well too this text.

Furthermore, there are othersome whiche vnderstande not this sentence, neyther of death, nor of buriall as was expounded yesterday: but as though it were sayd, that when the wicked man layeth him downe to rest, hee shall finde none. Yet notwithstanding the easiest interpretation is too say, that the wicked shall not scape, but that God will shewe his iustice vpon them: and (as I haue sayde) this commeth to passe, howbeit not alwayes. So then, we must not euer seeke the execution of Gods iustice in this worlde: for that were an euill principle, and it woulde trouble vs, (as I haue declared afore) if wee sawe not these things with our eyes which we haue imagined vpon. Then let vs vnderstande, that oure Lorde delayeth his iudgements when he thinketh good, and maketh them not manifest too the worlde. Nowe it is consequentlye, that fearefulnesse shall ouertake the wicked man as a rage of water. Hee speaketh heere of waters: but hee meeneth, that it is as a sodaine storme, when a tempest or a whirle winde commeth by night. As this iudgement of God is common, so is it also notable: that is to witte, that God sendeth suche fearefulnesse vpon the wicked, as they knowe not where to become: and that the same commeth as a storme, and as a tempest in the night, which a man foresawe not, ne yet tooke heede of.

This is spoken purposely, bycause the wicked doo beare themselues in hande, that God ought to let them alone in rest: and yet notwithstanding, though they be not troubled, they cannot bee thoroughly in quiet; bycause they haue an euill conscience: but yet they be hight themselues woonders. And as it is sayde in the Prophetes (specially in Esay) they make a couenaut with death, so as they thinke themselues to be in such league and attonement with the graue, that although the earth were covered with a floudde, and vterly drowned, yet the mischeefe coulde not come neere

Ye see then howe the wicked are puffed vp with pride, when God pincheth them not, and howe they harden themselues therby. And surely if a man threaten them, and tell them what shall be the ende of theyr attempts: they are so little moued therewith, that they doo but mocke at it. Thus ye see why it is sayde, That fearefulnesse shall come vpon them as a rage of water: according also too the saying of Saint Paule too the Thessalonians, that when they shall say peace, and all is safe: then shall they bee sodainly ouerthrowne, and the destruction whiche they thought not of, nor once doubted, shall come vpon them. So then when there is anie talke of suche alteration whiche God sendeth vpon the wicked, (whiche is that hee destroyeth them sodainly, as if he sent a storme or tempest in the night) let vs learne, not too bee so sorted in foolish presumption, as too thinke that God will let vs alone in rest: neyther let vs flatter oure selues, but rather let vs knowe that our Lorde intendeth too keepe vs vnder in lowliness, too the ende wee shoulde haue oure mindes the freer too come vntoo him, and not bee drawne away by the vanities of this worlde, but rather bee prouoked too giue oure selues wholly vntoo him. Ye see then howe it behoueth vs too seeke peace in God, and not in worldely goodes. If wee doo so, let vs not bee afrayde that wee shall bee ouerthrowne with anie sodaine tempest, or that God will sende anie suche fearefulnesse vpon vs, as shall trouble vs: but contrarywise, all suche as presume vpon their earthly prosperitie, muste bee fayne too feele the hande of God: And although not in this worlde, yet in the worlde too come, they muste bee fayne too come too an accounte: and then can they not escape the hande of the heavenly Iudge. Wherefore lette vs walke aduisedly.

Furthermore, though the wicked bee nowe and then without feare, let vs not thinke that God hath forgotten their wickednesse: for wee do not alwayes perceyue his iudgements presently, as I haue sayde. Therefore it behoueth vs too tarie for the discouerie of them, vntill the last daye: assuring oure selues, that God will sometymes trie oure fayth, by holding his hande as it were hidden from vs. And further, it behoueth vs too note, that although the feare whiche God sendeth vpon the wicked, and vpon the despyers of his worde, bee not perceyued heere: yet notwithstanding, they feele a secrete feare continually in theyr heartes, as it is sayde by the Prophete Esay, That there is no peace for the wicked, but that they are lyke the waues that beate one agaynste an other. So long as there is any violent winde, wee see the water is so turmoyled, that the waues beate one agaynste another. Euen so the wicked (withoutte trouble at other mens handes) doo torment themselues, and are hangmen too themselues in all their thoughtes and affections. They shall quake at the falling of a leafe when no bodie foloweth them. But this fearefulnesse shall be secrete: for outwardly they set a good countenance vpon the matter, and also they knowe not themselues, but are dulled in themselues, and chafe at God, and admit not the warnings that hee giueth them too moue them too repentance.

Therefore let vs learne too seeke this peace that I haue spoken of, whiche is too haue a good and pure conscience, so as wee leane vntoo God and call vpon him. And then although hee sende vs troubles: yet shall wee not bee so vterly ouerthrowne, but wee shall haue whereof to reioyce in his goodnesse. But it is said finally, finally, that they shall bee carryed away by the Eastwinde, driven out of theyr place, and ouerwhelmed with miseries, and shall flee away. These similitudes of the Eastwinde, and of VVhirlwindes are added, all too one purpose. For in respect of the Countrey of Iewrie, theyr Easterne winde was boytousest, as all the holy Scripture sheweth. And so it is ment, that when the wicked haue prospered, and are become riche and mightie, they shall neuerthelesse bee caught away or throwne downe, as if there rose a great tempest, and that there came sodainly suche a winde as shoulde beare downe all things, so as they shoulde bee compelled too flee away. And whereas they thought themselues well fenced, yea and trusted also theruntoo: they shall well feele, that all that cannot restreine the execution of Gods iustice vpon them. Although then that they scarre poore men, and bee a terrour too euery man: yet muste they bee faine too runne away themselues. And why? For there shall bee no more power in them too withstande the inconuenience: they shall well knowe that they muste needes bee vtterly ouerthrowne, bycause it is the hande of God that persecuteth and punisheth them. Too be short, it is shewed vs heere, that suche as bee so bolde in troubling others, shall bee so daunted by the hande of God, that they shall forget the stoutenesse that was in them, and the Lionlyke courage, and all their pride, and shall become as cowardely as Curres. And why? For they shall feele Gods hande which they had despyzed afore.

Heereby wee bee warned too foresee Gods iudgements a long while aforehande, that wee may wayte for them patiently. So then although God let vs alone in rest, yet let vs not cease to examin our sinnes, and to acknowledge our selues worthie too bee beaten with his roddes. In so doing let vs cast downe oure heades, and learne to bridle our selues, and not bee so bolde as to doo amisse. Let all our boldnesse be in calling vpon our God, and in despising of sin, the deuill and the world through his power, in that we be vnder the protection of our god. But yet therewithall let vs walke alwayes in lowlinesse and modestie, knowing that such as haue after that sort bene a terrour vntoo others, shall bee contreynd too hide themselues, and shall finde no safetie, according as it is certaine, that the wicked shall be forced to flee. For needes muste that thing bee fulfilled in them whiche is sayde in the Psalme. Lorde, where shall I become, that

Psa. 139. 4. 7 I maye scape thy handes? If I shoulde flie aboute the clowdes, thy Maiestie is there aboue too stoppe mee. If I get mee ouer the Sea, thy hande will ouertake me. If I go downe intoo the deepes, thou art well able to fetch mee backe againe. So then, the wicked may desire the

Osee. 10. 8 Mountaynes too fall vpon them, but it shall not boote Luc. 23. d. 30 them: for the hande of God shall take holde of them, Apo. 6. d. 16 wherefoeuer they hyde themselues. VVherfore let vs assure our selues, that they are in a wrong boxe, that seeke peace when they bee persecuted by the hande of God: they may well shunne it, but they cannot escape it. Nowe although this bee not seene in all matters presently: yet dooth not God cease too bee the iudge of the worlde still: that is the poynt wherevntoo wee muste continually haue recourse. And finally, it is sayde for conclusion, That every man shall clappe bis bandes, when he seeth the wicked after that fashion, and every man shall bisse at them in the way of scorne and mockerie, out of bis place. That is to say, the poore folke that had bene oppressed afore, and durst not shewe themselues abroad in the streetes, bycause of these Robbers that fleeced them, and were readie too eate them vp, shall reioyce when our Lorde dooth after that maner destroye such as had bene in credite and authoritie, inso much that they shall clap their handes, and mocke at the pride and ouerweening that is in such despisers of God. Here it might be demanded, whether it bee lawfull for the good and faythfull, too bee glad when they see the fall of the wicked.

This were as a superfluous question in this place, bycause it is not tolde vs that it is lawfull so to doo: but onely barely shewed vs, that the worlde is glad of it, according also as it is seene by experience, that when the pillers and pollers that haue molested all men, as well great as small, do die, and are beaten downe by the hand of God: it is a thing that all men reioyce at. And why? For they haue bene the enemies of the worlde. But yet wee muste marke this caueat, that if our reioysing were not fleshy, ne proceeded of a desire to reuengde, it were good and holy, and allowable before God. But if wee bee prouoked too reioyce through aduengement, or through fleshy affection: then is our gladnesse cursed, and too bee condemned. And so when men are moued by theyr passions, whether it be to gladnesse or too sorrowe: surely their ioy, or their sorrowe is commonly sinfull. VVherfore if a man will reioyce at the fall of the wicked, hee muste not doo it vpon any fleshy desire, but onely in allowing Gods iustice, and in agreeing too that whiche hee sheweth: and yet in the meane while he must alwayes be stablished and grounded more and more in his feare and loue, and also haue good gouernment of his owne affections. Thus you see that it may bee lawfull for vs too reioyce in the destruction of the wicked. But let vs take good heede that we bee not stirred therevnto by our fleshy affections, ne intermeddle any thing of our owne. Yet notwithstanding as touching this present text, let vs marke how it is shewed vs here, that the wicked which are full of ambition and vainglorie, and seeke to haue the estimation of the whole worlde, must needes become lothsome, and God will bring them so intoo hatred, that euery man shall reioyce at their destruction. Ye see then that they shall be disappointed of their expectation. Although this happen not at all tymes: yet lette not vs thinke that oure Lorde hath therefore forgotten his duetie, but let vs tarie for the reuelation whiche is promised vs at the laste daye.

And heere ye see why Iob declareth many of the secretes of nature that are seene in the worlde, and therevpon concludeth, that if a man had the vnderstanding of all the things that are hidde, yet notwithstanding, Goddes wisdom, surmounteth and is farre higher. Some take this as though it were sayde: things change in this worlde, and wee see no continuance in the order of nature: for where frutefull feeldes haue bene, that haue borne good corne, there men see fyre: that is too saye, barreynnesse. And where a man woulde haue thought there had bene but grauell or sande, there oftentymes hath bene Golde, and precious stones.

VVe see then manie changes in the worlde, as it is sayde in the hundreth and seuenth Psalme. That is the matter whiche the Prophete treateth of there, shewing that by reason of mennes sinnes, the earth becometh barreine, inso muche that it seemeth that menne haue sowne Salte there: And the places that were well inhabited, become desert, so as menne are contreynd to eschue them for famine, and for the heate and colde, which greue them in suche wise as they wote not where to become: And also that God with his goodness, nessie ouergoing the naughtinesse of man, maketh the feelds frutefull which were barrein before, and maketh flore of sustenance, where grewe not one graine of corne before. Some then are of opinion, that Iob ment here to make suche a description, as is conteyned in the sayde Psalme. But I haue alreadie shewed you his meening: that is too wit, that there are many things in the worlde whiche are secrete, and wherein there seemeth too bee no reason: and yet notwithstanding men shall finde reason in them at the last, and also fynde the things that are hidden: but as for Goddes wisedome, menne shall neuer attaine too it, nor reache so high. And this comparison holdeth from the smallest to the greatest: as if Iob shoulde say, go to my freendes, it is a verie harde thing to mans vnderstanding, too seeke out the meanes howe to finde out golde and siluer, and precious stones. True it is that men do neuerthelesse bring it to passe: but yet may it well bee called a secrete of nature. Also there are other things wherein men are grauelled, and can doo no more but woonder at them: for that sometyms ryuers run out of some place where none was euer thought to be before: according as there be waters which sometyms rise, and somtimes fall, so as a man may somtimes go through a place on drie foote, and anon after the water shall swel vp to his chinne, and one while the brookes shall drie, and another while increase. Verely there seemeth to bee no great secrete in this: for the brookes increase by the melting of the snowe, and by great raine: but you shall somtimes see springs dried vp, and anon after gush out water so abundantly, as a man cannot say, but that God mindeth to shew his power in such chaunges. These therefore are things which are seene in the world, and serue for this present life, and yet are darke. But it is yet further true, that mans reason may well inquire of them, and studie vpon them, so as hee shall finde some reason. But Gods wisedome is another maner of thing. VVhen we come to his iudgements, let vs not thinke to conteyne them in our brayne, or to compasse them with our wit: but let vs reuerence the things that wee knowe not, confessing that the Maiestie of God is ouer hie for vs, and that it becommeth vs not to go about too abace it in suche wise, as too imagine too determine of it as we thinke good: but let vs content our selues with that which God sheweth vs, assuring our selues that there is an ouerlong distance betwene God and vs, and that he must bee fayne too come vnto vs, or else we shall neuer come vnto him: howbeit in comming too vs, his meening is not that we shall yet knowe the things that he wil shewe vs at the last day. Thus ye see what Iobs meening is. Notwithstanding, it is not necessarie as now to stand vpon all the things that are spoken here. For the intent of the holy holy ghost, is not too shewe vs the cunning of such mynes. It woulde be a verie small profite, if I shoulde bestowe three or foure Sermons too teache you to seeke out the mynes of golde and siluer: For it is not the thing that wee haue too seeke, and euery man would not occupie himselfe in that trade. So then we must not stande vpon euery peece when wee finde mention made of mynes of golde and siluer, or when it is sayde vnto vs, that there is golde or graynes of mettall to be founde in the sande or in some ryuer. But it ought to suffice vs, to see that God hath put such secretes in nature, to the end to be magnified by vs. Thus ye see the effect that wee haue to beare in minde: which is, that if we ought to acknowledge Gods infinite power and wisedome, yea euen in the least things in the worlde. Much more ought wee to doo it in the secretes that are so straunge too vs, as is golde and siluer, and suche like things. For then ought we to bee more moued, and our mindes ought to be better wakened, that wee may the better perceyue and vnderstande the inestimable power of our God. For our Lorde will not haue vs dullardes like blockes of wood: but hee woulde haue vs too beholde the woorkes of hys hande. And indeede it is good reason that wee shoulde knowe them, and thinke vpon them: yea euen in suche wise, as wee may yeelde him his due glorie, and be moued thereby to knowe what the worker is, so as wee become not like the vnhappy wretches, that walke in the worlde, treading Gods woorkes vnder their feete, and knowing not his Maiestie. Therefore let vs not bee so brutishe, but at leastwise although we bee not so heauie and grosse as not too consider Gods Maiestie and power in common and base things: yet when we come to things that are straunge to vs, let vs be moued in that case, and beginne to consider that there is a God that worketh by wonderful meanes: Or otherwise our vnthankfulnesse will be vnexcusable, if we thinke not vpon it. But therewithall let vs marke, that God will not haue our mindes tied too the things of this worlde: he had leauer that we shoulde come vnto him, and that we shoulde know how too profite our selues by the warning that hee giueth vs. VVe see then that the principall poynt which we haue to marke in this streyne, is that when we meeete with any of Gods highe and excellent woorkes, wee shoulde set oure mindes vpon them, too consider them well, and that in considering them, wee shoulde also glorifie God. It is sayde expresly, that God hath bounded the darkenesse. Yee see howe darkenesse hydeth all things. In the day time men may discerne white and blacke asunder: but when night commeth, beholde, all things are defaced, our senses fayle vs, we discerne not a man from a stone, we discerne not a man from a stone, we discerne not a house from a hill. But yet for all this, the darkenesse which be- reueth men after that sort of their sight and discerning, is bounded, and God setteth it a stint in the ende. Hereby Iob meeneth, that although there bee great diuersitie of things in the worlde, yea euen vnto the verie darkenesse that hydeth away the sight of all things: yet notwithstanding men do go through with them: for anon after, God sendeth light, and the darkenesse continueth not for euer. And here we haue a good and very profitable lesson: which is, that mans reason may haue some abilitie to vnderstande and iudge of these lower things, which concerne the present transitorie life: but as concerning the things that are heavenly, and belong too the kingdome of God, and as concerning his iudgements: al those things are hidden from vs. I said that this doctrine will bee verie profitable, yea verely if it bee well vnderstoode as it ought to bee. Truly there are many euen of the smallest and lowest things, whiche wee cannot conceyue, except God giue vs abilitie: according as wee see howe there are many simple idiots (as men terme them) which knowe no more than brute beastes. Such maner of folke are set of God before our eies as looking glasses, to humble vs withall. VVhen we see a starke idiot that hath no wit nor reason, it behoueth vs to looke well vpon him, for he is a mirrour of our nature. VVhence come the reason and vnderstanding that wee haue? Is it not the singular gift of God? Then let all those whiche haue reason and vnderstanding, know that it is God which hath indued them with such grace, and therefore that they bee the more bounde vnto him. Marke that for one poynt. And surely whereas our Lord hath made some more sharpe witted than others, and giuen them more handesomenesse to compasse the things that they vndertake, so as they forecast, and conclude, and bring bring all their matters to passe wisely, and compasse many things in short time: and other some are so slowe and dull witted, that a man must be faine, as it were to beate it into their heades with beetles, if hee will learne them any thing: such diuersitie among men sheweth euidently, that if we haue any power too iudge and discerne aright, it is the special gift of God, & it must not be fathered vpon nature, so as we shoulde not acknowledge that our Lorde dealeth to euery man according as hee himselfe thinketh good. Lo what we haue to marke. Furthermore, when he sayth that mans wit is by nature able to conceyue the things that are here beneath, and which concerne the present life: the worde Nature barreth it not from being Gods gift, but serueth to do vs to vnderstand that the thing is giuen to the vnbeleuers also, & to those whom God hath not forgotten againe by his holy Ghost, who is named the spirite of adoption, bycause he is the marke that God imprinteth vpon his children. So then, although we haue not the holy Ghost, too be regenerated, and to haue the earnest pennie and pledge of the hoped saluation, yet may we well haue vnderstanding. For it is a common thing both to the beleuers and vnbeleuers, too iudge of the things that are here beneath, yea and ofentymes the wicked, and the despisers of God, to be the sharper witted, and skilfuller in their dooings, according also as our Lorde Iesus Christ speaketh of them. Yee see then howe wee muste beare in minde, that wee may well after a sort comprehend the things that are here beneath. Not that wee haue the same abilitie, of any other than of God, as I haue sayde afore: neyther that men haue it all in like measure: for God distributeth it to euery man as hee thinketh good. Yet notwithstanding, God putteth not men intoo this worlde, without giuing them some portion of Reason, so as they may be able to iudge of these inferior things, and moreouer also discerne betweene good and euill. Where shall we finde so beastly men, that will not condemne robberie, murther, and whoredome? For verie nature teacheth vs so to do. Againe, all men haue some lawes and forme of common weale, and they see well that they cannot breake order, and guide well the matters that perteyne to this present life of man. Furthermore, they haue also trades and handicraftes: as, one is a Baker, another a Plowman, another a Shoemaker, and another a Clothyer: and all these trades are the gift of God, and they be common, as well to the vnbeleuers, as to the faythfull whome God hath inlightned by his holy spirite. Howbeit, such giftes serue but for men, bycause mankinde coulde not bee mainteyned in his state, without such helps and meanes. Yee see then in effect, that the thing which we haue too remember, is that although there be a great number of secrets in nature, and that the things be high which belong to this present life: yet hath God giuen men abilitie to attaine vnto them. As for example: to speake of some handicraft: before a man come to be cunning in the occupation, he shall find strange things: yea there are some woorkes that require such cunning, as ye would woonder. Howe is this possible to be done, will men say? Howe coulde men know where Golde lyeth in the earth? Beholde men make Salt of water. Howe commeth that to passe? Surely euenu bycause God hath giuen men the skill. Againe, what is the Golde and the Siluer that are spoken of here? Beholde, the mettall is mingled with earth, it hath not so much as colour, yea and it seemeth to be vtterly vnprofitable. And howe can a man discerne it? Howe can he fine it so as it should serue his turne, and become a precious metall, and a meane of traffike betweene man and man, according as we see both golde and siluer applyed to that vse? Howe might that be done? Againe, as touching other artes, there is no handicraft so base and common, but that at the first men are to seeke how to worke in it. Specially when we see howe men sowe corne, how can it growe will some say? Howe doo men make wine and such other things? VVhen wee once knowe these things, wee thinke them not straunge at all, but yet is it God that hath giuen vs the skill of them, for otherwise we shoulde be too seeke. The thing then that I meane, is that there is some capacitie in men to comprehend naturall things, notwithstanding that they be darke at the first enterance. And although myn be harde and grosse of vnderstanding: yet do they attaine to the cast of this earthly life, bicause God giueth them the aydes and meanes wherewith too passe through the worlde. But when it commeth too mounting about this transitorie life: then we finde that all of vs come too short. Here yee see wherin all proude folkes misbeaue themselues. For they beare themselues in hande, that bycause they bee sharpe witted and suttile in these lower things: they are able also to iudge of all Gods secretes, of the whole doctrine of the lawe, of the Prophetes, and of the Gospell. But God maketh them double blinde, when they bee so presumptuous. For sayth is a spirituall light. The insight of Gods iudgements groweth not in vs, neither haue we it in respect of kind, but we haue it giuen vs from aboue by Gods good pleasure, ouer and besides the order of nature. Yea, and we see howe God punisheth the pride of such as trust in their owne wisdom, in these base and inferiour things. Beholde these lustie worldlings: if they come once to a finenesse in their suttilities: they can finde in their hartes to mocke both God and the world: yea and they be so polytike, as (too their owne seeming) nothing shall escape them: and therevpon they deuysse wonders, they vndertake enterprises about their abilitie, and God suffereth them too runne a heade after that fashion, and in the meane while so blindeth them at theyr neede, that little children can laugh them to scorne. For oftentymes it commeth too passe, that the craftiest and such as take themselues to be peerlesse in polycie, are destitute of all reason, and put to the foyle, according as the Scripture sayth, that God catcheth the wise in their owne wilinesse, as in a pitfall. VVe see this. And howe is it possible that a man which was so well aduised, should as nowe be so ouertaken, and dazeled in so small a matter? Hath he no wit in him? Verely as though God were not in heauen, too blinde suche as thinke themselues too see cleerely, and trust in their owne skilfuld wisdom. It standeth him in hande too punish suche pride. For inasmuch as they presume vpon themselues: they rob God of his honour, and he must be faine to reuenge himselfe of such trayterousnesse. Againe, forsomuch as men applie their wittes to naughtinesse rather than to goodnesse: it behoueth our Lord also to punish them for misusing the giftes that he hath bestowed vpon them. For it is a singular gift when God giueth vs a good and sharpe vnderstanding: and if we turne the same to craft and naughtinesse, is it not reason that God shoulde punish vs for it? For we desile the thing that he had appoynted, not onely too our owne welfare, but also to the common benefit of our neighbours. Nowe if God punishe suche pride when men trust to much too their owne wit in these base and transitorie things: I pray you must hee not needes gutte their combes, and plunge them into the bottome of hell, to reuenge himselfe of their pride and statelynesse, when they bee so loftie as they woulde faine mount vp intoo heauen, and be priuie to all the heauenly secretes, and knowe knowe the things that God hath referued too himselfe, and ought to belong to him alone? So then let vs learne, that although our wit serue vs well ynough too discerne the things that concerne and belong here to this earthly life: yet it is not to be sayd, that we be able to mount vp into heauen, and to enter intoo Gods secrete determinations, and to conuey that thing into our wit and braine, which our Lord hydeth in himself. To be short, let vs assure our selues, that all things which concerne the euerlasting life, are farre aboue our reach, and that our Lorde must be faine to worke in vs (yea euen supernaturally) & not only to inlighten vs after the maner of men, but also to giue vs the new light, which is hidden from vs, bicause it proceedeth of the sayde spirit of adoption, whereof I haue spoken. Furthermore, sith it is so: let vs consider what mans free will is, and howe mad they bee that will mainteyne themselves by it. For if we haue freewill too guide our selues to Godwarde, and to attaine too euerlasting life: it woulde follow of necessitie that first of all, we shoulde haue sayth, rightuoufnesse and holinesse. But we see that the Scripture condemne vs as blinde wretches, and telleth vs that wee must not aduaunce our selues so high, as to thinke to attayne to Gods secretes: but that wee muste confesse our selues to be destitute of wit and reason. Thus then ye see that the first lesson which wee muste learne when wee come too Gods schoole, is to become fooles, as Saint Paule sayth. Truly this seemeth straunge too vs: but yet must wee passe that way: so that if we intende too bee taught at Gods hande, and that he shoulde play the schoolemayster towardes vs, we must become fooles: that is to say, we must acknowledge that there is not so much as one droppe of reason or vnderstanding in vs, but that wee bee more destitute of it than the brute beastes are, and haue lesse skill and discretion in vs than they haue. And therefore let vs learne to humble our selues, to the ende that God may reach vs his hande. Sith the cace standeth so: what must wee do nowe? First let vs vnderstande, that too comprehend Gods secretes, hee muste bee faine too giue vs his holy spirit, and to inlighten our darkenesse: and forsomuch as wee bee so farre too seeke, hee must shewe vs what is for vs to know, and we must not presume to haue any knowledge, other than he giueth vs. Marke that for one poynt. But wee must also consider further, that when we haue receyued this heavenly light, and gift of vnderstanding that commeth of the holy Ghost: we must also come to the holy scripture, and not take vpon vs too search further of Gods woorkes and iudgements, than is conteyned there. Then let vs content our selues with the knowledge that God sheweth & teacheth vs, and let vs haue the mildenesse to say, well Lorde, whensoever thou tellest vs what thou wilt haue vs to knowe: let vs receyue it quietly. And when thou goest no further, let our minds stay also. The two things therefore which we haue to marke for our owne behoofe in this doctrine, are first not to thrust forth our selues with fond presumption to know more than is permitted vs, but to pray God to gouerne vs in that behalf, and to inlighten vs with his holy spirit: and secondly to hold our selues to his word, and to suffer our selues too be taught by the same, coueting too know nothing but that which is conteyned there: according also as oure Lorde sheweth vs there whatsoeuer is meete and necessarie for our welfare.

And nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs feele them better than we haue done, that in beholding his iudgements, we may always be prouoked to walke the more in his feare: and that when we haue profited in sounde vnderstanding, it may please him to make vs to go forwarde more and more, so as we may not hereafter bee wrapped in the vtter destruction which is prepared for the wicked that are hardened and stubborne agaynst him, but that by correcting our vices, we may prevent his iudgement, and obteyne grace and mercy: and that after he hath afflicted vs in this world, he may giue vs the rest that he hath promised to those which are his: that is to wit, that being deliuered from all the miseries which we haue to indure in this worlde, we may bee gathered vp into his heavenly glory, to be made partakers of all his goodes, and to be reformed to his Image in true perfection. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

The. Cij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxviij. Chapter.

10. He cutteth the riuers in the Rockes, and his eie seeth cuerie precious thing.
11. Hee bindeth the Riuers that they ouerflowe not, and bringeth too light the things that are hidden.
12. But vvh<sup>er</sup>e is vvisdome founde, and vvh<sup>er</sup>e is the place of vnderstanding?
13. Man knowveth not the value of it, neither is it founde in the lande of the liuing.
14. The depth sayeth, it is not in mee: and the sea sayth it is not vvith mee.
15. The fine Golde shall not bee giuen for it, neyther shall Siluer be vveyed for the exchange of it.
16. It shall not bee valued vvith the vvedge of Golde, nor vvith the precious Onix, nor vvith the Saphyre.
17. Golde and Christall shall not marche it, neyther shall it bee exchanged for plate of fyne Golde.
18. There shall no mention bee made of Corall, nor of Gabish: VVisedome is more vvorth than Pearles.
16. The Topas of Aethyop shall not be made equall vvith hir, neyther shall she be pryzed vvith the vvedge of cleane Golde.
20. VVhencethen commeth vvisdome? Or vvh<sup>er</sup>e is the place of vnderstanding?
21. It is hid from the eyes of all that lue, yea and it is hid from the foules of the ayre.
22. Destruction and death say, vve haue heard the renoume of hir vvith our cares.
23. God knowveth the vvay of vvisdome, he can tell vvh<sup>er</sup>e hir place is.
24. He beholdeth the endes of the vvorld, and seeth all that is vnder heauen.

25. It

25. It is he that hath vveyed the vvyndes, and measured the vvaters.
 26. VVhich hath set a lawe vpon the raine, and appoynted the vway of the roring tempestes.
 27. Then did hee see it and knowe it, he disposed and ordeyned it.
 28. And hath sayde vnto man, the feare of the Lorde is vvisedome, and too eschue euill, is vnderstanding.

I Have declared already what Iobs intent is here, and what he meneth by the worde VVisedome. His intent is to shewe, that men are too farre ouerseene when they wil comprehend all Gods secretes, and be ignorant in nothing. And that we may knowe what the worde VVisedome meeneth, hee taketh it for the knowledge of all things, and specially of those which God concealeth from vs, till hee giue vs the full discouerie of the things which hee dealeth to vs nowe by measure, according as hee knoweth to be for our profite. And nowe (as I haue sayde) Iob sheweth heere, that there are manie secrete and darke things in nature, and yet men attayne too them, yea and wee see some reason of them, so farre fourth as oure Lorde graunteth vs. For too that poynnt must we alwayes come backe. Furthermore, let vs marke well, that the same is by measure: and therewithall let vs vnderstande, that our reason and vnderstanding extende no further, than too the things heere bylowe, and which concerne the present life. But if we woulde mounte vp too the kingdome of heauen, and seeke the things that pertyne too the euerlasting life: there wee sayle and are vtterly blinde. And so yee see why it is demanded here, where vvisedome shall bee founde. It is not to be founde (sayth hee) among men aliue or deade. True it is that many may take vpon them to be wise, and also bragge that they carie vvisedome in their selues: but yet for all that, God holdeth it in couert: and euen they which are departed, although they bee no more wrapped in this mortall fleshe, nor sotted in this worlde, doo notwithstanding not comprehend the things that are in the secrete purpose of God. So then wee maye well go aboute heere and there, and seeke aboute and beneath: but wee shall neuer come where vvisedome is, by the diligence of man, or if God holdeth it in his owne hande. Agayne, if a man intende to purchase it by riches, hee beguileth himselfe: men maye beare themselves in hands that they can well become riche by their owne trauell: but too become wise, it is not in theyr power. Ye see then that vvisedome is so excellent a treasure, that a man cannot finde an equall thing too exchange for it. Let a man heape vp both Golde and Siluer: Let them gather together all precious stones: and all this shall not match it. So then wee see in effect, that Iobs meening heere, is too humble vs, too the ende wee shoulde not thinke oure selues able too comprehend Goddes secretes: but rather shoulde willingly bee ignorant of the things that passe oure capacitie.

And furthermore if wee intende too knowe what is meete for vs, let vs desire God too shewe it vs by his holy spirite: for too that poynnt muste wee come. By the waye also let vs come too the conclusion that is set downe heere: that God hath all vvisedome in himselfe, as hee hath well shewed, if it were but in the creation of the worlde, when hee ordeyned the counterpeysing both of the windes and of the water. Therefore like as onely God hath all vvisedome in himselfe, and is the wellspring thereof: So also hath hee ordeyned men too be wise, by fearing and seruing him. VVee see then in

Iobs conclusion, that the vvisedome of men, is not to bee inquitieue to knowe all things through sonde curiositie: but to keepe themselves within their boundes, and too knowe that it behoueth them too serue God, and too submitte themselves vntoo him. That is the true vvisedome, and there muste men holde themselves as it were brided and at a stay. Thus much concerning the letter of this sentence.

Nowe let vs consider howe wee may profite our selues by it. And first of all let vs marke well, that when hee sayeth, that vvisedome is not too bee founde among the liuing. It is alwayes to admonishe men, that they may not trust too their owne reason, nor attribute so sharpe and suttle witte too themselves, as too comprehend the reason of God woorkes. And this admonishment is verie needefull considering the pryde that is in vs. For if wee bee so proude and presumptuous in naturall things: muche more doo wee overshooete oure selues in other things, so as euerie one of vs taketh himselfe too bee so wittie as nothing maye scape him: and wee contende not anie more who shall beare the Bell amongest vs, or who shall bee wyser than his fellowes: but wee fight agaynst God, which is a horrible thing, and yet wee bee so madde, that wee doo it. For prooffe whereof, if men trusted not too muche too their owne witte: wee shoulde not haue so muche adooe too bring the worlde in order: For both greate and small doo mounte vppe intoo suche presumption, as there are verie fewe that yeelde themselves plyable vntoo God, too suffer themselves too bee governed by him. But specially when God intendeth to teache vs, the vnskillfullest, yea I saye the veryest Idiottes of vs all, will carpe agaynst him. And why? Bycause euerie man taketh hymselfe too bee wyse, saying: Tushe I knowe howe too gouerne my selfe. I trowe you take mee for a beast. Beholde, GOD dooeth vs the honour too shewe vs hys will, and yet notwithstanding wee can not abyde that hee shoulde teache vs.

Seeing then that men cannot abyde that God should bee theyr mayster and teacher: muste they not needes bee worse than madde? And whereof commeth this but of the sayde ouerweening, that wee woulde all of vs seeme wise? And therefore I sayde, that thys admonishment is woorthie too bee borne well in minde, and too bee practized of euerie man, considering that wee haue thys vice rooted in vs by nature, so as wee woulde fayne haue God too let vs alone too oure owne fancie, and not too meddle with teaching of vs? And why is that? Bycause wee thinke oure selues too bee of sufficient abilitie of oure selues.

Therefore let vs marke well, that whereas it is sayde heere, that vvisedome is not too bee founde among men. Iob (or rather the holy Ghost by Iobs mouth) meeneth here in effect too beate downe all the loftinesse that is in vs, when wee imagine oure selues too haue so good and so sharp vnderstanding, that we can comprehend all things. Here the holy ghost auoucheth, that men beguile themselves in vaunting after that sort: for they want vvisedom. And what vvisedom? The vvisedom to knowe gods secretes.

For

For (as it hath bene sayde) we may well haue some vnderstanding of the things that are heere beneath : And although they bee darke, yet God discovereth them too vs : and that knowledge is called naturall, bycause wee see all men partakers thereof, although it bee not in egall measure. But when the case concerneth the knowing of God and his judgements: There all mans reason must needs be dazeled : and so muche the more, as men thinke too aduance themselues, so muche the more must they bee beaten downe and confounded. Marke that for one poynt. But Iob sayth expressly, that wisdom is not purchased with Golde nor Siluer, nor precious stones. And that is to bereaue men of all their vaine presumption: for if a man bee riche, hee thinketh himselfe a huge and meruayous man, and vtterly forgetteth himselfe, bycause hee is esteemed of other men. And so Iob sheweth, that whatsoever excellencie there is in vs, we are not therefore the wyser, neyther muste wee grounde oure selues therevpon. Nowe then, this is no more than needeth: For wee see howe the wretched worlde is beguyled with the riche men, and men of great estate which are in authoritie, when they speake any thing. Saying, what? VVee may not replie agaynst it, for beholde suche a one sayde it. Men are forepossessed with suche an estimation of them, that they discern no further, if it bee a riche man that hath spoken it. And although hee bee a verie beast, yet are men so dazeled at his authoritie, that they are as it were amazed at it.

And nowe adayes what hindreth so many simple folke too come vntoo Gods truth, and too frame themselues thereafter: but bycause they looke vpon the great ones of the worlde, saying, beholde them that gouerne all, beholde the riche men, beholde all the Noble men: none of all them wil receyue this doctrine, and therefore it is a token that it is nothing woorth, and that it is doubtfull, and not for vs too meddle withall. VVee see howe riche men are put intoo the ballance, so as men thinke that wisdom is as it were tyed too them. But (God wote) it is cleane contrarie. For yee shall often see the riche men so blinded wyth vaine presumption, that their ryches bring nothing but follie too rocke men asleepe, and too make men vtterly brutishe. As much is too bee sayde of great estate and dignitie. A man of meane and small degree will knowe himselfe, and gather his wittes too him, when oure Lorde giueth him discretion: and contrarywise, hee that is highly aduanced, forgetteth himselfe, and is blinded. For tyke as hee spreadeth ouer his wings in imagioing himselfe too bee more than hee is: so oure Lorde suffereth all his reason too vanishe awaye, and him too become as an Idoll. VVee see this with our eyes, but wee consider it not: wherefoye let vs weigh well that which is sayde heere: (that is too witte) that wisdom is not purchased wyth Golde or Siluer, least men should trust too muche too the things whiche they may attayne too heere beneath: and let vs assure oure selues, that too vnderstande Gods secretes is a speciall gift of hys, and a treasure that is shette vp from vs, till God of his owne meere goodnesse come too inlighten vs, and giue vs thereof what seemeth good too him. And heere withall, let vs marke well howe in conclusion Iob sayeth heere, That God hath seene, bad, and disposed wisdom from the creation of the worlde, and afterwarde hath sayde too man, Beholde, howe you shall become wyse, that is too say, by fearing mee. Heere Iob compareth God wyth vs, bycause it is vnpossible too abate or tame oure pryde otherwise than by force. And the onely meane of that is by bringing vs too God: for men may well ynoughe shewe vs the infirmitie and rudenesse of oure witte: but yet will wee euer drawe backe, nor neuer come to that poynt, nor ceasse too kepe still some pride in secrete.

Although then wee bee conuincd that oure wit is so weake as is pitie too see it: yet notwithstanding wee will not giue ouer this foolish opinion that wee haue of being wise. But when wee bee brought vntoo God, then are wee driuen too knowe that wee are nothing, and that wee muste not deceyue oure selues by oure owne selfeweening. See howe Iob setteth God before vs heere: and too the ende wee shoulde knowe the wisdom that is in him alone, hee setteth the creation of the worlde before oure eyes. VVell sayeth hee, are men so sharpe witted, as too comprehend all Gods secretes, as howe he disposeth the order of nature, and howe hee hath as it were weyed the windes and waters, and other things? True it is as I haue sayde, that the Philosophers haue well conceyued the reason of the things that are seene in this worlde. But if men come too the Creation, it is so woonderfull a thing, as they muste needs bee abashed, and reuerence the infinite wisdom of God, and confesse themselues vnable too comprehend it.

Thus ye see Iobs meening in this sentence. And therevpon hee sheweth vs that wee muste thoroughly beleue, that our wisdom consisteth not in searching, exaemyning, and seeking out of all things: But in knowing that which is profitable for vs according to Gods ordinance. Beholde heere an excellent sentence. For it is all one as if it were sayde, that Gods secretes are knowne to none but himselfe, and that no bodie is of counsell with him, as it is sayde in other textes of the Scripture: and therefore that wee muste not presume, too enter intoo his secrete determination, nor too knowe more of hym than is lawfull for vs, but muste learne onely what pleaseth him to shewe vs in his schoole, and assure our selues that all our wisdom is there. And this is the cause why I sayde that this is an excellent sentence. And why? For there are two vices in men which are harde too correct. The one is ouerboldenesse, and the other foolish vanitie. As touching the Ouerboldenesse, it is in that men are desirous to knowe more than God hath appoynted: and too bee short, that they woulde be wise whether God woulde or no, whereas God onely is the fountayne of wisdom.

Thus then ye see an outrageous vice, and yet notwithstanding it is verie hard too correct it. For wee see that men proceede with a furious outrage too saye, I wyll knowe this or that, what soeuer come of it. Yea, but God permiteth it not, hee setteth a barre in the waye, the gate is shutte agaynst thee, and whiche waye then wilt thou enter? But go too: yet will men bee inquisitiue of that whiche is not lawfull for them, whatsoever come of it. Furthermore, they thinke too attaine therevnto by their owne power. Yea, for they bragge alwayes of their owne reason and witte. So then it standeth vs in hande too fight agaynst this boldenesse and pryde which are in our nature, and to learne that we are able too doo nothing, and that it becommeth vs not too knowe more than our Lorde will haue vs. Marke that for one poynt. The seconde vice is the sayde sonde vanitie: whiche is, that men doo leaue the thing that is for their profite, and wherevpon they ought too rest, and wherevnto they ought too appie their whole studie, making none account at all of it: and in the meane while fall too tormenting themselues wyth vaine things things that are nothing to their profite. That is all their traueling and discourfing. I would knowe this (say they). And why wouldest thou know it? For it liketh mee. Behold how we be led with fonde desire to know the things that are nother for our profit, nor can edifie vs, eyther in faith or in the feare of God. And the cause why our Lord concealeth many things from vs, is first for that he intendeth to humble vs. For he knoweth our pryde, and that we would be intollerable if we knew all things, feing that notwithstanding our ignorance, yet men see there is no hold of vs, but that we would seeme to be otherwise. Loe how God abaceth vs: and when wee desire to be wiseft, we become so fonde, that euen litle children may mocke at vs. But although our Loride holde vs so in awe: yet cease not we to bragge still, & to beare our selues in hand, yea and to perfwade other men also, that there is no wisdom but in vs. And why? doth God keepe vs ignorant of the thing which is hidden from vs, bycause he enuieth vs. No: but he meeneth to learne vs humbleness there-by. And the principall poynt of our wisdom, is to be modest and sober: yea and to feele our owne infirmitie, that we exalte not our selues. Yee see then that God hideth many things from vs, to the end we should learne to be lowly: which thing we would not be, if nothing were vnknowne to vs. Againe, he discerneth what is good for vs: and that is the thing wherein he intendeth to occupie vs and to hold vs wholly. For wee finde not in the Scripture, that our Lord is minded to feede our curiositie, & to let vs know what we would desire. Our eares are alwayes itching and tickling in our desires: & would fayne know what is this, and what is that. But all these are fond things that can do no good: and God, to redresse this vanitie & foolish longing that is in vs, sheweth vs only those things that are for our behoofe. And so let vs remember wel this sentēce where it is sayd, that God disposeth wisdom, yea and keepeth it to himself: and yet notwithstanding hath sayd vnto men, feare yee mee and you shall be wise. For hereby Iob meeneth, first that menne beguile themselves when they be so desirous, & that they do but breake their neckes when they flie so hie: for it is asmuch as if they would flie without wings. So then let them learne to content themselves with that which it shal please God to open vnto them. Marke that for one poynt. And for the second poynt, lette vs acquaint our selues well with that which God sheweth vs, and wherein he will haue euery one of vs to exercise himself: which is, that we must know such things as may edifie vs in his feare. For he will not haue vs wise to be heauengazers, and to flitter in the ayre: but to know how we ought to liue, & to match our wisdom with the knowledge how to rule our life as becōmeth vs. Now then we see, first that wee must let God alone with his secreete iudgemēt, & not presume to know the things that are about vs: but content our selues to discern the things that God sheweth vs, knowing that many things are reserued to the latter day, at which time wee shall see the things fully and perfectly, and that as now it must suffice vs to know the things in part which our Lord vouchsafeth to distribute vnto vs. This is it that is shewed vs here. Now when I say that we muste not couet to know aught of Gods secreete iudgemēt: my meening is, that we must not desire to passe beyond that which our Lord teacheth vs by his word. For when wee know that God will guyde vs, wee neede not to be afrayde that we shall erre. But if we fal to gazing after our own fancie for the things that God hath hidden frō vs: we enter into a bottomlesse depth, & it is reason that we should be ouerwhelmed. Loe how God punisheth the pride of many mē that cannot be cōtēted with the knowledge of the things that are meete for thē. And so Iob, to correct the two vices that we speake of, sheweth vs that God hath spoken this vnto men. This saying, that God hath spoken it vnto men, is of great weight. For it is all one as if he shoulde say, that God intended to cut men off from al occasion of searching his secretes and determinations, further forth than he sheweth them, and therewithal declareth that the doctrine which he wil haue men to learne in his schoole, is profitable to edifie them in holy life, that they might learne to submit themselves vnto him that created and formed them, and walke in his obedience. Thus ye see the wisdom that God hath ordeyned for vs. To be shorte, Iob in setting the feare of God before vs as our whole wisdom: meeneth that our Lord plucketh vs backe from that which we haue moste minde vnto: that is, from our vayne speculatiō which cā serue vs to no purpose, but to puffe vs vp with foolish vainglory to haue the sayd windie knowledge which will make vs presume ouer far, and yet hath no profit nor instruction in it. Iob then hath set those two things one against another, one on the one side, and an other on the other, saying: will men be wise, they must not make themselves wise after the manner of God. Behold, God hath all perfection of wisdom in him, the neerer wee preace vnto him, the more shall we be confounded: for it is not for vs to make our selues like vnto God in wisdom, but rather to submit our selues vnto him. Lo what our wisdom is. VVe see what happened to our father Adam & our mother Eue: for God was not so niggardly as not to indue them with such wisdom as he knew to be good for them. Yee see then that Adam was formed after the image of God, to haue vnderstanding of all things that pertayned to him, in such wise as he could not wishe any thing more, if he had had a modest and well ruled desire. But what? Satan blowed him in the eare, that he should be like vnto God in knowing all things. Therevpon he ouerhot himself, and playd the horse that is broken loose, [thinking with himselfe,] ô, then shall I be ignorant of nothing. VVe see howe he caught him in that poynt: for wherof cōmeth the beastlinesse that we haue at this day? If a man speake to vs of God, needes must wee (spight of our teeth) know that we are wretched beasts, and that all the delight which wee suppose our selues to haue, is but darkeness as the Scripture also sayeth of it. VVhereof cōmeth it that the sense of man comprehendeth nothing of Gods misteries, & that if God call vs on the one side, wee shrinke backe on the other side, or elie are so lazie, as we cannot finde in our hearts to come to him: wherof commeth this? It is the payment of Adams pryde, in that he was not contented to be so farre forth inlightned in the knowledge of things by Gods spirite as was expedient for him to his welfare, but would needes become like vnto God. And when he was so lifted vp, he coulde not but meete with Gods mightie hande to cast him downe into this horrible gulfe of cōfusiō, wherein we are at this day. Ye see then why Iob sayeth expressly, that God sayd it vnto men: as if he shoulde say, go to, aduise your selues well what way you take to become wise. It is not to bee desirous to mount aboute the cloudes, and to search out many things which ought to be vnknowne vnto vs, as to say, why did God delay the creating of the worlde so long? what hath moued him to do this or that? wherfore disposeth he things after this sort? why suffereth he things to passe after this manner? your wisdom consisteth not in those things: for when you shall thinke your selues wise after that maner, you shall but go astray, and ye shall neuer be able to gette out of that maze: you shall but shrinke aside in such wise as you shall be shamed for euer. VVhere then will you finde wisdom? It belongeth too me (sayeth God) to discern and determine what is good for you. Learne to be contented with that which I tell you and teach you: for it is my charge to see what is for your behoof: and that is, to feare and honour me: Therefore hold you there and passe not your bounds. Nowe we see the meaning of Iob, or rather of the holy ghost. And so let vs learne, not to giue heede to this our foolish and tickling lust to know the things which can stande vs in steade, and to enter into Gods secreete determination, of purpose to search out the reason of all his iudgements: that is not the thing wherein we must occupie our selues, and wherevpon wee must set our mindes. VVherevpon then vpon suche things as may serue to true edifying.

2.Tim.3. d.

And that is it which S. Paule meeneth by saying, that all holy Scripture is profitable. But how is it that God hath sayde vnto men, that it is wisdom to feare him? he sayd it and also shewed it in deede, when he published his lawe and expounded it, first by the Prophetes and lastly by the Gospell. Yee see then how God sheweth vs, that our wisdom is to feare him. But nowe, to make this doctrine the more profitable: let vs note first what the goodness of our God is, in that he maketh vs partakers of the wisdom which he knoweth to be good and expedient for vs, notwithstanding that wee be bereft of it and shet out from it by nature. It hath ben sayd already, that wisdom is not to be found, nother amongst the liuing, nor amongst the dead, and that a man may go into the deepe for it and tarrie there foreuer confounded, without finding it. For there is no wisdom but in God. The dead may say, we haue heard speaking of it, but that is all: we know it not, nother haue wee any familiaritie with it.

But now beholde, our Lord doth vs the honour and grace to offer vs this wisdom, which is a secreete and inestimable treasure. VVee haue no access to it of our selues, and God offereth it vs after such a sorte, as wee neede not to make any long circuites for the finding of it. And why? Let vs but onely suffer our selues too bee taught of our God, and this treasure shall be put into our handes. Then is it a singular benefite of God, when he vouchsafeth to communicate that thing vnto vs which we were so vnacquainted with, and from which we were vtterly depriued and banished. And here yee see why he vpbraydeth men with this vnthankfulness in the eight Chapter of the Prouerbes, where he sayeth, that wisdom crieth out in the Streetes and in the open places, come yee to mee, I am readie to shew my self to you. She knocketh at the gates, shee declareth that hir desire is to dwell among men, and yet no man receyueth hir, men mocke at hir, and make none account of so greate a benefite that is offered them.

Pro.8. a.1.

Ye see then that the blame which God vpbraydeth vs withall, is that we may well know that wisdom is such a precious thing, as nother golde nor siluer may be comparable to it, and therefore that wee must needes say wee be worse than straught, and that the Diuell hath bewitched vs, if wee make none account of the sayd wisdom, seeing that shee offereth hir selfe vnto vs. There needes no great seeking and răsacking for hir, there needes no great paynes taking or farre going: wee neede but to receyue hir when shee is set afore vs, and yet for all that, wee see that noman makes account of hir. VVhy so? The weyght of a pinne (as they say) will occupie our heads, and there is not any one of vs all, but he is so wedded to his owne selfe profite, as wee sette more by the gayne of a penic or a shilling, than wee do by the wisdom of God.

Agayne it is no one thing that letteth vs: but according as euery man is giuen to one vice or other, so is he easily turned aside and drawne away from God. A whore-hunter will bee so weltred in his filthinesse, that his eares shall bee stopped, yea and he will bee vtterly deafe, so as it is no speaking to him: God may crie out alowde vnto him, but hee will not heare aught at all. The couetous persone doth the like, and the drunkarde as muche.

To be shorte, we see that the lettes are many which turne menne aside from suffering themselves to bee taught by God.

But yet for all this, the vyce that God findeth faulte withall in this texte of Salomons, is ouercommon and ordinarie: that is to wit, that when he sendeth this treasure of wisdom which ought to bee common to all menne, knocking at their gates, and bidding them to the feast: euery man doth rather shrinke away, than drawe neerer. Furthermore, as God in that place accuseth and condemneth men for their beastly carelesnesse and vnthankfulness: so sheweth he all the faythfull, howe greatly they ought to esteeme to be taught of him: according as it is sayde in the fourth of Deuteronomie, beholde, thy wisdom and vnderstanding is to haue thy God come vnto thee, and to stewe thee his will, what is good for thine instruction, and to edifie thee in him. Lo wherevnto our

Deut.4.4.6.

Lord calleth vs, when he intendeth too bring vs to himselfe, by shewing vs that all our true wisdom and vnderstanding, is to hearken vnto him, namely by conceyuing what he sheweth vs in his woorde. As if he should say, yee wretched soules, deceyue not your selues by setting your mindes vpon vayne things as the worldlings and vnbeleeuers do: but hold ye to that which I tell you, assuring your selues that that onely is your true wisdom and vnderstanding, and that you are but fooles, yea and mad men, if yee attempt to steppe out of those boundes. And therewithall he vpbraydeth them newe againe, and in vpbrayding them sheweth, that wee be vtterly without excuse if wee walke not aright, seeing we haue his woorde.

And why? Say not any more (sayeth he in the thirtieth of Deuteronomie) who shall climbe vp into heauen? or who shall go downe into the deepe? or who shall passe ouer the Sea? Beholde, the woorde is in thy heart and in thy mouth. Our Lord then declareth, that we cannot alledge that it is ouerharde for vs too conceyue the things that are about vs. For if wee alledge the dulnesse of our vnderstanding, or the highnesse of the secretes of heauē:

Deut.30. c.

No no (sayeth God) I haue provided for all that, I haue made way aforehande: for by giuing you my lawe, and by shewing you my will, I haue so taught you wisdom, as the same would very fayne dwell among you: according also as it is sayde in the eyght of the Prouerbes, My delight is to dwell among men. Ye shall not neede therefore to make long journeyes to come vnto mee, ye neede not to stie about the clowdes, yee neede not to go downe into the deepes, nother neede yee to go ouer the Seas.

Pro.8. d.31.

For when my woord is giuen into your mouthes, and put into your hartes: behold, that is all your wisdom, that is the thing that you must rest vpon. Now then, first of all, seeing the case standeth so: if menne dispize this grace of God when it is offered them by communicating his woorde vnto them: they make warre against him as much as in them lieth. Therefore lette vs take good heede to our selues. For wee see heere a saying that ought to wey greatly with vs, when it is sayd, that wisdom delighteth to dwell among vs. God in that place bringeth in his owne wisdom which he sendeth vs, as it were in his owne persone. So then seeing it delighteth God that we should receyue his wisdom: let vs assure our selues, that in refusing, it we make warre against him, as I haue sayd, and that it is all one as if wee would spite him of sette purpose, and driue him quyte and cleane away from vs.

And

And is not that an ouerhynouse thing? Furthermore whereas we desire our own wellfare, and God is readie to shewe vs the way, and calleth vs to him, to the ende wee shoulde finde the fulnesse of all wellfare in him: wee vouchsaue not to come, but turne our backs vpon him. Againe when he teacheth vs: it is to the ende we should knowe him, and be as it were transformed into him. And wee know that his image and glorie are to be preferred before all things. Therefore, when we cannot abyde to be taught, it is as much as if we would turne light into darknesse and deface Gods glorie, that it might not be seene nor knowne any more. And muste not men needes be become terrible monsters and Diuelles incarnate, when they labour so to abolish Gods glorie and to quenche the light, euen the light that was their whole wellfare, soule helth and ioy? But yet is this vice ouer common. So then let vs learne to esteeme this benefite that God doth for vs when he vouchsaue to call vs too his schoole, and openeth vs the doore to the end wee shoulde learne of him: & wheras of nature we were bereft of the sayd wisdom, he cometh to set it before our eyes, and offereth it vs familiarly: yea and tarieth not til we seeke it, but knocketh at our doores, and calleth vpon vs, desiring nothing but to winne vs to himself. Seing then that our Lord vsesh such gentlenesse towards vs, as to allure vs so curteously: lette vs learne to make account of that honour, and let vs not be so vnkind when he would haue vs to come vnto him. And specially let vs remeber what hath bene sayd: namely what our own nature is. For it is not requisite that God shoulde teach vs as the Angelles of heauen. Astouching the Angels of heauen, although they bee of a noble and excellent nature, although they be partakers already of the heavenly glorie, although they holde still the foundnesse which they had in their creation: yet notwithstanding, they be exceedingly bounde vnto God, in that it pleaseth him to make them priue to his will, & needes must they be rapt into astonishment at the grace that he hath giuen them. But the case standeth not with vs as with them. For firste, as in respect of our bodies wee be earthly creatures: and although God haue giue vs immortal soules: yet dwell wee here in houses of myre and clay, as hath bene declared heretofore: there is nothing but corruptio in vs, and we are here with brute beastes, with woormes, and with things so base and heauie, as there seemeth to be an infinite distance betweene vs and Heauen. But there is yet a worse thing: which is, that we be bereft of the vnderstanding that was giuen too our father Adam: and therefore we bee as forlorne creatures. Whereas Asses and Oxen keepe still their owne nature: men are so corrupted & marred, that when God calleth them to him, in steade of being in loue with such goodnesse, they be lesse moued with it than the brute beastes. Beholde, God desireth earnestly, that wee should be partakers of his glory, yea and of all the good things that are in him, and that we should enter aforehand into the possession of them when his woorde is preached vnto vs. Now then if we profite not our selues by these things: I pray you what a matter is it? Therefore seing the time will not suffer me to speake any more of it as nowe: let vs aduise our selues, firste to be ignorant where God will haue vs, for he onely knoweth what is meete and conuenient for vs: and therefore let it suffice vs to bee taught in his schoole, and to learne the things, that he sheweth vs. And secondly let vs learne to know his will in such wyse as is conteyned in the holy Scripture. And therewithall let vs not be so thankelesse, as to reiect the benefite that he. mindeth to bestowe vpon vs and offereth vnto vs: but let vs be attentiu, and indouour to put away all our euill affections, and suffer our selues to be so taught of God, as we may be edified by the things that he sheweth vs, and profite in them more and more, & be desirous to be stablished in them all the time of our life.

Iob. 4. d. 19.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgment of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better, that wee may returne vnto him with true repentance and acknowledge the miseries wherewith wee bee fraught, that he may vouchsafe to cleanse vs of them, and to bring vs fully backe vnto him, and to reforme our frowarde nature: and that seing wee be helde in the darknesse of ignorance, so as there is nothing but blindnesse in vs, it may please him so to inlighten vs by his holy spirite, as wee may dispise all worldly vanities, and keepe on our way to the heauely life, wherunto he calleth vs. And furthermore that wee may haue the modestie, to keepe vs to his woord, & not to couet to know more than he thinketh good for our edifying. And that whyle wee be here in his schoole, wee may profite more and more, vntill that hauing taken vs fro this earthly pilgrimage, he gather vs into his kingdome, to giue vs full and perfect fruition of the things which wee know now but in portion and measure, according as our capacite doth beare. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs but also to all people and Nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant &c.

The ciij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxviij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the former texte.

Haue told you already that Iobs intent was, to shewe menne that they ought to holde thēselues in such sobrietie, as not too couet to knowe more than God permitteth them: and also that they muste not runne gadding astray, but followe the way which is poynted to them. For this cause Iob setteth a difference betweene God and vs, and sheweth that it is no reason that a mortall man should presume to seeke the things that are in God, and be contented to be ignorant in nothing. Let vs be contented to be subiect vnto him to whome wee cannot attayne furtherforth than it pleaseth him to lift vs vp to himselfe, and specially which is so gracious vnto vs, as to abace himselfe to the ende wee shoulde know him. For it were impossible for our infr-mitie to mount vp to the highnesse of God: and therefore he muste be fayne to come downe vnto vs. And so let vs not thinke that our wisdom is to know all things: but let vs vnderstande that it behoueth vs to be in faire lower degree vnder the highnesse of God, and to worship that which is hidden from vs, that is to wit, the wonderfull secretes of God.

Yee see then in effect what we haue to marke vpon this text, where it is sayd that God in creating of the worlde, hath well shewed that there is an other wisdom than wee can attayne vnto. For it is not in our power to measure the windes or the waters, or to dispose of the whole order of the world and of nature. Now seing these things surmount our capacite, let vs learne to hūble our selues, and to be contented with the vnderstanding that is giuen vs. And now according to that which hath bene declared already,

Ii.ij.

already,

alreadie, let vs wey well this saying, that God hath sayd to man. For it serueth to shew that it is not lawfull for vs to know more than is giuen vs frō aboue. And furthermore let vs marke well the grace that God graunteth vs aboue other creatures. For where as Iob sayeth expressly, that God turned himselfe vnto men to giue them some wisdom by measure: therein he sheweth, that we be not like brute beastes that liue without discretion, but that God hath giuen vs an excellent priuiledge, which is that we should haue vnderstanding and some light of reason, to know what it is to liue, so as we might haue some modestie and honestie in vs. Therefore let vs learne to esteeme this grace of God, & to honour him, for that it hath pleased him to do to vs, in separating vs after that sort frō the brute beasts. And this is well worthie to be noted, bicause we see two extreme vices in men, by reason whereof they can neuer keepe any good measure. Such as would fayne be wise and full of vnderstanding, do giue themselves to many vaine curiosities, they gaze about them, they trudge vp and downe, they are vnfacible, they are desirous to knowe this and that, and they are neuer at any rest, because they labour alwayes for vayne and vnprofitable things. Behold here a very euill extremitie, when menne cannot knowe their owne abilitie, but sitter in the ayre, and plundge themselves into so deepe dungeons, as they can neuer get out agayne. On the contrary parte, what do such as minde not to trouble themselves in vayne after that sort? They become brutish, as we see by experience: specially in the papacie. I pray you, haue we not there a fayre mirrour of this doltishnesse which is in men, that to hold themselves within modestie, they will knowe nothing at all, but shet themselves frō that which ought to be cōmō to all men? To be short, for feare to ouershotte themselves in curiositie, they become as Calues or other brute beastes without any other vnderstanding. And we see that such as vnderstand no woorde of latine (to the intent to play the beastes) speake thus in latin: Mitte arcans Dei: the meening whereof is, that they must not inquire of Gods secretes. See how men do retch their boundes continually, and cannot keepe a good meane. Therefore let vs remember how it is coneyned in this streyne, that God sayeth expressly vnto men, This is the wisdom. Iob then magnifieth this knowledge which God hath giuen vs in separating vs frō other creatures: according as it is sayd in the first chapter of S. Iohn, that we not onely haue life to eate and drinke, and to exercise our bodie: but also that we haue the light of vnderstanding. And for asmuch as this benefite deserueth to be magnified: let vs take good heede that wee be not deprived and bereft of it thorough our owne vnthankfulnessse. VVhen God openeth our eyes, & we shut them, are we not worthy to be blamed as peruerterers of the order of nature? when God giueth vs discretion to know good from euill, and setteth vs here to beholde his werkes, to the end wee should approach vnto him, and be partakers of his image in respect that wee be reasonable creatures: if we defile all this & will not know any thing: is it not a manifest fighting against God, and an utter renouncing of the benefite which he would bestow vpon vs, yea, and of such a benefite as is most principal & highliest to be esteemed of al others? ye see then in effect two things which we ought to beare in minde. The one is that God hath not set men in this world to bereeue them of al vnderstanding. For he will not haue them like Asses or horses: he hath indued them with reason, and would haue them to vse vnderstanding: and therefore when he sayd, this is the wisdom, he spake purposely vnto them? VVhy spake he not also vnto other creatures? Bicause he listeth not to do them the like honour that he hath done to vs, nor to aduaunce the to so high degree. And therefore (as I sayd) al they which passe not to profite in wisdom while they liue, do well shewe that they go about to withdraw themselves wholly from their creator. Marke that for one poynt. And for the second also, we haue to beare in mind, that our Lord hath set vs boūds which we may not passe, and that such as will be wise and politike, must not stray at iouers, and giue themselves to fond speculations and dotages, but hold the first to this lesson of not coueting any thing which God sheweth them not. Lo what our wisdom is: let that be alwayes our entraunce: and when we intend to shew our selues wise, let vs herkē to this voyce, namely that our Lord holdeth vs within such listes, as he will not haue vs to run out here and there, but to receyue that which he thinketh good to teach vs. And now let vs come to the fearing of God. It is our wisdom to feare God. It seemeth here, that Iob restrayneth más wisdom to much, when he incloseth it wholly within the feare of God: for we know that our Lord teacheth vs other things also in his woord. But yet so it is, that our whole wisdom is to harken vnto God when he speaketh, and to beare in minde whatsoever he sayeth, and not to make our selues wilfully deafe: but to haue our eyes & eares open when he sheweth vs his will & speaketh to vs: according as it is sayd in the 4. of Deuteronomie, behold thy wisdom and vnderstanding is to profit in the schole of thy God, seing he vouchsafeth to be thy schoolemaster. Then had it rather bene meete to haue sayd, that the wisdom of mē is, not to be inquisitiue of whatsoever liketh themselves: but to come to Gods woord wherevnto he will haue them to hold themselves, and to submit themselves all wholly without passing of their boundes. In steade hereof Iob sayeth: that our wisdom is to feare God. But wee muste briefly marke that besides the modestie whereof mencion hath bene made, he sheweth vs here, that our wisdom is the thing which edifieth vs to walke in the feare of God, and to obey him. Then his meening is not to withdraw vs from fayth and frō that which dependeth therevpon, that is to wit, from knowing the infinite goodnesse of our God, to rest therevpon, so as we should not doubt but he is merciful vnto vs, bicause he pardoneth our sinnes for our Lord Iesus Christ sake, and also hath adopted vs & will loue vs as his children to procure our saluaciō vnto the end: Iob (I say) excludeth not fayth in this place when he speaketh of the feare of God: but he sheweth briefly, that the true wisdom, is not speculatiue, as we see many men trouble and disquiet themselves very much to know this or that, & they wote not why, there is no certaintie. If a man aske them saying, when wil you haue cōprehended the things which are hidden from you? To what purpose are they? what shall they profite you? It is certaine they shall not profit the at all, nother shall they be a whit the better for them. It is not inough to feede themselves with winde and with foolish fancie, nor to be puffed vp as S. Paule speaketh of them, saying, that knowledge puffeth men vp. See what mēs fondnesse is. But cōtrarywise Iob sayth, that if we be wise after the māner that our Lord hath ordeined, we shal be well edified to walke in the feare of God. Here ye see also why it is sayd in the first and 9. chapters of the Prouerbes, that the feare of God is the enterace or beginning of wisdom. True it is that some mē take this beginning to be as an appee. VVhy is the feare of God the beginning of wisdom? Bicause it is the thing that we must begin at: like as men will not at the first dash set a yong childe to the lie and profound sciences, but muste firste teach him his entrances or principles. But they which take Salomons wordes in that sense, do ground themselves vpon that which is sayde in the Canonickall Epistle of S. Iohn,

1. Iobn. 4. d. 18. where it is sayd, that true & perfect loue doth driue away feare. But in that place, S. Iohn speaketh of the feare that the Infidels haue when they shunne God trembling at his Maieslie, bicause they know not in what case they be. For who soeuer haue not caught holde of Gods goodnesse to come vnto him and to trust in him, (of whiche number all they be which know not that God intēdeth to be at one with vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, and therewithal that forasmuch as he hath adopted vs, we must not doubt but that he will alwayes shew himselfe louing toward vs, and receyue vs to mercy:) all they (I say) that haue not tasted of this, are afrayde and astonied when men speake to them of God, and are like a wretched offender that could finde in his heart that all Iustice were abolished. Yee see then what the state of all vnbeleeuers is, how they be half besides themselves, and eschewe God asmuch as is possible. But when we be once perfwaded of Gods mercy: we be drawne to him by that gracious goodnesse, to ioyne with him, and wee come vnto him as it were with our heads vpriight. Not that we do at any time omit our reuerence and humilitie: but bicause wee are fully resoluēd, that God liketh well of vs. And so wee are no longer in the doubt and vnquietnesse wherewith the wretched vnbeleeuers are tormented. S. Iohn speaketh of the sayde feare: but when it is sayde in Salomon that the feare of God is the chiefe or beginning of wisdom: it is to shew that it is the chiefe poynt. And to be short, the very meaning of all the things that are taught vs here by Iob, is that if men will be wise, they must learne to walke in the feare of God, and be edified to rule their life accordingly, and not giue themselves to speculations which hold them in a mamering without any certaintie. And surely here you see also why Salomon in an other text sayeth, that the seif same feare of God is the fountayne of life. He would not call it the fountayne of life which draweth men out of destruction (as he addeth there): except it behoued vs to holde vs wholly to it, and that it were our perfect felicitie. So then we see, now what is the meaning of this text: Namely that such as are edified to feare and obey God, are men of right vnderstanding: and that the same is the thing wherupon we must set our mindes, and not vpon wandering speculaciōs: this will be the easier to vnderstand, if we adde one other goodly text of the Prophet Esay in the 33 chapter: There he speaketh of the true reformatiō of the Church, that was before the scattering and destruction thereof. Therefore he sayeth, that the things which were seene to be turned vpside downe as then, shoulde come to their state againe in the time of Ezechias, verely in asmuch as he was a figure of our Lord Iesus Christ: for no doubt but the Prophet Esay treateth there of the perfection which should be at the comming of Iesus Christ. For he sayeth: that stedfastnesse, strength, and saluation shall be the wisdom and vnderstanding of the tyme of Ezechias, and that the feare of God shall be his treasure. Here wee see howe the Prophete declareth, that where God is not knowne, there all things muste go to hauock and viter desolation, like as it is also sayd in another text, where the Prophet complaineth, that all was turned vpside downe, bicause there was no knowledge of God in the lande, and men were giuen ouer to all euill. And is it any wonder when men abuse themselves wilfully after that sorte, if God giue them ouer to a lewde minde. so as they be no more ashamed to caste themselves into so outrageous and haynous things as are euen lothsome to the worlde? Yce see then why the same Prophete Esay sayeth, that the people were caied into destruction bicause they had no knowledge. So on the contrary parte, in the texte which wee haue alledged, he sheweth that when the Church is set in hir perfect state agayne, and things brought into good order: then shal wisdom and vnderstanding be the stablishment, welfare and strength of them. As if hee should say, that the Church cannot otherwise stande in good case, than if menne be taught purely, to knowe what is for their profite. And here it is to bee seene, what the popish Church is. For they haue pompe ynough, and wee see also that they dare as it were face God with a Diuelish pryde, and strayne no curtesie at all in attributing these braue titles to themselves, that they haue the holy gouernement of Heauen amongst them, and the assurednesse of Gods truth and doctrine, and that they carrie the holy ghost in their sleewe, and holde God locked vp betweene their walles. But yet for all that, what maner of knowledge is it that they haue? Cleane contrarywise wee see that they seeke nothing, but to make the wretched worlde brutishe. And so wee may well conclude, that all the buylding of Gods Church is ouerthrowne by them, and put too horrible confusion. And why? for they want the wisdom which the Prophete Esay auouched to bee the welfare, strength and stablishment of the Church. Thus much concerning the firste poynt. But to fit the sayde texte to that which is conteyned here, it foloweth that the feare of God was the treasure of Ezechias, and of all his people. Esay therefore doth well shewe there, that which Iob meeneth here: that is too witte, that suche as knowe the things that God teacheth by his woorde, will not bee wedded to these small and fonde suttilties, but will bee well grounded in knowledge howe to rule their lyfe, and too walke in the feare of God. For vnder the woorde Treasure, hee sheweth that that is the thing wherupon men must wholly settle themselves, as vpon their full and perfect felicitie, and wherein they muste take their full contentation and rest.

Nowe wee see that the thing which is spoken heere, is very true, that is to witte, that men shall then bee wise and skilfull, when they shall haue profited so farre, as to walke in obedience to God and in holinesse of lyfe. And furthermore lette vs come backe to that which hath bene touched already: that is to witte, that therewithall wee muste applie our whole studie, and sette our whole mindes, vpon the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture, bicause there is nothing there which is not for our profite. And surely it is vnpossible to feare God and to giue our selues to his seruice, vnlesse wee be acquainted with his goodnesse: according as it is sayde in the hundred and thirteenth Psalme. Lord thou arte good and there is mercie with thee, to the ende that menne should feare thee. VVee see then that men cannot bee grounded in the feare of God, vntill they haue knowne Gods mercie, and taken holde of it, to the ende to come to him with a free heart and to seeke him. For so long as wee shunne God, we are fierce agaynst him, and consequently rebelles. But men shall neuer conceyue a right taste of his goodnesse, except they bee taught it by the Scripture. And that also is the place where true feare is. For wee muste not thinke that vnder this woorde Feare, the Scripture meeneth: onely some bondage that men should yeelde vnto God, as though they were enforced therevnto. But this feare here, importeth that wee muste bee fully minded to suffer our selues to be gouerned by Gods hande, and aboute all things knowe what his goodnesse and mercie is, and yeelde him such reuerence as wee may be truly ioyned vnto him. And vndoubtedly when he speaketh of the honor that belōgeth vnto him, he not onely alledgeth his maieslie, nor onely sayth that he is ma<sup>r</sup>er and Lord: but therewithall also sayeth that he is a father.

b. 6.*

For he crieth out by his Prophete Malachie, If I be your mayster, where is your feare? And if I be your father, where is your loue? True it is that in that place he putteth a difference betweene loue and feare. But afterward he sheweth that those two woordes come bothe to one ende: that is to wit, that for asmuch as wee ought to acknowledge him both as a father and a mayster: we ought to loue him, howbeit with suche reuerence as in all our lyfe wee desire nothing, ne seeke nothing but too obey him.

So then we see now, that Iob is so farre off here from intending to reiect sayth: that he rather leadeth vs vnto it. For that also is the poynnt whereat wee muste beginne to walke in the feare of our God. And this is the cause why Sainct Paule (when he speaketh of wisdom) prayeth God to open the eyes of the Ephesians, to the ende they may know how to hope for the salua ion that God hath prepared for them in Heauen by the resurrection of our Lord Iesus Christ. And afterward in the third chapter he sayeth, that it behoueth vs to knowe the kindnesse of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the loue that he hath shewed to assure vs of our saluation: in so much that he is our length, bredth, heighth, and depth. As if he should say, wee might well freyne our selues on all sides, but if wee would mount vp neuer so high, wee could not be able to go beyond the cōprehending of the loue which hath ben shewed in the person of our Lord Iesus Christ. Also wee may well seeke all depthes, but yet must we hold this for a certaintie, that when we haue gone to & fro, all that euer it behoueth vs to knowe, is but to conceyue howe God sheweth himself a father & fauour, according as he hath adopted vs in the person of his Sonne, minding to make vs partakers of his goodnesse and mercie, wherein our welfare consisteth. Now then we see, that to feare God it behoueth vs to be sure of his goodnesse. But here Iob hath set downe one particular for the whole, purposely to condemne the fond toys wherevnto men giue themselves, when they haue not the affection & zeale to be edified in the feare of God. Furthermore wee haue to gather vpon this text, that the worde which is giuen vs, and also conteyned in the holy Scripture, is so excellent a treasure, as we can not set store ynough by it. We know that wisdom shall be esteemed, yea euen of the most ignorant and veriest idiots. For our Lord hath giuen vs this insight by nature, that wee know true wisdom to be an amiable thing. And our Lord decketh his worde with that honorable title, and telleth vs that if we profite therein, it is the thing wherein our whole wisdom consisteth. This then ought to inflame vs greatly, to seeke the things that are contayned in the holy Scripture. To be short, that we may profite in the schoole of our God: we must needes haue that, or els wee shewe our selues to reiect the thing which is to be desired of it owne nature, yea and that we would fayne be bereft of it. Wherefore let vs learne to be enflamed with such zeale to profite in the holy Scripture, as wee may preferre the doctrine that is contayned there, before all our owne fanfies, and before all the vanities of the worlde that carie vs away. Furthermore it is not ynough for vs to haue suche a desire to profite in the holy Scripture: but we must learne also to honour it accordingly. We shal see many fantastical persons in these dayes, which dispise Gods word, because (as it seemeth to them) there is nothing, but simple stufte for the common people, and that it would be but a dulling of their wittes if they should set their mindes vpon the holy Scripture. But our Lorde payeth them as they are worthie. For if a mā trie what is in them: he shall find them double blind, and that our Lorde bereueth them of common reason, so as they become the veriest fooles, doltes and Idiotes in the world. See (I pray you) what is the wages of their pryde, that make no account of Gods woorde. True it is that at the first blissh we shall see great simplicitie there. For our Lorde vsfeth no high stile, but rather tempereth himselfe both too great and small. Yet doth not that imbrace the Maiestie of the holy Scripture at all. Why so? Should Gods goodnesse deface his glorie? Ought it to barre vs from humbling our selues vnto him, and fro yelding him his due honour? No, but cleane contrarie. For what is the cause that our Lord speaketh so grossly in the holy Scripture? It is his infinite goodnesse: who seeing our wittes so dull, stāmereth with vs. Seeing the case standeth so, let vs learne to yeeld reuerence to the holy Scripture, notwithstanding that our Lord vse an ordinary maner of speech, yea euen such a grosse speech as serueth for homely folks that are vnlearned. But there is yet more, for S. Paule telleth vs, that we must so much the better beholde the heavenly power and godly maiestie that is in the holy Scripture, seeing there is no paynting nor filed language after the manner of the worldlings that studie Rethorike, and colour their woordes with a fonde brauery. In the holy Scripture then, we finde grosse language: But behold, the Maiestie of God sheweth it selfe therewithall. There is no fleshly nor earthly thing to set any glosse vpon it: but wee are conuincd that God discovereth his owne arme there, yea and we be constrained to seele it and to speake it. And therefore so litle ought the simplicitie of the holy Scripture to cause vs to despise it, as wee see the proud stinking sorte do, which make no account of it: that it ought rather to make vs perceyue, that God needeth not to borrow any helpe else where, and that his power sheweth it selfe there, as it were to eyefight, to the ende wee shoulde be the more moued to honour him, and to submitte our selues wholly vnto him. Therefore let vs marke well that it is not ynough for vs to haue a good desire to profite in the holy Scripture: but also that we must come to it with all reuerence, and desire nothing but to imbrace all that is contayned there, not hauing our tongues filed to prattle with God, nor bringing any doctrine or disputations against the pure doctrine of the Scripture, but concluding generally, and saying: looke whatsoeuer is sayde to vs here, or whatsoeuer wee reade here, wee know it to be the truth of God. Lorde, seeing thou hast spoken it, it is ynough for vs: It is not for vs to replie, it is me etc for vs to stande to that which thou hast vttered, without any gaynesaying. Yee see then, that the thing which we haue to note in this worde Wisdom, is that where as menne are drawn away by their owne vayne imaginations, when they buylde newe wisdomes in the ayre: we must say, that our Lorde hath not without cause intided his worde by the name of wisdom. For his qualifying of it after that sort, is to shewe vs that we must come thither, and submit our selues vnto it, and rest wholly there. And why? For it is the thing wherein lieth our whole perfection. And as touching that which is sayd of the feare of God: lyke as Golde and Siluer are tried in the fornace, or by the tutchstone: so muste wee bee tried, that it may bee knowne whether we haue profited in the holy Scripture, that is to say, whether wee be edified in the feare of God or no. Wee go to a sermon: and they that haue the commoditie do reade Holy Scripture also. Very well, it is a good and holy exercise, and woulde God wee were yet much more giuen vnto it without all comparison than wee be. But yet therewithall it behoueth vs to know whether wee haue bestowed our time well or no. And howe shall wee knowe that? Not by that wee can skill to talke of it, and giue fayre answeres to mennes demaundes,

1. Cor. 2. 4.

maundes, nor that wee bee able to resolue all doubts that shall be alledged, nor that we can giue fitte expositions to the texte, to say, thus must they be vnderstood. True it is that these things are necessary: but that is not all. Howe then shall it be knowne whither wee haue profited eyther by Sermons or by reading of Gods woorde? [wee shall knowe it by this,] namely if our lyfe yeeld recordes of it. If wee feare God, it is a token that wee haue studied well in his schole, and that like as he on his side hath bene a good and faythfull schoolemaister, so wee on our side haue not lost our time. Thus muche haue wee to marke.

And furthermore wee see, that when the holy Scripture intendeth too giue a good and sure marke too

Psalms. 22. f. sayeth, let them that feare the Lord prayse him: you that

24. & 115. feare the Lord enter into his house. Let them that feare

b. 11. & 118. God be gladd and reioyce. Let men that feare God rest a. 4. & 60. boldly vpon him. Yee that feare God blesse the Lorde.

b. 6. This (I say) is the true marke whereby to discern Gods

Ecl. 2. b. 7. flocke from all the wilde beastes that raunge abroade.

So then if wee come to a Sermon, or haue the Bible in our handes: lette vs learne to knowe, that God meeneth not to puffe vs vp with vayne presumptiō of knowledge, nor to scratch our eares when they itch, nor yet to teach vs nyce pointes: but to edifie vs in his feare, that we may honour and serue him. If wee shoote at this marke: then shall wee not roue in the holy Scripture as wee were wont to do. For whereof commeth this vice, that men cannot finde in their hearts to stoope to take holde of that which is for their profite, but euery mā forgeth I wote not what by himselfe? whereof also procede so many Errours, Heresies, and false opinions so far out of square? It is because we know not wherevnto God would guide vs by his woord: & that also is the cause why we cast the feare of God behind our backes, bearing our selues in hād, that the holy Scripture is giuen vs to a farre other vse. Nowe seing that men do so abuse Gods woorde, and euery man vnhalloiweth it vngratiouly: so muche the more behoueth it vs to marke well this Texte, where the holy ghost giueth vs the manner of examination, whereby too trie who be of good and right vnderstanding. To bring this to passe (as I haue sayde already) wee must know God as he is. For we shall neuer feare him aright, vntill that like as he sheweth himselfe to vs, so wee know him to be our God, our Master, our Saviour, and our Father. And here

Prou. 1. a. 7 you see also why Salomon (in the text which we alledged & 9. c. 10. out of the first chapter of his Prouerbes,) sayeth that the knowledge of holy things is the true vnderstanding. After he had spoken of the feare of God, he setteth downe the knowledge of holy things. Seing then that the holy ghost hath knit these two things together in vnseparable bonde: it behoueth vs also to knit them togither. Hereby he meeneth, that the feare of God will neuer be in vs, till we be come to the poynt that we spake of: which is, that we know Gods mercie as it is offered vs in our Lord Iesus Christe: Namely that wee be drawne vnto him by his goodnesse, where through he allureth vs, and that we haue the boldnesse to call vpon him as our father, so as wee returne vnto him euen when wee bee vtterly dismayed. And this is the cause why he sayeth in Ieremie, Ierem. 9. f.

25 24. lette not the wise man truste in his wisdome, nor the strong man in his strength, but lette such as reioyce, reioyce that they knowe mee, mee (sayeth he) that am the Lorde which executeth iudgement, rightuousnesse and mercy. After that Ieremy the Prophet hath abated mens pryde, and shewed them that all the wisdome whiche those thinke themselves to haue that dispise God and

shrinke away from him, is but smoke and leasing: he bringeth them to this poynt, let not the wise man (sayeth he) boast of any thing but that he knoweth God. And how shall we know him? Is it by knowing the rule which he hath giuen vs, and which he hath apointed for men to followe? It is not onely by that: but by knowing him to be our Protectour, assuring ourselues that it is his office to gouerne the worlde, and that he holdeth all things in his hand: and therefore let vs pray him to receyue vs into his protection, and aboute all things to guyde and gouerne vs by his holy spirit, forasmuch as of our selues we should alwayes be confounded: assuring our selues also, that forasmuch as there is nothing but want and wretchednesse in vs, he muste be fayne to watch for our welfare, and to bring vs to that perfectiō wherevnto he willet vs to tend and trauell al the time of our life. Thus ye see whervnto it behoueth vs to apply al our indeuour that we may profite our selues by this doctiue. For the meenes whereby God draweth vs vnto him, are his feare and loue. True it is that many light headed persons cā speake ynough of the grace of our Lord Iesus Christ, and of the rightuousnesse that is giuen vs in him, and can babble well of fayth: but yet they neuer tasted what it is to haue the grace of God, except they were rauished to come vnto him, and that in so doing they haue the sayde feare that is spoken of here. And in good sooth seing that God hath bought vs so derely, is it meete that euery man should be giuen to himselfe and to his owne lustes? is it not reason, seing that he hath purchased vs, that euery one of vs shoulde dedicate himselfe vnto him, and become his true possession and heritage? Seing that he hath gathered vs as it were into his housholde: ought wee not to be obedient vnto him? Yee see then that the thing which wee haue too marke here, is that when our Lord calleth vs, (as he calleth vs now being here assembled to heare his woord, and as he calleth vs by giuing vs his holy Scripture, and by commaunding vs to exercise the same: wee muste come vnto him in such wise, as we acknowledge him to be our father and mayster, and learne to submit our selues to his obedience and seruice, and vnhalloiw not his holy Scripture, by seeking there for trifling things, but keepe on forward continually to the sayde marke of knowing our God to be such as he sheweth himselfe to vs, and as he vttereth himselfe by his worde, which is the measure that he will not haue vs to passe nor to turne aside from, whatsoever come of it. And herewithall let vs marke, that the feare of God ought also to teach vs to shunne euil, according as it is set downe here for a conclusion: namely, that such as desire to submit themselves vnto God, and to rule their life according to his will, must fight against euil, as the thing wherevnto wee are inclined by nature: and as we know that wee are beset with many temptations, and other things that turne vs from our God, so as wee haue greate neede to resist the temptations of our fleshe and all the allurements of this worlde, and so to strengthen our selues, that our wicked affections prouoke vs not to stryue agaynst God, but that all things which stirre vs vp thereto, may rather bee cutte off and hewen downe.

And so lette vs marke briefly, that we cannot go forwarde in the feare of God, but by renouncing our selues. For what haue wee else in our nature but a Sea and bottomlesse pitte? But we muste cast off all that geare, and learne to exercise our selues in the things that God sheweth vs by his woorde, to the end we fall not in the confusion whereof wee haue spoken, but maye walke in the obedience of our God, and profite more and more in his schoole, so as he may allowe vs for his schollers, and wee yeelde such triall of our seruice, as he on his side may accept vs for his children, and shewe himselfe a father to-wardes vs.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with the acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to forgiue vs our faults past, and to call vs in such wise vnto him, as we may be increased and settled more and more in the grace of his holy spirit, so as we may be rid frō all the vices of our flesh, and therewithall that he forbear vs in our imperfections, vntil he haue taken vs out of this present life, to make vs partakers of his euerlasting glorie. So let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father we acknowledge in our selues, and confesse as truth is, that wee are not worthie to lift vp our eyes vnto heauen to come before thy face, and that we ought not to presume so far that thou wilt heare our prayers if thou haue an eye to that which is in vs. For our consciences accuse vs, and our sinnes beare witnesse agaynst vs, and wee know that thou art a righteous iudge that iustificth not the sinners and vnrighteous, but punisheth the faultes of them that haue transgressed thy commaundements. Euen so Lord, in considering our whole life, &c.

IOb tooke vp his parable againe and sayd.

2. VVould God I were as I vvas in tyme past, vvhē God preferred mee.
3. VVhen his lampe shyned vpon my head, and I vwalked in the darke by his light.
4. As I vvas in the dayes of my youth, vvhē the Prouidence (or companie) of God vvas in my tent:
5. VVhen the Almighty vvas vwith mee, and my seruants round about mee.
6. VVhen I vvas washed my paths in butter, and the rocke povvred mee out Riuers of Oyle.
7. VVhen I vvent out to the gate of the Citie, and made a chayre to be set for mee there.

It seemeth at the first sight, that Iob bewayleth here the time past, and is grieued that God had chaunged his state by afflicting him so sharply, whereas he had made him to prosper before: but his meening is not so. For he setteth himselfe agaynst those that had iudged amisse of his affliction, as if he had bene a man forsaken of God. His intent therefore is to shewe, that those men iudged vntowardly, because they looked no further than to the things that were seene. For (as we shall see in the knitting vp) Iob sheweth that if it were to be deemed so, they shoulde rather haue an eye to the time of his prosperitie. VVherefore lette vs marke, that Iob repineth not here as one that was grieued for the losse of all the goodes that God had giuen him: but rather that he reproveth his aduersaries, shewing them that they take a wrong way to iudge of him, because they thinke a man to be vterly damned, by reason of the chaunge which they see in his state, and remember not at all, that in tymes past he had bene had in great reuerence as an excellent and chozen man among all others. Therefore by the reading of this text, lette vs learne too take example, not too be out of pacience though God afflict vs. For wee ought rather to remember how wee haue herde Iob say, that sith wee haue receyued good at Gods hande, why should wee not be patient to indure the aduersitie also which he sendeth? For wee be vnthankfull to God, if the remembering of his benefites asswage not all our griefes when it pleaseth him to exercise vs and to bring vs lowe. For then it behoueth vs to thinke, how now? hath not our Lorde dealt in such wise with vs heretofore, as it is good reason that wee should receyue whatsoever it pleased him? yea and it ought to confirme vs in Gods goodnesse, so as we should not doubt, but that he loueth vs, seing wee haue founde him so good vnto vs by experience. And haue wee not caufe to bee contented when God sheweth his loue towards vs, although things fall not out as we would wish? Thus then yee see howe and in what sort it behoueth vs to remember our former prosperitie, when God afflicteth vs, it muste not encrease our heauinesse, nor pricke vs forwarde to any grudging: but it must rather bridle vs

if we stormed to much: and if our passions were ouer-heady, the sayd remembrance (say I) ought to asswage the miserie which we feele, in that God hath made vs to tast his goodnesse which is sufficient matter of comfote for vs. Agayne, seing he hath had such care of vs, it is good reason that we should yeeld our selues wholly vnto him, to suffer what soeuer it shall please him. And it is a right necessarie warning for vs, that when aduersitie pincheth vs, and wee be at the last cast, wee ought to call to minde, that God hath not pressed vs so alwayes, but hath had regarde of our feeblenesse, and borne with it, and thereby witnessed his loue towards vs, to the ende that we should trust in him, and not doubt but that when he shall haue tried our pacience in that sorte, he will remedie our aduersities, and bring vs backe agayne to our former state. Behold (I say) how it behoueth vs to practise this doctrine in all our afflictions. But nowe lette vs returne to the principall poynt of Iobs intent. I haue tolde you heretofore, that here Iob meeneth to shewe, that his aduersaries are as it were blinde and iudge foolishly, because they stay vpō the things which are seene with the eye. For, because Iob was in so great extremitie, they imagined that God had forsake him, & that he was to be esteemed for a cursed man, But (as wee haue seene heretofore) wee must not go so to worke: but wee muste haue the wisdome that is spoken of in the Psalme, namely of bridling our selfe that wee haue compassion of suche as are in aduersitie. And furthermore, wee muste beginne at this poynt, that if wee see a man smitten by Gods hande, wee muste consider what his lyfe hath bene. If he haue bene a wicked and disordered person: then our Lorde sheweth vs the thing which he telleth vs so often, namely, that his threatenings are not in vayne, and that it behoueth vs to learne at an other mannes coste (as they say) to walke in feare. It will seeme nowe and then that God looketh not downe here, and that he suffereth things to go to haooke: but when he executeth his iudgements, the same ought to reach vs righteousness (as it is sayd in the Prophete Esay) and wee muste consider that it is no playng with God. For although hee wincke at things for a tyme, he will in the ende call those too account which thought themselves too bee escaped, and of whom the worlde supposed, that they should abyde vnpunished.

Ye see then that we must not settle our iudgement simply vpon affliction, but consider what the life of them hath ben, whom God punisheth, to the end wee may acknowledge their chastizements according too their deserts, for the better profiting of our selues therby. For if wee see a good man punished in such wyse as God may seeme to haue forgotten him, yea and euen to persecute him: what ought we to say to that? It behoueth vs to suspend our iudgements: for it were an ouer greate rashnesse, for vs to iudge of things secret and vnknowne. Therefore let vs knowe, that our Lord intendeth to humble vs, and that we must confesse him to be righteous, although the reason of his doings bee not altogether apparant. And so ought Iobs freendes to haue iudged, which condemned him wrongfully: For inasmuch as they had seene him to be as a mirror of holynesse and al perfectiō during al his whole life: when they saue him so smitten downe as it seemed that God ment to ouerwhelme him vtterly: They ought to haue come to this point, to haue sayd, we knowe not what to say, our wittes are dazeled in this behalf, this man hath liued holily, doutles he was neuer any wicked man, any whoremonger, any drunkard, any periured person, any looce liuer, any cruell person, nor any proude man: there were none of all these things in him, why then doeth God handle him so rigorously? we cannot tell. And therefore God myndeth to humble vs here, to the end that we should knowe, that sometimes his iudgements are as a bottomlesse pit, and that it is not for vs to wade into thé, but rather wee ought to glorifie him, yea euen by shetting our eyes vntill he shew vs why he worketh so. Ye see then what the wisdome is wherof the Psalme maketh mencion when it sayeth, that the man is happie which iudgeth rightly of him which is in aduersity. But heerewithall it behoueth vs also to apply this to our instruction. For (as our Lord sayeth) if God do make the greene wood to be burned after that sort, what shall become of the drie? Then let vs compare ourselues with such as we haue knowne to be good men and to haue God. And wee shall find so grosse faults in ourselues, as we shal be constreyned to say, alas I see well that God beareth with mee and pitieth my weaknesse in handling me so gently: for I am worse thā such a man: I see that if I should be compared with him, I come farre short of walking in such vprightnesse: and yet notwithstanding see how God afflicteth him, and I am still at myne ease and rest. And is this bycause I am worthy of it? No, but my God knoweth me to be so weake, that I could not beare such afflictions: by reason whereof he spareth mee, and therefore I must impute it to his goodnesse. But if I be stricken downe, and be fayne to indure afflictions, I must not therefore cease to call still vpon God, assuring my self that it is for my profit and welfare: and when I do but heare of his threatnings, I must therevpon prepare my self to beare aduersity, to the end that when it shall please him to touche vs with his rodde, we may not think it straunge, bycause wee haue ben prepared for it a good while before hand. Thus we see nowe what Iobs meening is, for he sheweth, that such as iudge by the present state of things, and by the outward appearaunce, shal be conuincid by experience, bycause he had walked after such a sorte, as he was vnblamable, and euery man did rather wonder at him, than cōdemne his life. Then must it not be concluded, that bycause God afflicted him so, therefore he was a reprobate, and that all that euer he had done was but hypocrisie: that were to vntoward dealing. By the way, although Iob speake but to those that come to accuse him falsely: yet is this written for the instruction of all Gods children. So then let vs gather that which I haue sayd already of this text: namely that we must not iudge at randone of any of the chastizements and rodde wherewith God striketh men. Verely wee must hold this for a generall rule in all afflictions, that they be witnes of Gods Iustice vpon our sinnes. For if we were vtterly pure and innocēt: vndoubtedly God would handle vs after an other fashyon than he doeth. Therefore wheras we see men so miserable, and tormented after so many fashyons: they bee the fruits of their sinnes as well seuerally as in cōmon: but yet notwithstanding we must not measure all men by one meatyard as they say. And why? For there be diuers causes (as I haue declared afore) why God sendeth afflictions vpon the world. Seing then that God hath diuers respects, we must not wrap vp all together, nor make all to passe vnder one collect (as they say:) But we must bee wyse in this behalf, and as it were bridle our owne reason, that wee passe not our measure and compasse. VVherfore (as I sayd) let vs thinke vpon euery mās life: And if that those be afflicted which haue despised God & his word, and led a lawles life, giuing thé selues ouer to all naughtinesse: let vs assure our selues that our Lord instructeth vs in their persōs to the end we should open our eyes to see that our faults shal not escape clere without comming to account before the heauenly iudge. But if we see no cause why our Lord should punish this man or that, but rather, the cleane contrary: Then let vs learne to say, Lord thou art righteous howsoeuer the world goeth: true it is that we bee dazeled in this behalf, and that our sinfull flesh prouoketh and inforceth vs to murmur against thee. Neuerthelesse wee wil not say as they do which demaund why God shuld be so mynded, and could find in them hartes to go to lawe with him: No: but we wil be quiet and pacient, and tarry thy leysure, till thou shew the things that are as yet hidden from vs. Ye see in effect what we haue to remember in this text. But herewithall let vs marke also, that when we come to the iudging of ourselues, we must cal this doctrine to mind, to the intēt we fal not in dispaire although God presse vs and we feele his hand overhard vpon vs: but that we take courage to call vpon him, and leaue not to comfort ourselues in him. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to practise still this doctrine. Contrariwise, in time of prosperity, let vs not be so sotted in our owne ease & pleasure, as wee see the world is, which abuseth Gods goodnesse in such wise, as they become vtterly blind, except God constrayne thé by force to think vpon their sinnes. Then if God let vs alone in rest, we haue as it were a spirituall drunkennesse, so as our witts be rauished, and we play the restie Iades. Let vs keepe vs from mounting after that sort into pryde and presumption, when God maketh vs to prosper: and rather let vs knowe (as I haue sayde already) that he giueth vs leysure to dispose our selues to the receyuing of the aduersities which he shall send vs, being well assured that he will pity vs, and not handle vs rigorously. Likewyse if we see that God letteth the wicked runne at rouers, and layeth the bridle in their necke, and destroyeth in them not at the first brunt: let vs not thinke they make the better market for that, nother let vs be tempted to enuy their good fortune, as it is sayd in the seuen and thirtith Psalme: but let vs exercise our faith in this cace, tarrying Gods leysure, till he shewe vs his iudgements which are hidden from vs for a tyme, according as it is not for vs to determyne the day nor the houre. Then must the faythfull hold themselves at a stay, as often as our Lord sheweth himself fauorable too the wicked, and to such as haue deserued to be quite and cleane rooted and wyped out of the world. For although he leaue them in prosperity, they are not therefore in his fauor: but it is to make them the more vnexcusable: and needs must they pay deare for their abusing of Gods patience in that wise, when he calleth them to repentaunce by handling them so gently. Lo in effect what we haue to marke of this doctiine. And now let vs come to the particular words that Iob vseth here. Why (sayeth he) am I not as in tyme past when God kept me? In saying that God kept him, Iob meeneth that he had as now forsaken him. Not that he was fetled in that opinion, but for that he had an eye to his owne naturall vnderstanding, as all the faithfull do diuers tymes in praying vnto God. For they may well vse this maner of speche to say, Lord thou haste forsaken mee: Lord how long wilt thou forget mee? Lord how long wilt thou turne thy face from mee? Lord how long will it beere thou ease me of my misery? whē the faythfull speak after that sort: it is not for that they think that God hath forsaken them: for it were in vayne and to no purpose to call vpon God, if he had forgotten vs. What should we gayne by resorting vnto God and by desiring him to helpe vs at oure neede, if God would not kepe vs? I pray you were it not lost labour to say vnto him, Lord helpe vs? So thē the faithful in cōplayning that God hath forsaken them, meene not that it is so: But there is in vs a double feeling and cōceiuing. The one is by our naturall wit, the other by faith. But what are the things that our naturall wit doeth rest vpon and looke at? The things that we feele, see and touche. Therefore when God leaueth vs in such extremitie as we know not what shall become of vs, there seemeth to be a thick clowde betwene him and vs, and that we be no more vnder his hād & guiding. But yet notwithstanding see how God promiseth to be nere at hand to vs. When we think he is furthest off frō vs: And when it shall seeme that his eyes are shut: he will haue vs to think thus, hath God spoken it? Let vs hardely hold vs to his promis. Now then we see that there is a double cōceiuing in the faithfull: and it standeth vs in hand to praise this well. It is not ynough to say it, but euery man must put it in vre in himself. VVhē any aduersitie befallēth vs, we cānot but think that god hath turned his back vpon vs. See wher vnto our nature driueth vs. But afterward it behoueth vs to run immediatly to the promises of God who biddeth vs call vpon him in the day of our trouble. In that he willet vs to call vpon him it is a token that we are in his keeping & protectiō. So thē we see that faith must ouerrule our naturall reason, to the end we may bee quiet in the middes of all our miseries, wayting for Gods succour, & walking as he cōmandeth vs. According her vnto Iob sayth here, Where are the times become when God preferred? For he meeneth that God hath shewed by effect and by very eyesight, that he had preferred him, as if some mā shuld say, seing that Iob is so persecuted, is it to be sayd that God keepeth him? Is it to be sayd that God mainteineth him? No, but rather that God hath forsakē him as a wretched creature. Iob thē speaketh not here of the thing as it was in verie deede, as though god had at that time forgottē him: but he speketh of that which might seeme to mē, & of that which he perceiueth by his naturall wit, howbeit that he resisted it by the force of faith, resting himself vpon Gods promises, and fighting against the tētion that was put vnto him. Ye see then in what wise it behoueth vs to take this text, and therewithall to apply it to ourselues: and so let vs vnderstand, that if we be in prosperitie, we must not terme it good fortune (according to the maner of mē which alwayes are so malicious, that they rob and bereue God of the honour that belongeth vnto him) but we must vse such lāguage as this, namely that God preferueth vs. What is the cause then that God prospereth vs? what is the cause that we liue & are stil mainteyned whē we be beseged with a thousand deaths? It is bicause God pitietieth vs & is our Protectour. Lo how it behoueth vs alwayes to resort to Gods prouidēce, that we may yeeld him the prayfe of al the benefites which he bestoweth vpon vs, yea eue in respect of this trāsitory life. And furthermore, whē our Lord chaungeth to outward apperance, and suffereth vs to be assaulted on all sides so as one mā pillet vs, and another defameth vs, & many aduersities light vpon vs: might it not be sayd to mās seeming, that God hath forsakē vs, & will no more come at vs? Yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to receiue the promis which God giueth vs, yea and to hope eue against hope, as which is the lesson that is taught vs in the person of our father Abrahā, as S. Paule speaketh of him. But Iob addeth, that in that time God had lighted his lampe vpon him, and that he had walked in his light in the middes of darknesse. Let vs marke how it is diuers times sayd, that God inlighteneth vs when he teacheth vs by his word, and for that cause is it termed a lāpe. But in this text it hath an other sense. For Iob meeneth not simply that God taught him by his lawe, or by any reuelacion of the holy Ghost. But that God had giuē him comfort in al his aduersities, and therewithal also a good and desirable issue of thē. What then is this lampe of God? it was Iobs prosperitie, in that God stode by him, according also as we see that the scripture likeneth the afflictions of this present life vnto darknesse. As for exāple, if we be in warre or be troubled with famine or pestilence: we are as it were in the night: Gods countenance is hiddē frō vs: and we know not on which side to turne vs. So on the contrarie parte, when our Lord hadleth vs louingly, it is asmuch as if the sunne did shine vpon vs, we see that the daylight maketh mē glad, and contrariwise that the night maketh men sad and heauy. Also when it is clowdie and raynie weather, we are after a sort beaten downe and euery one of vs shrinketh. So then let vs marke, that Iob doeth here continue his matter, by saying that the lampe of God shyned vpon him, whē he was in happie state and euery mā laughed vpon him. VVherin is cōfirmed yet better, the doctrine which I haue touched: namely that neede must not father the prosperitie of this world vpon fortune, as we see these worldlings do, which looke not vnto Gods hād nother in weale nor woe. Therefore we must not do so, but rather whensoever we haue any prosperitie, let vs consider that God shyneth vpon vs, and sheweth vs a louing countenance, and would haue vs to knowe him to bee our father, that wee might glorifie him. Behold then how our Lord sheweth vs his countenance in all prosperitie, to the end that by seeing him, we might haue occasion to prayfe his goodnesse, and also be drawn vnto him by his gentle allurement, and that both of thē might giue vs courage to loue him and to yeld our selues to his seruice. Now we see that these maner of speches are not superfluous, when in stead of saying after the maner of the vnbeleuers, I haue had good fortune, I haue liued at myne ease: Iob sayeth that God had shone vpon him with his lampe, and addeth, that God had giuen him light in the midst of darknesse. And he sayeth this, bycause it is not possible but that wee must bee in many inconueniences and daungers in this world, I meane euen those which seeme to haue all things as they would wish. Although we perceyue some man to bee as it were exempted from all trouble: Yet notwithstanding so long as he is vpon earth he must needes walke among thornes. VVe shall alwayes bee threatned with many deaths: and though a man haue his Garners and Cellers full: yet is it not to bee sayd but that he may bee made poore in the turning of a hand. So thē let vs marke well, that in the middes of this world, we be alwayes as it were

were in darknesse: that is to say we be besette with many troubles and daungers, insomuch that if our Lord provided not for vs, we could not step one pace forward, no nor so much as stirre one finger, but wee should stumble into many miseries. But God remedieth all things by shewing vs his lampe, and by making it to shine vpon vs. Therefore let vs learne to yeeld him the prayse that he deserueth: which is that we cannot hold out in this transitory lyfe, vnlesse he do alwayes looke vpon vs and guide vs. And let vs pray him, that in guiding of vs he will also make vs feeble by effecte, that he is neere vs, and that he hath vs after such a sort in his protection, as we be exempted from many miseries, bycause he suffereth vs not to fall into them. Now if God deserue to haue this prayse yelded vnto him in respect of all things that concerne the state of this life: I pray you what deserueth he in respect of the instruction which he giueth vs by his word? So long as we liue here bylowe we liue as it were in darknesse as S. Peter sayth, and we be as it were blind wretches: and moreover as in respect of our witts we be so grosse headed, as of necessitie we should fall into confusion at euery steppe, if we were not inlyghened by the lampe of Gods word. VVe see then that in this greate and thick darknesse, we had neede too knowe Gods goodnesse, and to open our eyes to behold it, and to be diligent to marke it, to the end we may honour him for al his benefites, and not deuoure them, but depend wholly vpon his providence. Thus much haue we to marke in this sentence. Now it is consequently sayd, that Iob in the tyme of his youth had the prouidence of God also in his tent. The Hebrew word which he vseth here, doeth signifie a latter tyme: but by a similitude it is taken for youth, not for the youth of fiftene yeeres, but for the tyme of mans chief corage and lustinesse, as from the yeres of siue and twenty vnto the yeres of siue and thirty. And why? For then is a man in his chief floure, not for begetting of children as some haue expounded it, (for that were to fond and grosse): but bycause that man is then in his full rypenesse to giue counsell and to do any thing that belongeth to mans life. For in that age we see that men do so dispose themselves as they may be put to the doing of some seruice. So then, like as the latter tyme bryngeth forth his fruts: so also in that age man is fit to yeeld his fruts, that is to say, to bee employed to some seruice. But in this text, a man may well take that woord both in that signification, and sometymes otherwyse also by similitude: which is: I would I were as in my later seazon, that is to say, as in the tyme when men gathered the fruts of mine abundance. Lo what Iob meeneth. VVhen it is spring tyme of the yere, we see how the blade that shal beare corne, shooteth forth, and the vynes beginne to bud. Howbeit as yet there is nothing but hope: VVe see the meadowes spring vp with grene grasse: but in the latter seazon the cattell are fat and well fed, bycause they haue had pasture, and the ryches of the yearth are gathered and laid vp. Thus ye see the tyme of abundance. And so I dout not but Iob ment to say, when I was in my riches, when God had giuen me so greate abundance of goods as they flowed in my house. And afterward he addeth, that the prouidence or company of God was vpon his tent, pursewing the matter which he had talked of already. The Hebrew word which Iob vseth, signifieth prouidence or company, and both of them agree very well: therefore men neede not to trouble themselves much, for the sense continueth all one. Therefore [the meening of it is,] when I had the prouidence of God vpon my tent, that is to say, whē God watched ouer me to guide all my affaires: or else when God kept mee company, that is to say when I found him faurable vnto me, so as he was neere me to hold me as it were in his lap. Here Iob conrynueth his acknowledging of Gods benefites. And let vs marke well, that if a man which was tormented after that sort, was notwithstanding not so farre besides himself, but that he alwayes glorified God: what is to be sayd to vs, if we thinke not vpo God whē he letteth vs alone quietly in the middles of our ease? VVe know that when a man is pinched with aduersity, he is so dismayed as he remembreth nother God nor himself, but is caried away, and his wits be amazed. And now in what state was Iob? Haue we not seene, that there was neuer yet almost any creature, that was tormented after that fashion? And yet neuerthelesse it is seene, that he stil directeth himself vnto God, and glorifieth him by confessing that the benefites which he had receyued in times past, tell not to him by casuall aduerture, nor were purchayfed by his owne trauell and pollicie, nor that he was beholding vnto men for them. How then? It is God (sayeth he,) who hath lighted his lampe vpon me, it is he that hath guided me, it is he that hath be at hand with me. VVhen Iob speaketh so, ought it not to be a record to condemne those men double and treble which are not so dismayed, and yet neuerd. lesse do forget God, and swallow vphis benefites without dooing him any honour at all? Then let vs learne to glorifie God for all things, after the example of Iob, both in prosperity and aduersitie. And in so saying, he addeth what his state was for the tyme that God was with him as his companion and gard, that is to wit, that his feete were bathed in butter, and that the riuers flowed vnto him with oyle. By these similitudes Iob signifieth, that God had set him in such prosperitie, as he wanted nothing. And when he sayth that he trode in butter and bathed his steppes in it: it is asmuch to say, as that God made him too walke vpon all pleasant things, according as it is sayd in the fourescore and eleuenth Psalm, that the saythfull shall be borne vp by the hands of Angels, so as their feete shall not stumble nor dash against any thing amisse. After the same manner Iob sayth in this text, behold, God hath delt so with me in tymes past, that I did not as it were treade vpon the ground, nother felt I the hard pauement vnder me, but rather God made me a path as it were of butter and all swete things. To bee short, he meeneth that in steade of being in the common state of men, he did as it were swimme in all pleasures. Not that he sotted him self in them, as they do that are rauished in loue with their owne ease, and ouerjoy and ouershoote themselves in all things, as gluttons, drunkerds, and wanton folke doo: Iob intended no such thing, but he meeneth that God hild him in so great prosperity, as he was not able to expresse but by excessse of wordes. And herein it is to be seene, that he magnified gods benefites as much as he could, like as we also ought to do. And it is a point that we ought to mark well, bycause that when we be enforced to confesse the good that God hath done vs: our acknowledging of it is not to magnifie it so highly, as so greate a benefit ought to be: but rather we diminish it through our owne maliciousnes. Lo how God is abated of his due by vs, as though some man that could not deny a whole debt, should say, O I thought it not to be so much, according as we see, that these euill paymasters are not so shamelesse as to say, I owe you nought, when the thing vs knowne and euident ynough: but they could find in their harte, to make an hundred illorens but siue, if it were possible. Euen so play we with God: we nicke him through our vnkindnesse and vnfaithfulness, diminishing the gifts which we ought to magnifie. Contrariwise Iob sheweth vs here, that whē god hath done vs any good, we must not thinke to discharge ourselves by saying in one word, I am very much beholden vnto God, and this cometh to me of his grace, (these are trifling ceremonies:) But we must learne to esteeme Gods benefits according as they be worthy. And in good fayth what are we? I pray you, let vs consider our state, and from whence our Lord hath drawen vs. Let vs consider on the other side, if we haue deserued that hee should stretch out his hand to help vs and bestowe all his creatures vpon vs too doo vs seruice. Let vs marke these things a litle, and surely we shall find the cleane cōtrary: that is to wit, that God ought to shake vs off altogether, and yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not to do vs good. Therefore let vs learne to esteeme this fatherly loue which he beareth vs, and to taste it more earnestly than we haue done hytherto. Lo what we haue to marke in this similitude of butter and oyle, as if he should say, when I compare my self with others, I find my self so greatly bound vnto God, as it is not possible for me to acknowledge it sufficiently. And herevpon he sheweth the honour wherein he was. He had spoken of his riches, saying: that his feete were bathed in butter, and that the stones yelied him honnie, that is to say, that euen the hardest things were turned vnto him into pleasure: And nowe he sheweth that he was had in honour and estimation. The Govern vs (sayeth he) tariel at the gates, there I made a chayre to be set for mee, and euery man y. elded mee honor and reuerence. VVhen Iob sayeth so, it is not in way of bragging, (for he beareth the shame that God had layde vpon him, with all humilitie) but he reprooueth his aduersaries. As if he should say, you iudge of mee as nowe that I am a damned and cursed man. And why? For ye see me a wretched carkeffe, destitute of all helpe, and euery man scorneth me. But see whither ye iudge rightly or no. For it is not long ago since I was honored of all men, and the wold you haue douked to me too. Therefore your iudge-mēt is not right and indifferent, bycause you stay vpon visible things, whereas you ought to looke further. Now you see what Iobs meening is. VVherfore according to that which hath bē declared, for asmuch as we cā go no further as now, let vs learne as oftē as our Lord doth vs any good, let vs learne (I say) to acknowledge that the same cometh not of fortune, but of the hand of God. And on the contrary parte, whensoever it pleaseth him to afflict vs, let vs knowe that his intent is too waken vs by that meanes, and that it serueth not to put vs out of hart, but to humble vs. And therefore let vs not cease to resort still vnto him, assuring our selues that when he hath beaten vs with his rodde, he can well cure vs againe, as he that knoweth the remedies that are fittest for our welfare.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too make vs feele them in such wyse, that being hartely sorry for them, wee may seke nothing but to rid our selues of our fleshy affections, that we may be fully clothed with his holy spirit, to the end wee may yeeld our selues to his obedience. And that we may knowe howe to profit ourselues in such wyse, both by our owne afflictions, and by the afflictions of our neyghbours, as wee may be still instructed more and more in his feare, and glorifie his iudgements, and not be so wrapped in these presente things, but that we may alwayes looke hygher, and that in the middes of our afflictions, wee may not cease to resorte vnto our good God, trusting that he will continue his goodnesse towards vs, euen til he shew vs that thing in effect and experience, which he now warranteth vs by his word. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to al people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable &c.

The. cv. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxix. Chapter.

8. VVhen the young men saue me, they hid themselves, the princes rose vp, and stode vpon their feete.
9. The Gouerners left speaking vwhen I spake, and laid their hand vpon their mouth.
10. The princes held their peace, and their tounge cleaued to the roote of their mouthe.
11. The eare that heard me sayd I vvas happie, and the eye that saue vvitnesed vvith me.
12. For I deliuered the poore vwhen he cryed, I helped the fatherlesse that vvas succorlesse.
13. The blessing of him that vvas ready to perish came vpon me, and I comforted the hart of the vvidowve.

The more precious that a thing is, the warelier ought a man to keepe it, & the more wysely to dispose it, and to put it to the better vse: and we see that euery man doeth so in respect of worldly goods: True it is, that some spare nothing, but wait all: and yet euen those do knowe, that it is a vice to be reprobued, when men knowe not how to order a good thing, which they ought to set store by, how be it herewithall, although wee confesse that honestie is a mannes cheef treasure: yet notwithstanding men make no spare of it, but sell it for litle or nought. For prooffe hereof, looke vpon them that be in most reputation, and to whom men make most courtise. are they in estimation for their vertues? No: but cleane contrary, if a man take those that humble themselves before the greate and rich ones, what moueth them to do so: they will not say, because they are worthie of it: For their owne consciēce beareth them witnesse, that the most parte of them are starke naught. VVe see then, that honestie is quite shaken off, and yet notwithstanding, men can well ynough say, it is the most precious thing that can be: And that is a foule faulte, according also as we see, how sainct James, not only scorneth, but also sharply rebuketh those that honour the wicked after that sort: For it is a defiling of the thing, which God had dedicated to a good vse. VVhat ought men to honour sauing God, and that which proceedeth from him? Therefore when wicked men are had in such reputation: the thing that belongeth vnto God is plucked from him, and giuen too the diuell. True it is that if a wicked man be in auctoritie, men may well honour him, nor in respect of his owne person, but in respect of his office. But when vices are had in estimation, and prayed for vertues: Is it not a mingle mangle to ouerthrowe all order? Therefore we ought to marke well this text, that where as Iob speaketh of the honour that was done vnto him, he sayeth not that it was by reason of his riches or of his credit: but for his vertues, The young men (sayeth he) hid themselves when they sawe mee. VVhat moued the young young men to hyde themselues? for if a man passe his bounds, young men will rather take the more boldnesse to do euill, when they shall haue such a shadowe and prop to beare them vp. Then if men stooode so much in awe of Iob, that they hid themselues from his sight: it is a signe that he had such vertues in him, as men were enforced to honour him for them, and not for his riches. Lo what we haue to marke in the first place. But herewithall let vs marke also, that this word Hyde, importeth a shame which those had that feared not God. For yet neuertheless they were hild in awe before men, and were lothe to haue their leudnesse knowne. And specially if a vertuous man that hath some grauitie in him, do come in the way: they that meene to do euill, hyde themselues from his presence. To what purpose serueth such shamefastnesse? For it seemeth to be a superfluous thing. It is certaine that yf a man absteyne from doing euill, only in respecte of some person: therby he sheweth, that he hath not as yet profited: and it is also a slender honouring of God. But yet notwithstanding, there commeth double profit of it. The one is, that like as a child before he knowe what reason is, or haue any discretion, shall neuertheless be inured to good things: Euē so our Lord causeth this shamefastnesse (which of it self is naught) to serue to drawe those forward by little and little, which haue not yet proceeded so farre, as to loue vertue for it owne sake. As for example: loke vpon a man, that is vnconstant, and hath not the feare and loue of God yet rooted in him, but is altogether as it were dazeled, & taketh leaue to do euill, and to ouershooote himself: Yet hath he still a bridle, and is not vtterly past shame. VVe shall see diuers which of themselues will commonly be ouerseene when they are in euill company, and a man shall no sooner intice such to do amisse, but they will bend to and fro: and yet for all that, if they haue any shamefastnesse, as soone as a man whome they reuerence, doeth but cast his eye aside vpon them, they will be so abashed, as they could find in their hearts to bee buried: and if a man tell them their faults: they haue not a word to answer, but wil rather fall a weeping, than reply. Thus ye see it is some token that a man is not altogether past hope of amendment, when he keepeth still this modestie of knowing the shamfulnes of his owne sinne. Neuertheless it is euident, that this shamefastnesse is not a vertue of it self. Howbeit such a mā will come home by little and little, and our Lord causeth that medicine to serue him as a sirop for a preparatiue against some disease, to the end that the pacient may afterward receyue some strong medicine. Lo here a sirop which doeth but alter. And what commeth of it. It healeth not the pacient, but yet it is a good preparatiue, and when a man hath taken half a chaunge after that sort, so as he is redy afore hand for the medicine: the medicine hath the more force. In like cace is it with shamfastnesse. For of it self it is not able to heale our vices nor to clense vs of them, nor to make vs to walke as it becommeth vs: but it prepareth vs, so as we do not vtterly passe our bounds. Thus then ye see one vse and profit, which our Lord picked out of the shamfastnes that is in wauering and lyght mynded folke: which (as I sayd) haue not such foundation as they ought to haue, and in whom the feare of his name is not well rooted. But there is yet one other vse, that is to wit, that all excuses are taken from vs, and that God giueth vs a marke, as if he ingraued it and brended it in our forehead, to say that we canot iustifie our faults. VVhy so? I will go hyde me from the presence of a man. And what is the cause of it? Shame. And whence commeth this shame? God hath printed it in mee, as it were with a searing iron, insomuch that whereas otherwyse I would suffer the sunne, the heauen, the yearth, and men, to beare witness of my lewdnesse: Yet notwithstanding I am restrinde whē I see that men shall point at me with their fingers, and that I shall be hated and abhorred: For vice is cursed of it selfe. VVe see then that this shamefastnesse whiche me haue, is as a processe, that God maketh against vs aforehande, as if he should charge a Jewrie, and take informations and inditements against vs, to the end we should be cast, and that notwithstanding all the shifts that we could alledge, yet neuertheless our brondmarke should bewraye that all vices are vices, and worthy to be condemned. And so although a man bee otherwyse blockishe, and not touched any whit with the knowledge of his sinnes: yet inasmuch as he hath shamfastnesse, by that meanes he is made vnexcusable. Nowe then wee see what doctrine wee haue to gather of this streyne. The first is, that our Lord warneth vs, that when we haue any shame of euill doing, and shun mens presence, and would be loth to haue our lewdnesse knowne: we must vnderstand, that thereby God aduertiseth vs, that it is not for vs to flatter our selues in our sinnes, nor to hide them, but rather that wee must learne to condemne them. Furthermore, if wee be so abashed before men: let vs assure our selues wee can not escape the presence of God. VVe maye w. l. locke vp our selues in our lurking holes, but wee shall gaine nothing by it: His eye must always see vs, and not only marke the works that are to be seene of the world, but also our secretest and deepest thoughts. Therefore let vs learne, not only to feare men, but specially the heauenly iudge that seeth vs: and also let not the said shamfastnesse gouern vs, for we must not stay there, as I haue sayd already. It were all one as if a childe should abyde alwayes in his Apcee, or else as if a sick man should content himselfe with a preparatiue, and afterward die vpon it for want of taking further phisick. Then must not this shamfastnes raigne alone in vs, but it must leade vs further: that is to wit, that although men perceiue not our defaults, and that we might haue coverings to hyde ourselues withall and to beguile the world: yet neuertheless our owne conscience may watche, and kepe ward, and the iudgement of God may presse vs, and that we may so dispose all our whole life, as wee may not desire only to be had in good reputation of men, but also to be allowed of our God. And for the bringing hereof to passe, we must not only absteyne from open euell doing: but our harts also must be clensed, and we must haue our affectiōs corrected, so as wee may not haue any backenooke to hyde our filthinesse in. Thus ye see what we haue to remember in this streyne. But yet notwithstanding we see in what times wee bee. For now adayes, like as there is not any feare of God, so is there no shame of men: Iniquitie doeth so overflow, that they which bee most shamelesse, are most valiant. At leastwyse, youd ought to haue some modesty: and vndoubtedly it is not without cause, that the Paynims did of their owne naturall wit, knowe that shamfastnesse is the peculiar vertue of young folks. And why? For young folke are not yet so well gouerned as were requisite. They are full of boiings that stirre them vp vnto euell, the fier is in their head, and therewithall their lulls are so violent, as it is very hard to repress the. Herevnto our Lord giueth a remedy: which is, that although young folkes be very heady: yet notwithstanding they are couicted and constrained to know theselues, and they perceiue that they haue not yet such a stayednesse in the as were requisite: and that is the cause why they haue some shamfastnesse in the. But what is seene nowadayes? Ther wāreth no store of young rusties: behold these yōg Cockerells, they are no sōner copen out of the tholl, but by and-by and by they must haue a sword by their side, and you shall see them vtterly voyde of all shame. They think they ought to be like brothels of the stewes, and that (whatsoeuer they doo) nother reuerence, nor Iustice nor any things else ought to gouerne them. To bee short, wee see how youth is become altogether diuelishe, and that not only there is no feare of God, but also no honestie at all in them.

Sith wee see this, let vs assure our selues, that there is a flood of iniquitie, and that things are so farre out of order, as they bee past remedie. For it appeareth, that the thing which ought to be imprinted by nature in all men, and specially in yong folke, (that is to say, shamefastnesse and modestie) is quite razed out, & young folkes are vtterly shamelesse and stubborn, and passe not though they be mocked for their vnshamefastnesse. So then let vs learne to walke in greater feare and carefulnesse. For wee shall not bee excused by alledging that euery man doeth as we do: for it is no meanes to acquite vs before God, to say, that other bee no better than ourselues, but rather let the same be an occasion vnto vs to drawe backe, that wee bee not wrapped in the vices that reigne so in all men. And furthermore let vs remember how it hath ben sayd, that we must not walke as men that looke but only vpon the creatures: but let vs set God before our eyes, according also as we cannot scape his presence. True it is that through our inclination to hypocrisie, we seeke many wyndlasses [and startingholes,] but yet must God needes to loue vs euery where. Seing it is so, let vs learne to dedicate ourselues wholly vnto him, and to haue our sight fastened vpon him.

And forasmuch as he enlighteneth vs by his word: let vs thinke also vpon that which the Apostle telleth vs in the Epistle to the Hebrewes. For there he declareth that the word which wee heare, is of the same nature that God himself is: which is to search our thoughts, and to try out all that is in vs, and to deuide asunder the marie from the bones, and the vaynes, and all that is in vs. Seing then that when our Lord sendeth vs his word, he will make such a triall, that all that euer lieth hid in men must come too lyght: let euery of vs walke as in the broad day, and consider that wee bee no more in darknesse, seing our Lord Iesus Christ reigneth among vs by his Gospell. Thus ye see what ye haue to remember in this text. And now Job addeth, that the Princes rose vp as fore him, yea and that the deafe men and gouerners bld their peace when they heard him speake. Here we see an order that nature teacheth, were it not that the malapertnes of men peruerteth all things. And if we followe that which our Lord sheweth, I say euery according to the order of nature: It is certayn that if there were a man that had the gift of teaching, and more iudgement and knowledge than other men, he should be harkened vnto, and euery man would hold their peace when he spake. What is the cause then that when a man shall speke good reason, and haue the gift to edifie others: he is not receyued, but despised: and many bal blersthrust themselues foorth and will needes be heard with their tongues running at ryot, by meanes whereof the truth shall bee put backe, and thrust vnder soote? what is the cause thereof? It is for that men cannot abyde that God should guide and gouerne them, but (as I say) they corrupt all the order of nature by their malapertnesse, or rather madnesse. For needes must wee become wood beastes, when we cannot abyde to submit our selues to truth and reason, and to admit them that are ordeyned ouer vs as it were in Gods bede. Therefore let vs marke well this text. For Job meeneth not to magnifie his owne person only:

No vndoubtedly, it is not his meaning. What then? yesterday I shewed you a peculiar reason, which hee had too speake so. But further wee may gather also a generall doctryne that God giueth vs by Iobs mouth: which is, that when there is an vpryght and vertuous man, and therewithall indewed with wisdome: we must giue care too him, and receyue him among vs. For if wee folowe not the rule which is shewed vs heere, wee not only doo wrong vntoo a mortall man; but also God taketh the same wrong to be done as to his owne person. And not without cause: for if a man be able to gouerne vs with good doctryne, thinke wee that he hath it of himselfe? Euery man can well ynough say, that it is the gift of God. Now when God auunceth a man in such wyse by giuing him more largely of his holie spirit, is it to the intent he should purchase himselfe estimation, and not rather for the common profit of all men? He that is so indewed with any greate gifts, is bound so much the more too his neyghbours, and must so bestow that which is giuen him, as all men may be partakers of it. But now if wee vouchesafe not too heare a man, when wee may profit vnder him: is it not a despising of the spirite of God? Is it not a scorning of his maiestie, which he would haue too bee knowne when he sendeth vs a mortall man after that sort in his name?

Furthermore this pryde is matched with vnthankfulnesse. Behold, God rayseth vp men that are able too teache vs: let vs but only heare them, and it shall bee for our welfare. If wee voutsafe not too doo that: is it not a reiecting of the benefit that God offereth vs as much as in vs lieth. So then it is not for nought told vs heere, that if there bee a vertuouse man which hath more skill than our selues, he deserueth to haue care giuen him, and that men should bee heedfull too receyue that which he shall say. For (as I haue declared already,) if men doe it not, wrong is offered vnto God, and we are also vnthankfull, in that we will not be gouerned by him. There is yet more: And that is, that if wee ought too heare men which haue some worldly skill: what ought we to do when they be purposely sent too bring vs Gods word, and are so furnished as they may say, that God sendeth vs the message of saluation by their mouthes? According as he serued his tourne by the Prophetes and Apostles during their lyues, and will haue the same order of gouernement to be at this day in his church, and there too contynue vntoo the worldes ende. Then if we refuse too heare Gods word when it is preached by such as are ordeyned to that office: Is it not a double rebellion? And shall wee not bee somuch the more too blame? So then wee be warned heere, too keepe silence when our Lord sendeth vs his woord, and bothe greate and small too stoupe vntoo it, and to bee dumb, but not deafe. I say we must bee tungyde: for when God speaketh, it standeth vs in hand to herken without replying, and too receyue quietly whatsoeuer is sayd vnto vs, and to conclude with Amen, So bee it.

Again, wee must not bee deaf: but forasmuch as we see that by nature wee be so ill disposed too heare God, and too obey his woord, wee haue too pray him too open our eares, and too correct the dulnesse of hearing that is in vs, and our slouenesse of obeying him, and specially too giue vs the vnderstanding of his will: for else wee bee so brutish, as wee should neuer conceyue the thing that is for our welfare, except wee were inlyghened by his holie spirit. And therefore let vs learne too brydle, not only our tounge, but also all our affections.

For

For the thing that hindereth vs from the hearing of God, and from being taught by his woord, is not only that we be to talkatyue and to full of babbling and prittleprate: but also bycause we bee full of lusts and geynstriings, which do as it were breake off Gods talk. Now then let euery man looke well to himself. For when we come to a Sermon, or otherwyse looke vppon the holic Scripture, no doubt but wee shall well vnderstand some good sayings and profitable sentences heere and there: But what? Byandby it slippeth from vs, and we forget it again. And whyso? For wee bee combered with our owne geynstriings. Therefore it is all one as if there were a greate noyze in vs that brake off Gods word, so as it was not receyued.

Again, wee beate not away the hundredth part of that which is told vs. And why? Bycause wee bee fleshly, and our affections carie vs away. So then, (as I haue sayd) if wee mynd to fare the better by Gods word, wee must not only brydle our toungs which are ouerlaurish: but wee must also brydle our affections, too the ende there may bee a peafable obedience yekled too our God.

Thus ye see what wee haue to marke. Neuerthelesse wee must also haue the sayd sobernesse and modestie of not being too hattie to speake, but rather yeeld our selues teachable. It is sayd that the wyse man shall wax wyzer by hearing. Salomon speaketh not there of the ignorant and idiots: but forsomuch as men take themselues to bee greate clerks and doctors at the first day, and beare theselues in hand that they haue profited ynough assoone as they haue any little taste of the doctrine: (as in good soothe men will swell big ynough, euen like toades, howbeit that all their swolnesse is but wynd) forasmuch then as men haue such ouerweening of themselues: therefore Salomon sayeth that there is not so wyze a man, but he groweth wyzer by hearing. VVhat is to bee doone then? VVe must not be so forward too speake, but wee must also bee as readie too herken, and to heare what is told vs. Lo what wee haue too beare alwayes in mynd vppon this streyne. And verely seing that Iob sayeth expresly, that the gouerners, (euen such as were practyzed in wisdom, and bare authoritie among men,) had giuen eare too him bycause hee excelled: I pray you what shall become of them that cannot chalenge such skill too themselues, nor haue had the like practize, nor borne office whereby too get so much vnderstanding? And yet neuerthelesse wee see there are verye fewe now adayes that can abyde too bee taught, but euery man taketh vpon him to be a teacher.

And see how ill wee practyze the lesson that is giuen vs by Sainct Iames, where he sayeth, that wee must not couet too bee many maysters: for contrarywise there is none of vs all, but he thinkes himselfe able too guyde the whole world: and in the meane whyle there is not any man that can abyde to bee taught or told any thing, no though he bee but a yoong calf. So much, the more then ought wee too marke this circumstance which I haue purposely touched concerning Iob. The holic Ghoſte prayseth the men that were wyse and in authoritie, who notwithstanding yekled themselues peafable, and refused not to be taught. Seeing the holic Ghoſte sheweth vs this: let vs vnderstand, that it is not only to commend the persons, for they are vnknowne too vs at this day: but too giue vs example and instruction what wee haue to do. And this present admonition is not more than needeth, considering the pride that is in vs. For (as I sayd) euery man will bee wyse, and no man can finde in his heart too stoupe so low, as too confesse that he hath neede to be taught by others. Thus the cause why the holic Ghoſte setteth vs downe such instruction heere: is for that although wee were the excellentest men in the world, yet must wee not imagine any such perfection in ourselues, but that wee haue neede too profit yet further. And herewithall let vs marke well the giftes of God. VVhen wee see a man sent too vs to teach vs: let vs vnderstand that God hath sent vs his treasure too releue our want withall. It standeth vs in hand too receyue the same of God, as who is the fountayne of all wisdom. It is true: neuerthelesse he maketh it to runne downe vntoo vs, as it were by riuers and chanel. For when men receyue giftes at his hand it is to distribute them too vs by their meanes. And although a man haue no greate gift: yet must wee giue him the hearing, if hee speake reason and truth: yea though it were a young childe that told vs our faultes, yet is he a messenger of Gods sending. Now if wee may not refuse a litle childe, no nor a filie Idiot that hath no authoritie nor any excellent gifte, but must receyue correction at their hand: I pray you must wee not needs bee out of our wits if wee reiect the manifest giftes of God which he would haue to bee magnified, by setting them in an open place too bee seene? Or when must it not bee sayd that wee bee sharke madde if wee reiect them?

So then for asmuch as we haue neede to bee continually strengthened by receyuing doctrine and instruction by al meanes that can be offered as long as we liue in this world: let vs accept Gods gifts (as I sayd,) and whosoever wee see them, let vs doo them the honour to submit our selues to them. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. Iob declareth byandby after, that he had ben honoured and commended, not only for hauing a sharp and suttle vnderstanding. But also for mainteyning right among men. And that is a sentence further well worthy too bee noted. True it is that when a man meddleth with teachiug his neyghbours, it is not ynough for him to bee an honest man, and to haue a desire too liue well, and to giue good example too all men. But he must also haue a skilfulnesse, and God must haue giuen him wit and reason. Neuerthelesse if a man were asskilfull as could bee wished, and had his toung ready too vtter, so as there were no blemishe in his speach, and yet were of an euill conscience, so as hee were a scorner of God, or a heathenish man in his lyfe: hee deserueth not too bee heard. For his lyfe speaketh him suspected, so as men can hardly take any tast of his doctrine. I meene not that the wickednesse of mennes lyues, ought to diminish the authoritie of Gods word, but I speake of the common infirmitie that is in vs, insomuch that if we see a man that is wicked and froward, and without al vprightnesse, who in his dooings scorneth all vertue: if such a man speake as an Angel, yet would not men vnto safe too heare him. For they would thinke themselues deceyued, bycause they see hee speaketh not from his heart.

So therefore it is a requisite thing for him that dealeth with teaching, too haue the sayd vprightnesse, that men may know he speaketh from his heart, and not fainedly, and that he telleth not a tale in iest, like as a player may play his part in an enterlude, and yet when all is done, it is but a iest. And this is the cause why I sayd that it is not ynough too speake well, but that he which myndeth too teache others, must not only speake with his toung, but also deale so as men may knowe that the same commeth from his heart: and he must so raise and see all

Pro. 1. 8. 5.

Lam. 3. 4. 6.

his doctrine by his dedes, as men may see that the thing which he speaketh is so fetled in his hart, and so printed and ingrauen in him, that he speaketh as it were in the presence of God. Ye see then what we haue to marke in this sentence, when Iob (after he had reported that he had ben cōmended, of the greatest and honorablest fort of mē) addeth, that it was bycause he had succoured the poore, and afflicted, and that the blessing of him that was readie to perish had ben vpon him, and that he had ben the defender of the fatherles, and the Proteclour of the widoues. So thē this vprightnes purchaseth him auctoritie, according as it is sayd in the fiftenth Psalm, that we must honour them about all men, which haue the feare of God. And surely (as was declared not long ago) seing that the feare of God is our wisdome, yea eue our true wisdome: we must also cōsider whether a man deserue too be heard or no. Furthermore when a mā walketh vprightely, and giueth good assurace that his speche is not fained, and that he is no dissemler that doth but babble frō the teeth outward, and hath no affection at all in his hart: if a man be such a one, as that his whole life warranteth that he intendeth to teache other men in good earnest, to the intent that God may be serued and honored: let vs assure our selues that we must take such a one for a mirroure or looking glasse: for if we make no reckening of the good life of such as ought to teache vs, we reiect the assurace that God giueth vs of his doctrine. True it is (as I haue said,) that men cannot barre the word of God from continuing in his full state: for it dependeth not vpon the vertuous behauiour of men. But howsoeuer the world go, when God is so gracious vnto vs to teach vs by such men as witness by their liues, that their only seeking is that men should serue God, I say when we haue such a record: it is as it were a sealing of the doctrine, and it is along as if God should relieue our infirmitie by driuing and pricking vs forward, bycause he seeth vs so negligent and slow to come vnto him. Is it not a signe that we be slouthfull beastes, if wee make no accompt of this? So then let vs marke well this sentence as it is couched here by Iob: and therewithall let such as haue the charge to teach others loke well to themselues, that they behaue theselues in such wise, as their life may be a paterne to all mē, and beare witness that they speak not in vaine, but that they speake the word of god which is thoroughly ingrauen in them: and let vs also take warning in their persons, to haue the word of God in estimation, that wee may yeeld our selues too his obedience as well as they. Thus ye see the thing which all ministers and magistrates, and such as haue charge to gouern the people, and generally ail such as haue any degree or vocation of teaching, ought to think vpon: namely that our Lords wil is, that they should shew the way, and that his calling of them to that office, is vpon condition that they should not only speake, but also witness the same earnestly and truely by their life. Yea and this doctrine extendeth to all men in generall: for there is no man but he ought to teache his neyghbours, in tyme and place conuenient when neede requireth. Therefore let vs consider that in condemning other men, wee hyde not our owne faults, ne cause them to be forgotten. He then that would be a good correctour of his neyghbours, must first correct himself. He that will teache other men, must first be his owne schoolemayster: that is to say, he must begin at himself and receyue good doctrine. Also let vs not forget that which wee haue sayd: namely that wee must be ready to receyue instruction at euery mans hand, and yeeld ourselues teachable without refusing so greate a benefit, when our Lord goeth about to teache vs by any manner of person. As touching that which Iob sayeth here: the effect of it is, that he hath shewed himselfe to be a man that feared God. Such as are led with ambition, would fayne shewe themselues to be men of renoume, and they neuer do any thing, but they looke for some prayse and commendacions for it afore men. Contrariwise Iob declareth here, that he bestowed his doings where was no hope of recompence nor of purchasing any greate fame or renoume to the worldward: and that he indeuered to do good vnto men, euen when they seemed to be dead. Herby he sheweth well, that he was not led by vaine glory, ne sought his hyre here beneth in earth, but that he walked as in the sight of God. For if a man seeke his owne preferment: it is certayne that when he ought to do any man a good turne, he will looke twice vpon it, and see whether the partie bee able too counteruaile it, and to render like for like. And thus ye see that none of the good turnes which are done in the world, are done frely, but rather for wages, and therefore their doings cannot be sayd to be a vertue. For it is not charitie that lea-10 deth them to do good one to another, or to helpe such as haue neede: but euery man hath an eye to his owne profit, and to see whether the good that he doeth vnto others, may retorne home againe to himself. But contrariwise, it is shewed vs here, that in seruing of God, wee must not haue regard of any worldly recompence, nor couet to be commended and praysed, according as wee see how Iob sayeth here, that the blessing of him that was readie too perish, came vpon him. Let vs marke wel this saying: for whē a man is at deatnes dore, it seemeth to vs, that what soeuer good we shall haue don vnto him, it is as good as lost, and 20 also as to the worldward it is all quite gone. And verely Iob speaketh here of such as were vitterly forsaken, and had no succour: infomuch that no man voutsafed to think vpon them. There is then as it were a buried man, or as it were a wretched coarfe, and I succour him: If in so doing my respect bee to purchase any prayse among men, then is it certeyne that I will seke some man to blafe abroad my goodnesse, and to tel how much he is beholding and bound vnto me. But if I take a poore man, that is as good as half dead, and seemeth that he 30 must perish out of hand: it is a token that I seke not the prayse of men. Againe, what is the hyre that I shall looke for. The man is as it were condemned to death and there is no more hope of him. So then, if we mind to procede in such vprightnesse, wee must thrust all ambition vnder foote, and there must no couetousnesse leede vs, but we must looke ryght forth vnto God. That is the thing which Iob ment to betoken in effecte, and the same also is the cause, why he setteth downe here all the particulars that we haue touched, namely of wydowes, of fatherles children, and of such as bee dispised of the whole world. For vndoubtedly these also are the parties which are specially recommended vnto vs of God. As for them that haue the meanes to recompence the good turnes which they shal haue receyued: they recommend themselues. But when a poore man is destitute of all fauor, and hath nother kinfolke nor freendes nor goods nor auctoritie on his side: if wee succour him, it is a signe that wee looke ryghtfoorth vntoo God: And 40 if we do not, it is a token that there is no charitie in vs. And truely forasmuch as euery one of vs is so wedded to his owne profit: therefore doeth our Lord exprefly cōmend vnto vs both the widoues, and the fatherles, and those that are in such extremitie and are not able to helpe themselues. God (I say) presenteth them vnto vs, to try our charitie in that behalf. Yce see then a point in Iob which it standeth vs in hand to marke, yea and to marke it in such wyse, as wee must assure our selues that all these things are spoken for our learning. For (as I haue touched already) Iob vseth no brauerie here, neither maketh he any brags to get himself estimation: but rather in his person the holy ghost sheweth vs what is to be esteemed: namely, not that which appereth outwardly, & hath the fayrest glosse afore men, for that oftentimes shall be but abomination before god. VVhat then? when a mā walketh as hauing none other record but god, so as al his doings are leuelled at that mark, to say, my God hath commaunded it me, it is the thing wherin he will trie me, it is the thing wherunto he tasketh me, when a man walketh by that rule: it is all one as if he should banish all worldly respects to gather himselfe vnto God. And euen so also must we do. Let vs seke none other allowance but of god: and let that iustice and content vs, & let vs not be turned aside, nor drawn away by ambition or vainglorie. VVhē we intend to serue God, let vs not looke for our recompence at mans hande, but let vs serue God with such vnseynednesse and soundnesse, as we may not stay vpon the things that haue fayrest shewe, but vpon the things that are commaunded vs: and let vs fully conclude and be resoluēd, that wee ought to desire no further, but that God be obeyed. Therefore in all these things, let vs folow still the example of Iob, and shew that we feare God. yea and let our shewing of it be, not by I wote not what Ceremonies, wherin there is no substance, but by the things that oure Lorde commaundeth vs, especially in hys lawe: which are that wee shoulde execute iustice, rightuoufnesse and mercie: that is to say, that wee shoulde yeelde euerie man his right, that wee shoulde abteyne from all euill, from all iniurie, craft, and violence, and iudeuour to serue our neighbours cheefely in hauing pitie and compassion vpon those that are in aduersitie, too the ende to succour them after the abilitie that God hath giuen vs.

 50 these

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to haue pitie vppon vs, and too make vs so to feele our sinnes, as wee may be humbled in true repentance, and come too seeke him in the persone of our Lorde Iesus Christ: and that when hee shall haue receyued vs too mercie, it may please him so to guide vs wyth his holy spirite, as his glorie maye shine in vs, and wee in the meane while may not couet too bee honoured of men, but holde oure selues contented, that his glorie shineth so in vs, as his name bee exalted: and that it maye please him too make vs too walke in suche soundnesse vnder his obedience, that such as wander and go atray, maye bee brought intoo the way of saluation by meanes of oure example, so as all of vs together may serue him wyth one common accord all the time of our lyfe. And for the performance heereof, it may please him too stirre vppe true and faythfull Ministers of hys woorde, &c.

13. The blessing of him that vvas readie to perishe, vvas vpon mee, and I comforted the vvy-dovves heart.
14. I vvas clothed vwith rightuoufnesse, I apparayled my selfe vwith iudgement as vwith a Robe or a Crovne.
15. I vvas the eye of the blinde, and the foote of the Cripple.
16. I vvas the father of the poore, and I fought out diligently the cace that I knevve not.
17. I brake the chavves of the vicked, and plucked the pray out of his teeth.

W E beganne yesterday too shewe howe Iob giueth here a triall of the vertues of a man that feareth God: which is that he dooth good without regard of the world, or without seeking his recompence there, and is not led either with ambition or seite profit, but walketh as in the sight of God. For as for those which make a shew of vertue, and yet notwithstanding walke not vp rightly: they in doing good, haue alwayes an eye whether men be able to recompence them. And where they may be prayesd & comēded, & purchase credite by the meanes of it. But if a man giue himselfe to do good freely, that is to say, without hope of recōpence in this worlde: the same sheweth, that hee is minded too serue God. And therefore Iob declareth, that he regarded not whether those to whom he did good, were able to recompence him or no. For he did rather imploy himselfe vpon the poore, the fatherlesse, the widowes, the lame and the blind. Herein then he sheweth that his whole intent was to serue God. Besides this, he sheweth that he was not led by ambition, ne sought that men should comēd him. Howe so? for hee holdeth him selfe contented, that the blissing of him which should haue perished was vpon him. And this importeth as much as if he should say, that he had a desire to succor those that were already as good as halfe dead. It seemed that if he shewed them any fauor or did the any good, the same should be lost, & it shoulde neuer be spoken of. But this respect hindreth not Iob frō doing well, bicause he was sure that although men die, God kepeth a reckening of our doings, and they cōtinue in his registers. To be short, we see alwayes that Iob was none of those, that are drawne hither & thither by fleshy affection: but had alwayes his eyes vpon this marke of regarding and folowing the thing that god aloweth. And here ye see how we ought to rule our life: for Iob heere preacheth not his owne prayes, but sheweth vs how we ought to behaue our selues. And as much as there is nothing easier than to aduaūce our selues when the world laugheth vpon vs, and men prayse vs, and we be in reputation and credit: here Iob bringeth vs vnto God, and telleth vs, that as he onely is our iudge, to whom perteyneth the authoritie to gouern vs, & to be our lawmaker: so also we must seeke to please him onely, and to obey him in all that we do and say. Marke this for one poynt. Herewithall let vs marke also, that God (to trie the loue which we beare him) offereth vs such persons as haue no meanes to recompence vs. For behold the true prooffe that we serue god, is that we serue our neighbors when they haue neither pleased nor helped vs afore, or when it shall seme that we haue lost both our labor and our cost, & yet notwithstanding cease not to imploy our selues still. VVhy so? For it is inough for vs that God aloweth our doings. That is the thing which wil make vs not to play the hirelings. Now seeing it is so, let vs be wel aduised, that whensoever we see any pore men in aduersitie or mistreated, (as whē some are in necessitie for want of worldly goods, some are wrested and wronged by other men some stand in neede of counsell, and other some lacke helpe: ) then doth God meane to trie our charitie, then putteth he vs to the touchstone: and if we shrink aside when the poore crieth, and giue no care to him: thereby we shew that we are neither zealous nor willing to serue God. And let vs assure our selues that this threat (the poore cried, and thou wouldst not heare him, and therefore thou shalt crie and not be heard, neither shall any man pitie thee) shall be executed vpon our heades: for we shall find no mercy neither before God, nor before man, when we haue bin pitilesse to such as God hath sent to vs to bee succoured. And thereafter as our hart shall haue bene hard and vnkinde: so will God shet the eyes of such as see vs in povertie, so as they shall haue no remorse of vs: wee may well complaine and smart, but no man shal regard it. And why? For it is the payment that we deserued, whē we had not compasion of those that were in distresse: specially seeing God sendeth vs such a triall, of purpose to knowe whether we be willing to serue him or no. To be short, we see here, that mercy is one of the principall partes of our life, if it be ruled by gods order. And what importeth this saying? Euen that whē we see any man in aduersitie, and that he hath need of our helpe, we should be sorie in our hart, & suffer with him in our own person, & therby be led to do for him according too the abilitie that God giueth vs. For it is not inough for vs to help such as haue need of our aide, but we must also do it of a hartie loue. The word almes importeth asmuch as mercy. But men think they haue done an almesdeed, whē they neither regard nor esteem the person more than a dog, nor suffer any part of his greef, nor (to be short) haue any compasio<sup>30</sup> on him, prouided only that they giue him somewhat: but (to speak properly) that is no almes at al. Truly it is a witnessse of almes, that is to say of mercy: but yet is it but a false witnessse when a man hath not the said compasio<sup>30</sup> & hartie affection that I spake of. So then let vs marke well, that god will the alow of our life, whē we be hard harted, in pitying such as are in aduersity, & therby are moued to succor thē to the vttermo<sup>30</sup> of our power. Such as deal so, may wel say that they are gouerned by gods spirit, & that their life is allowable. True it is that God comaundeth vs many other things in his law, nother said I that this is all, but that it is one of the principal parts. Yet notwithstanding a man may be as it were a little Angel in the residue, & the world may haue him in admiration: & yet if he be cruel as a wild beaft, & so hardharted as he careth not for the poore, nor for such as be in aduersity: it is certaine that god will abhor all his vertues, which might be had in estimation. So thē, are we desirous that in liuing chastly and soberly, in yelding euery mā his right, & in offering no mā wrong, violence, nor deceit, are we desirous (I say) that our Lord should take al these things in good worth, and that our doings shuld be an acceptable seruice vnto him. Thē let mercy be matched inseparably with them. For like as meates are vnfaery without salt: so also when we be not pitiful to relieue our neighbors, & to reach out our hand to such as seeke our succor: it is certaine that god taketh neither tast nor fauor of all the rest. Thus ye see what we haue to bear away in this text, whē Iob saith, that the blis sung of him: that was redy to perissh, was vpon him, and that he had bin the father of the widowe, and the defender of the fatherlesse. And furthermore let vs mark wel, that according as we see the wants & necessities of our neighbors, so is it all one, as if he should say to vs, Behold, I shew you, that I would haue men to comūicate together. For God could wel inough bring to passe, that euery man should be contented with his owne person, & to liue alone by himselfe. But we see that ther is none of vs al which hath not need of others helpe, I speake euen of the richest & those that haue most ease. Let vs take a man that is helthful & lusty of his body, & haue store of goods and welth, so that he shall seme to haue all things to his own liking: & yet notwithstanding, he hath need of other men. All mē cannot be husbandmen, al mē cannot be Clothiers, al men cannot be Tanners, & so of all other handicrafts. To be short, we see that god bindeth vs one to another by force, and that necessitie is as it were a cheyne to hold vs fast tied and knie together. And besides this, we see that our lord cōtreineth vs yet better, whē he sendeth one man sicknes, & another man pouerty, & one man this, and another that, so as the rich are no more priuiledged than the poore, but we are oftentimes set in such perplexities, as we know not on which side to turn vs. I say that God bringeth thē thither as they neuer thought of, euen them I say, which (to their owne seming) had the world at will. And what is the cause hereof? As I sayd afore, God perceyuing that men would set light one by another, and euery one liue to himselfe (if it were possible) draggeth vs as it were by the heare of the head, and sheweth vs that it is an ouergreat folly to desire to exempt our selues from the state wherein hee hath set all mankind. And therefore let vs marke wel, that when any of our neighbors wanteth, (according as it is said here, of the lame, of the blind, of such as were redy to perissh, of the widowes, & of the fatherlesse.) euery of vs ought to cōsider, go to, how ought I to behaue my self in this case? For if god haue giuen vs wherewith, he bindeth vs out of hād to help such as want. And if we haue not that consideration with vs: it is a disappointing of our neighbors, & we rob thē of the thing that god hath ordeined to helpe thē with: & further we must yeld an accout for kepig back of that thing which god had comitted vnto vs to the vse & ende, that such as want it should be succored by it. So then let euery of vs cōsider wel the abilitie that is giuē him: for we shall pay deare for Gods gifts, if they be not bestowed as they ought to be: specially, if we consider not that they be precious in gods sight, & therupon do vse thē purely as he comaundeth. There is not any of gods gifts so smal which is not worthie to be had in estimation: & that is thē done, whē we applie them to their right & lawful vse. Therefore when God indueth a man with any gift: it behoueth him to thinke, this is not for my selfe alone: true it is, that God will haue me to vse it with thanks giuing: but his giuing of it is also to the end, that I should haue wherewith to helpe my neighbors: and therefore I must streyne my self therunto: and if I play the niggard in that behalfe, god eā wel shew that I am but as a steward of their goods, & that they are not mine to dispose as I list, but that the dealing of thē only is committed vnto me. Wherefore let euery man cōsider in what wise god will haue his gifts esteemed, & let euery of vs so drinke of his owne waters (as Salomon saith) that our riuers may flow forth to our neighbors: let vs not play the gluttons by our selues alone: but let vs haue such a spring as may both satisfie our selues, & also releue such as wāt. Let vs drink of the fountain that God hath giuē vs: but yet therewithal let vs so deal, as other men also may feele of it, & let vs not be like wilde beastes. Thus ye see what we haue to remember in this sentence. And furthermore let vs also marke on the other side, that if wee bee not too cruell, the verie necessities themselues ought to moue vs to succor our neighbours. And truely though wee had neither lawe written, nor the Prophetes, nor ought else: Is not nature hir selfe a sufficient good mistresse too bowe vs, and too soften our hartes, when we see men in any necessitie? Beholde, one man is blinde, another lame, and the thirde lacketh the goods of the worlde, and another wanteth defence, and

Esa. 58. b. 7 and another hath need of counsel: in this case we see our owne flesh (as the Prophete Esay sayeth) wee cannot renounce our owne nature. Therefore when we see men which are made after our owne likenesse in necessitie: if we succor them not, are we not as ill or worse than brute beastes? So then let vs bethinke our selues: for we may perchance alledge this and that, but no ignorance can excuse vs. For although we had not one worde of teaching: yet doth very kind it self shew vs, that we are blameworthy, if we indeuer not to help such as are so in extremity. And the very heathen men beare sufficient witnesse, that the very nature of man teacheth vs in this behalfe as much as is needfull: yea & euery one of vs is sufficiently couinced by experience. For whē we see any man in aduersitie: it is certain that we haue thē an instinct & motion within vs, so as if it be possible, wee must needs run thither. But, what? Euery of vs stoppeth his eyes, wee turne our backe at it, and we plucke our heades out of the collar by some vain & trifling shift or other. Neuerthelesse the said inward motiō of ours shal be as a proces against vs afore God, for that we haue not indeuored to help the necessitie of our neighbors. For (as it hath bene said alreadie) we must not think that mens wanting of ayde after that sort, commeth by casual chaunce. God hath appointed it after that fashion, to the end that our charitie might be tryed, or else that we might be conuincied to haue bene to cruell. Now Iob addeth, that he had made inquisition of the case that was not knowne vnto him, bicause he was minded too know the truth out of hande. He speaketh here, not in his owne priuate person, but as one that had authoritie too do iustice, as we haue seene afore. And this is a poynt wel worthie to be noted of such as are in office of iustice. For here he sheweth, that they ought to be watchfull in searching out euery mans right, to the end they suffer not any to be oppressed, nor yet to do any deceit or wrōg. True it is that herevpon we haue also a generall doctrine to gather. But first and formost, it behoueth magistrates and men of authoritie to knowe, that the holy ghost intended here to shew them their lesson, and giue them a sure rule, to the end they might faithfully discharge their dutie, if they listid to bend themselues to it: and contrariwise that they might be left without excuse, if they discharge it not. This is it that is conteyned here. Therefore let vs marke well, that it is not inough for a Iudge too doo no man wrong willingly, & to pronounce sentence according to that which he seeth: but also he must be diligent in boulding out of things. It is not inough for a Iudge to tarie till men haue made the way opē afore him, & pointed him to the matter with their finger: but he must haue a care too spie out things himselfe: and if the matter be darke and doubtfull, he must bend all his wits about it, to the ende to be wel informed of it. Now if such diligence be required in all Iudges. I pray you what shall become of them when they shet their eyes willingly, & let things passe for fauour, or for hatred, or for bribes, so as they be caried away to spoyle one man of his goodes, and to fauor another man, & to incumber the third? VVhat & how horrible damnation shal they haue whē they deale so? Therefore let vs take good heed to this doctrine. For if a man intend to serue god faythfully, & to performe the charge that is comitted vnto him, when he is called to office in the common welth: he must first vnderstande, that hee is not set there as an Idoll. And in good sooth why hath god promised to giue the spirit of discretion to kings, princes, and magistrates, but bicause they haue neede of it, as of a singular gift aboue others? Therefore such as are in that state, haue need to pray vnto God, so to guide thē as they may haue such wilddome and right vnderstanding to trie and discern things, as they may not in any wise deale vnaduisedly. And are they once so commended vnto God? Then the second point is, for them to be diligent to finde out the truth of things: and when a matter is vnkowne vnto thē, they must not thinke themselues discharged by saying, I knew nothing of it, for that negligence of theirs shall cost them deare before god. Therefore the Iudge that intēdeth to performe his dutie, must be vigilant to know how things go, and get instruction of the truth to the vttermost, so much as is possible for him by any meanes to do. Hereby it is seene, that it is a fond excuse to say, I wilt not of it. Yea, men will go about to enforme thē with lies which sit in Gods seat: and I pray you, if they will bee deceyued willingly, and bee contented too siff the matter no further, but let the mischief slip (as truly oftentimes they shet their eyes): is it not a very fond shift? They occupie Gods roome: and is God an Idol that hath a curteyn before his eies, so as he cannot iudge betwene white & black? But what dishonor do such Iudges to their maister, whē they be wilfully ignorāt, or when they fall so aslepe, & can find in their hartes that men should beguile thē? Beholde, there is a man that hath the worst case in the world, & he goeth about to blere the Iudges sight, as if he should cast a handfull of ashes in his eies, or set some other let in his way: and the Iudge is contented with it, & sayth, I see not awhit: & what a trayterousnesse is that at Gods seat ought to be holy, and men go about to defile it as much as they can. For there is not a more villanous defiling, than lyes, when men suffer thē to peruert iudgement & right after that sort. Peraduētūre they will say, there is a reason. And what reason? A stark lie. Thē if Iudges be double minded, that men may bend thē like Reedes that wauer with euery wind, & that the Iudges like well of it, so as there is no stedfastnesse nor firmnesse in them: I pray you shall they therefore ceasse to be guiltie before God? But we shall see many, which not only are well at ease, when men beguile them, & desire no better than to haue some colour and gloze, but also become thēselues aduocates of vntruthes, & fall to foylting in of lies to ouerthrow the right. Perchance some case shal be so thoroughly clere, that eue little children (if they were set there) could tel how the matter goeth according vnto truth: and yet the Iudges shal cast I wote not what doubt, the case shal bee true and cleare inoughe of it selfe: and one shall come and alledge I wote not what, to intangle all the matter. The Iudges (I say) tary not til some Proctor or Aduocate come to bring in his lies, and lewd allegations to turken the whole case: but they themselues are readie to tush it is thus and thus. The case shal be verie good & vtterly cleare and euident: and yet notwithstanding, they will thrust in their lies to snarle and intangle it vtterly. To be short, there is nothing to be seene but so villayrous shamelesnesse, that the very babes may iudge of it. And wil God do nothing in the meane while? VVill hee suffer men to scorne hys Maiestie after that sort, and too defile his sacred seate which he had dedicated too his owne name? No no. So then wee see that suche as are set in the seate of iustice, shall haue a terrible account to make, and that there is a dreadfull curse prepared for them, vnlesse they bee vigilant in searching oute of things, so as they iudge not at aduenture, ne veritie the Prouerbe whiche sayeth, a foolish Iudge giueth a hastie sentence, but doo they indeuer too learne howe things go, so as they may alwayes protest before God, and also shewe by theyr deedes afore men, that there was no lette in themselues, that they were not fully enfourmed, and that the truth of matters was not knowne vnto them.

Nowe if this negligence be punished so roughly, and that that such as haue drawne the curteines before them, can not scape the hande of God, what shall become of those which through an euil conscience corrupted with bribes, and forepossessed with parcialitie or hatred, fall to flinging after that sort like wild beastes, and ouerthrowe all as much as in them lieth, inso much as men know not where they are, & when they flie to iustice for refuge, they are there in as good plight as among a sort of theeues. And I pray you when they be come to that point, how shall they appeare before god, although he winck at the for a time? 10 Now then we see, that there is not a harder thing, than to minister iustice, seeing that god requireth such watchfulness in it. And therewithall let vs mark also, that euery man particularly (so much as in him lieth) ought to make inquiry of good & euil, to the end we grieue not our neighbors. For although we be no iudges to pronouce publike sentence: yet notwithstanding we oftentimes do our neighbors wrong by iudging amisse of the, & we may do them harme many wayes for want of true information. Therefore let vs set our minds throughly to try & serch out the 20 truth, that we be not deceiued with lying, and thereby do wrong to any man. Furthermore, when Job hath treated of the wisdom & carefulness which ought to be in men of authoritie: he addeth one other vertue, which is as requisite in the, that is to say, vncorruptnesse of conscience, so as they set theselues against all wrongs & violence, & suffer not any outrage to be done to any mā, without redressing it as much as in them lieth. And that is the cause why Job protesteth, that he brake the chawes of the wicked, and plucked the pray fro betwene his teeth. But this cannot be done vn- 30 lesse the Iudges and Magistrates haue such a stoutnesse in the, as they cannot abide any euil without resisting it. And this vertue is also a speciall gift of god. For although a mā be of stout courage: yet notwithstanding whē he seeth mē fall into many incōueniences, by purchasing folks displeasure: it plucketh him backe, & cooleth him. True it is that there are many examples to be found, yea euē among the Paynims, and those which neuer knewe God, that they bowed not for any cause, but mainteyned the right, and gaue their hand and succour, to such as were wrongfully 40 oppressed. A man may well see many examples of this. But God worketh after that maner in that behalfe, to the end to take away all excuse fro the, which pretend his name, when they haue swarued or dissembled and suffred good men to be oppressed and wronged, and the wolues to deuour the shepe. Yet notwithstanding (as I saide afore) this vertue of inuincible stoutnesse or costancie, is the speciall gift of God. And so by which are set in the seate of iustice, after they haue desired God to giue them wisdom to iudge rightly, and induered themselues to the vtter- 50 most to discharge their dutie, and to retch their hande to such as are troden vnder foot, ought to set themselues as sheeldes agaynst suche as woulde take away other mens goods by force, and set their feet vpō poore mens throtes: Iudges ought to applie themselues to this. True it is, that when men see wicked folke haue the bridle lie looce in their neck, and no body resisteth them, they wil say what can I do to it? I cannot redresse it: but such excuses are to no purpose before God. I see (will some men say) that no man beareth me companie, al drag behind in that behalfe, 60 if I would do my dutie, they that should ioyne with me will leaue me there: if a lewd fellow or twain do but gren at me, I quake for feare, and I wote not what to do, and so it is not my fault, I woulde faine it were remedied, but I cannot do it alone. These reasons may wel eary some colour before men: but needs must they fal to the ground before God. For (as I haue declared) here the holy ghost giueth a common lesson too all such as haue that charge committed vnto them: which lesson is, that they must shewe themselues flat enemies to the wicked: and when they see them so like madde beastes, and that their teeth be sharpened to eate vp one, and too byte another: they must barre them of their doings, and step before them, employing against them the credite and authoritie which God hath giuen them. For it is no small saying when it is said here, I haue broken the Chawes of the wicked, and plucked the pray out of their teeth. But now let vs mark, that when God ordeyneth magistrates, that is to say, when he calleth mē to the office of iustice, and armeth the with his sword, in so doing he bindeth them to maintein the good & the innocent, and to take vpon them the defence of right, & also to set themselues against al wrongs, misdealings, and violences. Now if a Iudge say, I know not who had right or wrong: who was to blame for it? For first of all God will neuer faile to giue wisdom to such as aske it: and againe, he wil also blisse their labor, which trauel faithfully to seke out the right. But what Iudges are so farre off fro making inquisition for such as are oppressed: that if men do so complaine vnto them, that the ayre shall ring of it, yet notwithstanding in the meanwhile the eares of such as ought to set to their hands to remedie it, are deafe? If a mā haue patiently put vp a wrong, & the Iudge be made priuie to the case, he is not to be excused, he cannot say, he came not to complaine to me: no, but the fault was committed before thine eies, and it was thine office too redresse it, but thou hast made no account of it, and thinkest thou to escape cleere before God? But yee shall see poore folke complaine, and come shew their right, & yet 30 can haue no redresse. And cōtrariwise, where no euil hath bin done, there the sword must be drawne, and the matter must be hadled with vehemēcie as if he were mad. Some man wil say, it is but the zeale of iustice. It is much to the purpose: no it is to vilanous a shamelesnesse wherin there is neither rime nor reason, whē they suffer a poore man to be troubled, & in the meane while deale with al the rigor that may be in a matter of nothing. If a poore man that is wronged do complaine and lay forth his right, tushe it is nothing, come againe a seuennight hence: and then hee shall be delayed so long, that he shall be tired. If a plaine man haue not rents and reuēnes to liue vpon, if he haue not men at his beck, to sollicite his matter, if he be a handicrafts man: hee must sterue for hunger, if hee will recouer right in a matter that is neuer so euident. He hath wronged him, the worlde seeth it, the matter is apparently knowne, and yet in the ende will hee haue right? then must he haue a full purse, he must shet vp his shop, and he must make his account to be idle halfe the yeare. 40 And when he hath folowed his matter a good while: yet shall he be but laughed to scorne. VVe see this disorder at this day: and therefore how can they make their account afore God which are placed in the holy seate of iustice? True it is, that they will cleare theselues before men, but yet shall not this doctrine be disanulled for them. And so (as I sayde) it were a very ofward thing to be inquisitiue, sith we see, that when things are brought to light, there is no zeale to succor those that are so misused & oppressed, yea and it is also sene, that the wicked becom the bol- 50 der, euen by reason of the libertie that is giuen them whē they shall haue cōmitted any euil & scape vnpunished: it is all one as if libertie & priuilege were giuen them to do harm to all men. VVell then, they vse it, and abuse it, and thervpon proceed further and further: and in the meane while the Iudge can stil say, indeed such an euil was committed: yea and there happened a seconde, a thirde, and a fourth, inso much that at length al is out of order, and yet in the meane while, where is the redresse? VVill not God

God haue his seat to be honored? And how can that be, except there bee the sayde vertue of stoutnesse and constancie to repress the euill? Therefore if there bee such libertie, as the wicked sort may play the Lions, Beares, & other wood beasts: let such as be in the authoritie of God remember with themselves, I ought to serue my maister, and how shall I discharge my selfe? If I do my dutie, then shall I haue him on my side, and I shall be vphilde by his hande. Ye see then wherevpon a iudge ought to thinke, and then shall he haue a Lions heart too set himselfe agaynst the woode beastes, and to plucke the pray out of their teeth, and too breake their Chawes. And in good faith let vs marke, that these maner of speeches are not superfluous: for in effect, Iob (or rather the holy Ghost by his mouth) mēt to declare, that such as will execute iustice duly, shall neuer bring it to passe, except they vse the sword which God hath put in their hand to breake the chawes of the wicked: that is to say, except they vse sharpnesse & rigor. For if a iudge be effeminate, and that whē it cometh too the punishing of offenders, he fall too saying, I wote not where I am, I wote not what to say, and so bee destitute of stoutnesse too redresse matters that are out of order: it is certaine that hee shall neuer performe his dutie. Therefore whereas here is mention made of the breaking of wicked mens teeth: let vs vnderstande that our Lorde warneth those to whome hee hath giuen hys sworde, to vse it stoutly agaynst the wicked, which commonly are ouerhardie: and that like as they are brute beastes, so the Iusticers also muste haue a stedfast, and stoute heart to repress all their violence and rage. Thus ye see what we haue too marke in this streyne. Nowe for a conclusion let vs marke this sentence whiche Iob setteth downe: which is, that hee had clothed himselfe with his rightuousnesse, and that hee had made Iustie (that is too say vprightnesse) as his Robe or Crowne: that is to say that he was decked with vertue, and not with brauerie, as those be whome God hath aduanced to some credite, who beare themselves in hande, that the worlde is not worthie too looke them in the face: they play the Peacocks, and spread their wings abroad. Ye see then the decking of those which at this day are in authoritie and state of Iustice: for there is nothing to be sene but pride, there is nothing but pompe and brauerie, and yet they thinke themselves not to bee mortall men. But contrariwise it is sayde heere, that the man whiche regardeth God, and indeuereth too execute his duetic faythfully, taketh rightuousnesse for his Robe, and vpright dealing for his Cloake or apparell. I pray you if it were but for honestie sake, would a man suffer his coate and cloake too bee plucked from him, and himselfe too bee sent too picke pagles, as the prouerbe sayeth? If it were neyther whote nor colde, would he not keepe his clothes still, to the intent he might honestly keepe company among men? But if a man bee stripped, and chauce to bee in the rayne and winde, so as hee is left readie too starue for colde, or too swelt for heate, and his coate is pluckt in peeces: will it not greue him at the hart? And yet notwithstanding, rightuousnesse and vpright dealing are our verie clothes, and coates wherewith we bee apparayled. And if a man haue behaued himselfe faythfully in dooing his duetic: God mainteyneth him, and he is fenced by protection from aboue, hee shall bee in Gods fauour, although no man made him good countenance among men. Ye see then in what sort wee ought to be clothed and apparellled before God and his Angels: namely by keeping the said rightuousnesse and vpright dealing, so as wee haue not beene spoyled and destitute of it. Then although that diuerse tymes either by flatterie, or by briberie, or by threatning, or by hatred, or by some other temptations, men labour too get away this clothing and apparell of rightuousnesse, and vpright dealing from vs: let vs take good heede that we bee not spoyled of it, except wee will haue our shame and dishonnestie shewed openly before God and his Angelles. Furthermore, as touching the worlde, and this present life, let vs bee well ware, that wee lay not our selues open to the colde or heate: that is too saye, that God suffer vs not to fall into manie wantes, and therewithall sende vs no succour. And why? For when wee haue beene so cowardely or slouthfull, too suffer our selues to be spoyled of oure clothes: It is good reason that wee shoulde smart for it afterwarde. I had a cloake to couer me, and keepe mee from the raine: and I haue let it go at aduventure. Nowe, am I not woorthie to be wette too the skinne, seeing I hilde scorn to cast my cloake aboute mee. Beholde, God declareth vnto vs, that to the intent wee shoulde bee well clad, hee himselfe hath clothed vs with his owne rightuousnesse. And wee cast away that rightuousnesse as a thing of no value: we make no account of the sayd vpright dealing and equitie which he commendeth so greatly vnto vs: But wee cast it away as it were into the winde. Seeing then, that wee vnclothe our selues after that sort, I pray you, deferue wee not that our Lorde shoulde giue vs vp to all shame, to be mocked and scorned, and therewithall to bee left vtterly destitute of all things, and finally too haue no ayde nor succour, neyther of God nor man? Lo what wee haue too marke in this text. But truly we can neuer discharge our selues throughly of that duetic, I meane not onely the Magistrates whiche haue so highe and harde a charge, but also them which haue no more to gouern but themselves, and theyr householdes: It is vnpossible that they shoulde haue suche perfection, as to bee garnished with rightuousnesse and vpright dealing in all poynts. What haue wee then too doo? VVee muste then resort to oure Lorde Iesus Christ for twoo causes. For first wee finde not in our selues the things that are conteyned heere: we bee slowe vnto goodnesse, and swift vnto euill: there is neyther wisdome, nor discretion in vs: and therefore it behoueth vs too drawe it out of Iesus Christ, to whom the spirite of wisdome and strength is giuen, as it is sayde in the eleuenth Chapter of the Prophete Esay. Esay. 11. 2. Then if we be clothed with the rightuousnesse of oure Lorde Iesus Christ, and with the vprightnesse and wisdom which he will giue vs by his holy spirit: then shall wee bee garnished and decked conveniently to appeare before God. But forasmuch as in this present life, there will alwayes bee some imperfection in vs, and somewhat will alwayes bee amisse. our Lorde Iesus Christ must of his meere grace couer all our faultes, so as they may bee pardoned for his sake, and hee supplie our wantes, and therewithall continually increase the giftes of his holie spirite in vs more and more, and guide vs by the power of the same, vntill hee haue cleare ridde vs from all the infirmitie and corruptions of our flesh, and that wee bee come to the marke wherevnto we be going.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him too make vs so too feele them, that beeing vtterly dismayde in in our selues, we may make our recourse vnto him, trusting that the same shall not be in vaine, bicause he is willing and readie to helpe all them that seeke him. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly father, wee acknowledge and confesse according too the truth, that we be not worthie to lift vp our eyes to heauen, too present our selues before thee, &c.

The Cviij. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the xxix. Chapter.

- s Some read 18.* I sayd, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiplie my dayes as the * fande, as the Psa 19. My roote is spred out to the vvater, and the deavy shall lie vpon my haruest, and it shall bee vix. verie great.
 20. My glorie shall be renewed, and my bovy shall be strengthened in my hande.
 21. Men heard me vvith longing, and hilde their tongue at my counsell.
 22. They replied not to my vvordes, and my talke dropped as raine vpon the hearers.
 23. They vvayted for it as for the deavve, and they opened their mouthe as after a desyred raine.
 24. If I laughed vvith them they beleued me not, neyther suffered they the light of my countenance to fall.
 25. VVhen I came in vvay, I had the cheefe roome, I vvvas among them as a king vvith his armie, and as a comforter of them that mourned.

Ob hauing spoken of the authori-tie that hee had purchased by his vertues, and by the giftes of grace that god had put in him, doth now adde that it seemed that his state should neuer haue chaunged. And therin he sheweth that he was not like those which reigne ouer men whether they will or no, and are alwayes in doubt and vncertaintie: according as we see that suche as attaine too honour and authori-tie wrongfully, may well beare great sway, and make all the worlde too quake vnder them, but as soone as the winde turneth, the least chaunge in the worlde ouerthroweth them. VVhy so? For as they be feared, so are they hated, and such as crouch and creepe to them, wishe with all their harts to see the ouerthrowne, & to be short, they haue no foundation at all. But Iob sheweth that hee had not a fleeting credit, that should continue but for two or three dayes: but that it was so well grounded, as a man might haue sayde, that his state should neuer haue beene chaunged: it was so well vnderpropped on all sides. Lo what his meening was. Yet notwithstanding, God smote him in such wise, as hee became the miserablest creature in the world. Therefore it is no maruell though he were in such anguish as he could no more: for he fel into an aduersitie that he neuer looked for. And that is the cause why he ouershootes himself oftentimes in his talke: and although he haue alwayes an eye vnto God, yet is he excessiue, and that too much. This therefore must not be thought straunge, considering that the miserie which he indured was incomprehensible, and such a one as men had neuer thought on afore. But this must serue for our learning, that we may alwayes stand vpon our gard. If God send vs any prosperitie, let vs not be too sleepe: but let vs consider that this mortall life is subiect to all the chaunges that we can deuise, yea truely notwithstanding all the proppes that we can haue. And although the whole world seeme to fauour vs, & that we haue a hundred thousand shoulders to beare vs vp: yet must we neuertheless think, that there is no settlednesse here bilow, but that all things are transitorie, so as all things are chaunged in the turning of a hand, and those that were lifted highest vp, are cast lowest downe. Beholde (I say) the lesson that we haue to gather of this text. And it is a verie needfull doctrine for vs. For there is nothing easier with a man, than to make himselfe beleue, that he shall alwayes continue in hap-pie state, when hee is once in it. VVee see what Dauid himselfe confesseth, VVhen I was in my prosperitie (sayeth hee) I sayde I shall neuer be removed. True it is, that in the tenth Psalme, he putteth it ouer to the dispizers of God. For in speaking of their prosperitie, he sayeth, that they beare themselves in hande, that although the whole world should be turned vpside downe, yet are they so exceedingly well fenced, that they shall continue safe still. Ye see then, that the worldlings and vnbeleuers presume vpon their owne power, and take themselves to be so well armed on all sides, as nothing may hurt the, according also as all the holy Scripture speaketh of that pride of theirs. But Dauid in his own person (in the forealledged text of the thirtith Psalme) sayeth that he fell asleepe since the time that God had settled him in the kingdome, and made him too prosper, and giuen him the vpper hand of all his enemies: and that therevpon he made his reckning, neuer to remoue from that state. But (sayth he) Lord thou hast well taught me by experience, that the only fauor of thy good will aduanced me after that maner. For as soone as I felt thy hand, beholde I was in such plight, that I was vtterly at my wits end. Dauid the sheweth, that euen the children of god, although they be not puffed vp with pride that is in the vnbeleuers, do set themselves in their good fortune as they terme it, and are notwithstanding not able to stay fro promising themselves more than is needfull. For they imagine that their good days shall last for euer, & that their prosperitie shall neuer fail. Sith we are inclined to such vice, in somuch that euē Dauid was not altogether clere of it, what haue we els to do but to take heed to our selues? And in what sort? Da-uid in marking this vice, doth also shewe the remedie of it, when he sayth, Lorde the surenesse and safetie both of me, and of my kingdome, are grounded vpon thine one-ly goodnesse. If wee acknowledge that all our welfare dependeth vpon Gods good pleasure: we shall conclude, that there is no certaintie nor settlednesse in our selues.

 So then let vs call vpon God, and wayte at his hande for whatsoever shall please him to sende vs. And although wee hope that hee will continue his goodnesse towardes vs: yet notwithstanding let vs not cease too prepare our selues whensoever it shall please him to meeken vs, and too exercise our pacience by aduersitie: but let vs alwayes be in a readinesse for it, and not thinke it straunge when it commeth. Furthermore let vs marke well howe Dauid sayth, that he was troubled. And why? For it is alone, as if he should come vpon a man that is fast asleepe.
 VVill not we then be in like trouble when the hande of God striketh vs? Let vs dispose our selues to it aforehād, and let vs preuent all the changes that are to be sene with the eye, and which God sheweth vs to the end that euery of vs should kepe good watch. Thus ye see, why I say that the doctrine which is cōteined here, is very necessary for vs: which is, that we must not think to dy in our nest after the maner of the similitude which Iob vseth here: but must be as birds vpon a bough to remoue at gods pleasure that when

when we are enriched, we may be impoueriſhed if he liſt: and when we haue bene in great honor and eſtimation, we may come to ſuch reproch and ſhame, as in maner all the whole world may mock vs, if it be his pleaſure: and that we may take all in good worth, and (as I ſayd) be in a readineſſe before hande, to the ende we be not troubled when our Lord ſhall viſit vs in that maner. And we haue ſpeciall neede to bee warned hereof, becauſe the ſtate of Chriſtians is to be changeable. For S. Paule ſayth that both himſelfe and his fellowes were without reſt. He v-ſereth that word, not that we ought not to be conſtant. For it behoueth vs tooo determine with our ſelues, neuer too ſwarue. But as touching the outward and viſible ſtate tooo the worldward, we muſt be faine to be fleeting, and without any reſt. So then, ſeeing that god hath called vs thervnto. Let euery one of vs take heed that he make not his reckening without his hoſt, ne beare himſelf in hand that he ſhall continue, alwayes in one ſtate. And why? For he warranteth himſelf that which he cannot performe. Behold here two things which we haue to marke. The one is, that what proſperitie ſoeuer we haue, the ſame is no certaine and abiding ſtate. And why? For ſo is the good pleaſure of God: like as if a Prince ſhoulde giue a man the poſſeſſion of ſome Lordſhip, not in feeſimple, but to holde of him as Tenant at will. He hath it but from day too day, and the Prince may reuoke his graunt when it pleaſeth him. In like caee is it with all the things that God giueth vs in this worlde. For the condition of them is not that we ſhould inioy them both in life and death, but onely when it pleaſeth him, according alſo as hee knoweth what is expediēt for vs. Lo here the firſt point.
 The ſeconde poynt is, that we muſt conſider it to be the good will of our God, to remoue vs from time to time, ſo long as we be in this world. And why? For if he ſhoulde ſuffer vs to ſettle long, ſurely we would as it were gather ruſt, and drawe much ſuperfluous baggage to vs. God therefore remoueth vs, that is tooo ſaye, hee chaungeth our ſtate, hee afflicteth vs, hee maketh vs poore, and after he hath liſted vs vp, hee caſteth vs downe: and all is tooo the ende we ſhoulde not bee ſnarled in the goods of this worlde, nor become ſo foliſh, as not to keepe on our way cōtinually to the heauenly life. Thus ye ſee what we haue to beare away in this text. Furthermore, let euery of vs invre himſelfe tooo conſider the turnings that wee ſee in this world. For our Lorde ſheweth vs them, to the intent wee ſhoulde fare the better by them. And ſpecially if wee ſee any thing that was neuer miſtrufte nor looked for afore: as if ſome man were aduanced to great credit, and nothing went againſt him, but he had both wind and weather at will (as they ſay) ſo as hee ſhall haue gathered great riches, and gotten great friends, & haue alied him-ſelfe well, and gotten infinit ſtayes: if we ſee ſuch a one fall, becauſe God layeth his hand vpon him to beate him downe: let vs beſthink our ſelues, that it behoueth vs then to wake, and that God declareth vnto vs, that there is nothing certaine in this world, to the ende we ſhoulde come hide our ſelues vnder his wings, and alſo diſpoſe our ſelues to aduerſitie, whenſoeuer it ſhal pleaſe him to ſend it.
 And if we happen to fall: let vs not be tooo much aſtonied and diſmayde, becauſe we haue minded it a long time before hande. Verely ſometimes God maketh alterations, not onely vpon men, but alſo vpon Cities, Countries, and Kingdomes. VVhen any of theſe great Courtiers that were had in ſuch reputation, as men thought them to be aduanced about the Clowdes, are ſeene to come to decay: that is a change right great and wonderfull. But if you ſee a Citie, a Shire, yea or a Realm ouerthrowne (as I ſayde afore) where a man would haue thought there had beene ſo much helpe as it had beene vnpoſſible tooo haue come vnto it: I ſay if we ſee all this ouerthrowne: let vs vnderſtand, that our Lorde ſetteth that looking glaſſe before our eyes, to the end that euery of vs ſhoulde think the better vpon his own frailtie, & not fall aſleepe in any preſumption or vaine truſt. Thus ye ſee howe wee ought to profit our ſelues by this text, & by the experience which our Lord giueth vs of it al our life long. But Iob vſeth the moſt ſimilitudes to expreſſe that which he had ſayd, that is to ſay, that the dew ſhall lie alwayes vpon his barneſt, or vpo his brāches: (for the Hebrew word importeth both twain, & all cometh to one end.) And again, that his dayes ſhall be multiplied as the ſand. As if he ſhoulde ſay, without nūber.

 And again, that his glorie ſhall be renewed, and that his bowe ſhall not be beaten downe. True it is, that ſome men vnderſtand theſe ſayings to concerne the hope of the reſurrection: but men may ſee by the whole proces of the matter, that Iob treateth of the ſtate of this preſent life. Therefore wee muſt not cliime ſo hie, nor ſeeke ſo curious a gloze: but content our ſelues with the naturall ſenſe which I haue ſet downe already: which is, that Iob meneth here to ſay, that his ſtate was well ſetled, ſo as men thought not that euer they ſhoulde haue ſeene it fall into ſo miſerable a plight as it was then. And (as I ſaid) that is a circumſtance to make many men to woonder. For when we ſee ſuch changes: we fall to reaſoning with our ſelues, how happe-neth it that God thundreth vpon ſo hie moūtaines, and ſmiteth ſo great heades? Is it poſſible? we cōſider not that God intendeth to vtter his power in that caee, to the end that men ſhoulde not truſt ſo much to theſelues, but learne to referre theſelues wholly vnto him, & to reſt altogether vpo his goodneſſe, & not to promiſe theſelues any thing after their own imaginatiō. So much the more the behouueth it vs to marke wel this circumſtance, that Iobs auā-cement was not only for a day, two, or thre, or for ſom ſhort time: but that he ſeemed to be viterly exempted from all dangers, & to be no more in peril of any miſfortune: and yet notwithstanding, that god ſmote ſo roughly vpo him with his hand, as he was viterly defaced. VVherefore let vs vnderſtand, that god ment to giue vs a notable looking glaſhere, to the end we ſhoulde alwayes keepe good watch: and whē we haue called vpo god, if it pleaſe him to ſend vs any affliction, we might receiue it paciētly, in aſmuch as we had after that ſort forſene it. And ſurely whatſoeuer ver-tu: there be in vs, the ſame muſt not ſtir vs vp the more, when there hapneth any change: but we muſt vnderſtand that according as our Lorde hath giuen vs of his gracious gifts, & ſpecially after as he ſhall haue gouerned vs by his holy ſpirit, to vſe them well, and as it becommeth vs: the ſame muſt ſerue to ſtabliſh vs in ~~paſſion~~ ſteadines, notwithſtā-ding that we be wealed, yea & viterly beaten downe in our bodies. Then let vs aſſure ourſelues, that God will come to vtter the ſtrength of his ſpirit in ſuſteining vs, to the end we may fight agaynſt ſuch temptations, and that the victorie which we ſhall haue gotten, may be ſo much the more glorious, becauſe his goodneſſe hath beene the more increaſed towards vs. Lo here what wee haue tooo marke. And now Iob goeth on with this matter which he had delt in before: which is the great authoritie that hee had gottē, not through vain reputatiō, but by his wiſdom and grauitie, & becauſe he had ſo gouerned himſelfe, that euerie man reuerenced him. Therefore he ſayth expreſly, that all men bekned to him, yea and that they bekned in ſuch ſort as they wayted for his wordes, and euery man gaped, as a man that is athirſt, or as we ſee how the earth when it is very dry doth crany, as if ſo be it deſired rain to drink. Iob thē declareth, that he himſelf was ſuch a one: that is to wit that he was as the rain & the dew, & that al ſuch as herd hi, were as it were altered at his wordes, and hung vpon his talke as vpon an vnreucable iudgement. And this is declared vnto vs purposely, to the ende we shoulde knowe first what a man Iob was, whome we see so sore smitten by Gods hand. Therefore let vs not complaine & grudge against God, nor accuse him of crueltie, whē he afflicteth vs. For we see what Iob gayned by it: namely that he abode vanquished and confounded when he went about to striue against the chastisements that God sent him, and yet neuertheless, ye see what holinesse of life, and what perfection was in him. Therefore let vs learne that God is alwayes iust in afflicting vs, and that if we compare our selues with Iob, we shal find our selues to be far short of the perfection that was in him, and yet was hee beaten more sharply than we be. So then we haue none other shift, but to receiue Gods stripes with allowlinesse & patience. Mark that for one poynt. And herewithal we see in Iobs perso, what reuerēce we ought to beare to such as God sendeth to teach vs faithfully. It is sayd that men bearked to him with longing: wherein he sheweth that me ought to haue a desire to profit in knowledge, & that seeing nature prouoketh them to desire to eate & drinke for the nourishment of their bodies: they must not dispise the food of their soules, which is the knowledge and learning of goodnesse, wherby they differ from brute beasts. VVhen we know a thing to be good to mainteine vs: we need neither maister nor teacher to teach vs to couer it: neither need we any prouocation to it, or any body to put vs in mind of it. Every man (as I sayd) can skill to couet to eate and drink, every man can desire to be clothed. VVhy so? For we know that those things concerne our life. But now, is not our soule the excellentest part of vs? And how ought that to be interteyned? Not with eating and drinking: But there is a thing agreeable too the nature of it, which is to haue reason & vnderstanding, that our life be not brutish, but that we may shewe our selues to be creatures formed after the Image of God. So then, in this verse it is shewed vs, that if we be not to blockish (or at leastwise if we haue any reason at al in vs) we ought continually to deuise how we may profit, by knowing to what end man is borne in this worlde: namely to be more and more stablished in the knowledge of God, after we haue once receyued it. But we see many so retchlesse, as they passe not to heare any thing: & we see otherfom that can not be satisfied with dispising the doctrine, but they also hate it & vterly absent themselves from it, as much as they can. And do such folk deserue to be counted men? No: for the thing wherein we differ from brute beasts, is that we haue some reason and vnderstanding. Howbeit although God hath put some scale of vnderstanding in vs, to discern betwene good & euil: yet notwithstanding there is such grosnes & infirmitie in our wits, as we haue need of furtherances. Yea & though we had al the furtheraice that could be wished: yet is it apparant, that there is stil default in vs. For what is the cause that we reiect al the benefites that god offreth vs, but bicause we be worse than beasts? So then we must nedes cōclude, that if a man knewe the end of his creation, and why he liueth in this worlde: he would always be moued to profit in knowledge, as to set his mind therevpon, & he would neuer refuse the meanes whē they were offered, but would think with himself, behold, god intendeth to teach me, & therefore it behoueth me to yeeld my self willing to lerne, & to giue eare to his doctrine which he setteth afore me, as which is good & available for my saluatiō. Lo what desire ought to be in vs. But now let vs loke vpo our owne retchlesnesse: For God is so gracious vnto vs, as to giue vs his word, and not only sendeth vs some man that hath a good wit & vnderstan-

ding: but also is willing to do the dutie of a maister himselfe. And although he come not downe from heauen in his own visible person: yet haue we his law, his Prophets, & his gospell, which giue vs infallible assurance & record that it is he which speaketh there. Then seeing that God openeth his holy mouth to teach vs, although he vse mortal men as his instruments: I pray you are not we too vntankfull, if we vouchsafe not to profit in his schole? And yet neuertheless, we see howe wee fare in that behalfe. VVherefore it behoueth vs to remember well the lesson that is shewed here, in respect that God vpbraideth vs, according also as Iesus Christ hath done the Iewes and hypocrites, saying, you can skill to discern the seasons, Mat. 16. a. 3 you can tel when the Sun wil cheere the earth, you know Lu. 12. g. 55 when the weather will be cleare and fayre, so as you may go about your businessse. And why discern we not that which belongeth to our soules? Bicause we are too much wedded to this present life. There is none of vs but he wisheth for raine whē he knoweth it to be needfull, saying: O, now it were good for the earth to be watered. Again, if we haue need of heat, or of faire weather, or of any thing else: we can so good skill to forecast the things that concerne the commodities of this temporal life, as there is no lacke at all in vs in that behalfe. But behold, God sendeth vs his worde, and we know not the due time of his visitation, to enter when the gate is opened vs: he calleth vs on all sides, and we take scorn to come in. Furthermore let vs marke well, that this similitude is not set downe without cause, where Iob sayth, That his wordes were wished & prayed for, as the raine or dew. And Moyses also vseth the same in his song: ye heauens (saith he) let my words drop as the dew, or the raine in their season. Now for the vnderstanding hereof, we must not only cōsider the rain in it self, but also marke the vse and profit that it bringeth vs. Rain in some respect may be hurtfull, as vnto the that are wet to the hard skin, when they go abroad in the fields: and to al other men also, when it kepeth them within the doores. But yet for all that, a seasonable raine bringeth vs sustenance by moysting the earth which coulde yeeld no frute without it. Thus ye see why raine is to bee desired. And so let vs vnderstande, that we on our part are much more barren than the earth. For prooffe hereof wee can bring forth nothing but shrewd weedes. True it is that in respect of euil we be too frutefull: but in respect of good, we cannot bring forth so much as one graine of corne, or one braunche of good hearbe, and much lesse can wee bring forth any one good nourishing frute wherwith to feede our selues, or shoot forth one blade of good corne, vntil God haue changed our nature. But hath God put good into vs? He must also be faine to water it, or else it will be either choked with briars, or else grow wilde. Our Lord then must worke in that behalfe. And beholde the means that he intendeth to keepe, is that he sendeth vs his worde as raine, to the ende that being so moystned, we may see what his working and cheerefulness is, and that the good roote which he hath planted in vs, may not perishe, but increase more and more, and bud and bring forth good frute. Furthermore let vs take heede we become not like stones and blockes, when God rayneth so vpon vs. The raine doth the earth good, when it is well tilled, but will it do any good to a rock? No, none at al, the raine is but lost vpon it. Euen so is it with men. If we be well tilled, and minded too yeeld vnder the obedience of our God, when he maketh his worde to raine vpon vs. Certainly it will enter into our eares, and wee shall feele the working of it, so as wee shall bee the more disposed vnto goodnesse, and our good workes shall shewe that we haue not beene watered in vaine, and

and that Gods mynd was not that his graces should be losse in vs. But yf wee contynue alwayes in oure cursed nature, as many men do which are wilfull and forward: then shall we belike rocks, hee will raine vpon vs, but what for that? VVe shall haue no disposition to receiue the raine, and that will cost vs right deere. Therefore let vs vnderstand, that it is a raine of Gods sending, when he will haue his word preached vnto vs. And that if when it streameth downe vpon vs, we make it to vanish in the aire, and suffer it not to light vpon the ground, we may be sure that such vnthâkfulnesse shall not scape unpunished. Thus ye see to what end it behoueth vs to applie the similitude that Iob vseth heere, when he saith that his wordes were waited for, and longed for as the rayne and dew. That is to wit, wee must assure ourselues, that the good doctrine which God sendeth vnto vs for oure welfare, commeth to vs from heauen, and that although we heare it at a mortall mâs hand, yet notwithstanding it is of Gods sending. Ye see then how Gods desire is too water vs. To o what intente? To make vs receiue good seede out of hand, and to bring forth good frute according as it is added heere. For Iob not only saith that his words were longed and waited for: But also that men receiued them immediatly with great and earnest good will, and also that there was no more replying to the contrary. Then if it please God to teach vs, and (for the doing thereof to raise vp meete mō indued with the grace of his holy spirit, vnder whome we may profite. Let vs giue care to them with all reuerence, and yeld too their good doctrine without any constraint. True it is that we ought to examine spirits, and that we must not at all aduenture receiue all doctrines that are set afore vs, vntill we be sure that they are of God. But when we knowe that it is God that speaketh, that is to say, when we are sure that we be taught in his name, and as it were by his mouth: then is there no replying, but wee must doo him the honoure to settle ourselues fully vpon his word, so as we may yeld ourselues obedient vnto it, and it may haue full course and authoritie among vs. True it is that many can finde in their harts to suffer God too speake without kicking against him, so as they know the things to be good which are preached vnto the: but yet do they strue againste him in their life. And that is the thyng wherein our Lord intendeth to try whether we be his or no. Haue we heard Gods word? VVe must not reply against it, but we must glorify God, assuring ourselues that there is nothing better for vs than too obey hym. Haue we once acknowledged that: Let euery of vs (whē we be returned into our houses) shew by oure deedes that we haue borne away the doctrine, and do allow it as good. For he that doth contrarie to that which he confesseth, is double condemnable. And surely as there bee folke that do much worse in secret than if their wickednesse were opened to the world: So also, their replying against God, extendeth not only to the mouth, but also to the life. Therefore when folke liue not as they are taught by the Gospell: their works repley sufficiently against God. VVhen any man troubleth his neighbour, so as he riseth vp openly against him and doth him any violence, it is certaine that suche outrage shall not bee borne withall but shall be punished at Gods hand, howe long soeuer he tarrie. And although our going about to annoy our neighbors, be by suttletie and as it wer by vndermining, so as our slighes be cheefly conueyed and couered, and we cannot be reprobued of men, nother can any man (to our seeming) find fault with vs: yet notwithstanding, the cry mounteth vp to Heauen, and craueth vengeance at Gods hand for the extortion that we haue so committed in secret. VVherefore let vs marke well, that although we haue yelded such reuerence vnto gods word, as to heare it as good and holy doctrine, and to receiue it as the very foode of our soules, and as the meane too bring vs too the euerlasting life and the saluation which we pretend to desire: yet it behoueth euery one of vs to take good heede to himselfe, that he repie not against it by his life. And now let vs consider a little, if a man may euer find this vertue in the world. Behold Iob speaketh in suche a time as Gods doctrine was yet very darke: for it is not well knowne whither hee liued after the law of Moyse, or before: howbeit it is certaine, that he was auncienter than the Prophets. For when hee is spoken of in the Prophets, he is spoken of as a man that had bin of auncient time. Now seeing it is so, I pray you ought not the world at this day to be more giuen to receiue Gods doctrine, than at that time? For (as I haue said) the doctrine of God was very darke in those days, and God sent it but as it were drop by drop, euē as whē there falleth a small deaw in the night. To be short, men are taught it but slightly in comparison of the abundance of grace whiche God sendeth into the worlde in these days. For in the Gospell we haue infinite treasures of wisdom and knowledge, God sheweth himselfe familiarly vnto vs, he will haue vs to be filled, and throughly filled with all perfection of his doctrine, and he giueth so cleere and certain vnderstanding as can be possible. And yet for all this, where is the reuerence that Iob speaketh of: where is the desire? where is the amiable obedience? Nay contrariwise wee see skornefulnesse as I haue touched already. Again, when the doctrine is preached, how many are there that giue attentive care vnto it? Nay the most part are busied about their owne fancies and earthly cares, where they haue I wote not what matters within them, that shut God out of doores, so that they play the resty iades in kicking against the doctrine. Their coming to Sermons is but for fashion sake, and they retourne home from them as wise as they went thither. So then there are very few folke in whom the reuerence is to be found that is spoken of here. And as for cōforming themselues fully vnto it, that is a very rare vertue. For euery man wil be wise and cunning, and after what sort? In not obeying God, and in not conning to the knowledge of the holy scripture: nay many say they, I thinke thus, and thus it seemeth to me: And men are not ashamed to alledge their weenings before God: and it is the cheefe articles of the saythe of the Papistes at this daye, that in their opinion God ought too set greate store by them for this theyr ouerdiuicish pride, in that they woulde haue all men to holde themselues to al their deuises. And they that blasphemē not so openly with their mouthes, are neuertheless seene by their deedes, that they rebell against God. For wee see howe God dothe nowe adayes set out the whole perfectiō of wisdom in the Gospell, & cometh so familiarly vnto vs, desiring to fill vs to the full. And yet notwithstanding wee finde no tast in his worde, but vtterly despise it, and when it is declared vnto vs, wee go about to resist it, or at leastwise to deface it by our doings. Seeing then that wee are so malicious, shall not they that heare Iob, beare witness against vs? Shall they not vpbraid vs with the obedience whiche they yelded vnto Iob, who in deede was a Prophet of God, but yet had no such record of his calling, as our Lord Iesus Christ hath giuen to those that preach his gospell in these dayes? And therefore let vs marke well this text. For like as it is said that the least in the kingdome of Heauen (that is to say of them that preach the gospell in these days) is more excellent in his ministe-

ry, than Iohn Baptist and all the Prophets: so on the contrary, part, when we despise the doctrine that God sendeth, seeing that he commaundeth it to be so honoured: it is certaine that we shall be double gillie. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text. And it is said immediately, that if Iob iested with them, they beleued it not. VVhereby hee meeneth, that he had such a grauitie in him, as men durst not beleue that hee woulde iest, because that in all his conuersion he shewed himselfe as a Prophete of God, and had gotten so great credite, as the very reuerence whiche men beare vnto him, was a cause that men thought not that he would abace himselfe to become fellow like and companion with others. And afterward he addeth, they constrained me too let the light of my countenance fall: that is to say, they compelled me to hide my cheerefull countenance, because that although they were glad to see it, yet durst they not shew like countenance agayne, for feare of offending him by any maner of way. This serueth to confirme the matter more which was spoken of already. For the holy Ghost sheweth vs as it were in a looking glasse, what the reuerence of the whole people was in those dayes, towards a man that was indued with excellent giftes, notwithstanding, the same spirit that rested in him, speaketh at this day vnto vs. Then if men honoured him in such wise as they durst not shew lyke countenance when hee laughed, for feare of displeasing him: it sheweth well the obedience which wee shoulde yeld to Gods worde, and that we ought to esteeme and honour the doctrine, in asmuch as wee knowe it proceedeth from him for oure welfare. And herewithall Iob sheweth also after what sort he behaued himselfe among those that honoured him so and gaue him the cheefe roome as vnto a king: namely that he had bin a comforter of the afflicted. Therefore he sheweth that for his part, hee abused not the authoritie that was giuen him by taking vpon him as a Lord, after the manner of false Prophetes (according as it is sayde in Ezechiell) whiche vse suche and extreme sternesse as though they woulde set their feete vpon the necks of those that feare God, by thundring and storming against them, and in the meane while haue not any humanitie in them, nor regarde too reache out their hand to such as are afflicted.

Iob then declareth, that his grauitie was not tyrant-like, that is to say it was not a sturdy stateliness to daunt poore folke, and to make them afraid: but although hee shewed himselfe familiar too them, yet they stood in awe of him, and durst not dailie with him, because they knew he had receiued Gods spirit abundantly. VVherefore let vs vnderstand, that like as he had bin milde and courteouse vnto all men: so also it is a lesson for al those whome God hathe called too the teaching of theyr neighbours, and generally for all the faithfull, euery man in his owne behalfe. Then if God giue vs any authoritie, or so replenish vs with this holy spirit, as wee bee honoured among other men: It is not for vs too aduaunce ourselues, nor to ouerrule them like Lords (for that were an abusing of Gods gifts, and a wresting of them cleane contrarie to his meening:) but it behoueth vs to knowe, that our Lorde imployeth vs too the comforting of the poore that are afflicted: that is to wite, that such as seeke too serue God with all lowlinesse may bee cheered by heering and seeing vs. For like as Gods worde is hated of the wicked sort, and of the despisers thereof, because it telleth them of their destruction: so also they that are cast downe in themselves and are not aduauced with pride, presumption or stubbornesse, but are alwayes lowly minded, and to bee short all the scho-lers of Iesus Christ, must needs be cheered at his doctrine, according to his saying, come vnto me all ye that laboure and are heauy laden, and I will refresh you. So then let suche as haue the charge to vter Gods word, looke wel that they make the doctrine which they carrie, to be found sweete and amiable to all suche as are oppressed and overwhelmed in themselves through the knowledge of their own wants and miseries. And therewithall, if they deale roughly: let it be towards those that haue neede to be roughly handled and tamed by reason of the hardnesse that is in them.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledging of our sins, praying him that when he hath made vs perceiue them, he will also giue vs such repentance as wee may hartely desire to be healed by the remedies that he sendeth vs: and that for asmuch as his word is the true medicine to purge all oure diseases, he will make the same to worke effectually: and when he hath giuen vs health, hee will feede vs with the sellesame foode, and strengthen vs more and more thereby, so as we may thew by effect, how it is hee that lyueth in vs and therefore that we may not liue any more after the worlde and the flesh, notwithstanding that we dwell heere: but that our liuing may only be to feed our soules with his worde, vntill hee haue called vs into the kingdome of Heauen with his Angell, where we shall neede no more teaching, nor to haue the meanes which are requisite for our infirmitie as now. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only to vs, but also too all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignoraunt soules from the miserable bondage of erroure and darknesse, too the right way of saluation, for the doing whereof, it may please him to raise vp true and faithful ministers of his worde, that seke not their owne profite and vaynglorie, but onely the aduaancement of his holie name. &c.

2. But

9. But now am I their song and their matter to talke vpon.

10. They abhorre me and flee farre from me: and forbear not to spit in my face.

WE haue seene the honoure wherein Iob had bin for a time: and his reherſing of it is, to the ende that by comparing it with the reproche wherein he was, hee mighte shewe how he had the more cause too be sad, and that it was an intollerable greete to see himseife scorned with extremitie, euen of those that had feared him and stood in awe of him afore. Now when a man hath bin aduanced to great honoure and high estate, and afterward seeth himselfe despised, it is a naturall thing for him too be greued the more thereat. For he looketh not vpon the thing that is left him, but vpon the excellent state from whence he is false. A poore man that shall haue liued at home in the countrie, and neuer tasted of honoure and pomp, is alwayes at a poynt with himselfe, when men skorne and disdain him, or shew any token of contempt towards his person. The good men also which shall haue liued in simplicitie, will not be so greatly greued at it, but will ouerpasse it. But as for him that hath bin brought vp in pleasure, and hath had abundance of riches, he can abide no shame without deadly wounding to the hart, by cause men hild him in some estimation. And although men come not too spite him to his face: yet if there bee any crooked dealing that tendeth to the shaking of him off, and to his contempt, it greueth him sore. Ye see then how it is a naturall thing for such as haue bin in honoure, to be vnable to beare their owne defacing, and to be the more greued at it. And that is the thing that Iob declareth heere. For like as he had declared the reuerence that me bare vnto him, in somuch that all men gaue eare to him, not in respect of his riches, but by cause God had giuen him wisdom and discretion aboue other men, so as they might rest vpon him, and he was as a mirroure and patterne of all vertue for the to take example at throughout his whole life: So now when he saw himselfe skorned, and euery man pointed at him with their finger, it is a crosse much heauier and bitterer for him to beare, than if he had neuer bin aduanced heerebefore. But heereof we haue a good lesson to gather, which is, that commonly when a man is noozed in pleasure, therby he waxeth ouertender: in somuch that it is not for our profite to be so brought vp in honoure, so as men should neuer displeas vs, nor speake any thing to vs that shoulde not rather tickle our eares than scratch them. VVhy forsoer we know that our Lord commendeth vs aboue all things, if we be patient and acknowledge our faults when we be blamed to our faces. If men yeld vs no honoure, but rather scorne vs: let the same put vs in miad, that we haue not honoured our God to whome at honoure belogeth, and therefore it is good reason that wee should receiue such reward of shame vpon our heads. God then intendeth to trie our lowlinesse in this behalfe, by our meeke receiuing of the iniuries that men do vnto vs withoute stomaking of them. For this delicate bringing vp of vs in pleasure (as I said) causeth vs to be vnpatient, so as we cannot beare any thing: but as soone as a man doth but pointe at vs with his finger, it greueth vs, yea and it is such a corzie to vs, as we wote not which way to turne vs. Then if our Lord inure vs to the suffering of wrongs and reproches: let vs learne that therein he procurerth our welfare and profite, to the intent we should be all whole and sound as they say. And this is the cause why Sainthe that we may passe through shame and reproch, as well as through honoure. If God list to haue vs in elimination, let vs not therevpon gather, that we shall alwayes continue in that state, nother let vs sette our selues with vaine glory and ambition. But let vs vnderstand that our Lord bindeth vs so much the more vnto him, for the good edifying of our neighbours. VVhen a man is in any preheminance, he ought to consider, that all men looke vpon him, and that our Lord hath set him as a candle on a cubbard, or a table, to giue light. Therefore it standeth him in hand to walke the more carefully, and to beware that he giueth no occasion of stumbling vnto any man. Thus yee see how the honoure which God giueth vs ought to be applyed, not to our owne vaine glory, but to the edifying of our neighbours. And on the other side also, let vs marke how Sainthe Paule saith, that it behoueth vs to be thoroughly acquainted with reproches, & to haue our eares beaten with them. If men slander vs, let vs neuerthelesse take all in good woorth, and yet notwithstanding let vs take good heede, that their scoffing at vs may not be for our faults. Furthermore, if our conscience be cleere before God, so as we be sure that they which raile vpon vs and backbite vs, do it of malice & without cause: let vs put it ouer wholly vnto God, and contente ourselues with his allowance. And therewithall (as I said) let vs be vtterly inured therevnto a long time before had. For it is a lewd thing, when men be so tender and haue their eares so nice, as they are able too beare no misreport.

Thus ye see what we haue to mark in this text. But for asmuche as this doctrine is hard to practise: lette vs also marke the examples that are giuen vs in the scripture. Behold Dauid, for we will take a man renoumed among others. After he had bin king and continued in such prosperity as it was open seene that God guided him with his had, & that he was not auanced by worldly meanes, nor by his owne pollycie, but after such a sorte as God meant to shew a speciall working of his owne power in him: After he had bin so honoured: behoid he was afflicted in the turning of a hand, yea and that by his owne sonne. Stones were throwen at his head. Semei his own subiect persecuted him both in deedes and words, & spited him saying, thou murderer thou receiuedst thy payment. VVherein he vpbraided him as if God had set him the reward due for the cruelties which he had committed against the house of Saule. Neuerthelesse, Dauid who might well haue bin inflamed with anger against Semei, specially considering the circumstances which we haue touched, in that he sawe his owne subiect bend himselfe openly against him being so excellent and renoumed a king: Firſte and formeſt calleth too mynde, that it was God which had exalted him, yea and that hee had done it of his owne meere grace, and that wheras he was now cast downe: the same came not by any casualtie of misfortune, but of Gods will, who woulde haue hym bayted by men. It is God (saith hee) whyche hath appoynted hym too doo so: not that Semeis outrage and pride was allowed of God, but by cause Dauid knewe that the same came not too passe withoute the heauenly prouidence. And therefore hee humbleth himselfe too the furtheraunce heereof: it booted hym greatly that he had bin brought vp as a poore countrey cloyne or a shepherd or a neateherde with his father: For in his youthe hee kepte his fathers lambes, and was not broughte vp so dayntily, as not too knowe what

what it was to be scorned: that bringing vp therfore did greatly profite him. And heere ye see why I said that if God should not waken vs, but rather suffer vs to be alway flattered by men: if it woulde not bee for oure behoofe. VVherefore let vs vnderstand, that when me vse such missayings and raylings against vs, god doth by that meanes prepare vs, to the ende it should not be straunge to vs, if he lilled now and then to abace vs. Now then when such extremities betide vs, our Lord prepareth vs to pacience. And therevpon let vs marke the example of David, who was a man subiect to passions as we be, and yet notwithstanding submitteth himselfe willingly, whē he perceiued it to be Gods will that hee should bee as it were torne in peeces, yea though it were wrongfully. For that is not the matter that must grieue vs: but rather we must be of good cheere when our consciences aunswere well for vs before God, and when wee knowe that men persecute vs wrongfully. This (saye I) is a thing that ought to vphold vs the better: for we must not be foolish as to say, what now, what cause can men find to scorne me after this sort? True it is that if we be reproched for our sinnes sake, the same oughte to frame vs so much the more vnto pacience. But if our Lord suffer vs to be slandered by them, & to be scorned by thē, when notwithstanding we shal haue liued wel, & not haue giue occasion to the wicked and to backbiters to do vs iniurie: let vs assure ourselues that our Lord hath graunted vs a singular grace, in exempting vs so frō the spitefulnessē of me, as al their ill wil towards vs is without cause. And therfore if he wil haue vs to suffer vniustly, let vs passe thorough it, and not think it strange. Thus ye see the doctin which we haue to gather vpon this text. But now it behoueth vs to marke, that although the graciouse gyftes and benefytes which we shall haue receiued at Goddes hand ought to comfort vs in our afflictions: yet notwithstanding it is not possible, but that if we haue ben in estimation, it will be a great greefe and a dubble hart sore to vs, to see our selues scorned afterward: but yet behoueth it vs to resist such temptations. Our pacience must not be a senselesnesse: but it consisteth in this, that when we feele the things which are declared heere by Iob: yet neuerthelesse we take courage too walke still as before God: and if it please him that wee shall bee wrongfully slandered, we arme ourselues against such battels, that we may not be foyled howsoeuer the world go. For the thing that Satan practiseth by stirring vp maliciouse folke, and by inforcing them to slander and backbite vs, is that wee should conclude that wee haue lost oure time in doing good. VVhat: I haue indeuered too lyue without blame. I haue streined my selfe to do good to every man. There is no man that can say that I haue eyther done him hurt or harme, and yet I see I am persecuted after this maner. VVhat haue I gayned then by walking vprightly? Thus ye see that the craft and pollicie of Satan, is to make vs beleue that we lose oure labour in doing good: and therevpon to carrie vs so away, as we should no more sticke to any or hinder men. And on the other side let vs marke, that mēs vnkindnes ought to prouoe vs so much the more to remit ourselues wholly vnto God, being sure that it is he to whome we must yield our account, and that his allowing of vs ought to suffice vs. Do we then see men vnthankfull towards vs, so as when we haue indeuered too do them good, they turne and spit in oure faces, and burden vs with false slander? Let vs assure ourselues that thereby God calleth vs too him, as if hee should say, I will haue you too walke as it were before my face, and therefore you shall not be recompenced now heere by low, but be you contented to haue obeyed me in al points. VVhereas me da so raile vpon you: it is too the ende you shoulde not stay yourselues, nother vpon them, nor vpon their opinion, nor be led with such fondnesse as to say, you haue well defered that men should praise your vertues. Thus ye see after what sort we ought to fight against this temptation which is spoken of heere. And by the way let vs marke, that our Lord ment to giue vs a singular instruction by these chaunges heere: I meane by the chaunge that happened vnto Iob, and by all the other chaunges which we see in the holy scripture, and which we behold dayly with our eyes and reade in heathen stories. And why? First of all (as was declared yester day) they that are aduanced too honoure and dignity, haue a bridie too reine them backe from warranting themselves to continue always in that state, and to make them knowe, that in the turning of a hand, God not only can shake them, but also vtterly ouerthrowe them from the highnesse wherein he hath set them: So that instead of the honour which he hath giuen them, they shall see themselves assaulted on all sides with wrongs, scornings, and slanders. Ye see then that all such as feare God, ought too bridle themselves when they are in such state and dignity, and make their account that early or late all may chaunge. For God to proue their meekenesse, will giue men liberty to scorne them, and to do them many outrages. Also we see that the very Paynims knew this, and that they haue made many common Prouerbes of it, whiche serue to take away a excuse from vs. True it is that they did ill put them in vre. And why? By cause it is hard for men to hold themselves sober whē they haue the world at wil and that fortune (as they terme it) doth smile vpon them. It is too common a vice among men to besotte themselves in their prosperitie, and wee can well ynough say it, but there be few of vs that take heede of it. Although then that those sayings be ordinarie euery where, and all men confesse them to be true, namely that a man ought not to glory of his prosperitie, nor to sotte himself in it: nor to beleue that it shall tarrie with him for euer: but that he ought to thinke vpon the chāges and alterations that may happen: yet notwithstanding no man applieth his indeuer to do so: and therefore so much the more behoueth it vs to take paine, by cause we see ourselues so soone ouertaken with the delights and gloriousnesse of this world. To the end therfore that no man suffer himselfe to be caried away by his inordinate lusts, it behoueth vs to marke the doctrine so much the better which is ser downe heere. And so let all men that feare God bethinke themselves while they are in honoure, that God is well able to bring them downe, yea and that they must not promise themselves either monethes or dayes, but dispose themselves euery minute to haue their shoulders ready too beare the burthen of reproch, whensoeuer it shall please God too put them too shame before men. Marke that for one point. And surely considering the frowardnesse which we see in the world nowadays, it standeth vs so much the more in hand to take warning heereof. For it is a wonder that a mā which walketh vprightly can be honoured at this day. True it is that the wicked may be heid so short spite of their teeth, as they shall be fayne to leaue vertue: but yet misse they not afterward to fall againe to such outrage, as to slander the good, and to turne light into darknesse. Although thē that God haue ingraued such an insight in the despisers of his maiestie, that they commend al things which they know to proceede of him: yet neuerthelesse they by and by after fall to such a rage, as they shut their eyes, and become brutish wilfully. And why? the intent to spew out their their blasphemies and railings against God, and against the gifts and grace of the holy spirite. Therefore it is no wonder though such as feare God and walke in soundnesse of life, bee subiect to many slanders and reuylings: specially seeing that Satan thrusteth forward the wicked after that sort, bereauing them of all modestie, yea and inflaming them as it were with a fire rage. VVe see these things too commonly: and therefore it behoueth vs too bee warned, to passe through the wrongs and slanders of this worlde.

By the way, whensoever God listeth too haue vs reuyled after that sort, if it bee by reason of our sinnes as I sayd afore: we haue so much the more cause to hold our tungs, and to beare the reproche quietly which we haue deserued as the iust hire of our faults. And therevpon it behoueth euery man too bethinke himselfe aduisedly: and as soone as any man shall backbite vs, or mock vs, or make vs as it were a tale and laughingstocke, wee must learne to acknowledge, that God putteth vs in mind to make our owne accusation. Euen the heathen men could well skill to say, that our deadly enemies do oftentimes profite vs more than our friends: And why? Our freends beare with vs, and that causeth vs to feede oure owne vices. For although their intent bee not to flatter vs, yet notwithstanding the gentleness which they vse in bearing with vs, is a cause that we thinke not vpo our imperfections to amend them. But our enemies do pricke vpon vs, and seeke all the meanes that can be, to lay open all the faults that are in vs. Therefore when any man findeth fault with vs, and scoffeth at vs, it behoueth vs too thinke thus: goto, I see here that God citeth mee to make mine owne proces, and to accuse my selfe, so as I may be mine owne iudge to condemne my selfe, that by so doing, my shame may be couered and buried. Lo howe wee ought to deale in this behalfe. And if we know that suche as speake euill of vs, haue any reason so to doo, although they do it of malice: yet notwithstanding, let vs not reple to say, this man is led with desire of reuenge. Let vs not looke at any such thing, but let vs pleade guiltie, and pray God to blot out all our offences, to the end we may be quit both before God and the world. Yea and if we know not any reason why the partie shoulde speake euill of vs in that behalfe: yet let vs acknowledge, though I be not faultie in this poynt wherof I am blamed, yet are there many other vices wherof I am guiltie, but my God spareth me, and will not haue them come to the knowledge of men: if it pleased him to stur abroad all my filthinesse: what a stinke would there be? Let vs consider (I say) that by that meanes God intendeth too set secretly before our eyes the sinnes which we woulde haue cast behind our backe, and that is to make vs too hate the euill that is in vs, withoute any flattering of oure selues. Marke that for the second point. And finally, if our consciences be cleere: not that we can in all points and all respects be vterly faultlesse, and like the Angelles: but because that wee see that men haue no cause too persecute vs, but that they do it wrongfully, and our suffering is for that we haue followed Gods word, or for executing our office and duetie faithfully: I say if men do blame vs for it (as in deed they be full of rancour & malice) let vs assure our selues that our Lordes will is, that our receyving of such reward, shall be to the ende we shoulde looke for a better at his hand, as I sayd afore. And if we see no cause at all, but are vterly abashed in our selues: let vs not therefore cease to say, Lorde thou art righteous, whatsoever come of it. Thus ye see to what point it behoueth vs to come.

And heerewithall lette vs indeuer too profite oure-

selues by all the chastizementes which God sendeth vs from day to day: and let vs vnderstand that therby God intendeth to fashion vs to yeeld him the prayse, and too glorifie him, euē when we see good men had in reproch. For like as euerie of vs ought to bee patient, and by his patience to prayse God in all things that he suffereth: so also must wee not blame him, when wee see him suffer good men to be slandered. VVherefore let vs not be too muche greeued when wee see an honest man slandered and reuyled, so as menstungs run riot against him. VVe see what happened vnto Iob. He was (as I haue saide) a patterne of all holinesse: And yet notwithstanding wee see him in such reproch, as he seemeth to be vterly past recouerie. Can we blame God in this behalfe? or can we skorne against him? Nay, rather when wee see such afflictions happen vnto a vertuous man: we ought to humble our selues. And although the reason why God doth so, be not apparant vnto vs: yet notwithstanding let vs assure our selues, he doth it not without cause, and therefore we ought to glorifie him in all his iudgements, although they be incomprehensible to vs. Marke that againe for one other poynt.

But let vs come too those that are so proude, as too disdain, and not onely too disdain, but also villanously to reuile those whome God hath honoured by giuing them excellent vertues. Heere we see in the person of those of whome Iob speaketh that it is a detestable vice. Is there any man that condemneth not this pride, or rather this shamefull beastinesse, that rascalls and naughtipacks should so lift vp themseloes against a man whome they ought too honoure and reuerence for his vertues? Behold, these doggs barke, yea and they bark where they cannot bite. For (as we haue seene already) Iob was none of those that are in credite for their riches or authoritie, or any worldly respect: but for his vertues, bycause men saw as it were these marks of Gods glory in him: and yet ye see heere, that rascalls, and ribawdes, and such as haue no skill either of honoure or honestie, do rushe agaynste him, and raile vpon him with their tongues. See ye not what an intoilerable villanie is this? And may not a man compare them to curre dogges which barke and gnashe their teeth although they cannot bite. So then this vice is not to be borne withall, but we be conuincid by verie truth and reason, that it is to be condemned. VVherefore let vs learne, not to fellow that thing which we mislike and condemne in others. And so when God maketh any changes, so as man falleth downe whereas hee had bene in great estimation afore: Let vs not bee so farre ouerseene, as to crie out against him: but let it come too oure remembrance, that by making suche alterations in this worlde, God intendeth to waken euerie of vs, that wee shoulde not bee presumptuous according too oure owne nature, which is too much inclined therevnto. But I am a poore man, I was neuer in credite or estimation, the worlde hath not heard any talking of me: Nowe if I see a great personage cast downe, it is as if a mountaine fell downe: and what else shoulde I thinke of it, but that our Lorde intendeth too set so much the greater brightness vpon his iudgements, too the intent that I shoulde consider what I am my selfe? I am heere as a fillie woorme, I do but creepe vpon the earthe, and suche a one did as it were soare about the Cloudes: and yet notwithstanding I see that God hath cast him downe before mine eyes.

VVell then: art not thou a starke foole if thou prayse and esteeme thy selfe? Yee see howe the little ones ought too take warning too walke in feare and carefulnesse, and that when oure Lorde dooth so cast downe the great ones before their eyes, they muste consider on their partes, that he can cast them downe likewise when-foeuer they go about to aduance themselves, how stately soeuer men be, God is able inough to pluck them out of their high nestes. And when they be setled in such degree, as it shall seeme vnto them, that fortune cannot do any thing agaynst them: God will shewe that it is to no purpose for men to fancie a fortune as they do, but that God stretcheth out his hande through all things. Nowe if the Princes and great men of this worlde, ought to be afraide when they see God thunder vpon the mightie ones, and such as are aduanced to hie degree: I pray you what ought the meanest sort too do? And furthermore, let vs be well aduised also, that wee list not vp our selues agaynst other men. And in good sooth is it not a thing agaynst nature, when a man that hath nothing in him worthie of commendation, doth so vaunt himself agaynst others? For men may alwayes say, what art thou? Put the case that this man deserue to be set light by: yet is it not for thee to do it. For if we despise a man bicause hee is not rich, or bicause he is not wise, or bicause hee hath no commendable qualities, or bicause he is not a gentleman: we shall finde that there are no more of these things in vs, than in him. VVhat is too bee done then, but that they which are of lowe degree should behaue themselves lowly? Though we were great: yet behoued it vs to stoupe, according as Saint Paule admonisheth vs, that if we be Gods children, he that is in hie degree must stoupe too make himselfe equall with the little ones, yea, euen with the least. But nowe if I bee destitute both of vertue and knowledge, and nobilitie, and worldly goods, so as I haue nothing to boast of, and yet do rush agaynst a poore man, that is as it were troden vnder foote: do not I deserue to be abhorred of the whole worlde? So then, let vs take warning by this text, to looke well to our selues: and if any man bee brought to contempt, let vs consider that as much or more might befall vnto vs, and therefore let vs holde our tongues. This is the instruction which we haue to take. Nowe had we this lesson well printed in our minde, wee shoulde not see so many backbitings, raylings, and scostings as are in the worlde. For euerie of vs woulde take himselfe by the nose (as they saye.) And truly though a man haue in him some vertue, riches, or authoritie, yet notwithstanding no man shall finde himselfe so perfect, but that God giueth him many causes to hang downe his heade. Therefore if euerie of vs examine thoroughly what is in himselfe: Surely wee shall bee hilde in the boundes of modestie, so as wee shall not despise those that are vnder foote, nor vaunte our selues agaynst those whom our Lord putteth to reproch. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde. But nowe let vs come to Iobs woordes: he sayth, that the yong folke mocked him, yea euen those whose fathers he woulde not haue vouchsafed to haue made his dogkeepers. It should seme that Iob speaketh here with great scornfulnesse. For he gathereth together al that is possible for him in disdain of those that scorned him: as whē he sayth, their fathers were beggers, I helde scorne of their seruice, they were rascalles, and poore steruelings that scraped vp the earth with their nayles to gather rootes, and they did eate the berries of Iuniper in the woodes: and nowe I see my selfe scorned by thē. It seemeth (I say) at the first blush, that Iob is inflamed with some scornfulnesse & presumption. But like as I haue declared heretofore that hee expressed the temptations which he felt, but yet consented not vnto them: so it behoueth vs to remember in this text, that Iob looketh vpon the thing as it is, & yet in the meane while ceaseth not too fight agaynst the gripes that gnawed his hart and his marea, to the intent he might patiently beare such reproches. For surely whē we be scorned by such as haue not any comendable thing in thē: that is much more hard and strange to vs. VVee bee despised at honest mens hands, we consider that we must not sooth our selues in this case for to make excuse: for there is some cause why, seeing that such men do find fault with vs. But if they that be wicked & vnruely, & full of al shamefulnesse, do mock vs: surely such an extremitie maketh the reproche seeme the greater, so as we be the more grieued with it. Thus ye see what Iob looked at, in saying that those which were such abiects, had list vp themselves agaynst him. And let vs marke well howe Iob hath declared heretofore, that he was not honored for his riches, for his high estate, or for his noble birth: (those are not the things wheron he grouded himself) but bicause he had walked in so great vprightnesse & perfection, that at the sight of the vertues which God had put into him, men were constrained to yeelde him reuerence, & he had not abused those graces. Nowe thē ye see why he thought it a very hard & grievous case to be despised by those in whome there was nothing worthie of praise. Howbeit forasmuch as we see that Iob was brought so low: let vs vnderstand that if our Lord send the like in these dayes, it behoueth vs to be strengthened by this example. And therefore although the thing be heuy & hard for vs to beare: yet notwithstanding let vs bee so milde as too stoupe as often as it shall please God to afflict vs. Verely there is euē a natural reason which ought to teach vs this. As how? VVe must not think it strange, though verlets and such as haue neither honestie nor good qualitie, nor maners in them, do rush out into rayling. For we see this come to passe dayly: and the thing that is of custome and ordinarie with vs, ought to seeme no noueltie: but wee ought to be thoroughly acquainted with it. But besides this naturall reason, let vs also consider (as I haue touched already) that it is our Lords intent to trie our pacience the better, when he casteth vs after that maner into contempt, not only of those that are in authoritie & estimation, but also of those that are the veriest shakerags, so as we wold thinke our selues to be assaulted rather of brute beastes, than of men. Therefore when our Lord afflicteth vs by any such meanes, it is to meken vs: VVe see it is a general thing, euen vnto all mankind. Howe hapneth it that lice, flees, and flies, and such other vermine make warre both agaynst great and small? For no man can exempt himselfe frō them. And although al men be not combred with filth and stinch, yet notwithstanding our Lord maketh vs subiect to those wormes, as it were to annoy vs, euen though we be kings and princes, so as euerie one of vs must abide it. And wherfore is it so, but only to humble vs the more? So then let vs marke it to be gods will, that when he putteth vs to such extremitie, that persons of hie state vaunt themselves agaynst vs. It is alwayes to the end to take away all vainglorie and presumption from vs. VVherfore in that behalfe let vs be as men that haue put themselves into the hands of God, and say: Lord I see my self vterly vnderfoot, and as it were at the last cast: But vouchsafe thou to slake thy hand, & to draw me out of the reproch wherunto thou hast put me. But herewithall it behoueth vs also to be redie to behaue our selues well in the thing whiche wee see ordinarily: whiche is, that those which crouch and creep & play the liamhounds to a man when he is in authoritie & credit, are redie to leape in his neck, as soone as his state is chaunged, that they see him overthrowne: and they do it with such excessse, as they seeme to take plesure in it. And hereby ye see the maliciousnesse that is hid in them. Therefore like as euerie of vs ought to be armed afore, and to leaue such reproches patiently: so

Ro. 12. d. 16
Phil. 2. a. 3.

also let euery of vs trie himfelfe, to the ende he may behaue himfelfe wifely in that cace. For fometimes we honour thofe whom God abhorreth, and wee perceiue not that in fo doing there is a peece of hypocrifie in vs: infomuch as if God ouerthrow them, oftentimes we will be the firft that fhall runne vpon them. VVe fee fuch examples in ftories of Souldiours that haue rifen agaynft their own Princes. Loke vpo the great Capitaynes which haue borne fuch fway, as they made all to quake, and yee fhall fee that when a great Prince hath bene ouerthrowne, 10 euen they that had hazarded theyr lyues in his defence, fhall (either to gratifie his fuccellour or his enimie) fal to practifing of treafon, & to committing of fuch cruelties, as his enimies would not haue done. For where the enimie would haue fhewed pitie: they which earft had hazarded their liues for his fafetie, doo paffe intoo all outrage fo much the more cruelly and furiously. VVhen we fee fuch examples, let vs call our wittes about vs, and beware that we be not infected with any fuch vice. Moreouer a man might fay heere, that Iob feemeth to be contrarie to himfelfe, when he fayeth, that hee would not haue vouchsafed to haue fet their fathers to be keepers of the dogges of his flockes. For in the laft Chapter hee had fhewed himfelfe too bee of fo great curtefie, as hee was not onely the father of the fatherlefse, and the defender of the wydowes: but alfo the eye of the blinde, and the foote of the lame: that is to fay, that hee had had compafion of all poore folkes, and vfed kindenefse towards them in fuccoring them. Now therefore to fay that he vouchsafed not too matche their fathers with his Dogges, it feemeth cleane contrarie. But let vs marke, that Iob fpeaketh not heere, of his owne difpofition towards them, but of the thing as it was in it felfe: as if hee fhoulde fay, that the worlde counted not the fathers of them woorthie too keepe Dogges. Thus yee fee in effect what Iob ment too fignifie. But yet wee muft beare in minde, that although men haue not any thing in them worthie of eftimation, wee muft not therefore difceyne them, but knowe them to be Gods creatures, and fuch as 30 relemble our felues. Therefore let vs honour them: for whofoeuer is hieft in degree, may perchance alledge this and that, to fort out himfelfe from the reft of men: but yet notwithstanding though he bee a king, he muft haue brotherhood with the pooreft shepherds and neatherds in the worlde, except hee can put off his owne nature. And oute of doubt, as for the cheefe and excellenteft thing that a king hath in him, that is too fay, manhood: hath not the shephearde it as well as hee? O (fayeth the king) I am come of fuch a princely stocke. My freende, are not all men defcended of Adam, and afterwarde of Noe? Surely as touching linages, the worlde feeth 50 howe they go. For the nobleft and moft renowned linages, are not the beft. Infomuche that oftentimes, it were better to be a shepherdes fonne of the Countrey, borne of honeft father and mother, than to be the fonne of fome great perfonage that is had in eftimation of the worlde. For fo may hee oftentimes bee the fonne of a theefe, or of a brothell, notwithstanding, that they bee aduanced too fo highe degree: and therefore that is not the thing wherein they ought too glorie. Contrarywife, wee muft come backe againe too the poynt that hee fpake of: which is, that the excellenteft thing that a king hath in himfelfe, is that hee is a man: and that haue the neateheardes of the Countrey, as well as the king. Therefore let the great and honourable perfonages of the worlde: boaft themfelues as muche as they lift. They may make great bragges in that behalfe: but yet fhall they bee but men ftill: and the veryeft rafcalles and miferableft men whome they difpyfe, are fo as well as they. VVherefore let vs confider, that God hath made vs all of one felfe fame nature, and fet an vnion among vs in that behalfe, too the ende to binde vs one to another. Thus ye fee what Iob ment in this text. And therefore let vs marke, that in all this reherfall he maketh as it were a lively picture, wherein God fheweth vs the changes and alterations of this worlde, to the ende wee fhoulde not bee wedded too it, but paffe further longing for the heauenly life, where wee fhall haue a continuall ftedfaftneffe. Alfo let vs learne too knowe, that in this prefent life, there is nothing but frayletie, and miferie, and that wee fhall alwayes bee fubieft vntoo them, vntill God haue taken vs hence too make vs partakers of the euerlafting reft, whiche hee hath prepared for vs in heauen.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of oure faultes, praying him to make vs feele them in fuche wife, as wee maye learne too condemne them in our felues, according as in deede wee haue all curfedneffe: and therewithall, that if he affliet vs, wee may by that meanes bee inured too be forie for our offences, and to mourne for them, referring oure felues vntoo him, and praying him too deface the 40 faultes that wee haue committed, and to wipe them out of remembrance, not onely before him, but alfo before men, to the intent that our life may not bee a ftumbling-blocke, but an edifying vntoo all men. And that all of vs both great and fmall, may learne to frame our felues too his obedience, that hauing mutuall felowfhip one with another, wee may liue togither in good peace and brotherly loue, and by beholding the changes of this worlde, be led further to the hope of the heauenly life, to the ende we may paffe heere by lowe as through a pilgrimage, wherein hee will not haue vs to reft. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but alfo to all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant foules from the miferable, &c.

11. Bicaufe the Lorde hath broken my corde and afflicted me, they alfo haue broken their bridle agaynft mee.
12. The yong men rife vpat one fide, they pinched my feete, yea and they did befet my pathes vvith their ftumbling blockes.
13. They marrd my vvay, and indeuered to hurt me, and no man helped me.
14. They came againft me as an ouerfloving riuer, & persecuted me wrongfully by reafon of this calamitie.
15. Feare returned vpon me, they purfued mine excellencie as the vvinde, and my welfare paffed avvay as a clovde.
16. My foule vv as poured out vpon me: the time of aduerfitye caught holde of me.

17. My bones are perced by night, and there is no rest in me.
 18. My clothing hath chaunged coloure through the greatnesse of my miserie, and the hemme of my garment cleaueth to me.
 19. He hath cast me to the ground and I am become as dust and ashes.
 20. VVhen I cry vnto thee thou hearest me not, and though I vvaite, thou regardest it not.
 21. Thou art become cruell vnto me, and art against me vvith the strength of thy hand.

Ycause Iob had heeretofore declared, that men of more value had stepped vp so malapertly agaynste him: hee addeth, that such things coule not haue bin done vnto him, if God had not broken al his strength in suche wise, as hee was weakened, yea & vtterly made feeble to the worldward, so as euery man might despise him. For that is the thing which he meeneth by this similitude, that God had broken his sinew or cord. His meening then is, that whē we be vphild by the hand of God, we haue as it were a strōg rope too hold by: but if it like God to breake that rope, we slide away, and can no longer abide, but all goeth to wrecke with vs. Thus ye see how Iobs meening is, that the rascalles, and such as beare no countenance at all, had not assailed him so malapertly, ne durst haue set themselves agaynste him, vnlesse God had bereft him of hys strength, and left him nothing to mainteine him in hys state. True it is that some expound this texte, as if Iob should say, that mē made a beast of him, so as one while they let him looce, and another while tied him vp again: but that is too much streined. VVe see then what the naturall sense is: and it is a point well woorthy to be noted. For when men do raile after that sorte agaynste vs, it behoueth vs alwaies to come backe to this similitude, that God hath as it were loozened vs, so as there is no more knitting: but we are in cace as if our body were without sinewes, like as if a fagot or a sheaf of corne or so, ne such like thing were vnbound. The thing that cannot holde together of it selfe, had neede to be gathered vp and hild together otherwise. Now of ourselues we haue not any thing that can keepe vs together. And therefore it behoueth oure Lorde too binde vs vp. Marke that for one poynte.

On the contrary part also, when it pleaseth him to vnbind vs, by and by we fall asunder, and there is nothing that can mainteine vs, in somuche that men shall haue their ful scope ouer vs. I meane euen the veriest rascals. VVe haue seene heeretofore, how it is the office of God to gird kings with their girdles and also to cut their girdles asunder: wherby it was signified vnto vs, that where as kings and princes are in authoritie, it is bycause God hath committed the sword vnto them, and holdeth the fast, and will haue them so reuerenced. But contrariwise when God lieth to cut their girdle asunder, there is no more power, strength and authority in them than in women, but much lesse. And heere wee haue a generall doctrine, which euery man must applie to himselfe: which is, that if we haue any apparant vertue or strength, wee must not imagin it to come of ourselues, but bicause god strengthneth vs.

Therefore lette vs alwaies submit ourselues vnto him, too the ende wee bee not touched with vaine presumption. For when God seeth men imagine that they haue that thing of themselves which he hath giuen thē: he bereueth them of it to make them better aduised too know what his grace is, and how they ought to haue esteemed it at suche time as hee made them too feeble it. VVherefore (as I said) let vs learne, not too furnize any vertue or strength in our selues: but let vs acknowledge that we be vphild by the hand of God, like as a sheafe of corne is held together by the band. Therewithall let vs know also, that if our Lorde list to vnbind vs, and to vntie our cord, immediaty we shall fall asunder, and not haue any abiding state, further foorth than it pleaseth him to continue his grace towards vs. And if we happen too bee trampled vnder foote, or to bee troubled and incombered, and yet haue no helpe nor meane too reuenge ourselues, let vs call too remembrance, that men shoulde haue no such aduantage of vs, except it were giuen thē from aboue.

For asmuche then as oure Lorde maketh vs despised, euery man can lift vp hym selfe agaynste vs: and it behoueth vs too beare this lesson well in mynde, too humble ourselues withall. For vntill wee haue the skill too knowe that it is God which putteth vs too reproche, and also which gyueth men leaue too persecute vs: wee shall neuer bee tamed as wee ought to bee. Marke that for one point.

But after that Iob hath spoken so, hee addeth other like complayntes: that is to say, that the yong men which had as it were couched down before him heretofore, rose vp at one side, and tripped vp his heeles to make him fall, or cast stones in his way for him too dash or stumble at. Heereby hee meeneth that hee was mocked on all sides, and had no more the reuerence that hee spake of before. Too bee short, hee meeneth that God had layd hym open too all iniuries. And afterwarde hee addeth, that his soule vexed him: VVherefore hee sheweth that hee was wounded through and through. For it might fall out that a man shoulde bee mocked and not passe greatly for it. But Iob sheweth that the reproches and iniuries which men did vnto him, touched him too the hart. And that is the cause why hee saythe, That his soule had bin persecuted, and his welfare as it were plucked from him. The Hebrue word which hee vseth dothe properly signify Royall, Princely, or excellent: and also bountifull, liberall, willing, or freehearted: and the worde Soule is not expressed.

Therefore it seemeth that Iob meant too name hys soule, and too terme it Royall or princely, as the noblest, freest, liberallest or bountifullest parte, like as kings and princes are termed bountifull or liberall, bycause they be full of liberalitie, and haue wherewith to do it. Howbeit for asmuch as it is the manner of the Hebrue tung diuers times to repete one thig twice: or else to set down two wordes that are neere of signification the one too the other, and tend both to one end: the very meening of this text is, That Iob saythe that his hightnesse was ouerthrown, and his welfare taken quite from him. First therefore he setteth downe the word Excellencie or Hightnesse, and afterward addeth the word VVelfare which hath a further scope. The naturall meening then is, that whereas he had bin in greate dignitie before: nowe all was quite dashed: And whereas hee had bene well garded, so as it myghte seeme that no adueritie coule euer haue touched hym: hys welfare was so appayred and oppressed by men, that hee is become almost vtterly destitute of the comforte of all those whome he had he had vsed theretofore. And hereby we are alwayes put in mynd, (as I touched yesterday) to fense our selues against such chaunges, seing we haue the example of Iob. He was excellent among men for a time, and his state had ben as noble as any mānes. And now behold God setteth him as a horrible gasingstock: Euery man had ben ready to serue him, and it seemed that the whole world should haue fauored him. And yet notwithstanding euen they that had erst ben his friends, become as wild beastes, and raged against him to bereue him of his welfare. Forasmuch as we see this, let vs prepare ourselues, if it please God to afflict vs after the same sort. And if he do it, let it not trouble vs out of measure, seing that the same happened vnto Iob. For although God exercised his seruant in such wise for a tyme, as he might seeme to haue vtterly forsaken him: yet notwithstanding we see that he looked alwayes vpon him with pitie, and the issue sheweth that it was not in vaine for him to haue wayghted his leysure, at whose hand he had received so many benefits before: and to haue called vpon him, and to haue fled to him for refuge. Therefore let vs do the like, let vs repose our selues vpon Gods goodnesse: and let vs hold vs alwayes to his promise, and he will make vs feele that the end shall be none other towards vs, than it was towards Iob. Furthermore although I stand not vpon euery word: it behooueth euery of vs to minde the things that are treated of here. For Iob ment to expresse vnto vs, that his state was so miserable, as it was able to make our heares stand vp vpon our head. And why? First and forme (as I haue shewed) he excuseth himself of his impacience and of his tormenting of himself, bycause his afflictions greued him: For the excessiuenesse of them caused him too do so. In the meane while let vs not doubt, but that the holye Ghoste speaketh by his mouth to the intent that if our aduersities seeme greate and vnable to be borne, we may compare the with the things that happened to Iob. And seing that he was scourged much more than we can be, we must not be so nyce (and as it were childishe) when our aduersities pinch vs, as to think that God afflicteth vs to fore. [But let vs say] how now? did there not happē as much vnto Iob. Yea and was not the miserie which he indured much more excessiue and outrageouse than this? Ye see then how we must learne pacience by that which is declared here at length, touching the aduersities that Iob suffered. And herewithall commeth to this purpose the thing which I haue touched: that is to witte, that the miserie which Iob indured, was with in him, and that he was not only mocked, scorned and wronged by men: but also was cast downe in himself. For although a mānes enemies mock him, and he perceyue well that they backbyte him on all sides: yet if he be at rest in himself, such a man shall not be so greatly tormented, as he that is vtterly dismayed and can indure no more. And vndoubtedly if a man see such crueltie in men, as they are not satisfied with the miserie that he indureth, but also fall to blowing of the fire, and to greuing of him further when they see him as good as half dead already, so as every mā striketh at him to murder him and to increase the torment wherwith he is already afflicted to the vttermoost: that augmēteth his grief and anguish much more. Thus ye see what Iob ment in this streyne when he sayeth that terror tooke bold on him, that he had no reſt, that his pulſes did beate continually, & that he had no releef at all: lyke as a man that is in a contynual agew, or that is so tormented as he hath no leysure to take his breath. Iob then by such cōplaints signifieth, that he is not only mocked as diuers are, which yet for all that forsake not their meate and drinke and myrth, nor as they that are able to defend theselues, so as though men pactize euill against them, they are not able to bring it to passe: but contrarywise he sheweth that he was so afflicted, as he stode in feare of it. And vnder this woord Feare he comprehendeth all the anguishes that we can feele, whē eyther our Lord God, or men, do set themselues against vs. Yea and that word importeth much more than heauinesse or anguish: for heauinesse is a greef for aduersities present: But when we are in feare, it is as if we sawe death threaten vs, and that wee were besieged with many daungers. For then we imagin, how now? Indede I am in miserie already: but that is nothing. For such a misery may happen moreouer: and peradventure also an other on the other side, and yet another to that. Therefore when we foresee such daungers, and it seemeth vnto vs that when we be escaped from one death there cometh a second, and a third, and to be short, we are assailed on all sides: that is a thing that striketh our hart dead: and that is it which Iob meeneth by saying that feare had caught hold of him within: And this text ought to be well marked if vs. For the chief benefit with wee haue and which men do also naturally desire, is to be in safetie: and God also when he speaketh of his blessings, doeth about all things promise vs rest, and that when we be in his custody, we shall sleepe at our ease without feare of being waked, so as we shall not feare to sleepe, euen vnder a tree or by a high wayes side: and although wee had nother dore, nor barre, nor lock, nor key to our chamber, yet we shall be safe vnder his protection. Neuerthelesse wee see how Iob sayeth, that he was possessed with feare. It seemeth then that he had no more trust in God and consequently that he was bereft of the souerain benefit that we desire, and which God hath promised to all his children. And verely the faithful shall alwayes haue finally such rest in theselues, as they may be cheerfull in their aduersities: and that is bycause they rest vpon Gods goodnesse, and know wel that he will neuer forget the. Ye see then a rest which cā neuer fayle at the faithful, so long as they trust in God: and that did Iob wel feele in parte. But herewithall let vs marke, that now and the God will cast his seruants in such trouble (I meene for a litle while) as they shall not know where they be. And this ioy of the holy Ghost is as it were ouerwhelmed and choked in the, so as they cā not resort vnto God, nor warrant theselues that he watcheth ouer the, nor be sure to say, no, no: Howsoeuer the world goeth, yet will my God perſerue mee: indede I perceyue not that he is minded to succour mee: but yet will I tarry his leysure patiently. The faythfull then may at tymes be scarce fully out of doubt: and they shall bee tossed with so greate waues and stormes as they shall not know where to become, but shall be caried with such violence, and tossed and turmoyled after such a fashion, as their rest shall be turned into trouble: and what is to be done then? It behoueth vs to vnderstand, that first of all, to be peaceable, yea euen in the middelt of all our aduersities, it standeth vs in hād to flee to our God, & to be out of doubt that his promising too bee alwayes with vs, is not vaine. Therefore let vs mind Gods promises, that we may be armed with them on all sides, so as we may be quiet in the middelt of our aduersities. For there is none other safetie for vs: but the hope of succour at Gods hand. So long as we haue that, we cannot but fall vpon our feete, as the pro- uerb sayeth. But assone as we be turned away from God, and cānot beleue that he will helpe vs, and hath a fatherly care of our welfare, we are vtterly dismayed and so amazed, as we knowe no meanes in the world to quiet our selues. And therefore let vs learne to settle our selues in Gods promises, if we will not be ouerwhelmed with trembling and fearfulness in the middes of our aduersities.

Furthermore if now and then we be so sore oppressed as we knowe not where to become : yet let vs not cease to resort to our God, hoping that he will chase away our darknesse, and not suffer vs to continue alwayes in such distresse, as there should be no remedie nor asswagement of our sorowes. Now sith wee see that the like happened vnto Iob, and also vnto Dauid, who are twoo myrrors of paciēce, fayth and hope : let vs not be too much discomforted, when it seemeth too the infirmitie of our fleshe, that we be vtterly ouerwhelmed with aduersitie, and feazed with such feare, as we be vtterly forlorne. For surely God will worke continually in his faithfull ones, and although his woork appeare not to the eye : yet shall they feele it. And truly although the faithfull be in such anguish and feare, as there seemeth to be no more hope for them in the goodnesse of God: yet shall they not quayle, but be succoured by him, notwithstanding that they be not able to perceiue his succour by their natural reason. Thus ye see how we ought to procede in our heauinesse, and how wee ought too practise this doctrine to profit our selues by it. And when as Iob addeth, that God had cast him to the ground, and that he was become like dust and ashes (for he had erst sayd, that his garments were changed and cleaued as it were to his skin;) Therby he sheweth that he was vtterly ouerthrowne, and that there was not one sparke of hope of lyfe left in him, inso much that it might haue ben sayd: behold a man vtterly consumed, in whom there reigneth nothing but death. For by these words earth, dust, and ashes he not only meeneth that his strength fayled him : but also that he was become as a dead carse, yea euen as good as half rotten. Iob then sheweth right wel, that there was no more token of life in this extreme afflictio which he indured : But rather that he was condemned, yea euen of all men, wherin it is shewed vs, that our trust must not bee tyed too the things that are seene, but that wee must trust in God, yea euen in the midst of death. And that when we seeme to bee past recovery, yet notwithstanding wee must take hold of the lyfe that God hath promised vs, and continually imbrace it. And herewithall let vs marke also, that Gods power is not subiect too any humane or worldly meanes : but that he worketh after such a fashion, as is incomprehensible and secret vntoo vs. Lo here the twoo things which wee haue too marke in this text, which goe ioyntly one with an other. For why haue wee sayd that fayth must not bee inclosed in the things that wee see, but bycause it is grounded vpon the power of God? But this power is infinite and may not be compassed or ruled by worldly meanes, or by ought that can be seene. For God is able to worke after such maner, as is vnknowne to vs. Seing it is so, it behoueth our fayth also too bee enlarged likewise.

And so, for the better vnderstanding of this doctrine, let vs begin at the second point which I haue touched : which is, that Gods power wherby he intendeth to work for our welfare, is not bouēd within these lower things : and therefore that we must not say, that God will do thus or thus bycause the order of nature is so, or bycause wee see some likelihood of it, or bycause there is such a meane or helpe to compass it. For that were to do him greate wrong, inasmuch as the things that are in him are infinite. Therefore we must not inclose Gods mightie power within our imaginatio and vnderstanding. Like as Gods goodnesse is endlesse and a botomlesse pit : so also are his wisdom and righteousnesse, and the same is to be said of his power. Now if we would comprehend this mightinesse and power : I pray you are we able too inclose it in our brayne? It is vnpossible. So then let vs marke well, that when God intendeth to saue vs, he doeth it not after the common fashion, but worketh by miracle towards vs: inso much that he will rayse vs euen from death. And that is the cause why he chalengeeth the office of sending men to the graue, and of calling them back againe. Also it is sayd in the Psalme: that the issues or ougoings of death are in the hand of our God. VVhen it is sayd of our God, it is to the end that the faythfull should taste the neerenesse of God, and that he should make them feele the thing by experience, which is conteyned heere : namely, that he hath the issues of death [in his hand]. And what are those issues? It is that when death shall haue reigned ouer vs, and we seeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed, so as there is no more hope of life: our Lord can well quicken vs, yea euen after a wonderfull fashion vnknowne vnto vs, and which men cannot perceiue vntill it be shewed by effect. And this is the cause also why Ezechiell had this vision giuen him, that when God vttered his word, the bones that were drye before, and wherein there was no substance, came together, and the sinewes did knit againe, and breth and liuehnesse came intoo them, and so they became liuing men. Thus ye see how we ought to be grounded vpon the inestimable power of our God: that is to wit, that when it commeth to the trusting in him, we must not fal to reasoning: Hath God any meanes to do it? Are the things lykely? or haue we any thing in vs to further him? No no, but God knoweth how too deale, and therefore let vs wayte at his hand. But now (as I sayd) it behoueth our fayth to be enlarged vpon the mightie power of God: and seing that Gods mightie power is not to be measured nor to be inclosed and made subiect too worldly and naturall meanes: our beleeif also must stretch out both hie and lowe, and become infinite. Verely it will neuer be so perfect as it ought to bee: wee shall but only haue some little pece of it. But yet must we labour forward: and although our beleeif be weake, and that we haue receiued it by measure, yet must we always tend to that marke. VVhat marke? Euen to rest ouer selues on God, and to wayte for helpe at his hand. And how shall wee waite for it? must wee rest vpon these earthly things? No no, but euery one of vs must stirre vplimself and consider: well Lord, thou art Almightye. Therefore thou wilt saue vs by thy mightie power which is vnknowne to vs as yet.

Lo what is shewed vs in this strcine. So then, seing that God hath giuen vs such a proof of his mightie power in the person of Iob: let the same confirme vs so much the more. In the end, after that Iob hath spoken of the wrongs and reproches that were done vnto him, and complained of the feare wherewith he was feazed: he directeth himself vnto God, and sayeth that although he turned himself vnto God to call vpon him, he was not heard: yea and that when he bidd on and wayted Gods leysure: God pitied him not, ne made any countenance to regard him, but which worse is, turned toward him as a cruel person. Surely this is the greuouesest temptation that might bee. For if any aduersitie happen vnto vs, wee knowe that Gods setting of vs in this world, is with condicion that wee should be tempted diuers wayes, and martyred with many miseries, too the intent too shew vs that this transitorie lyfe is nothing woorth: and againe if we haue some sorowe, our fraytie beareth it, and if wee bee not stout ynough to comfort ouer selues, we impute it still to the feblenesse of our nature. But when we flee vnto God, and yet feele no ease at his had, but rather that he displeaseth, so as the tyme seemeth to be lost in praying vntoo him: then are we at an vtter extremitie. VVhy so? For it is a soueraine remedie which God giueth vs, when he sayeth sayeth, come vnto mee when you are at an afterdeale, yea and as good as dead, and you shall perceyue that I haue power to quicken you. I recouer those that are quayed, I rayse vp them that are dead, and I fetch them out of their graues which were suncken in it, yea euen so depe as it might seemeth that they should neuer come out again. God therefore is liberal ynough to promise vs that he wil neuer refuze our prayers: but come we to seke him, he shrinketh away and seemeth to be deaf. This is a tēptation that is able to ouerwhelme vs vterly. Therefore let vs marke well this text, how Iob ment to declare that he was come euen vnto hell, and that he was not chastised after the common fashiō, but that God (to outward appearāce) had so forsakē him, as he might cōclude, I haue hetherto bē deceiued in seruing God, & I haue beguiled myself in hoping that he wold helpe me and be my sauour: and why? For in deede he sayth that his seruants shal be afflicted, howbeit he calleth thē to him, saying, cal vpon me in the day of thy trouble, and I wil heare thee, and thou shalt glorifie me for the same. I hē ought we to hope for life euē in death, through his power. For behold, God openeth vs the gate when he sayth that he is nere al those which cal vpō him in truth. But now (saith Iob) if I seeke thee I find thee not, if I call vpon thee thou answerest me not, I knock and the gate is still kept shut: VVhy sayth he so? For a mā might first demād whether God hath not performed the said promise which he made to al the faithfull, of being nere to al those which call vpon him. For although those texts were not yet writtē: yet did not God cease to haue pitie vpō his continually. Howbeit in causing thē to be written afterward, he had declared what a one he is, and what a one he hath always shewed himself to be. Then if Iob had lost his labour in praying vnto God: these promises should haue ben false, that God wil be nere vnto all those that cal vpō him in truth: and that he will heare all those that call vpon him, and graunt what soeuer is asked him in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: yea and that he wil be ready to succour vs before we open our mouth. But let vs marke wel, that although Iob did not as then perceue that God wold succour him: yet notwithstanding he knew it in the end, & God also made him to feele it, according as we see euē by that which is come to passe. Let vs marke I say that wee must not iudge of Gods helpe, according to euery momēt of time. For that were to great a restrayning of it: but wee must tary the end, and though we see that our Lord openeth not his eares to our requests, yet shall the end of our afflictions be always happy, if we continue in calling vpon him. So then howsoeuer the world go with vs: let vs not surmize that he wil not heare vs whē we besech him. For why? we see what happened vnto Iob, when he sayth they shal cry and not be heard, it is a threatning that cā light vpon none, but the vnbeleuers. For if wee cry, namely in faith and hope: it is certain that the promise which was spokē of shal be vnfailible. But forasmuch as the crying of the faithlesse is but a howling and roaring without any trust in God: and that although they know that without him they be but forlorne & fordone, yet they set not their minds vpō him: therefore they are not heard. VVherfore syth we see this temptation of crying and not being heard did light vpō Iob. let vs cōclude that if God make not cōtēnāce to heare vs, it is not for that he reiecteth our prayers or passeth not for thē: but he holdeth aloof to make vs cōtinue in praier. For it is not ynough to haue praied once, and to haue said, alas lord wilt thou not pity mee? But we must hold out in it, and if he delay, wee must not cease to passe yet stil further, vntill we know that he hath heard vs. Furthermore let vs mark wel, that although god pretid not to heare our prayers: yet notwithstanding he sheweth that he heareth thē. And that it is so: behold, Iob who complaineth that he cried & was not heard, had ben vterly ouerwhelmed if our Lord had not heard his request: howbeit that he perceiued it not, and thus yee see how our Lord worketh oftētimes in vs, and yet to our imaginatiō we cā not discernē that he helpeth vs, and why? For if we stand scanning after what maner God helpeth vs, it entreth not into our vnderstāding. VVhy? for we be rude and grosse, neuerthelesse our lord sheweth vs in time, that he ceased not to be nere vs, euē when we thought he had forsaken vs. And although his neerenesse were secret: Yet ceased he not to make his power droppe down into vs cōtinually. So then let vs inure ourselues with these temptations: namely, that whē we pray vnto God in our troubles, and feele no ease but, rather that the mischeef increaseth, & that God whetteth himself against vs, to greue vs the more when we seeke vnto him: we must not therefore be out of hope, but tarry his leysure patiently, and say: Truth Lord, this battayle is right fore: But what for that? Seing that Iob which was a weake man as wee bee, hath passed that way: let vs pray God to strengthen vs by his holy spirit. For the grace which he shewed to Iob at that time, and to Dauid in his time, and to all the rest of the faythfull in their tymes: is not abated at this day. Ye see then that it behoueth vs to fight till we haue fully gotten the vpper hand of this temptation which is greatest of all others: which is, when we call vpō God and are not herd. But there is yet more when Iob sayeth, thou hast turned thy self agaynist me, and art become as though thou wert cruel. By this saying hee meeneth not only that he was not deliuered from his miseries and aduersities, nor eased of them: but also that the fire seemed to be the more kindled, that the gulfes seemed to open the wyder, and (to be short) that he appayred his case by calling vpon God, as though he did put God in mynd too punish him the more. You may see now, that it is a greate temptation for a man to pray in his calamitie and not to be herd: and as Iob hath felt that, so may we also oftētimes feele it. But it is a farre greater greef when we looke to neere vpon it (that is to say) when our calling vpon God doeth so litle auayle vs, as it seemeth rather to prouoke him more, and that our so dooing maketh him the feercer against vs. How so? As thus: ye be importunate vpon mee, and I will giue you as much as you are able to beare: my rodde were light before, I did but as it were tick you with my litle finger: but now I will lay on you with mayne stroakes, I will drawe my sword and beate you downe to the ground. It seemeth then erewhyles that we gayne nothing by praying, but only put god in mind to be more rough and sharp with vs, and to vex vs the more, and to make our afflictions the greuouiser, and to excede so farre as to consume vs vterly. Lo what shall seeme vnto the faithfull, as euery one of vs shall find in himself. But what is to be done here vpon? let vs marke well how it is declared here by Iob, that we must not think it strange whē God listeth to try our faith after that sort, nor say that we faynt, and that the miserie shall but increase by it. For although he heare vs not at the first, but pretend to be as yet still more stirred against vs: yet notwithstanding although such things come in our mynd, let vs trust that he will succour vs, and that according as our troubles increase: so also he will succour vs in such sort, as he will not suffer vs to quayle. Then shall we be continually vpheld by his hand, howbeit after an vnknowne maner: and when he shall haue throughly exercised our faith, he will make vs to feele, that he was not alienated from vs when he afflicted vs. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to practise this sentence, to the end that if wee seeme not to be heard, we may not faint, nor be dismayed and overcome, but hold out to the uttermost, whatsoeuer temptation God sendeth vs. Yea and though wee see death present before our eyes, inso much that we be as it were drowned in the gulf of hell: yet let vs not doubt, but that like as our good God heard his seruant Iob: so also in the end he will giue a good and happie issue to all our aduersities.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to touche vs in such wise, as we may turne to him with true repentance, and that by being exercised in the manifold wants, miseries, and afflictions that linger vpon

vs in this temporall life, we may be rightly humbled vnder his obediēce, to giue ourselues wholly to his seruice, and to put ourselues intoo his hand, acknowledging that he hath all power and auctoritie ouer vs: and that in the midst of all the distresses wherewith we be combed, it may please him so to assuage all our griefes by the grace of his holy spirit, as wee may still reioyce in him, and alwayes trust in his goodnesse, euē till he haue deliuered vs from all the necessities and miseries of this mortall life, and called vs to his heavenly rest. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to al people and nations &c.

The cx. Sermon, which is the third vpon the .xxx. Chapter.

21. Thou art become cruel vnto me, and hast caught mee vp vwith the force of thy hand.
22. Thou hast lifted mee vp about the vvynd, and caused me to ryde vpon it, and made my vvit to fayle.
23. I know that thou wilt put mee into the graue, in the house appointed for all that liue.
24. Yet shall none stretch out their hand thither, although many cry in their affliction.
25. Haue not I wept vwith such as had hard dayes, and hath not my soule bē sory for the poore?
26. I haue looked for good, and euill is come vpon mee, I vwayted for lyght and behold here is darkenesse.
27. My bowels boyle, and there is no rest in the tyme of the aduersitie that hath caught holde of mee.
28. I go mourning, and cry out in the congregation.
29. I am as it were a brother to dragons, and a companion to Estriges.
30. My skin is become black vpon mee, and my bones are dryed vp.
31. My harp is turned to vweeping, and myne organs to the voice of lamenting.

Haue declared heretofore how gret a temptation Iob indured, when it seemed that his praying to God did him no good. For that is our last refuge in al our aduersities, and the soueraine remedie that can neuer fayle vs. Then if it seeme that we be disappointed of our hope, & that God do make as though he were deaf, and (to be short) that we profit not at all by our prayers and supplications: It is as it were a hell that gapeth open vpon vs, and we must needs fall into vter dispaire, if God hold vs not back, and shew that his delaying to succour vs, is not without cause. Then if God wrought not with a singular power in this behalf: Surely we should vterly ouerwhelme when we find no relief of our miseries by praying vnto him. Now seing that this happened vnto Iob: let euery of vs dispose himself after his exaple. And if God do now and the suffer vs to linger in payne, (as often times it commeth to passe) and we be not succored at his hand as we would wish: let vs tarry patiently and fight against such temptations, yea and let vs do our indeuour also to obey him. For it is not ynough for vs to pray vnto God: but wee must also brydle our afflictions. So as if aduersitie presse vs, and we be troubled that we can no more: yet neuerthelesse we must abyde still in this stedfastnesse that is spoken of here. And so if we haue ben subiect to the good wil of our good God for a time, let vs continue in the same to the end: and if it seemed to vs that we were ouercharged, yea euen in the middes of our aduersities: let this presente example come to our remembrance, that the end wil shew, that although God hyde himself from his seruants, and make them not to feele his working at the first, yet he neuer forgetteth the, but heareth them at length, when he perceiueth the conueniēt time. But let vs remember the Apostles lesson, that faith must be ioined with paciēce, & that we must be exercised in many battailes before we come to the triumph: for this life is ordeined to fight in. In the text here followeth that which I haue touched already: namely, that god shewed himselfe cruel towards Iob. Now when he speaketh so, it is not to accuse God of vnrighteousnes: but to shew the extremitie of the paine that he felt. The if we be tormented with any excessiue rigor, we may well terme the same a crueltie, but yet it foloweth not that we shuld condempne God for it. Ye see then what Iobs meening was. And for the beter conceiuing hereof, let vs beare in mynd what hath bin declared heretofore: namely, that the faithful which are pressed by the hand of God, do feele so terrible anguish as is not possible to be expressed. It is not without cause that David in bewailing the afflictions that God laid vpon him, vsed these similitudes, namely that he was brought to the bottome of the deepes, that there was not any more light left him, and that his bones were as it were rotten, that the marie of them was dried vp, that all his strength was withered, that his tong cleaued to the roofof his mouth, and that he was condemned to death, so as there was no more remedie. Lette vs marke that his speaking so, is to expresse the vehemencie of the griefe, wherewith the poore faythfull ones are oppressed when they feele the wraethe of GOD. For if our myndes misgiue vs that GOD is againste vs: that passeth all miseries. And the more that wee feare it, so muche the more doth our distresse and tormēt increase: For the vnbeleeuers, the dispisers of God, and al heathenish folke are as it were blockish. Loke vpō a man that is hardned in euill, and he dothe nothing but scoffe at all religion. VVell then, if God scourge him, no doubt but he shall be enforced to crie, alas: But yet for all that, he loketh not to the hand which striketh him: he feeleth the stripes, but hee thinketh not that it is God that striketh: whereas the faithfull by cause, they knowe that all their welfare consisteth in the fauor of God and in his fatherly fatherly goodnesse, do comfort theselues therewith in the midds of their aduersities : but if God seeme to become their enemy, or to haue shaken the of, or to haue withdrawn himselfe from them although they were [otherwise] at their ease, and that all things fell out as they would haue them: yet notwithstanding they conceiue such a hart grief as they knowe not were to become. And this is the cause why king Ezechias sayd, that God was a cruel lion against him, & crushed all his bonds asunder with his teeth. Ment Ezechias to find faulte with God, or to stand in cōtention against him: No, VVhy doth he then liken him so to a lion, and a wild beast that cometh to swallowe vp a pray, and to crasse and breake alasunder: It is (as I sayd afore) to expresse the feare wherewith the poore faithfull ones are tormēted, when they feele Gods wrath, and perceiue their owne sinnes, and see that he sheweth himselfe their iudge. For the must they needes be possessed with such anguish as surmounteth al bodyly harmes. So therefore wheras Iob cōplayneth that God was turned against him with cruelty: he meeneth not that God passeth measure, or that he vsed any tirannie, or that he was vnrighteous: but he expesseth the grief and the excesse of the miserie wherin he was: yet notwithstanding let vs marke well, that when Iob speketh so, he doth it as a man incōbered in his wits, and therefore he is not to be vtterly excused, as I haue declared heretofore. And truly whensoever our affections ouermayster vs, it is vnpossible that we shuld think of God & speake of him so reuerently as we ought to do. VVhy so? For our affections are blind: and if we wil speake of God with such reuerence as he deserueth: it behoueth vs to gather our wits to vs, and to kepe the quiet and peasable. So then seeing that Iob sheweth and declareth here, what his former tētations were: no dout but he speaketh vnadvisedly. And therefore we must not drawe this saying to an exāple, as though it were lawfull for vs to followe them. But let vs cōsider that although a man indeuour to bridle himselfe: yet can he not so ouerrule his infirmitie, but that there is alwayes somewhat in him worthy of blame and to be condemned. And so much the more ought we to be heedfull to brydle our affections, considering that do the best we can, we cānot be so subiect vnto God as were requisite. Thus then there are two things which we haue to note: the one is that when God sheweth himselfe to be against vs, & in steade of receiuing vs to his free goodnesse and loue, seemeth to be our enemy, and our owne sinnes reprove vs: & we see nothing but the signes of his curse vpon vs: It cānot be but we must needes be extremely tormented. Marke that for one point. And it is a necessarie lesson, to the end that euery man may prepare himselfe afore hand that when we come to the pinch, we may be so armed as we fall not into vtter dispare, but that in the middest of the gulfs we may tast some parte of Gods cōfort, to wayte paciētly for the good issue that we see not. And therefore let vs not think it to be a thing to be desired, neuer to haue any anguish at all, nor to be put in any feare. For that is more meeter for the infidels and for the despisers of God, which are become brutish as I haue declared afore. The swine and the oxee feele their miserie no further than their outward sense leadeth them: and euen so fare lewd persones that are doted in their vnderstanding, and would fiane forgette God, and thrust the remembrance of his name vnderfoote. But contrarywise, let vs be sure it is expedient for vs to be wakened from such drowinesse, and to feele Gods wrath, to the end we may walke in the greater warenesse, and learne therby to hūble our selues. For me shall neuer know and acknowledge their owne weakenesse sufficiently, till they haue cited themselves before God. It is sayd that the man is happie which trieth and examineth himselfe. And why? For behold, this retchlesnesse of ours whē our wits be as it were dulled with it, is the hygh way to destruction. And seeing it is good and expediēt for our welfare, to be carefull: let vs vnderstand that it is not without cause that our Lord maketh vs to feele his wrathe, to the intent we should be think vs the better of our sinnes. Marke that for one point. And for the second, let vs marke, that wee can neuer bee brought so well to the obedience of our God and to the ruling of our affections, but there wil be ouergreat gainstruings still, according as we see that although Iob were a mirror of pacience yet notwithstanding he was not so well stayed as to ouermayster himselfe when he spake of God. For he proceeded not with such a reuerence as he ought to haue done, but ranne hedlong into this temptatiō. wherof he was not ouercome, but resisted it although with much ado. Seeing then that the passions which are in vs are so farre out of square: let vs learne to hold them as it were in prison: and when we haue well fought to tame ourselues, let vs still consider that there is much imperfection in vs, and that God should alwayes find wherfore to condemne vs, if he bare not with vs of his infinite goodnesse. Lo what we haue to note. And now to expresse the greate feare, grief, and miserie that Iob was touched with all, he addeth, that God had lifted him vp vpon the wynd, and made him to ryde as it were in the ayre, & caused all his strēgth and substance to faile him. VVhen a man is so caught vp, and carried away as it were in a whirle wind, it is a dreadful thing. For if a man were beate downe and died there: it would not be so terrible, as when God hoyseth him vp into the ayre as it were with a suddaine tempest. VVe see then that Iobs intent is to confirme the matter which he hath declared: that is to wit, that God exerciseth and tryeth his seruants after straunge fashions. And therefore let vs not conceiue Gods wrathe only according to the examples that we haue seene with our eyes, and felt by our owne experience: but let vs vnderstand, that God can try vs by such meanes as are vnknowne to vs, yea eue in such wise as we shall be worse thā forlorne. And whē we know this, let vs also pray God to strengthen vs at our neede: & although that to the outward apparaunce we see nothing on all sides but the graue, and it seemeth that we should be swallowed vp, not only of bodyly death, but also of hel: Yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to cōtinue in the feare of our God, and to rest alwayes vpon the trust of his goodnesse, determining fully to call vpon him, and to flee vnto him alone for refuge, yea though all our senses withstode it, and that it seemed to vs that we were barred from all accesse vnto him. Thus ye see what we haue to minde in these verses. And so let vs not thinke it to be a needlesse tale, when mencion is made of the winds and of the stormes, and of gods making of him to ryde in the ayre: For it serueth to shew that our Lord hath straunge wayes to chastice vs, when it pleaseth him, and that we ought not to be taken vnwares by them for want of hauing thought of them before hand. And furthermore, if we feele not so greate and outrageouse afflictions in vs: let vs assure our selues it is bycause God beareth with vs. So then what ought we to do when we suffer aduersitie? If we be greued and tormēted more th in reason: (for so it may seeme vnto vs,) let vs take example of Iob. How now? Thou art not yet come to the extremitie that this good seruant of Gods was at. And what is the cause thereof, but for that thy God hath respect of thy feblenesse: but he will not handle thee so roughly though he could well do it and hath iust cause so too do. Thou seest then how he vseth gentlenesse still towards thee: what rigour soeuer thou feeleast, thou art not yet so martired as that thou canst say,
